They are not skillful considerers of human things, who imagine to remove sin by removing the matter of sin; for, besides that it is a huge heap increasing under the very act of diminishing, though some part of it may for a time be withdrawn from some persons, it cannot from all, in such a universal thing as books are; and when this is done, yet the sin remains entire. Though ye take from a covetous man all his treasure, he has yet one jewel left, ye cannot bereave him of his covetousness. Banish all objects of lust, shut up all youth into the severest discipline that can be exercised in any hermitage, ye cannot make them chaste, that came not thither so: such great care and wisdom is required to the right managing of this point. Suppose we could expel sin by this means; look how much we thus expel of sin, so much we expel of virtue: for the matter of them both is the same; remove that, and ye remove them both alike.

This justifies the high providence of God, who, though he commands us temperance, justice, continence, yet pours out before us, even to a profuseness, all desirable things, and gives us minds that can wander beyond all limit and satiety. Why should we then affect a rigour contrary to the manner of God and of nature, by abridging or scanting those means, which books freely permitted are, both to the trial of virtue and the exercise of truth? It would be better done, to learn that the law must needs be frivolous, which goes to restrain things, uncertainly and yet equally working to good and to evil. And were I the chooser, a dram of well-doing should be preferred before many times as much the forcible hindrance of evil-doing. For God sure esteems the growth and completing of one virtuous person more than the restraint of ten vicious.

And albeit whatever thing we hear or see, sitting, walking, travelling, or conversing, may be fitly called our book, and is of the same effect that writings are, yet grant the thing to be prohibited were only books, it appears that this order hitherto is far insufficient to the end which it intends. Do we not see, not once or oftener, but weekly, that continued court-libel against the Parliament and City, printed, as the wet sheets can witness, and dispersed among us, for all that licensing can do?[1] yet this is the prime service a man would think, wherein this Order should give proof of itself. If it were executed, you'll say. But certain, if execution be remiss or blindfold now, and in this particular, what will it be hereafter and in other books? If then the Order shall not be vain and frustrate, behold a new labour, Lords and Commons, ye must repeal and proscribe all scandalous and unlicensed books already printed and divulged; after ye have drawn them up into a list, that all may know which are condemned, and which not; and ordain that no foreign books be delivered out of custody, till they have been read over. This office will require the whole time of not a few overseers, and those no vulgar men. There be also books which are partly useful and excellent, partly culpable and pernicious; this work will ask as many more officials, to make expurgations and expunctions, that the Commonwealth of Learning be not damnified. In fine, when the multitude of books increase upon their hands, ye must be fain to catalogue all those printers who are found frequently offending, and forbid the importation of their whole suspected typography. In a word, that this your order may be exact and not deficient, ye must reform it perfectly according to the model of Trent and Seville, which I know ye abhor to do.

Yet though ye should condescend to this, which God forbid, the Order still would be but fruitless and defective to that end whereto ye meant it. If to prevent sects and schisms, who is so unread or so uncatechized in story, that hath not heard of many sects refusing books as a hindrance, and preserving their doctrine unmixed for many ages, only by unwritten traditions? The Christian faith, for that was once a schism, is not unknown to have spread all over Asia, ere any Gospel or Epistle was seen in writing. If the amendment of manners be aimed at, look into Italy and Spain, whether those places be one scruple the better, the honester, the wiser, the chaster, since all the inquisitional rigour that hath been executed upon books.

Another reason, whereby to make it plain that this Order will miss the end it seeks, consider by the quality which ought to be in every licenser. It cannot be denied but that he who is made judge to sit upon the birth or death of books, whether they may be wafted into this world or not, had need to be a man above the common measure, both studious, learned, and judicious; there may be else no mean mistakes in the censure of what is passable or not; which is also no mean injury. If he be of such worth as behoves him, there cannot be a more tedious and unpleasing journey-work, a greater loss of time levied upon his head, than to be made the perpetual reader of unchosen books and pamphlets, ofttimes huge volumes. There is no book that is acceptable unless at certain seasons; but to be enjoined the reading of that at all times, and in a hand scarce legible, whereof three pages would not down at any time in the fairest print, is an imposition which I cannot believe how he that values time and his own studies, or is but of a sensible nostril, should be able to endure. In this one thing I crave leave of the present licensers to be pardoned for so thinking; who doubtless took this office up, looking on it through their obedience to the Parliament, whose command perhaps made all things seem easy and unlaborious to them; but that this short trial hath wearied them out already, their own expressions and excuses to them who make so many journeys to solicit their licence are testimony enough. Seeing therefore those who now possess the employment by all evident signs wish themselves well rid of it; and that no man of worth, none that is not a plain unthrift of his own hours, is ever likely to succeed them, except he mean to put himself to the salary of a press corrector; we may easily foresee what kind of licensers we are to expect hereafter, either ignorant, imperious, and remiss, or basely pecuniary. This is what I had to show, wherein this Order cannot conduce to that end whereof it bears the intention.

---

[1] court libel The Royalist newspaper Mercurius aulicus, published weekly from 1642 to 1645 and sporadically afterward.

I lastly proceed from the no good it can do, to the manifest hurt it causes, in being first the greatest discouragement and affront that can be offered to learning, and to learned men.

It was the complaint and lamentation of prelates, upon every least breath of a motion to remove pluralities,[1] and distribute more equally Church revenues, that then all learning would be for ever dashed and discouraged. But as for that opinion, I never found cause to think that the tenth part of learning stood or fell with the clergy: nor could I ever but hold it for a sordid and unworthy speech of any churchman who had a competency left him. If therefore ye be loath to dishearten heartily and discontent, not the mercenary crew of false pretenders to learning, but the free and ingenuous sort of such as evidently were born to study, and love learning for itself, not for lucre or any other end but the service of God and of truth, and perhaps that lasting fame and perpetuity of praise which God and good men have consented shall be the reward of those whose published labours advance the good of mankind, then know that, so far to distrust the judgment and the honesty of one who hath but a common repute in learning, and never yet offended, as not to count him fit to print his mind without a tutor and examiner, lest he should drop a schism, or something of corruption, is the greatest displeasure and indignity to a free and knowing spirit that can be put upon him.

What advantage is it to be a man over it is to be a boy at school, if we have only escaped the ferula to come under the fescue of an Imprimatur,[2] if serious and elaborate writings, as if they were no more than the theme of a grammar-lad under his pedagogue, must not be uttered without the cursory eyes of a temporizing and extemporizing licenser? He who is not trusted with his own actions, his drift not being known to be evil, and standing to the hazard of law and penalty, has no great argument to think himself reputed in the Commonwealth wherein he was born for other than a fool or a foreigner. When a man writes to the world, he summons up all his reason and deliberation to assist him; he searches, meditates, is industrious, and likely consults and confers with his judicious friends; after all which done he takes himself to be informed in what he writes, as well as any that writ before him. If, in this the most consummate act of his fidelity and ripeness, no years, no industry, no former proof of his abilities can bring him to that state of maturity, as not to be still mistrusted and suspected, unless he carry all his considerate diligence, all his midnight watchings and expense of Palladian oil,[3] to the hasty view of an unleisured licenser, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferior in judgment, perhaps one who never knew the labour of bookwriting, and if he be not repulsed or slighted, must appear in print like a punie with his guardian,[1] and his censor's hand on the back of his title to be his bail and surety that he is no idiot or seducer, it cannot be but a dishonour and derogation to the author, to the book, to the privilege and dignity of Learning.

---

[1] pluralities multiple church livings held by one person.

[2] ferula...fescue respectively, a cane used for disciplining school children and a straw or twig used as a pointer in instruction.

[3] Palladian pertaining to Pallas Athena, goddess of wisdom.

And what if the author shall be one so copious of fancy, as to have many things well worth the adding come into his mind after licensing, while the book is yet under the press, which not seldom happens to the best and diligentest writers; and that perhaps a dozen times in one book? The printer dares not go beyond his licensed copy; so often then must the author trudge to his leave-giver, that those his new insertions may be viewed; and many a jaunt will be made, ere that licenser, for it must be the same man, can either be found, or found at leisure; meanwhile either the press must stand still, which is no small damage, or the author lose his accuratest thoughts, and send the book forth worse than he had made it, which to a diligent writer is the greatest melancholy and vexation that can befall.

And how can a man teach with authority, which is the life of teaching, how can he be a doctor in his book as he ought to be, or else had better be silent, whenas all he teaches, all he delivers, is but under the tuition, under the correction of his patriarchal licenser to blot or alter what precisely accords not with the hidebound humour which he calls his judgment? When every acute reader, upon the first sight of a pedantic licence, will be ready with these like words to ding the book a quoit's distance from him: I hate a pupil teacher, I endure not an instructor that comes to me under the wardship of an overseeing fist. I know nothing of the licenser, but that I have his own hand here for his arrogance; who shall warrant me his judgment? The State, sir, replies the stationer, but has a quick return: The State shall be my governors, but not my critics; they may be mistaken in the choice of a licenser, as easily as this licenser may be mistaken in an author; this is some common stuff; and he might add from Sir Francis Bacon, "That such authorized books are but the language of the times."[2] For though a licenser should happen to be judicious more than ordinary, which will be a great jeopardy of the next succession, yet his very office and his commission enjoins him to let pass nothing but what is vulgarly received already.

Nay, which is more lamentable, if the work of any deceased author, though never so famous in his lifetime and even to this day, come to their hands for licence to be printed, or reprinted, if there be found in his book one sentence of a venturous edge, uttered in the height of zeal and who knows whether it might not be the dictate of a divine spirit, yet not suiting with every low decrepit humour of their own, though it were Knox himself, the Reformer of a Kingdom,[3] that spake it, they will not pardon him their dash: the sense of that great man shall to all posterity be lost, for the fearfulness or the presumptuous rashness of a perfunctory licenser. And to what an author this violence hath been lately done, and in what book of greatest consequence to be faithfully published, I could now instance, but shall forbear till a more convenient season.[4]

Yet if these things be not resented seriously and timely by them who have the remedy in their power, but that such iron moulds as these shall have authority to gnaw out the choicest periods of exquisitest books, and to commit such a treacherous fraud against the orphan remainders of worthiest men after death, the more sorrow will belong to that hapless race of men, whose misfortune it is to have understanding. Henceforth let no man care to learn, or care to be more than worldly-wise; for certainly in higher matters to be ignorant and slothful, to be a common steadfast dunce, will be the only pleasant life, and only in request.

---

[1] punie from the French puis-ne, a minor.

[2] from a government brief Bacon wrote in 1589 about the government's response to the Martin Marprelate controversy, first printed in 1641 as A Wise and Moderate Discourse.

[3] John Knox (ca. 1505–1572), leader of the Reformation in Scotland.

[4] Among the texts suggested as the one Milton has in mind are Edward Coke's Institutes (1641) and John Knox's History of the Reformation (1644), both cut by censors.

And as it is a particular disesteem of every knowing person alive, and most injurious to the written labours and monuments of the dead, so to me it seems an undervaluing and vilifying of the whole Nation. I cannot set so light by all the invention, the art, the wit, the grave and solid judgment which is in England, as that it can be comprehended in any twenty capacities how good soever, much less that it should not pass except their superintendence be over it, except it be sifted and strained with their strainers, that it should be uncurrent without their manual stamp. Truth and understanding are not such wares as to be monopolized and traded in by tickets and statutes and standards. We must not think to make a staple commodity of all the knowledge in the land, to mark and licence it like our broadcloth and our woolpacks. What is it but a servitude like that imposed by the Philistines, not to be allowed the sharpening of our own axes and coulters,[1] but we must repair from all quarters to twenty licensing forges? Had anyone written and divulged erroneous things and scandalous to honest life, misusing and forfeiting the esteem had of his reason among men, if after conviction this only censure were adjudged him that he should never henceforth write but what were first examined by an appointed officer, whose hand should be annexed to pass his credit for him that now he might be safely read; it could not be apprehended less than a disgraceful punishment. Whence to include the whole Nation, and those that never yet thus offended, under such a diffident and suspectful prohibition, may plainly be understood what a disparagement it is. So much the more, whenas debtors and delinquents may walk abroad without a keeper, but unoffensive books must not stir forth without a visible jailer in their title.

Nor is it to the common people less than a reproach; for if we be so jealous over them, as that we dare not trust them with an English pamphlet, what do we but censure them for a giddy, vicious, and ungrounded people; in such a sick and weak state of faith and discretion, as to be able to take nothing down but through the pipe of a licenser? That this is care or love of them, we cannot pretend, whenas, in those popish places where the laity are most hated and despised, the same strictness is used over them. Wisdom we cannot call it, because it stops but one breach of licence, nor that neither: whenas those corruptions, which it seeks to prevent, break in faster at other doors which cannot be shut.

And in conclusion it reflects to the disrepute of our Ministers also, of whose labours we should hope better, and of the proficiency which their flock reaps by them, than that after all this light of the Gospel which is, and is to be, and all this continual preaching, they should still be frequented with such an unprincipled, unedified and laic rabble, as that the whiff of every new pamphlet should stagger them out of their catechism, and Christian walking. This may have much reason to discourage the Ministers when such a low conceit is had of all their exhortations, and the benefiting of their hearers, as that they are not thought fit to be turned loose to three sheets of paper without a licenser; that all the sermons, all the lectures preached, printed, vented in such numbers, and such volumes, as have now well nigh made all other books unsaleable, should not be armour enough against one single enchiridion,[1] without the castle of St Angelo of an Imprimatur.[2]

---

[1] coulters A coulter is the sharpened edge of a plough.

And lest some should persuade ye, Lords and Commons, that these arguments of learned men's discouragement at this your Order are mere flourishes, and not real, I could recount what I have seen and heard in other countries, where this kind of inquisition tyrannizes; when I have sat among their learned men, for that honour I had, and been counted happy to be born in such a place of philosophic freedom, as they supposed England was, while themselves did nothing but bemoan the servile condition into which learning amongst them was brought; that this was it which had damped the glory of Italian wits; that nothing had been there written now these many years but flattery and fustian. There it was that I found and visited the famous Galileo, grown old a prisoner to the Inquisition, for thinking in astronomy otherwise than the Franciscan and Dominican licensers thought.

And though I knew that England then was groaning loudest under the prelatical yoke, nevertheless I took it as a pledge of future happiness, that other nations were so persuaded of her liberty. Yet was it beyond my hope that those Worthies were then breathing in her air, who should be her leaders to such a deliverance, as shall never be forgotten by any revolution of time that this world hath to finish. When that was once begun, it was as little in my fear that, what words of complaint I heard among learned men of other parts uttered against the Inquisition, the same I should hear by as learned men at home uttered in time of Parliament against an order of licensing; and that so generally that, when I had disclosed myself a companion of their discontent, I might say, if without envy, that he whom an honest quaestorship had endeared to the Sicilians was not more by them importuned against Verres,[3] than the favourable opinion which I had among many who honour ye, and are known and respected by ye, loaded me with entreaties and persuasions, that I would not despair to lay together that which just reason should bring into my mind, toward the removal of an undeserved thraldom upon learning. That this is not therefore the disburdening of a particular fancy, but the common grievance of all those who had prepared their minds and studies above the vulgar pitch to advance truth in others, and from others to entertain it, thus much may satisfy.

And in their name I shall for neither friend nor foe conceal what the general murmur is; that if it come to inquisitioning again and licensing, and that we are so timorous of ourselves, and so suspicious of all men, as to fear each book and the shaking of every leaf, before we know what the contents are; if some who but of late were little better than silenced from preaching shall come now to silence us from reading, except what they please, it cannot be guessed what is intended by some but a second tyranny over learning: and will soon put it out of controversy, that Bishops and Presbyters are the same to us, both name and thing. That those evils of Prelaty, which before from five to six and twenty sees were distributively charged upon the whole people, will now light wholly upon learning, is not obscure to us: whenas now the pastor of a small unlearned parish on the sudden shall be exalted Archbishop over a large diocese of books, and yet not remove, but keep his other cure too, a mystical pluralist. He who but of late cried down the sole ordination of every novice Bachelor of Art, and denied sole jurisdiction over the simplest parishioner, shall now at home in his private chair assume both these over worthiest and excellentest books and ablest authors that write them.

---

[1] enchiridion a hand-book, but probably also punning on another meaning of the word in Greek, a hand-knife.

[2] St Angelo the papal fortress across from the Vatican.

[3] he... Verres Cicero, whose oratory drove Gaius Verres from office.

This is not, ye Covenants and Protestations that we have made,[1] this is not to put down Prelaty; this is but to chop an Episcopacy; this is but to translate the Palace Metropolitan from one kind of dominion into another; this is but an old canonical sleight of commuting our penance. To startle thus betimes at a mere unlicensed pamphlet will after a while be afraid of every conventicle, and a while after will make a conventicle of every Christian meeting. But I am certain that a State governed by the rules of justice and fortitude, or a Church built and founded upon the rock of faith and true knowledge, cannot be so pusillanimous. While things are yet not constituted in Religion, that freedom of writing should be restrained by a discipline imitated from the Prelates and learnt by them from the Inquisition, to shut us all up again into the breast of a licenser, must needs give cause of doubt and discouragement to all learned and religious men.

Who cannot but discern the fineness of this politic drift, and who are the contrivers? That while Bishops were to be baited down, then all Presses might be open; it was the people's birthright and privilege in time of Parliament, it was the breaking forth of light? But now, the Bishops abrogated and voided out the Church, as if our Reformation sought no more but to make room for others into their seats under another name, the episcopal arts begin to bud again, the cruse of truth must run no more oil, liberty of printing must be enthralled again under a prelatical commission of twenty, the privilege of the people nullified, and, which is worse, the freedom of learning must groan again, and to her old fetters: all this the Parliament yet sitting. Although their own late arguments and defences against the Prelates might remember them, that this obstructing violence meets for the most part with an event utterly opposite to the end which it drives at: instead of suppressing sects and schisms, it raises them and invests them with a reputation. "The punishing of wits enhances their authority," said the Viscount St. Albans; "and a forbidden writing is thought to be a certain spark of truth that flies up in the faces of them who seek to tread it out."[2] This Order therefore may prove a nursing-mother to sects, but I shall show how it will be a step-dame to Truth: and first by disenabling us to the maintenance of what is known already.

Well knows he who uses to consider, that our faith and knowledge thrives by exercise, as well as our limbs and complexion. Truth is compared in Scripture to a streaming fountain;[3] if her waters flow not in a perpetual progression, they sicken into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition. A man may be a heretic in the truth; and if he believe things only because his Pastor says so, or the Assembly so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy.

There is not any burden that some would gladlier post off to another than the charge and care of their Religion. There be—who knows not that there be?—of Protestants and professors who live and die in as arrant an implicit faith as any lay Papist of Loretto. A wealthy man, addicted to his pleasure and to his profits, finds Religion to be a traffic so entangled and of so many piddling accounts, that of all mysteries he cannot skill to keep a stock going upon that trade. What should he do? fain he would have the name to be religious, fain he would bear up with his neighbours in that. What does he therefore, but resolve to give over toiling, and to find himself out some factor, to whose care and credit he may commit the whole managing of his religious affairs? some Divine of note and estimation that must be. To him he adheres, resigns the whole warehouse of his religion, with all the locks and keys, into his custody; and indeed makes the very person of that man his religion; esteems his associating with him a sufficient evidence and commendatory of his own piety. So that a man may say his religion is now no more within himself, but is become a dividual movable, and goes and comes near him, according as that good man frequents the house. He entertains him, gives him gifts, feasts him, lodges him; his religion comes home at night, prays, is liberally supped, and sumptuously laid to sleep, rises, is saluted, and after the malmsey or some well-spiced brewage, and better breakfasted than he whose morning appetite would have gladly fed on green figs between Bethany and Jerusalem, his Religion walks abroad at eight, and leaves his kind entertainer in the shop trading all day without his Religion.

---

[1] Milton deploys the rhetorical strategy of addressing the texts that led to the abolishment of episcopacy, including the Scottish National Covenant (1638) and the Solemn League and Covenant (1643).

[2] from Bacon's A Wise and Moderate Discourse (1641).

[3] Psalm 85:11.

Another sort there be who, when they hear that all things shall be ordered, all things regulated and settled, nothing written but what passes through the custom-house of certain publicans that have the tonnaging and poundaging of all free-spoken truth,[1] will straight give themselves up into your hands, make 'em and cut 'em out what religion ye please: there be delights, there be recreations and jolly pastimes that will fetch the day about from sun to sun, and rock the tedious year as in a delightful dream. What need they torture their heads with that which others have taken so strictly and so unalterably into their own purveying? These are the fruits which a dull ease and cessation of our knowledge will bring forth among the people. How goodly and how to be wished were such an obedient unanimity as this, what a fine conformity would it starch us all into! Doubtless a staunch and solid piece of framework, as any January could freeze together.

Nor much better will be the consequence even among the clergy themselves. It is no new thing never heard of before, for a parochial minister, who has his reward and is at his Hercules' pillars in a warm benefice,[2] to be easily inclinable, if he have nothing else that may rouse up his studies, to finish his circuit in an English concordance and a topic folio, the gatherings and savings of a sober graduateship, a Harmony and a Catena;[3] treading the constant round of certain common doctrinal heads, attended with the uses, motives, marks, and means, out of which, as out of an alphabet, or sol-fa,[4] by forming and transforming, joining and disjoining variously, a little bookcraft, and two hours' meditation, might furnish him unspeakably to the performance of more than a weekly charge of sermoning: not to reckon up the infinite helps of interlinearies, breviaries, synopses, and other loitering gear. But as for the multitude of sermons ready printed and piled up, on every text that is not difficult, our London trading St. Thomas in his vestry, and add to boot St. Martin and St. Hugh, have not within their hallowed limits more vendible ware of all sorts ready made: so that penury he never need fear of pulpit provision, having where so plenteously to refresh his magazine. But if his rear and flanks be not impaled, if his back door be not secured by the rigid licenser, but that a bold book may now and then issue forth and give the assault to some of his old collections in their trenches, it will concern him then to keep waking, to stand in watch, to set good guards and sentinels about his received opinions, to walk the round and counter-round with his fellow inspectors, fearing lest any of his flock be seduced, who also then would be better instructed, better exercised and disciplined. And God send that the fear of this diligence, which must then be used, do not make us affect the laziness of a licensing Church.

---

[1] publicans here, tax collectors; Milton links the Licensing Order with tunnage and poundage, a tariff that Charles I had attempted to collect on his own authority (that is, without Parliament).

[2] Hercules' pillars Gibraltar and Abyla, which mark the limit of the Mediterranean; hence, a symbol for any ultimate achievement.

[3] topic folio... Catena reference books that could provide shortcuts to sermon making, respectively a commonplace book, a parallel edition of the gospels, and extracts from the Church Fathers.

[4] sol-fa musical scale.

For if we be sure we are in the right, and do not hold the truth guiltily, which becomes not, if we ourselves condemn not our own weak and frivolous teaching, and the people for an untaught and irreligious gadding rout, what can be more fair than when a man judicious, learned, and of a conscience, for aught we know, as good as theirs that taught us what we know, shall not privily from house to house, which is more dangerous, but openly by writing publish to the world what his opinion is, what his reasons, and wherefore that which is now thought cannot be sound? Christ urged it as wherewith to justify himself, that he preached in public; yet writing is more public than preaching; and more easy to refutation, if need be, there being so many whose business and profession merely it is to be the champions of Truth; which if they neglect, what can be imputed but their sloth, or unability?

Thus much we are hindered and disinured by this course of licensing toward the true knowledge of what we seem to know. For how much it hurts and hinders the licensers themselves in the calling of their ministry, more than any secular employment, if they will discharge that office as they ought, so that of necessity they must neglect either the one duty or the other, I insist not, because it is a particular, but leave it to their own conscience, how they will decide it there.

There is yet behind of what I proposed to lay open, the incredible loss and detriment that this plot of licensing puts us to; more than if some enemy at sea should stop up all our havens and ports and creeks, it hinders and retards the importation of our richest merchandise, Truth; nay, it was first established and put in practise by Antichristian malice and mystery on set purpose to extinguish, if it were possible, the light of Reformation, and to settle falsehood; little differing from that policy wherewith the Turk upholds his Alcoran, by the prohibiting of printing. 'Tis not denied, but gladly confessed, we are to send our thanks and vows to Heaven louder than most of nations, for that great measure of truth which we enjoy, especially in those main points between us and the Pope, with his appurtenances the Prelates: but he who thinks we are to pitch our tent here, and have attained the utmost prospect of reformation that the mortal glass wherein we contemplate can show us, till we come to beatific vision, that man by this very opinion declares that he is yet far short of Truth.

Trust indeed came once into the world with her Divine Master, and was a perfect shape most glorious to look on: but when he ascended, and his Apostles after him were laid asleep, then straight arose a wicked race of deceivers, who, as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the good Osiris,[1] took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since, the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb, still as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, Lords and Commons, nor ever shall do, till her Master's second coming; he shall bring together every joint and member, and shall mold them into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection. Suffer not these licensing prohibitions to stand at every place of opportunity, forbidding and disturbing them that continue seeking, that continue to do our obsequies to the torn body of our martyred saint.

We boast our light; but if we look not wisely on the Sun itself, it smites us into darkness. Who can discern those planets that are oft combust, and those stars of brightest magnitude that rise and set with the Sun, until the opposite motion of their orbs bring them to such a place in the firmament, where they may be seen evening or morning? The light which we have gained was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things more remote from our knowledge. It is not the unfrocking of a priest, the unmitring of a bishop, and the removing him from off the Presbyterian shoulders, that will make us a happy nation. No, if other things as great in the Church, and in the rule of life both economical and political, be not looked into and reformed, we have looked so long upon the blaze that Zwinglius and Calvin hath beaconed up to us, that we are stark blind.[1] There be who perpetually complain of schisms and sects, and make it such a calamity that any man dissents from their maxims. 'Tis their own pride and ignorance which causes the disturbing, who neither will hear with meekness, nor can convince; yet all must be suppressed which is not found in their syntagma.[2] They are the troublers, they are the dividers of unity, who neglect and permit not others to unite those dissevered pieces which are yet wanting to the body of Truth. To be still searching what we know not by what we know, still closing up truth to truth as we find it (for all her body is homogeneal and proportional), this is the golden rule in theology as well as in arithmetic, and makes up the best harmony in a Church; not the forced and outward union of cold and neutral, and inwardly divided minds.

---

[1] Typhon... Osiris Milton's source for this allegory about the search for truth is likely Plutarch's "On Isis and Osiris." Typhon (the Egyptian Set) tears up and scatters the body of Osiris (sacred text), which Isis, the sister of Osiris, then collects and pieces together.

Lords and Commons of England, consider what nation it is whereof ye are, and whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious and piercing spirit, acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point, the highest that human capacity can soar to. Therefore the studies of Learning in her deepest sciences have been so ancient and so eminent among us, that writers of good antiquity and ablest judgment have been persuaded that even the school of Pythagoras and the Persian wisdom took beginning from the old philosophy of this island. And that wise and civil Roman, Julius Agricola, who governed once here for Caesar, preferred the natural wits of Britain before the laboured studies of the French.[3] Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Transylvanian sends out yearly from as far as the mountainous borders of Russia, and beyond the Hercynian wilderness, not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language and our theologic arts.[4]

Yet that which is above all this, the favour and the love of Heaven, we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending towards us. Why else was this nation chosen before any other, that out of her, as out of Sion, should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings and trumpet of Reformation to all Europe? And had it not been the obstinate perverseness of our prelates against the divine and admirable spirit of Wycliffe, to suppress him as a schismatic and innovator, perhaps neither the Bohemian Huss and Jerome, no nor the name of Luther or of Calvin, had been ever known: the glory of reforming all our neighbours had been completely ours. But now, as our obdurate clergy have with violence demeaned the matter, we are become hitherto the latest and backwardest scholars, of whom God offered to have made us the teachers. Now once again by all concurrence of signs, and by the general instinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and solemnly express their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in his Church, even to the reforming of Reformation itself: what does he then but reveal himself to his servants, and as his manner is, first to his Englishmen? I say, as his manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of his counsels, and are unworthy.

---

[1] Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531) and John Calvin (1509–1564), leading figures of the Reformation.

[2] syntagma systematic treatise or body of doctrine.

[3] Tacitus, Agricola, 21.

[4] Many theologians from strongly Protestant Transylvania came to study in western European universities in the period.

Behold now this vast city: a city of refuge, the mansion house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with his protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed Justice in defence of beleaguered Truth, than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching Reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement. What could a man require more from a nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soil but wise and faithful labourers, to make a knowing people, a nation of prophets, of sages, and of worthies? We reckon more than five months yet to harvest; there need not be five weeks; had we but eyes to lift up, the fields are white already.[1]

Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism, we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirred up in this city. What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-reputed care of their Religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to join, and unite in one general and brotherly search after Truth; could we but forgo this prelatical tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men. I doubt not, if some great and worthy stranger should come among us, wise to discern the mold and temper of a people, and how to govern it, observing the high hopes and aims, the diligent alacrity of our extended thoughts and reasonings, in the pursuance of truth and freedom, but that he would cry out as Pyrrhus did, admiring the Roman docility and courage: If such were my Epirots,[2] I would not despair the greatest design that could be attempted, to make a Church or Kingdom happy.

Yet these are the men cried out against for schismatics and sectaries; as if, while the temple of the Lord was building, some cutting, some squaring the marble, others hewing the cedars, there should be a sort of irrational men who could not consider there must be many schisms and many dissections made in the quarry and in the timber, ere the house of God can be built. And when every stone is laid artfully together, it cannot be united into a continuity, it can but be contiguous in this world; neither can every piece of the building be of one form; nay rather the perfection consists in this, that, out of many moderate varieties and brotherly dissimilitudes that are not vastly disproportional, arises the goodly and the graceful symmetry that commends the whole pile and structure.

Let us therefore be more considerate builders, more wise in spiritual architecture, when great reformation is expected. For now the time seems come, wherein Moses the great prophet may sit in heaven rejoicing to see that memorable and glorious wish of his fulfilled, when not only our seventy Elders, but all the Lord's people, are become prophets. No marvel then though some men, and some good men too perhaps, but young in goodness, as Joshua then was, envy them. They fret, and out of their own weakness are in agony, lest these divisions and subdivisions will undo us. The adversary again applauds, and waits the hour: When they have branched themselves out, saith he, small enough into parties and partitions, then will be our time. Fool! he sees not the firm root, out of which we all grow, though into branches: nor will beware until he see our small divided maniples cutting through at every angle of his ill-united and unwieldy brigade.[1] And that we are to hope better of all these supposed sects and schisms, and that we shall not need that solicitude, honest perhaps though over-timorous of them that vex in this behalf, but shall laugh in the end at those malicious applauders of our differences, I have these reasons to persuade me.

---

[1] an adaptation of John 4:35.

[2] Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, defeated a Roman army in 280 B.C.E.

First, when a city shall be as it were besieged and blocked about, her navigable river infested, inroads and incursions round, defiance and battle oft rumoured to be marching up even to her walls and suburb trenches, that then the people, or the greater part, more than at other times, wholly taken up with the study of highest and most important matters to be reformed, should be disputing, reasoning, reading, inventing, discoursing, even to a rarity and admiration, things not before discoursed or written of, argues first a singular goodwill, contentedness and confidence in your prudent foresight and safe government, Lords and Commons; and from thence derives itself to a gallant bravery and well-grounded contempt of their enemies, as if there were no small number of as great spirits among us, as his was, who when Rome was nigh besieged by Hannibal, being in the city, bought that piece of ground at no cheap rate, whereon Hannibal himself encamped his own regiment.

Next, it is a lively and cheerful presage of our happy success and victory. For as in a body, when the blood is fresh, the spirits pure and vigorous, not only to vital but to rational faculties, and those in the acutest and the pertest operations of wit and subtlety, it argues in what good plight and constitution the body is so when the cheerfulness of the people is so sprightly up, as that it has not only wherewith to guard well its own freedom and safety, but to spare, and to bestow upon the solidest and sublimest points of controversy and new invention, it betokens us not degenerated, nor drooping to a fatal decay, but casting off the old and wrinkled skin of corruption to outlive these pangs and wax young again, entering the glorious ways of truth and prosperous virtue, destined to become great and honourable in these latter ages. Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth,[2] and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam; purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

What would ye do then? should ye suppress all this flowery crop of knowledge and new light sprung up and yet springing daily in this city? should ye set an oligarchy of twenty engrossers over it, to bring a famine upon our minds again, when we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel? Believe it, Lords and Commons, they who counsel ye to such a suppressing do as good as bid ye suppress yourselves; and I will soon show how. If it be desired to know the immediate cause of all this free writing and free speaking, there cannot be assigned a truer than your own mild and free and humane government. It is the liberty, Lords and Commons, which your own valorous and happy counsels have purchased us, liberty which is the nurse of all great wits; this is that which hath rarefied and enlightened our spirits like the influence of heaven; this is that which hath enfranchised, enlarged and lifted up our apprehensions degrees above themselves.

---

[1] maniples infantry companies in the Roman army.

[2] mewing "muing" in the original; "mew" is a term from falconry meaning to moult, leading to a connection with ideas of renewal.

Ye cannot make us now less capable, less knowing, less eagerly pursuing of the truth, unless ye first make yourselves, that made us so, less the lovers, less the founders of our true liberty. We can grow ignorant again, brutish, formal and slavish, as ye found us; but you then must first become that which ye cannot be, oppressive, arbitrary and tyrannous, as they were from whom ye have freed us. That our hearts are now more capacious, our thoughts more erected to the search and expectation of greatest and exactest things, is the issue of your own virtue propagated in us; ye cannot suppress that, unless ye reinforce an abrogated and merciless law, that fathers may dispatch at will their own children. And who shall then stick closest to ye, and excite others? not he who takes up arms for coat and conduct and his four nobles of Danegelt.[1] Although I dispraise not the defence of just immunities, yet love my peace better, if that were all. Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.

What would be best advised, then, if it be found hurtful and so unequal to suppress opinions for the newness or the unsuitableness to a customary acceptance, will not be my task to say. I only shall repeat what I have learned from one of your own honourable number, a right noble and pious lord, who, had he not sacrificed his life and fortunes to the Church and Commonwealth, we had not now missed and bewailed a worthy and undoubted patron of this argument. Ye know him, I am sure; yet I for honour's sake, and may it be eternal to him, shall name him, the Lord Brook.[2] He writing of Episcopacy and by the way treating of sects and schisms, left ye his vote, or rather now the last words of his dying charge, which I know will ever be of dear and honoured regard with ye, so full of meekness and breathing charity, that next to his last testament, who bequeathed love and peace to his disciples, I cannot call to mind where I have read or heard words more mild and peaceful. He there exhorts us to hear with patience and humility those, however they be miscalled, that desire to live purely, in such a use of God's ordinances, as the best guidance of their conscience gives them, and to tolerate them, though in some disconformity to ourselves. The book itself will tell us more at large, being published to the world, and dedicated to the Parliament by him who, both for his life and for his death, deserves that what advice he left be not laid by without perusal.

And now the time in special is, by privilege to write and speak what may help to the further discussing of matters in agitation. The temple of Janus with his two controversal faces might now not unsignificantly be set open. And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously, by licensing and prohibiting, to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the best and surest suppressing. He who hears what praying there is for light and clearer knowledge to be sent down among us, would think of other matters to be constituted beyond the discipline of Geneva, framed and fabricked already to our hands. Yet when the new light which we beg for shines in upon us, there be who envy and oppose, if it come not first in at their casements. What a collusion is this, whenas we are exhorted by the wise man to use diligence, to seek for wisdom as for hidden treasures early and late, that another order shall enjoin us to know nothing but by statute? When a man hath been labouring the hardest labour in the deep mines of knowledge; hath furnished out his findings in all their equipage; drawn forth his reasons as it were a battle ranged; scattered and defeated all objections in his way; calls out his adversary into the plain, offers him the advantage of wind and sun, if he please, only that he may try the matter by dint of argument: for his opponents then to skulk, to lay ambushments, to keep a narrow bridge of licensing where the challenger should pass, though it be valour enough in soldiership, is but weakness and cowardice in the wars of Truth.

---

[1] coat and conduct a tax that provided clothing and transportation of new troops; noble a coin worth 6*s* 8*d*; Danegelt ship money, a tax originally levied to support the building of ships with which to oppose invading Danes but controversially resurrected by Charles I.

[2] Robert Greville, second Lord Brooke (1608–1643), a leading Parliamentarian and general, killed in battle; Milton cites his Discourse of Episcopacie (1641).

For who knows not that Truth is strong, next to the Almighty? She needs no policies, nor stratagems, nor licensings to make her victorious; those are the shifts and the defences that error uses against her power. Give her but room, and do not bind her when she sleeps, for then she speaks not true, as the old Proteus did, who spake oracles only when he was caught and bound,[1] but then rather she turns herself into all shapes, except her own, and perhaps tunes her voice according to the time, as Micaiah did before Ahab, until she be adjured into her own likeness [I Kings 22:9-28]. Yet is it not impossible that she may have more shapes than one. What else is all that rank of things indifferent, wherein Truth may be on this side or on the other, without being unlike herself? What but a vain shadow else is the abolition of those ordinances, that handwriting nailed to the cross? What great purchase is this Christian liberty which Paul so often boasts of? His doctrine is, that he who eats or eats not, regards a day or regards it not, may do either to the Lord. How many other things might be tolerated in peace, and left to conscience, had we but charity, and were it not the chief stronghold of our hypocrisy to be ever judging one another?

I fear yet this iron yoke of outward conformity hath left a slavish print upon our necks; the ghost of a linen decency yet haunts us.[2] We stumble and are impatient at the least dividing of one visible congregation from another, though it be not in fundamentals; and through our forwardness to suppress, and our backwardness to recover any enthralled piece of truth out of the grip of custom, we care not to keep truth separated from truth, which is the fiercest rent and disunion of all. We do not see that, while we still affect by all means a rigid external formality, we may as soon fall again into a gross conforming stupidity, a stark and dead congealment of wood and hay and stubble, forced and frozen together, which is more to the sudden degenerating of a Church than many subdichotomies of petty schisms.

Not that I can think well of every light separation, or that all in a Church is to be expected gold and silver and precious stones: it is not possible for man to sever the wheat from the tares, the good fish from the other fry; that must be the angels' ministry at the end of mortal things. Yet if all cannot be of one mind—as who looks they should be?—this doubtless is more wholesome, more prudent, and more Christian that many be tolerated, rather than all compelled. I mean not tolerated popery, and open superstition, which, as it extirpates all religions and civil supremacies, so itself should be extirpate, provided first that all charitable and compassionate means be used to win and regain the weak and the misled: that also which is impious or evil absolutely either against faith or manners no law can possibly permit, that intends not to unlaw itself: but those neighbouring differences, or rather indifferences, are what I speak of, whether in some point of doctrine or of discipline, which, though they may be many, yet need not interrupt the unity of Spirit, if we could but find among us the bond of peace.

---

[1] Proteus a shape-shifting sea deity; see Odyssey 4.383–459.

[2] linen decency referring to the vestments that Archbishop Laud insisted ministers wear in the interests of uniformity.

In the meanwhile if any one would write, and bring his helpful hand to the slow-moving Reformation which we labour under, if Truth have spoken to him before others, or but seemed at least to speak, who hath so bejesuited us that we should trouble that man with asking licence to do so worthy a deed? and not consider this, that if it come to prohibiting, there is not aught more likely to be prohibited than truth itself; whose first appearance to our eyes, bleared and dimmed with prejudice and custom, is more unsightly and unplausible than many errors, even as the person is of many a great man slight and contemptible to see to. And what do they tell us vainly of new opinions, when this very opinion of theirs, that none must be heard, but whom they like, is the worst and newest opinion of all others; and is the chief cause why sects and schisms do so much abound, and true knowledge is kept at distance from us; besides yet a greater danger which is in it?

For when God shakes a Kingdom with strong and healthful commotions to a general reforming, 'tis not untrue that many sectaries and false teachers are then busiest in seducing; but yet more true it is, that God then raises to his own work men of rare abilities, and more than common industry, not only to look back and revise what hath been taught heretofore, but to gain further and go on some new enlightened steps in the discovery of truth. For such is the order of God's enlightening his Church, to dispense and deal out by degrees his beam, so as our earthly eyes may best sustain it.

Neither is God appointed and confined, where and out of what place these his chosen shall be first heard to speak; for he sees not as man sees, chooses not as man chooses, lest we should devote ourselves again to set places, and assemblies, and outward callings of men; planting our faith one while in the old Convocation house, and another while in the Chapel at Westminster; when all the faith and religion that shall be there canonized is not sufficient without plain convincement, and the charity of patient instruction to supple the least bruise of conscience, to edify the meanest Christian, who desires to walk in the Spirit, and not in the letter of human trust, for all the number of voices that can be there made; no, though Harry VII himself there, with all his liege tombs about him, should lend them voices from the dead, to swell their number.

And if the men be erroneous who appear to be the leading schismatics, what withholds us but our sloth, our self-will, and distrust in the right cause, that we do not give them gentle meeting and gentle dismissions, that we debate not and examine the matter thoroughly with liberal and frequent audience; if not for their sakes, yet for our own? seeing no man who hath tasted learning, but will confess the many ways of profiting by those who, not contented with stale receipts, are able to manage and set forth new positions to the world. And were they but as the dust and cinders of our feet, so long as in that notion they may yet serve to polish and brighten the armoury of Truth, even for that respect they were not utterly to be cast away. But if they be of those whom God hath fitted for the special use of these times with eminent and ample gifts, and those perhaps neither among the Priests nor among the Pharisees, and we in the haste of a precipitant zeal shall make no distinction, but resolve to stop their mouths, because we fear they come with new and dangerous opinions, as we commonly forejudge them ere we understand them, no less than woe to us, while, thinking thus to defend the Gospel, we are found the persecutors.

There have been not a few since the beginning of this Parliament, both of the Presbytery and others, who by their unlicensed books, to the contempt of an Imprimatur, first broke that triple ice clung about our hearts, and taught the people to see day:

I hope that none of those were the persuaders to renew upon us this bondage which they themselves have wrought so much good by contemning. But if neither the check that Moses gave to young Joshua [Numbers 11:27-29], nor the countermand which our Saviour gave to young John, who was so ready to prohibit those whom he thought unlicensed [Luke 9:49-50], be not enough to admonish our Elders how unacceptable to God their testy mood of prohibiting is, if neither their own remembrance what evil hath abounded in the Church by this let of licensing, and what good they themselves have begun by transgressing it, be not enough, but that they will persuade and execute the most Dominican part of the Inquisition over us, and are already with one foot in the stirrup so active at suppressing, it would be no unequal distribution in the first place to suppress the suppressors themselves: whom the change of their condition hath puffed up, more than their late experience of harder times hath made wise.

And as for regulating the Press, let no man think to have the honour of advising ye better than yourselves have done in that Order published next before this, "that no book be Printed, unless the Printer's and the Author's name, or at least the Printer's, be registered."[1] Those which otherwise come forth, if they be found mischievous and libellous, the fire and the executioner will be the timeliest and the most effectual remedy that man's prevention can use. For this authentic Spanish policy of licensing books, if I have said aught, will prove the most unlicensed book itself within a short while; and was the immediate image of a Star Chamber decree to that purpose made in those very times when that Court did the rest of those her pious works, for which she is now fallen from the stars with Lucifer. Whereby ye may guess what kind of state prudence, what love of the people, what care of Religion or good manners there was at the contriving, although with singular hypocrisy it pretended to bind books to their good behaviour. And how it got the upper hand of your precedent Order so well constituted before, if we may believe those men whose profession gives them cause to inquire most, it may be doubted there was in it the fraud of some old patentees and monopolizers in the trade of bookselling; who under pretence of the poor in their Company not to be defrauded, and the just retaining of each man his several copy, which God forbid should be gainsaid, brought divers glosing colours to the House, which were indeed but colours, and serving to no end except it be to exercise a superiority over their neighbours; men who do not therefore labour in an honest profession to which learning is indebted, that they should be made other men's vassals. Another end is thought was aimed at by some of them in procuring by petition this Order, that, having power in their hands, malignant books might the easier scape abroad, as the event shows.

But of these sophisms and elenchs of merchandise I skill not.[2] This I know, that errors in a good government and in a bad are equally almost incident; for what Magistrate may not be misinformed, and much the sooner, if liberty of Printing be reduced into the power of a few? But to redress willingly and speedily what hath been erred, and in highest authority to esteem a plain advertisement more than others have done a sumptuous bribe, is a virtue (honoured Lords and Commons) answerable to your highest actions, and whereof none can participate but greatest and wisest men.

—1644

---

[1] Milton cites an Order of January 29, 1642.

[2] sophisms and elenchs differing forms of logical deceit, the first a positive expression, the second a refutation.

Of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, and Toleration

It is unknown to no man, who knows ought of concernment among us, that the increase of Popery is at this day no small trouble and offence to greatest part of the Nation; and the rejoicing of all good men that it is so; the more their rejoicing, that God hath given a heart to the people to remember still their great and happy deliverance from Popish thraldom, and to esteem so highly the precious benefit of his Gospel, so freely and so peaceably enjoyed among them. Since therefore some have already in public with many considerable arguments exhorted the people to beware the growth of this Romish weed; I thought it no less than a common duty to lend my hand, how unable soever, to so good a purpose. I will not now enter into the labyrinth of Councils and fathers, an entangled wood which the Papist loves to fight in, not with hope of victory, but to obscure the shame of an open overthrow: which yet in that kind of combat, many heretofore, and one of late,[1] hath eminently given them. And such manner of dispute with them, to learned men, is useful and very commendable. But I shall insist now on what is plainer to common apprehension, and what I have to say, without longer introduction.

True religion is the true worship and service of God, learnt and believed from the word of God only. No man or Angel can know how God would be worshipped and served unless God reveal it: He hath revealed and taught it us in the holy Scriptures by inspired Ministers, and in the Gospel by his own Son and his Apostles, with strictest command to reject all other traditions or additions whatsoever. According to that of St. Paul, "Though we or an Angel from Heaven preach any other Gospel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you, let him be anathema, or accursed" [Galatians 1:8]. And Deut. 4:2: "Ye shall not add to the word which I command you, neither shall you diminish ought from it." Rev. 22:18, 19: "If any man shall add, &c. If any man shall take away from the words," &c. With good and religious reason therefore all Protestant churches with one consent, and particularly the Church of England in her thirty-nine articles, Artic. 6th, 19th, 20th, 21st, and elsewhere, maintain these two points, as the main principles of true religion: that the rule of true religion is the word of God only: and that their faith ought not to be an implicit faith, that is, to believe, though as the Church believes, against or without express authority of Scripture. And if all Protestants as universally as they hold these two principles, so attentively and religiously would observe them, they would avoid and cut off many debates and contentions, schisms and persecutions, which too oft have been among them, and more firmly unite against the common adversary.[2] For hence it directly follows, that no true Protestant can persecute, or not tolerate his fellow Protestant, though dissenting from him in some opinions, but he must flatly deny and renounce these two his own main principles, whereon true religion is founded; while he compels his brother from that which he believes as the manifest word of God, to an implicit faith (which he himself condemns) to the endangering of his brother's soul, whether by rash belief, or outward conformity: "for whatsoever is not of faith, is sin" [Romans 14:23].

I will now as briefly show what is false religion or heresy, which will be done as easily: for of contraries the definitions must needs be contrary. Heresy therefore is a religion taken up and believed from the traditions of men and additions to the word of God. Whence also it follows clearly, that of all known sects or pretended religions at this day in

---

[1] one of late probably Edward Stillingfleet, A Discourse Concerning the Idolatry Practised in the Church of Rome (1671), which had gone through three editions by the year Milton was writing.

[2] the common adversary Catholicism.

Christendom, Popery is the only or the greatest heresy: and he who is so forward to brand all others for heretics, the obstinate Papist, the only heretic. Hence one of their own famous writers found just cause to style the Romish church "Mother of Error, School of Heresy."[1] And whereas the Papist boasts himself to be a Roman Catholic, it is a mere contradiction, one of the Pope's bulls, as if he should say, universal particular a Catholic schismatic. For Catholic in Greek signifies universal: and the Christian church was so called, as consisting of all nations to whom the Gospel was to be preached, in contradistinction to the Jewish church, which consisted for the most part of Jews only.

Sects may be in a true church as well as in a false, when men follow the doctrine too much for the teacher's sake, whom they think almost infallible; and this becomes, through infirmity, implicit faith; and the name sectary, pertains to such a disciple.

Schism is a rent or division in the church, when it comes to the separating of congregations; and may also happen to a true church, as well as to a false; yet in the true needs not tend to the breaking of communion; if they can agree in the right administration of that wherein they communicate, keeping their other opinions to themselves, not being destructive to faith. The Pharisees and Sadducees were two sects, yet both met together in their common worship of God at Jerusalem. But here the Papist will angrily demand, what! Are Lutherans, Calvinists, Anabaptists, Socinians, Arminians,[2] no heretics? I answer, all these may have some errors, but are no heretics. Heresy is in the will and choice professedly against Scripture; error is against the will, in misunderstanding the Scripture after all sincere endeavours to understand it rightly: Hence it was said well by one of the ancients, "Err I may, but a heretic I will not be."[3] It is a human frailty to err, and no man is infallible here on earth. But so long as all these profess to set the word of God only before them as the rule of faith and obedience; and use all diligence and sincerity of heart, by reading, by learning, by study, by prayer for illumination of the holy Spirit, to understand the rule and obey it, they have done what man can do: God will assuredly pardon them, as he did the friends of Job,[4] good and pious men, though much mistaken, as there it appears, in some points of doctrine. But some will say, with Christians it is otherwise, whom God hath promised by his Spirit to teach all things. True, all things absolutely necessary to salvation: But the hottest disputes among Protestants calmly and charitably enquired into, will be found less than such. The Lutheran holds consubstantiation;[5] an error indeed, but not mortal. The Calvinist is taxed with predestination,[6] and to make God the author of sin; not with any dishonourable thought of God, but it may be over zealously asserting his absolute power, not without plea of Scripture. The Anabaptist is accused of denying infants their right to baptism; again they say, they deny nothing but what the Scripture denies them.[7] The Arian and Socinian are charged to dispute against the Trinity:[1] they affirm to believe the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, according to Scripture, and the Apostolic Creed; as for terms of trinity, triniunity, coessentiality, tripersonality, and the like, they reject them as scholastic notions, not to be found in Scripture, which by a general Protestant maxim is plain and perspicuous abundantly to explain its own meaning in the properest words, belonging to so high a matter and so necessary to be known; a mystery indeed in their sophistic subtleties, but in Scripture a plain doctrine. Their other opinions are of less moment. They dispute the satisfaction of Christ,[2] or rather the word Satisfaction, as not scriptural: but they acknowledge him both God and their saviour. The Arminian lastly is condemned for setting up free will against free grace;[3] but that imputation he disclaims in all his writings, and grounds himself largely upon Scripture only. It cannot be denied that the authors or later revivers of all these sects or opinions, were learned, worthy, zealous, and religious men, as appears by their lives written, and the same of their many eminent and learned followers, perfect and powerful in the Scriptures, holy and unblameable in their lives: and it cannot be imagined that God would desert such painful and zealous labourers in his Church,[4] and oft times great sufferers for their conscience, to damnable errors and a reprobate sense, who had so often implored the assistance of his Spirit; but rather, having made no man infallible, that he hath pardoned their errors, and accepts their pious endeavours, sincerely searching all things according to the rule of Scripture, with such guidance and direction as they can obtain of God by prayer. What Protestant then who himself maintains the same principles, and disavows all implicit faith, would persecute, and not rather charitably tolerate such men as these, unless he mean to abjure the principles of his own religion? If it be asked, how far they should be tolerated? I answer doubtless equally, as being all Protestants; that is on all occasions to give account of their faith, either by arguing, preaching in their several assemblies, public writing, and the freedom of printing. For if the French and Polonian Protestants enjoy all this liberty among Papists,[5] much more may a Protestant justly expect it among Protestants; and yet some times here among us, the one persecutes the other upon every slight pretence.

---

[1] Petrarch (1304–1374) had described the Church as "scola d'errori e templo d'eresia" (sonnet 107) on account of papal corruption.

[2] respectively, mainstream Protestant movements founded on the theology of Martin Luther (1483–1546) and John Calvin (1509–1564); the name of several groups associated with the radical fringe of the German Reformation and linked by their repudiation of infant baptism; followers of the unitarian theology of Fausto Paolo Sozzini (1539–1604), who denied the essential divinity of Christ; and followers of the Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609), who challenged the strict predestination of the Calvinists.

[3] a dictum attributed in the period to Augustine.

[4] Job 42:7–10.

[5] consubstantiation the Lutheran doctrine of the Eucharist, which holds that the substances of both the blood and body of Christ and of the bread and wine co-exist in union with one another.

[6] predestination the belief that certain persons, the elect, are by divine decree guided to salvation, while others, the reprobate, are excluded, all without reference to their individual merits.

[7] Milton agreed with "the Anabaptist" on the issue of infant baptism.

But he is wont to say he enjoins only things indifferent.[6] Let them be so still; who gave him authority to change their nature by enjoining them? If by his own principles, as is proved, he ought to tolerate controverted points of doctrine not slightly grounded on Scripture, much more ought he not impose things indifferent without Scripture. In religion nothing is indifferent, but, if it come once to be imposed, is either a command or a prohibition, and so consequently an addition to the word of God, which he professes to disallow. Besides, how unequal, how uncharitable must it needs be, to impose that which his conscience cannot urge him to impose, upon him whose conscience forbids him to obey? What can it be but love of contention for things not necessary to be done, to molest the conscience of his brother, who holds them necessary to be not done? To conclude, let such a one but call to mind his own principles above mentioned, and he must necessarily grant, that neither he can impose, nor the other believe or obey ought in religion, but from the word of God only. More amply to understand this, may be read the 14th and 15th chapters to the Romans, and the contents of the 14th, set forth no doubt but with full authority of the Church of England; the gloss is this: "Men may not contemn, or condemn one the other for things indifferent."[1] And in the 6th Article above mentioned, "whatsoever is not read in Holy Scripture, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man as an article of faith, or necessary to salvation." And certainly what is not so, is not to be required at all; as being an addition to the word of God expressly forbidden.

---

[1] Arianism and Socinianism are both doctrines which denied the divinity of Christ. The Arian position is argued in De doctrina Christiana, a manuscript certainly connected with and generally thought to be by Milton.

[2] satisfaction a theological term for payment of a penalty due God on account of sin; often applied to the atonement, with Christ's death a satisfaction for the sins of the world.

[3] free will against free grace As a result of their more liberal attitude to predestination, Arminians were accused by Calvinists of linking salvation to the exercise of the human will, thus diminishing God's majesty.

[4] painful painstaking.

[5] The models offered by France and Poland were often cited in tolerationist pamphlets, though the freedom of Protestants in both countries was seriously undermined in the last few decades of the seventeenth century.

[6] things indifferent referring to the doctrine of adiaphora, or "things indifferent" to salvation. The Church of England valued uniformity of practice on matters such as church ceremonies and vestments, arguing that conformity on these "indifferent" issues should not trouble a dissenting conscience. Milton proceeds to summarize a primary Nonconformist counter-argument.

Thus this long and hot contest, whether Protestants ought to tolerate one another, if men will be but rational and not partial, may be ended without need of more words to compose it.

Let us now enquire whether Popery be tolerable or no. Popery is a double thing to deal with, and claims a twofold power, ecclesiastical, and political, both usurped, and the one supporting the other.

But ecclesiastical is ever pretended to political. The Pope by this mixed faculty, pretends right to kingdoms and states, and especially to this of England, thrones and unthrones Kings, and absolves the people from their obedience to them;[2] sometimes interdicts to whole nations the public worship of God, shutting up their churches:[3] and was wont to drain away greatest part of the wealth of this then miserable land, as part of his patrimony, to maintain the pride and luxury of his court and prelates:[4] and now since, through the infinite mercy and favour of God, we have shaken off his Babylonish yoke, hath not ceased by his spies and agents, bulls and emissaries, once to destroy both King and Parliament;[5] perpetually to seduce, corrupt, and pervert as many as they can of the people. Whether therefore it be fit or reasonable, to tolerate men thus principled in religion towards the State, I submit it to the consideration of all magistrates, who are best able to provide for their own and the public safety. As for tolerating the exercise of their religion, supposing their state activities not to be dangerous, I answer, that toleration is either public or private; and the exercise of their religion, as far as it is idolatrous, can be tolerated neither way: not publicly, without grievous and unsufferable scandal given to all conscientious beholders; not privately, without great offence to God, declared against all kind of idolatry, though secret. Ezekiel 8:7, 8: "And he brought me to the door of the court, and when I looked, behold a hole in the wall. Then said he unto me, Son of Man, dig now in the wall; and when I had digged, behold a door, and he said unto me, go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here." And verse 12: "Then said he unto me, Son of Man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark?" &c. And it appears by the whole chapter, that God was no less offended with these secret idolatries, than with those in public; and no less provoked, than to bring on and hasten his judgments on the whole land for these also.

---

[1] Milton omits what follows in the gloss: "But take heed that they give no offence in them."

[2] Pope Innocent III excommunicated King John in 1209, and Pope Pius V excommunicated Queen Elizabeth in 1569, absolving her subjects from the oath of allegiance.

[3] referring again to Pope Innocent III's struggles with John, when England was placed under interdiction from 1208 to 1214.

[4] Papal taxation was much resented in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

[5] referring to the Gunpowder Plot, a Catholic conspiracy to blow up the Houses of Parliament and James I on November 5, 1605.

Having shown thus, that Popery, as being idolatrous, is not to be tolerated either in public or in private; it must be now thought how to remove it and hinder the growth thereof, I mean in our natives, and not foreigners, privileged by the Law of Nations. Are we to punish them by corporal punishment, or fines in their estates, upon account of their religion? I suppose it stands not with the clemency of the Gospel, more than what appertains to the security of the State: But first we must remove their idolatry, and all the furniture thereof, whether idols, or the mass wherein they adore their God under bread and wine:[1] for the commandment forbids to adore, not only "any graven image, but the likeness of anything in Heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth, thou shalt not bow down to them nor worship them, for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God" [Exodus 20:5]. If they say that by removing their idols we violate their consciences, we have no warrant to regard conscience which is not grounded on Scripture: and they themselves confess in their late defences, that they hold not their images necessary to salvation, but only as they are enjoined them by tradition.

Shall we condescend to dispute with them? The Scripture is our only principle in religion; and by that only they will not be judged, but will add other principles of their own, which, forbidden by the word of God, we cannot assent to. And the common maxim also in logic is, "against them who deny principles, we are not to dispute."[2] Let them bound their disputations on the Scripture only, and an ordinary Protestant, well read in the Bible, may turn and wind their doctors. They will not go about to prove their idolatries by the word of God, but run to shifts and evasions, and frivolous distinctions: Idols they say are laymen's books, and a great means to stir up pious thoughts and devotion in the learnedest. I say they are no means of God's appointing, but plainly the contrary: Let them hear the Prophets; Jerem. 10:8: "The stock is a doctrine of vanities." Habakkuk 2:18: "What profiteth the graven image that the maker thereof hath graven it: The molten image and a teacher of lies?" But they allege in their late answers, that the laws of Moses given only to the Jews, concern not us under the Gospel: and remember not that idolatry is forbidden as expressly (in several places of the Gospel). But with these wiles and fallacies "compassing sea and land, like the Pharisees of old, to make one Proselyte," they lead away privily many simple and ignorant souls, men or women, "and make them twofold more the children of Hell than themselves," Matt. 23:15. But the Apostle hath well warned us, I may say, from such deceivers as these, for their mystery was then working. "I beseech you brethren," saith he, "mark them which cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them; for they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly, and by good words and fair speeches deceive the heart of the simple," Rom. 16:17, 18.

The next means to hinder the growth of Popery will be to read duly and diligently the Holy Scriptures, which as St. Paul saith to Timothy, who had known them from a child, "are able to make wise unto salvation" [II Timothy 3:15]. And to the whole Church of Colossi; "Let the word of Christ dwell in you plentifully, with all wisdom," Coloss. 3:16. The Papal Antichristian Church permits not her laity to read the Bible in their own tongue: Our Church on the contrary hath proposed it to all men, and to this end translated it into English, with profitable notes on what is met with obscure, though what is most necessary to be known be still plainest: that all sorts and degrees of men, not understanding the original, may read it in their mother tongue. Neither let the countryman, the tradesman, the lawyer, the physician, the statesman, excuse himself by his much business from the studious reading thereof. Our Saviour saith, Luke 10:41, 42: "Thou art careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful." If they were asked, they would be loath to set earthly things, wealth, or honour before the wisdom of salvation. Yet most men in the course and practice of their lives are found to do so; and through unwillingness to take the pains of understanding their religion by their own diligent study, would fain be saved by a deputy. Hence comes implicit faith, ever learning and never taught, much hearing and small proficiency, till want of fundamental knowledge easily turns to superstition or Popery: Therefore the Apostle admonished [Ephesians] 4:14: "That we henceforth be no more children tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive." Every member of the Church, at least of any breeding or capacity, so well ought to be grounded in spiritual knowledge, as, if need be, to examine their teachers themselves, Act. 17:11: "They searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." Rev. 2:2: "Thou hast tried them which say they are Apostles, and are not." How should any private Christian try his teachers unless he be well grounded himself in the rule of Scripture, by which he is taught. As therefore among Papists, their ignorance in Scripture chiefly upholds Popery; so among Protestant people, the frequent and serious reading thereof will soonest pull Popery down.

---

[1] The equation of transubstantiation with idolatry was common in Protestant polemic.

[2] Aristotle, Physics, I.ii.

Another means to abate Popery arises from the constant reading of Scripture, wherein believers who agree in the main, are everywhere exhorted to mutual forbearance and charity one towards the other, though dissenting in some opinions. It is written that the coat of our Saviour was without seam [John 19:23]: whence some would infer that there should be no division in the Church of Christ. It should be so indeed; yet seams in the same cloth, neither hurt the garment, nor misbecome it; and not only seams, but schisms will be while men are fallible: But if they who dissent in matters not essential to belief, while the common adversary is in the field, shall stand jarring and pelting at one another, they will be soon routed and subdued. The Papist with open mouth makes much advantage of our several opinions; not that he is able to confute the worst of them, but that we by our continual jangle among ourselves make them worse than they are indeed. To save ourselves therefore, and resist the common enemy, it concerns us mainly to agree within ourselves, that with joint forces we may not only hold our own, but get ground; and why should we not? The Gospel commands us to tolerate one another, though of various opinions, and hath promised a good and happy event thereof, Phil. 3:15: "Let us therefore as many as be perfect be thus minded; and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you." And we are bid, I Thess. 5:21: "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." St. Paul judged that not only to tolerate, but to examine and prove all things, was no danger to our holding fast of that which is good. How shall we prove all things, which includes all opinions at least founded on Scripture, unless we not only tolerate them, but patiently hear them, and seriously read them? If he who thinks himself in the truth professes to have learnt it, not by implicit faith, but by attentive study of the Scriptures and full persuasion of heart, with what equity can he refuse to hear or read him, who demonstrates to have gained his knowledge by the same way? is it a fair course to assert truth by arrogating to himself the only freedom of speech, and stopping the mouths of others equally gifted? This is the direct way to bring in that Papistical implicit faith which we all disclaim. They pretend it would unsettle the weaker sort: the same groundless fear is pretended by the Romish clergy in prohibiting the Scripture. At least then let them have leave to write in Latin while the common people understand not; that what they hold may be discussed among the learned only. We suffer the idolatrous books of Papists, without this fear, to be sold and read as common as our own. Why not much rather of Anabaptists, Arians, Arminians, and Socinians? There is no learned man but will confess he hath much profited by reading controversies, his senses awaked, his judgment sharpened, and the truth which he holds more firmly established. If then it be profitable for him to read; why should it not at least be tolerable and free for his adversary to write? In Logic they teach, that contraries laid together more evidently appear: it follows then that all controversies being permitted, falsehood will appear more false, and truth the more true: which must needs conduce much, not only to the confounding of Popery, but to the general confirmation of unimplicit truth.

The last means to avoid Popery, is to amend our lives: it is a general complaint that this nation of late years, is grown more numerously and excessively vicious than heretofore; pride, luxury, drunkenness, whoredom, cursing, swearing, bold and open atheism everywhere abounding: Where these grow, no wonder if Popery also grow apace. There is no man so wicked, but at sometimes his conscience will wring him with thoughts of another world, and the peril of his soul: the trouble and melancholy which he conceives of true repentance and amendment he endures not; but inclines rather to some carnal superstition, which may pacify and lull his conscience with some more pleasing doctrine. None more ready and officious to offer herself than the Romish, and opens wide her office, with all her faculties to receive him; easy confession, easy absolution, pardons, indulgences, masses for him both quick and dead, Agnus Dei's,[1] relics, and the like: and he, instead of "working out his salvation with fear and trembling" [Philippians 2:12], straight thinks in his heart (like another kind of fool than he in the Psalms)[2] to bribe God as a corrupt judge; and by his proctor, some priest or friar, to buy out his peace with money, which he cannot with his repentance. For God, when men sin outrageously, and will not be admonished, gives over chastizing them, perhaps by pestilence, fire, sword, or famine,[3] which may all turn to their good, and takes up his severest punishments, hardness, besottedness of heart, and idolatry, to their final perdition. Idolatry brought the heathen to heinous transgressions, Romans [1:21–32]. And heinous transgressions oft times bring the slight professors of true religion, to gross idolatry: [II] Thess. 2:11, 12: "For this cause, God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned who believe not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." And Isaiah 44:18: Speaking of idolaters, "They have not known nor understood, for he hath shut their eyes that they cannot see, and their hearts that they cannot understand." Let us therefore using this last means, last here spoken of, but first to be done, amend our lives with all speed; least through impenitency we run into that stupidly, which we now seek all means so warily to avoid, the worst of superstitions, and the heaviest of all God's judgments, Popery.

—1673

---

[1] An Agnus Dei ("Lamb of God") was a devotional medallion made of wax depicting the lamb, a figure of Christ.

[2] Psalm 14:1: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God."

[3] The London plague of 1665, the Great Fire of 1666, and English defeats in the Dutch Wars were often cited as divine judgments against England.

Sir John Suckling

1609 – 1641

John Suckling was born at Twickenham in Middlesex (later famously the home of Alexander Pope). His father, Sir John Suckling, was a successful lawyer, who became Secretary of State, a Privy Councillor and a member of Parliament. His mother was Martha Cranfield, sister to Lionel Cranfield, the first Earl of Middlesex. Aubrey reports that Suckling's father was said to be "but a dull fellow," and that "the wit came by the mother." His mother died before Suckling was five years old. Suckling was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, left without taking a degree, and entered Gray's Inn in 1627. His father's death, shortly afterwards, made Suckling heir to rich estates in three counties; he frequented the court, and became acquainted with such wits as Thomas Carew, Richard Lovelace and William Davenant. Near the end of 1628, Suckling embarked on an extended visit to Europe, visiting Paris first, and then proceeding to Italy. In September 1630 he was back in England and was knighted by Charles I. In July 1631 he joined an expedition which set out from Great Yarmouth to reinforce the army of Gustavus Adolphus. In 1632 he returned to the English court, and threw himself into the pleasures common to rich young men of the time; he was a reckless gambler, and one of the earliest references to Piccadilly is Aubrey's story that his sisters would go there in fear that he would "lose their portions" at its bowling green. He was not without serious interests, however, and knew Lord Falkland, Roger Boyle, Thomas Stanley and other intellectuals of the time. Early in 1637 his "A Sessions of the Poets," in which many of his contemporaries are named, circulated in manuscript. In the same year he went on a jaunt to Bath with Davenant and some others; Aubrey gives an amusing account of this expedition. In 1639 Suckling and his friend Lord Goring undertook to "bring a hundred horse each" for Charles I's Scottish campaign; Suckling is said to have spent twelve thousand pounds, and incurred much ridicule for the expensive and colourful uniforms of his troopers. In 1641 he was suspected of a plot to free Strafford from the Tower, and fled overseas. In Paris he began a love-affair which led to disaster. The lady's previous lover, to gain revenge, accused him of conspiring the death of Philip IV. Suckling was tortured and condemned to the gallows; but he was reprieved because his enemy, in remorse, confessed to his perjury and was himself sentenced to death. Suckling is thought to have committed suicide rather than live in the poverty to which he had become reduced. Little of Suckling's work appeared in his lifetime; a collection was published in 1646 by the leading Royalist publisher, Humphrey Moseley.

* * *

To the Reader [1]

While Suckling's name is in the forehead of this book, these poems can want no preparation: It had been a prejudice to posterity they should have slept longer, and an injury to his own ashes. They that conversed with him alive, and truly (under which notion I comprehend only knowing Gentlemen, his soul being transcendent, and incommunicable to others, but by reflection), will honour these posthume Ideas of their friend: And if any have lived in so much darkness as not to have known so great an ornament of our age, by looking upon these remains with civility and understanding, they may timely yet repent, and be forgiven.

---

[1] from Fragmenta Aurea (1646), and written by the publisher, Humphrey Moseley. Moseley also wrote a preface to Suckling's Last Remains (1659), which begins: "Among the highest and most refined wits of the Nation, this genteel and princely poet took his generous rise from the Court; where having flourished with splendour and reputation, he lived only long enough to see the sun-set of that Majesty from whose auspicious beams he derived his lustre."

In this age of paper-prostitutions, a man may buy the reputation of some author's into the price of their volume; but know, the name that leadeth into this Elysium is sacred to Art and Honour, and no man that is not excellent in both is qualified a competent judge: For when knowledge is allowed, yet education in the censure of a gentleman requires as many descents as goes to make one; And he that is bold upon his unequal stock to traduce this name, or learning, will deserve to be condemned again into ignorance his original sin, and die in it.

But I keep back the Ingenuous Reader by my unworthy Preface: the gate is open, and thy soul invited to a garden of ravishing variety; admire his wit, that created these for thy delight, while I withdraw into a shade, and contemplate who must follow.

—1646

Song

1

Why so pale and wan fond lover?
Prithee why so pale?
Will, when looking well can't move her,
Looking ill prevail?
Prithee why so pale?

2

Why so dull and mute young sinner?
Prithee why so mute?
Will, when speaking well can't win her,
Saying nothing do't?
Prithee why so mute?

3

Quit, quit, for shame, this will not move,
This cannot take her;
If of her self she will not love,
Nothing can make her,
The Devil take her.

—1638

A Ballad. Upon a Wedding[1]

1

I tell thee Dick, where I have been,
Where I the rarest things have seen,
O things beyond compare!
Such sights again cannot be found
In any part of English ground,
Be it at wake, or fair.

2

At Charing-Cross, hard by the way
Where we (thou know'st) do sell our hay,
There is a house with stairs;
And there did I see coming down
Such folk as are not in our town,
Forty at least, in pairs.

3

Amongst the rest, one pest'lent fine,
(His beard no bigger though than thine)
Walked on before the rest:
Our landlord looks like nothing to him:
The King, (God bless him) 'twould undo him,
Should he go still so dressed.

4

At Course-a-Park, without all doubt,
He should have first been taken out
By all the maids i'th' town;[2]
Though lusty Roger there had been,
Or little George upon the green,
Or Vincent of the crown.

---

[1] This poem was probably written for the marriage of John Lord Lovelace. It was first published in Wits Recreations.

[2] Course-a-Park a country game, in which a girl called out the name of a person of the other sex to chase her (OED).

5
But wot you what? the youth was going
To make an end of all his wooing;[1]
The parson for him stayed:
Yet by his leave (for all his haste)
He did not wish so much all past,
(Perchance) as did the maid.

6
The maid, (and thereby hangs a tale,
For such a maid no Whitsun-ale
Could ever yet produce)[2]
No grape that's kindly ripe, could be
So round, so plump, so soft as she,
Nor half so full of juice.

7
Her fingers were so small, the ring
Would not stay on which they did bring,
It was too wide a peck:[3]
And to say truth (for out it must)
It looked like the great collar (just)
About our young colt's neck.

8
Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice stole in and out,
As if they fear'd the light:
But oh! she dances such a way!
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight.

9
He would have kissed her once or twice,
But she would not, she was so nice,
She would not do't in sight;
And then she looked as who should say
I will do what I list to day;
And you shall do't at night.

10
Her cheeks so rare a white was on,
No daisy makes comparison,
(Who sees them is undone)
For streaks of red were mingled there,
Such as are on a Katherine pear,
(The side that's next the sun.)

11
Her mouth so small when she doth speak,
Thou'dst swear her teeth her words did break,
That they might passage get;
But she so handles still the matter,
They come as good as ours, or better,
And are not spoil'd one whit.

12
Her lips were red, and one was thin,
Compar'd to that was next her chin;
(Some bee had stung it newly.)
But (Dick) her eyes so guard her face;
I durst no more upon her gaze,
Than on the sun in July.[4]

13
If wishing should be any sin,
The parson self had guilty been,
(She looked that day so purely;)
And did the youth so oft the feat
At night, as some did in conceit,
It would have spoil'd him, surely.

14
Passion oh me! how I run on!
There's that that would be thought upon,
(I trow) besides the bride:

---

[1] wot you what? Do you know what?

[2] Whitsun-ale a parish festival formerly held at Whitsuntide, marked by feasting, sports and merrymaking (OED Whitsun).

[3] too wide a peck too wide by a good deal (OED peck sb^{1} 3).

[4] July accented thus as late as Dr. Johnson's time; the modern pronunciation is abnormal and unexplained (OED).

The bus'ness of the kitchen great;
For it is fit that men should eat,
Nor was it there denied.

15
Just in the nick the cook knocked thrice,
And all the waiters in a trice
His summons did obey:
Each serving man with dish in hand,
Marched boldly up, like our train band,
Presented, and away.

16
When all the meat was on the table,
What man of knife, or teeth, was able
To stay to be entreated?
And this the very reason was,
Before the parson could say Grace,
The company was seated.

17
Now hats fly off, and youths carouse;
Healths first go round, and then the house,
The brides came thick and thick:
And when 'twas nam'd another's health,
Perhaps he made it hers by stealth.
(And who could help it? Dick)

18
O'th' sudden up they rise and dance,
Then sit again and sigh, and glance;
Then dance again and kiss:
Thus sev'ral ways the time did pass,
Whilst ev'ry woman wished her place,
And ev'ry man wished his.

19
By this time all were stoln aside
To counsel and undress the bride;
But that he must not know:
But yet 'twas thought he guessed her mind,
And did not mean to stay behind
Above an hour or so.

20
When in he came (Dick) there she lay
Like new-faln snow melting away;
('Twas time I trow to part)
Kisses were now the only stay;
Which soon she gave, as who should say,
Good b'w'y'! with all my heart.

21
But just as Heav'ns would have to cross it,
In came the bridemaids with the posset: [1]
The bridegroom eat in spite;
For had he left the women to't
It would have cost two hours to do't,
Which were too much that night.

22
At length the candles out, and now
All that they had not done, they do:
What that is, who can tell?
But I believe it was no more
Than thou and I have done before
With Bridget, and with Nell.
—1640

The Constant Lover

1
Out upon it, I have loved
Three whole days together;
And am like to love three more,
If it hold fair weather.

2
Time shall moult away his wings
Ere he shall discover

---

[1] posset hot milk curdled with ale, wine or other liquor; often with sugar, spices or other ingredients (OED posset sb).

In the whole wide world again
Such a constant lover.

3
But a pox upon't, no praise
There is due at all to me:
Love with me had made no stay,
Had it any been but she.

4
Had it any been but she
And that very very face,
There had been at least ere this
A dozen dozen in her place.
—1646

A Barley-break [1]

1
Love, Reason, Hate, did once bespeak
Three mates to play at barley-break;
Love, Folly took; and Reason, Fancy;
And Hate consorts with Pride; so dance they:
Love coupled last, and so it fell
That Love and Folly were in hell.

2
They break, and Love would Reason meet,
But Hate was nimbler on her feet;
Fancy looks for Pride, and thither
Hies, and they two hug together:
Yet this new coupling still doth tell
That Love and Folly were in hell.

3
The rest do break again, and Pride
Hath now got Reason on her side;
Hate and Fancy meet, and stand
Untouched by Love in Folly's hand:
Folly was dull, but Love ran well,
So Love and Folly were in hell.
—1646

Sonnet I

1
Do'st see how unregarded now
that piece of beauty passes?
There was a time when I did vow
to that alone;
but mark the fate of faces:
That red and white works now no more on me
Than if it could not charm or I not see.

2
And yet the face continues good,
and I have still desires,
Am still the self same flesh and blood,
as apt to melt
and suffer from those fires;
Oh! some kind power unriddle where it lies,
Whether my heart be faulty, or her eyes?

3
She every day her Man doth kill,
and I as often die;
Neither her power then, nor my will can question'd be,
what is the mystery?

---

[1] Barley-break is an old country game. The first word of the title may be a corruption of "parley," "a term used in the games of children, when a truce is demanded"; or it may refer to the fact that the game was played in a field or stack-yard. The game was played by six persons, three of each sex, in couples; one couple were left in the middle (called "hell") and had to catch the others, who were allowed to separate or "break" when hard-pressed, and thus to change partners. If they were caught they had to take their turn in "hell." See OED barley interjec and barley-break; see also the description in The Poems of Sir Philip Sidney, ed. W.A. Ringler (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1962), 495.

Sure beauties' empires, like to greater states
Have certain periods set, and hidden fates.[1]
—1646

Sonnet II

1

Of thee (kind boy) I ask no red and white
to make up my delight,
no odd becoming graces,
Black eyes, or little know-not-whats, in faces;[2]
Make me but mad enough, give me good store
Of Love, for her I court,
I ask no more,
'Tis love in love that makes the sport.

2

There's no such thing as that we beauty call, it is mere cozenage all;[3]
for though some long ago
Like't certain colours mingled so and so,
That doth not tie me now from choosing new;
If I a fancy take
To black and blue,
That fancy doth it beauty make.

3

'Tis not the meat, but 'tis the appetite
makes eating a delight, and if I like one dish
More than another, that a pheasant is;
What in our watches, that in us is found,
So to the height and nick
We up be wound,
No matter by what hand or trick.
—1646

Sonnet III

1

Oh! for some honest lover's ghost,
Some kind unbodied post
Sent from the shades below.
I strangely long to know
Whether the nobler chaplets wear,[4]
Those that their mistress' scorn did bear,
Or those that were used kindly.

2

For what-so-e'er they tell us here
To make those sufferings dear,
'Twill there I fear be found,
That to the being crown'd,
T'have lov'd alone will not suffice,
Unless we also have been wise,
And have our loves enjoy'd.

3

What posture can we think him in,
That here unlov'd again
Departs, and's thither gone
Where each sits by his own?
Or how can that Elysium be
Where I my mistress still must see
Circled in others' arms?

4

For there the judges all are just,
And Sophonisba must

---

[1] Sure beauties' empires.../ Have certain periods set Compare the proverbial sentence "States have their conversions and periods as well as natural bodies," The Works of George Herbert, ed. F.E. Hutchinson (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1941), 361 (no. 1166).

[2] know-not-whats an Englishing of the French je ne sais quoi; the French phrase occurs in a letter of Suckling's The Works of Sir John Suckling, ed. Thomas Clayton, (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1971), 153.

[3] cozenage deception (OED cozenage b).

[4] chaplets wreaths for the head (OED chaplet).

Be his whom she held dear; [1]
Not his who loved her here:
The sweet Philoclea since she died
Lies by her Pirocles his side,
Not by Amphialus. [2]

5

Some bays (perchance) or myrtle bough
For difference crowns the brow
Of those kind souls that were
The noble Martyrs here;
And if that be the only odds,
(As who can tell) ye kinder gods,
Give me the Woman here.
—1646

The Wits
(A Sessions of the Poets) [3]

1

A sessions was held the other day,
And Apollo himself was at it (they say;)
The laurel that had been so long reserv'd,
Was now to be given to him best deserv'd.
And
Therefore the wits of the Town came thither,
'Twas strange to see how they flocked together;
Each strongly confident of his own way,
Thought to carry the laurel away that day.

2

There was Selden, and he sat hard by the chair;
Wenman not far off, which was very fair; [4]
Sands with Townsend, for they kept no order;
Digby and Chillingworth a little further: [5]
And
There was Lucan's translator too, and he
That makes God speak so big in's poetry;
Selwin and Waller, and Berkeleys both the brothers;
Jack Vaughan and Porter, with divers others. [6]

3

The first that broke silence was good old Ben,
Prepared before with Canary wine, [7]
And he told them plainly he desrved the bays,
For his were called Works, where others were but Plays; [8]

---

[1] Sophonisba the daughter of Hasdrubal and the wife of Syphax, whom she won over to the Carthaginian cause; when Syphax was overthrown Sophonisba took poison (OCD). Suckling refers to her in a letter to his sister, whose husband, apparently not much to be regretted, had committed suicide (Works, 149).

[2] Philoclea...Pirocles...Amphialus These names occur in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia.

[3] This poem, written in the summer of 1637, was sung to Charles I during his hunting expedition to the New Forest in late August and early September of that year (Works, 266–267). The word "sessions" denotes a trial, whereas "session" denotes only a sitting of a court.

[4] Selden John Selden (1584–1654), a famous legal scholar, considered to be one of the most learned men of his time; Wenman Sir Francis Wenman (fl. 1615–1640), described by Aubrey as an acquaintance of Lord Falkland, whose house at Great Tew, near Oxford, was "like a College, full of learned men."

[5] Sands i.e. George Sandys (1578–1644), translator of Ovid's Metamorphoses and the first book of the Aeneid, and author of a paraphrase of the psalms; Townsend i.e. Aurelian Townshend (fl. 1601–1643), author of two masques and a number of poems; Digby Sir Kenelm Digby (1603–1665), author of Observations upon Religio Medici (1643), and various scientific and philosophical writings; Chillingworth William Chillingworth (1602–1644), author of The Religion of Protestants A Safe Way To Salvation (1637).

[6] Lucan's translator Thomas May (1595–1650). On his importance see David Norbrook, Writing the English Republic (Cambridge: Cambridge U P, 1999); he / That makes God speak so big in's poetry not identified; Francis Quarles, George Wither, and Phineas Fletcher have been suggested (Works, 274); Selwin not identified; Waller Edmund Waller (1606–1687); Berkeleys both the brothers Sir William Berkeley (d. 1677) and John Berkeley, first Baron Berkeley of Stratton (d. 1678); Jack Vaughan Sir John Vaughan (1603–1674); Porter Endymion Porter (1587–1644).

[7] good old Ben Ben Jonson (1572–1637). Ben Jonson died on August 6, 1637, at about the same time as this poem was written. It has been argued that Suckling would not have ridiculed him immediately after his death, but Suckling had long been hostile to Jonson.

[8] his were called Works, where others were but Plays The folio Works of Benjamin Jonson, 1616, was thought presumptuous, as no other dramatist had published a collection of his plays before this.

And
Bid them remember how he had purg'd the stage
Of errors, that had lasted many an age,
And he hop'd they did think the Silent Woman,
The Fox, and the Alchymist outdone by no man.[1]

4
Apollo stopt him there, and bid him not go on,
'Twas merit, he said, and not presumption
Must carry it; at which Ben turned about,
And in great choler offered to go out:
But
Those that were there thought it not fit
To discontent so ancient a wit;
And therefore Apollo call'd him back again,
And made him mine host of his own new Inn.[2]

5
Tom Carew was next, but he had a fault
That would not well stand with a Laureate;[3]
His Muse was hard bound, and th'issue of's brain
Was seldom brought forth but with trouble and pain.
And
All that were present there did agree,
A Laureate's Muse should be easy and free;
Yet sure 'twas not that, but 'twas thought that his Grace
Considered he was well he had a cup-bearer's place.[4]

6
Will. Davenant asham'd of a foolish mischance
That he had got lately travelling in France,[5]
Modestly hoped the handsomness of's Muse
Might any deformity about him excuse.[6]
And
Surely the company would have been content,
If they could have found any precedent;
But in all their records either in verse or prose,
There was not one Laureat without a nose.

7
To Will Berkeley sure all the wits meant well,
But first they would see how his snow would sell:[7]
Will smil'd and swore in their judgements they went less,
That concluded of merit upon success.[8]
So
Sullenly taking his place again,
He gave way to Selwin, that straight stept in;
But alas! he had been so lately a wit,
That Apollo himself hardly knew him yet.

8
Toby Matthew (pox on 't! how came he there?)
Was busily whispering some-body i'th'ear,[9]
When he had the honour to be nam'd i'the Court:

---

[1] The Silent Woman, The Fox, The Alchemist all plays by Jonson. The Fox is Volpone.

[2] his own new Inn Jonson's play The New Inn failed badly in its first stage production; this was the occasion for his "Ode to Himself."

[3] Tom Carew Thomas Carew (1594/5–1640).

[4] a cup-bearer's place in allusion to Carew's position as Sewer in Ordinary to Charles I.

[5] Will. Davenant William Davenant (1606–1668); travelling in France possibly a euphemism for contracting syphilis, popularly associated (by the English) with France.

[6] any deformity about him Aubrey writes of Davenant, "He got a terrible clap of a black handsome wench that lay in Axe-yard, Westminster…which cost him his nose, with which unlucky mischance many wits were too cruelly bold"; clap gonorrhea.

[7] how his snow would sell It has been conjectured that this is a facetious reference to the frigidity or freedom from sexual impurity of Berkeley's play The Lost Lady, which had not yet been performed.

[8] they… / That concluded of merit upon success presumably, those who equated popular success with literary merit.

[9] Toby Matthew Sir Toby Matthew (1577–1655); was busily whispering Anthony à Wood wrote of Matthew that it was his custom always to be whispering in company.

But Sir, you may thank my Lady Carlisle for't; [1]
For
Had not her Character furnished you out
With something of handsome, without all doubt
You and your sorry Lady Muse had been
In the number of those that were not to come in.

9
In haste two or three from the Court came in,
And they brought letters (forsooth) from the Queen;
'Twas discreetly done too, for if they had come
Without them, they had scarce been let into the room.
This
Made a dispute; for 'twas plain to be seen
Each man had a mind to gratify the Queen: [2]
But Apollo himself could not think it fit;
There was difference, he said, 'twixt fooling and wit.

10
Suckling next was call'd, but did not appear,
And strait one whisperd Apollo in's ear,
That of all men living he cared not for't,
He loved not the Muses so well as his sport;
And
Prized black eyes, or a lucky hit
At bowls, above all the trophies of wit;
But Apollo was angry, and publicly said
'Twere fit that a fine were set on his head.

11
Wat Montague now stood forth to his trial,
And did not so much as suspect a denial; [3]
Wise Apollo then asked him first of all
If he understood his own pastoral.
For
If he could do it, 'twould plainly appear
He understood more than any man there,
And did merit the bays above all the rest,
But the Mounsier was modest, and silence confessed.

12
During these troubles, in the crowd was hid
One that Apollo soon missed, little Sid; [4]
And having spied him, call'd him out of the throng,
And advised him in his ear not to write so strong.
Then
Murrey was summon'd, but 'twas urg'd that he
Was chief already of another company. [5]

13
Hales set by himself most gravely did smile [6]
To see them about nothing keep such a coil; [7]
Apollo had spied him, but knowing his mind
Past by, and call'd Falkland that sat just behind:
But

---

[1] my Lady Carlisle Lucy Hay, Countess of Carlisle (1599–1660), was admired by Charles I's courtiers, but not apparently by Suckling. He is uncomplimentary about her in his "Upon my Lady Carlisle's walking in Hampton-Court garden," a poem in dialogue form in which Thomas Carew praises and Suckling dispraises her. Matthew's Character of the Most Excellent Lady, Lucy Countess of Carlisle, was circulating in 1636, though not printed until 1660.

[2] This made a dispute etc. omitted from the earliest printed copies because of the impropriety of its reference to Henrietta Maria; gratify is a double entendre.

[3] Wat Montague Walter Montague (?1603–1677). His The Shepherd's Paradise was acted by Henrietta Maria and her maids of honour, for the entertainment of Charles I, in January 1633.

[4] little Sid Sidney Godolphin (1610–1643), a poet. He was killed in the Civil War. See the chapter "The Death of Sidney Godolphin" in Irene Coltman, Private Men and Public Causes (London: Faber and Faber, 1962).

[5] Murrey probably William Murray, Gentleman of the Bedchamber and later first Earl of Dysart. In a manuscript of the time he is referred to as "his country's chiefest wit."

[6] Hales John Hales (1584–1656).

[7] keep such a coil a proverbial phrase, meaning "make such a fuss."

He was of late so gone with Divinity,
That he had almost forgot his Poetry,[1]
Though to say the truth (and Apollo did know it)
He might have been both his Priest and his Poet.

14
At length who but an Alderman did appear,
At which Will. Davenant began to swear;
But wiser Apollo bid him draw nigher,
And when he was mounted a little higher
He
Openly declared that 'twas the best sign
Of good store of wit to have good store of coin,
And without a syllable more or less said,
He put the laurel on the alderman's head.

15
At this all the wits were in such a maze
That for a good while they did nothing but gaze
One upon another, not a man in the place
But had discontent writ in great in his face.
Only
The small Poets cleared up again,
Out of hope (as 'twas thought) of borrowing;
But sure they were out, for he forfeits his Crown
When he lends any Poet about the Town.
—1646

A Candle[2]

There is a thing which in the light
Is seldom us'd, but in the night
It serves the maiden female crew,
The ladies, and the good-wives too:[3]
They use to take it in their hand,
And then it will uprightly stand;
And to a hole they it apply,
Where by its good will it would die:
It spends, goes out, and still within[4]
It leaves its moisture thick and thin.
—1659

---

[1] Falkland Lucius Cary, second Viscount Falkland (?1610–1643). See note on Wenman, above.

[2] Facetious poems on the clandestine uses of the candle were common in the period.

[3] good-wives mistresses of houses, therefore, married women (OED good-wife 1).

[4] die...spends Both words were commonly used in the period to refer to orgasm.

Queen Henrietta Maria

1609 –1669

Henrietta Maria, born at the Louvre in November, 1609, was the youngest daughter of Henry IV of France and his second wife Marie de Medici. Her marriage to Charles I in 1625 created an alliance between France and England. The marriage took place on the agreement that Charles would suspend the recusancy laws in England, that the English would serve as allies to the French against the Huguenot rebels at La Rochelle, and that Henrietta Maria would be permitted to have Catholic attendants in her service. Henrietta Maria had use of a chapel at Somerset House, which was open to members of the court, and Capuchin priests were sent from France to officiate. In 1629, Henrietta Maria bore her first child, a son who lived only a few hours. The following year, Charles (II) was born, and Henrietta attended mass with the child until her husband forbade it in February 1636. Between 1630 and 1644, Henrietta Maria bore five other children: Mary, James (II), Elizabeth, Henry and Henrietta. Henrietta Maria's political role included her raising £20,000 from English Catholics to assist Charles in the impending war against the Scottish forces. This action was followed by a series of foreign-aid and military plots which she devised to support Charles against Parliament. In 1641, Henrietta Maria arranged a marriage between her eldest daughter Mary and William of Orange in an attempt to secure funds from William which would enable Charles to resist Parliament. Mary and William were married in 1642, and in the same year, Henrietta Maria left for the Continent with some of the crown jewels which she pawned in Amsterdam to raise funds for munitions of war. Despite threats to her safety, Henrietta Maria returned to England with a large sum of money and arms in 1643, joining Newcastle's army at York. Meeting her husband at Edgehill, she rode with him to Oxford on July 14, 1643. The following year, Henrietta Maria gave birth to her youngest child Henrietta, and returned to St. Germains, France on July 14, 1644. In her letters to Charles I during the first civil war, we read of her personal attachments and political stratagems as Queen consort. However, her political negotiations failed to save the life of her husband. By 1646, Charles had placed himself in Scottish hands, an act which served as the prelude to his death. Her application for a passport to plead for her husband's life in 1648 was unsuccessful; she heard of his execution in February, 1649. After arranging a marriage between Henrietta and the Duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIV, Henrietta Maria returned to England in 1660 to secure a portion for Henrietta. She did so, and lived in Somerset House on £60,000 per annum. Roman Catholic services continued to be performed in her chapel. Henrietta Maria left London in 1665 and never returned to England, retiring in Colombes near Paris. She was buried in the church of St. Denis.

◆

The Queen's Letter[1]

Royal Sir, though I have been a long time absent from you in person, yet am I still and ever will be present with you in affection. No distance of place can divide our hearts, nor any length of time can lessen the real and unfeigned love that is equal between us. My heart's desire is to see you, and once more to behold a happy union between your Majesty and your Parliament.

—1642

---

[1] The Queen's Letter was printed at the conclusion of the pamphlet The Best News from York, That ever came to London and Westminster Containing, His Majesty's most gracious Resolution to return to his Parliament (London, 1642).

The Queen's Letter Sent to the King's most excellent Majesty from Holland[1]

Most royal and illustrious monarch of great Britain, my great, my good and worthy liege, the most regal object of my loving heart, best affections and utmost endeavours; be pleased to let this paper in all humility to salute your princely hands, and to give your princely cogitations some account of my endeavours (as I am bound in duty, and as I am your spouse and loyal wife), for your Majesty in my absence, my love having now no other ways left of expression, but by being your humble and faithful agent in accommodating and promoting your high affairs, wherein if my words, the pledges, and earnest solicitors for the improvement of your present fame and glory, may carry in them any strength of persuasion, I would earnestly incite your princely thoughts to a remembrance of your Majesty's resolution to carry forward your designs until they grow to a famous maturity and ripeness. Maintain and continue your cause in the hardy prosecution of your affairs, without any mitigation, unless an honourable satisfaction may make you disbandon and raise your former intentions. Now you have a large field given you, wherein the illustrious virtues inherent in your royal person may be actually expressed, and give the whole Christian world which are now spectators, and the eye of all Christendom upon your person, a clear approbation and testimony that your Majesty merits that noble attribute annexed to your royal title, Defender of the Faith. For by such like actions as these, princes live when they have paid their debt to nature, and will be their own monument, which shall be everlasting, and more durable than that of marble. Be therefore constant in your princely resolutions, full of your own cause, and your Majesty shall never want external accommodations and foreign compliances, which by my earnest endeavours and solicitations have of late been somewhat advanced, having obtained a list from our brother the Prince of Orange, from whence as the special merit did distinguish them in worth, I have selected out of that number some choice, well-experienced and serviceable soldiers, such as shall be forward with courageous affections to maintain your princely affairs, and to amplify your renown and glory in the engagement of present actions.[2] And out of these deserving men, I have chosen stout commanders, who will be always ready to do your Majesty service in your army, and that I might further supply and serve your present occasions, I have caused 400 barrels of powder, and 10 pieces of ordnance, to be conveyed to your Majesty, besides good store of all other ammunition, necessary upon all warlike occasions. The compliance of our noble brother the Prince of Orange is so settled in a firm complexion, sympathising, and affectionately agreeing with the present condition of affairs, that he hath by many demonstrations given testimony thereof, and by raising diverse sums of money for my use hath endeavoured the inclination of his particular affections, amongst other accommodations lest your Majesty should be any way necessitated. I am to certify your Majesty, that the jewels of your crown are for present receipts engaged to some certain Jews of Amsterdam.[3] Moreover I am to give your Highness cause to esteem the cheerful undertakings and forward alacrity of our brother the Prince of Orange, who will with all careful vigilancy be ready to take all opportunities for your Majesty's advantage, and will with clear intentions wherein you may repose trust, be ready to express himself in all Christian offices. My acknowledgment of Prince Robert's valiant courage and love expressed in personal actions, and those adhering to your Majesty, being arrived to my knowledge by a letter lately sent to Mr. Jermyn, must needs deserve my approbation and highest commendation, since his worth and noble actions are of such transcendent expression of princely merit.[1] Amongst the other endeavours of my affectionate desires, the States have been earnestly solicited for their aid and assistance, which as yet cannot be induced upon them to grant, nor can I by any persuasion obtain the effect of my urgent motion, though I hope my letters sent unto my brother the French king, shall infuse a royal flame into his breast, and make him through accompable fullness of your Highness's cause, give such aid unto your Majesty, as may express him royal in his thoughts, and tender of his regal relation unto your Highness;[2] but if my letter should be so unhappy as not fully to inflame and instigate his mind to awake his power in your aid and defence, I cannot nor will not see your actions brought on with so much expectation any way disanimated, but since the age's hopes must be the production and business of your weighty affairs, my personal solicitation shall at my going into France induce and incline my most Christian brother to appear in promoting and assisting your Majesty's cause and actions, which are so full of honourable justice.[3] Though absent till we be resident in your princely heart, and believe my affections and endeavours are ever ready to serve your Majesty.

---

[1] from The Queen's Letter from Holland: Directed to the King's Most Excellent Majesty (London, 1642/3).

[2] Prince of Orange Though Henrietta Maria had originally opposed a marriage between her eldest daughter Mary and William, Prince of Orange, she now encouraged the alliance in the hopes that William would supply money or troops to resist Parliament. On April 19, 1641 William arrived in England with a substantial amount of money. Parliament learned from an intercepted letter of November 26, 1642 that William had advanced her additional funds.

[3] that the jewels…of Amsterdam By June of 1642, news reached England that Henrietta Maria had been selling or pawning a great part of the crown jewels at Amsterdam and had purchased stores of munitions of war for the King's service.

Sir, I am and always shall be your most dutiful wife and liege woman.

HENRIETTA MARIA

—1642/3

---

[1] Prince Robert Prince Rupert; the name was often so Anglicized by English writers; Mr. Jermyn Henry Jermyn was Henrietta Maria's "man of business." He and the cavalier poet Sir John Suckling devised a plot by which Henrietta Maria could bring up the English army in the north to support the King.

[2] accompable probably meaning "sufficient for the occasion."

[3] disanimated discouraged (OED disanimate v 2).

Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon

1609 –1674

One of the most prominent statesmen of the century, Clarendon (as he is usually called, though he was not created Earl until 1661) was the son of a Wiltshire country gentleman. He was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and trained as a lawyer at the Middle Temple. His friends included many of the most distinguished intellectual and literary figures of the day, among them Ben Jonson, Thomas Carew, Edmund Waller, and John Earle; he also enjoyed connections with the Duke of Buckingham, Lucius Cary, and William Laud. Clarendon began his political career when he was elected to both the Short and Long Parliaments in 1640. While playing an active role in Parliament's early attempts at political reform, he opposed any alteration in ecclesiastical matters and eventually led Royalist opposition to the Grand Remonstrance. Clarendon became one of the King's leading advisors throughout the wars, responsible for administrative and financial rather than military issues; in addition, he wrote most of the King's numerous declarations and pamphlets until 1645. He accompanied Prince Charles to Jersey in 1646, where he began to write his History. With the renewal of war in 1648, he joined the Prince in France and from 1651 on was chief advisor to Charles II, as Secretary of State and (from 1658) Lord Chancellor. Clarendon was one of the architects of the Restoration settlement, and for a few years after 1660 was virtually head of government. In 1667, popular opposition and court intrigues led to his downfall, and he fled into France, where he lived the remainder of his life.

During this final period of exile Clarendon wrote an autobiography, and then combined this Life with the draft of the History he had begun 25 years earlier in Jersey and some new material to produce the final History of the Rebellion. The excerpts below combine passages from the final History and the Life, both of which were first published, separately, in the eighteenth century. For more on William Laud, the subject of one of Clarendon's famous character sketches, see the selection from Laud's Diary; for other accounts of the Great Fire, see the accounts by John Evelyn and Samuel Pepys.

* * *

From The Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon and The History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England

(excerpts)

The Character of William Laud

It was within one week after the king's return from Scotland [in August 1633], that [Archbishop of Canterbury George] Abbot died at his house at Lambeth. And the king took very little time to consider who should be his successor, but the very next time the bishop of London (who was longer upon his way home than the king had been) came to him, his majesty entertained him very cheerfully with this compellation,[1] "My lord's grace of Canterbury, you are very welcome"; and gave order the same day for the dispatch of all the necessary forms for the translation:[2] so that within a month or thereabouts after the death of the other archbishop, he [Laud] was completely invested in that high dignity, and settled in his palace at Lambeth. This great prelate had been before in great favour with the duke of Buckingham,[3] whose great confidant he was, and by him recommended to the king, as fittest to be trusted in the conferring all ecclesiastical preferments, when he was but bishop of St. David's, or newly preferred to Bath and Wells; and from that time he entirely governed that province without a rival: so that his promotion to Canterbury was long foreseen and expected; nor was it attended with any increase of envy or dislike.

---

[1] compellation appellation, the name or title by which a person is addressed (OED compellation 2b,c).

[2] translation the move of a bishop to another bishopric.

[3] the duke of Buckingham George Villiers (1592–1628); for more information, see the selection of anti-Buckingham poems.

He was a man of great parts, and very exemplary virtues, allayed and discredited by some unpopular natural infirmities; the greatest of which was (besides a hasty, sharp way of expressing himself) that he believed innocence of heart, and integrity of manners, was a guard strong enough to secure any man in his voyage through this world, in what company soever he travelled, and through what ways soever he was to pass: and sure never any man was better supplied with that provision. He was born of honest parents, who were well able to provide for his education in the schools of learning, from whence they sent him to St. John's college in Oxford, the worst endowed at that time of any in that famous university. From a scholar he became a fellow, and then the president of that college, after he had received all the graces and degrees (the proctorship and the doctorship) could be obtained there. He was always maligned and persecuted by those who were of the Calvinian faction, which was then very powerful, and who, according to their useful maxim and practice, call every man they do not love, papist; and under this senseless appellation they created him many troubles and vexations; and so far suppressed him, that though he was the king's chaplain, and taken notice of for an excellent preacher, and a scholar of the most sublime parts, he had not any preferment to invite him to leave his poor college, which only gave him bread, till the vigour of his age was past: and when he was promoted by king James, it was but to a poor bishopric in Wales, which was not so good a support for a bishop, as his college was for a private scholar, though a doctor.

Parliaments in that time were frequent,[1] and grew very busy; and the party under which he had suffered a continual persecution, appeared very powerful, and full of design, and they who had the courage to oppose them, began to be taken notice of with approbation and countenance: and under this style he came to be first cherished by the duke of Buckingham, after he had made some experiments of the temper and spirit of the other people, nothing to his satisfaction. From this time he prospered at the rate of his own wishes, and being transplanted out of his cold barren diocese of St. David's, into a warmer climate, he was left, as was said before, by that omnipotent favourite in that great trust with the king, who was sufficiently indisposed towards the persons or the principles of Mr. Calvin's disciples.

When he came into great authority, it may be, he retained too keen a memory of those who had so unjustly and uncharitably persecuted him before; and, I doubt, was so far transported with the same passions he had reason to complain of in his adversaries, that, as they accused him of popery, because he had some doctrinal opinions which they liked not, though they were nothing allied to popery; so he entertained too much prejudice to some persons, as if they were enemies to the discipline of the church, because they concurred with Calvin in some doctrinal points; when they abhorred his discipline, and reverenced the government of the church, and prayed for the peace of it with as much zeal and fervency as any in the kingdom; as they made manifest in their lives, and in their sufferings with it, and for it. He had, from his first entrance into the world, without any disguise or dissimulation, declared his own opinion of that classis of men;[1] and, as soon as it was in his power, he did all he could to hinder the growth and increase of that faction, and to restrain those who were inclined to it, from doing the mischief they desired to do. But his power at court could not enough qualify him to go through with that difficult reformation, whilst he had a superior in the church, who, having the reins in his hand, could slacken them according to his own humour and indiscretion; and was thought to be the more remiss, to irritate his choleric disposition. But when he had now the primacy in his own hand, the king being inspired with the same zeal, he thought he should be to blame, and have much to answer, if he did not make haste to apply remedies to those diseases, which he saw would grow apace.

---

[1] in that time the 1620s. Laud was made Bishop of St. David's in 1621, at the age of 48.

In the end of September of the year 1633, he was invested in the title, power, and jurisdiction of archbishop of Canterbury, and entirely in possession of the revenue thereof, without a rival in church or state; that is, no man professed to oppose his greatness; and he had never interposed or appeared in matter of state to this time. His first care was, that the place he was removed from might be supplied with a man who would be vigilant to pull up those weeds, which the London soil was too apt to nourish, and so drew his old friend and companion Dr. Juxon as near to him as he could.[2] They had been fellows together in one college in Oxford, and, when he was first made bishop of St. David's, he made him president of that college: when he could no longer keep the deanery of the chapel royal, he made him his successor in that near attendance upon the king: and now he was raised to archbishop, he easily prevailed with the king to make the other, bishop of London, before, or very soon after, he had been consecrated bishop of Hereford, if he were more than elect of that church.

It was now a time of great ease and tranquillity; the king (as hath been said before) had made himself superior to all those difficulties and straits he had to contend with the four first years he came to the crown at home; and was now reverenced by all his neighbours, who all needed his friendship, and desired to have it; the wealth of the kingdom notorious to all the world, and the general temper and humour of it little inclined to the papists, and less to the puritan. There were some late taxes and impositions introduced, which rather angered than grieved the people, who were more than repaired by the quiet, peace, and prosperity they enjoyed; and the murmur and discontent that was, appeared to be against the excess of power exercised by the crown, and supported by the judges in Westminster-hall. The church was not repined at, nor the least inclination to alter the government and discipline thereof, or to change the doctrine. Nor was there at that time any considerable number of persons of any valuable condition throughout the kingdom, who did wish either; and the cause of so prodigious a change in so few years after was too visible from the effects. The archbishop's heart was set upon the advancement of the church, in which he well knew he had the king's full concurrence, which he thought would be too powerful for any opposition; and that he should need no other assistance.

Though the nation generally, as was said before, was without any ill talent to the church,[3] either in the point of the doctrine, or the discipline, yet they were not without a jealousy that popery was not enough discountenanced, and were very averse from admitting any thing they had not been used to, which they called innovation, and were easily persuaded, that any thing of that kind was but to please the papists. Some doctrinal points in controversy had been, in the late years, agitated in the pulpits with more warmth and reflections, than had used to be; and thence the heat and animosity increased in books pro and con upon the same arguments: most of the popular preachers, who had not looked into the ancient learning, took Calvin's word for it, and did all they could to propagate his opinions in those points: they who had studied more, and were better versed in the antiquities of the church, the fathers, the councils, and the ecclesiastical histories, with the same heat and passion in preaching and writing defended the contrary.

---

[1] classis one of the governing hierarchies in the Presbyterian church. Clarendon here uses the term more generally, as in "class" or "type" of men (he uses the same word below to describe Royalists).

[2] Dr. Juxon William Juxon (1582–1663); he became Archbishop of Canterbury at the Restoration.

[3] talent inclination, will, disposition (OED talent sb 2,3).

The archbishop had, all his life, eminently opposed Calvin's doctrine in those controversies, before the name of Arminius was taken notice of, or his opinions heard of;[1] and thereupon, for want of another name, they had called him a papist, which nobody believed him to be, and he had more manifested the contrary in his disputations and writings, than most men had done; and it may be the other found the more severe and rigorous usage from him, for their propagating that calumny against him. He was a man of great courage and resolution, and being most assured within himself, that he proposed no end in all his actions or designs, than what was pious and just (as sure no man had ever a heart more entire to the king, the church, or his country), he never studied the best ways to those ends; he thought, it may be, that any art or industry that way would discredit, at least make the integrity of the end suspected, let the cause be what it will. He did court persons too little; nor cared to make his designs and purposes appear as candid as they were, by showing them in any other dress than their own natural beauty and roughness; and did not consider enough what men said, or were like to say of him. If the faults and vices were fit to be looked into, and discovered, let the persons be who they would that were guilty of them, they were sure to find no connivance or favour from him. He intended the discipline of the church should be felt, as well as spoken of, and that it should be applied to the greatest and most splendid transgressors, as well as to the punishment of smaller offences, and meaner offenders; and thereupon called for or cherished the discovery of those who were not careful to cover their own iniquities, thinking they were above the reach of other men's, or their power or will to chastise. Persons of honour and great quality, of the court, and of the country, were every day cited, into the high-commission court,[2] upon the fame of their incontinence, or other scandal in their lives, and were there prosecuted to their shame and punishment: and as the shame (which they called an insolent triumph upon their degree and quality, and levelling them with the common people) was never forgotten, but watched for revenge; so the fines imposed there were the most questioned, and repined against, because they were assigned to the rebuilding and repairing St. Paul's church; and thought therefore to be the more severely imposed, and the less compassionately reduced and excused; which likewise made the jurisdiction and rigour of the star-chamber more felt,[3] and murmured against, which sharpened many men's humours against the bishops, before they had any ill intention towards the church.

The archbishop had not been long at Canterbury, when there was another great alteration in the court by the death of the earl of Portland,[1] high treasurer of England; a man so jealous of the archbishop's credit with the king, that he always endeavoured to lessen it by all the arts and ways he could; which he was so far from effecting, that, as it usually falls out, when passion and malice make accusation, by suggesting many particulars which the king knew to be untrue, or believed to be no faults, he rather confirmed his majesty's judgment of him, and prejudiced his own reputation. His death caused no grief to the archbishop; who was upon it made one of the commissioners of the treasury and revenue, which he had reason to be sorry for, because it engaged him in civil business and matters of state, in which he had little experience, and which he had hitherto avoided. But being obliged to it now by his trust, he entered upon it with his natural earnestness and warmth, making it his principal care to advance and improve the king's revenue by all the ways which were offered, and so hearkened to all informations and propositions of that kind; and having not had experience of that tribe of people who deal in that traffic (a confident, senseless, and for the most part a naughty people), he was sometimes misled by them to think better of some projects than they deserved: but when he was so entirely devoted to what would be beneficial to the king, that all propositions and designs, which were for the profit (only or principally) of particular persons how great soever, were opposed and crossed, and very often totally suppressed and stifled in their birth, by his power and authority; which created him enemies enough in the court, and many of ability to do mischief, who knew well how to recompense discourtesies, which they always called injuries.

---

[1] Arminius Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609), a celebrated Dutch Reformed theologian who challenged the Calvinist doctrine of predestination. In England, Laud's movement toward an anti-Calvinistic, more ceremonial church polity was widely termed "Arminian."

[2] high-commission court an ecclesiastical court that investigated heresy and other irregularities. Widely unpopular for its arbitrary procedures and its use by the monarchy to enforce the royal prerogative, it was abolished by Parliament in 1641.

[3] star-chamber a court of law used extensively by Charles I to maintain royal authority, subsequently abolished by the Long Parliament.

And the revenue of too many of the court consisted principally in enclosures,[2] and improvement of that nature, which he still opposed passionately, except they were founded upon law; and then, if it would bring profit to the king, how old and obsolete soever the law was, he thought he might justly advise the prosecution. And so he did a little too much countenance the commission for depopulation,[3] which brought much charge and trouble upon the people, which was likewise cast upon his account.

He had observed, and knew it must be so, that the principal officers of the revenue, who governed the affairs of money, had always access to the king, and spent more time with him in private than any of his servants or counsellors, and had thereby frequent opportunities to do good or ill offices to many men; of which he had had experience, when the earl of Portland was treasurer, and the lord Cottington chancellor of the exchequer;[4] neither of them being his friends; and the latter still enjoying that place, and having his former access, and so continuing a joint commissioner of the treasury with him, and understanding that province much better, he still opposed, and commonly carried everything against him: so that he was weary of the toil and vexation of that business; as all other men were, and still are of the delays which are in dispatches, whilst that office is executed by commission.

The treasurer's is the greatest office of benefit in the kingdom, and the chief in precedence next the archbishop's, and the great seal:[5] so that the eyes of all men were at gaze who should have this great office; and the greatest of the nobility, who were in the chiefest employments, looked upon it as the prize of one of them; such offices commonly making way for more removes and preferments: when on a sudden the staff was put into the hands of the bishop of London [Juxon], a man so unknown, that his name was scarce heard of in the kingdom, who had been within two years before but a private chaplain to the king, and the president of a poor college in Oxford. This inflamed more men than were angry before, and no doubt did not only sharpen the edge of envy and malice against the archbishop (who was the known architect of this new fabric), but most unjustly indisposed many towards the church itself; which they looked upon as the gulf ready to swallow all the great offices, there being others in view, of that robe who were ambitious enough to expect the rest.

---

[1] earl of Portland Sir Richard Weston (1577–1635).

[2] enclosures privately owned enclosed fields, which had begun in the sixteenth century to replace the open-field system of farming.

[3] commission for depopulation one of the crown's unpopular money-raising strategies, in this case a commission that enforced fines on landowners who allowed fields to go uncultivated and thereby encouraged workers to leave the countryside.

[4] Lord Cottington Francis Cottington, Baron Cottington (1578?–1652), a convert to Catholicism.

[5] the great seal a metonymy for the Lord Chancellor, in whose custody was kept the Great Seal, used to authenticate royal documents.

In the meantime the archbishop himself was infinitely pleased with what was done, and unhappily believed he had provided a stronger support for the church; and never abated any thing of his severity and rigour towards men of all conditions, or in the sharpness of his language and expressions, which was so natural to him, that he could not debate any thing without some commotion, when the argument was not of moment, nor bear contradiction in debate, even in the council, where all men are equally free, with that patience and temper that was necessary; of which they who wished him not well took many advantages, and would therefore contradict him, that he might be transported with some indecent passion; which, upon a short recollection, he was always sorry for, and most readily and heartily would make acknowledgment. No man so willingly made unkind use of all those occasions, as the lord Cottington, who being a master of temper, and of the most profound dissimulation, knew too well how to lead him into a mistake, and then drive him into choler, and then expose him upon the matter, and the manner, to the judgment of the company; and he chose to do this most when the king was present; and then he would dine with him the next day.

. . . . .

The person [Clarendon] whose life this discourse is to recollect (and who had so great an affection and reverence for the memory of that prelate, [archbishop Laud,] that he never spake of him without extraordinary esteem, and believed him to be a man of the most exemplar virtue and piety of any of that age)[1] was wont to say, the greatest want the archbishop had was of a true friend, who would seasonably have told him of his infirmities, and what people spake of him; and he said, he knew well that such a friend would have been very acceptable to him; and upon that occasion he used to mention a story of himself: that when he was a young practiser of the law, being in some favour with him (as is mentioned before), he went to visit him in the beginning of a Michaelmas term,[2] shortly after his return from the country, where he had spent a month or two of the summer.

He found the archbishop early walking in the garden; who received him according to his custom, very graciously; and continuing his walk, asked him, "What good news in the country?" to which he answered, "there was none good; the people were universally discontented; and (which troubled him most) that every [one] spoke extreme ill of his grace, as the cause of all that was amiss." He replied, "that he was sorry for it; he knew he did not deserve it; and that he must not give over serving the king and the church, to please the people, who otherwise would not speak well of him." Mr. Hyde told him, "he thought he need not lessen his zeal for either; and that it grieved him to find persons of the best condition, and who loved both king and church, exceedingly indevoted to him; complaining of his manner of treating them, when they had occasion to resort to him, it may be, for his direction." And then named him two persons of the most interest and credit in Wiltshire, who had that summer attended the council board in some affairs which concerned the king and the county: that all the lords present used them with great courtesy, knowing well their quality and reputation; but that he alone spake very sharply to them, and without any thing of grace, at which they were much troubled; and one of them, supposing that somebody had done him ill offices, went the next morning to Lambeth, to present his service to him, and to discover, if he could, what misrepresentation had been made of him: that after he had attended very long, he was admitted to speak with his grace, who scarce hearing him, sharply answered him, that "he had no leisure for compliments"; and so turned away; which put the other gentleman much out of countenance: and that this kind of behaviour of his was the discourse of all companies of persons of quality; every man continuing any such story with another like it, very much to his disadvantage, and to the trouble of those who were very just to him.

---

[1] exemplar exemplary (OED exemplar a 4).

[2] Michaelmas term the university or court term beginning on the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels (September 29).

He heard the relation very patiently and attentively, and discoursed over every particular with all imaginable condescension; and said, with evident show of trouble, that "he was very unfortunate to be so ill understood; that he meant very well; that he remembered the time when those two persons were with the council; that upon any deliberations, when any thing was resolved, or to be said to any body, the council enjoined him to deliver their resolutions; which he did always according to the best of his understanding: but by the imperfection he had by nature, which he said often troubled him, he might deliver it in such a tune, and with a sharpness of voice, that made men believe he was angry, when there was no such thing; that when those gentlemen were there, and he had delivered what he was to say, they made some stay, and spake with some of the lords, which not being according to order, he thought he gave them some reprehension; they having at that time very much other business to do: that he did well remember that one of them (who was a person of honour) came afterwards to him at a time he was shut up about an affair of importance, which required his full thoughts; but that as soon as he heard of the other's being without, he sent for him, himself going into the next room, and receiving him very kindly, as he thought; and supposing that he came about business, asked him what his business was; and the other answering, that he had no business, but continuing his address with some ceremony, he had indeed said, that he had not time for compliments: but he did not think that he went out of the room in that manner: and concluded, that it was not possible for him, in the many occupations he had, to spend any time in unnecessary compliments; and that if his integrity and uprightness, which never should be liable to reproach, could not be strong enough to preserve him, he must submit to God's good pleasure."

He was well contented to hear Mr. Hyde reply very freely upon the subject, who said, "he observed by what his grace himself had related, that the gentlemen had too much reason for the report they made; and he did not wonder that they had been much troubled at his carriage towards them; that he did exceedingly wish that he would more reserve his passion towards all persons, how faulty soever; and that he would treat persons of honour, and quality, and interest in their country, with more courtesy and condescension; especially when they came to visit him, and make offer of their service." He said, smiling, that "he could only undertake for his heart; that he had very good meaning; for his tongue, he could not undertake, that he would not sometimes speak more hastily and sharply than he should do (which oftentimes he was sorry for and reprehended himself for), and in a tune which might be liable to misinterpretation with them who were not very well acquainted with him, and so knew that it was an infirmity, which his nature and education had so rooted in him, that it was in vain to contend with it." For the state and distance he kept with men, he said, "he thought it was not more than was suitable to the place and degree he held in the church and state; or so much as others had assumed to themselves who had sat in his place; and thereupon he told him some behaviour and carriage of his predecessor, Abbot (who he said was not better born than himself), towards the greatest nobility of the kingdom, which he thought was very insolent and inexcusable"; and was indeed very ridiculous.

After this bold enterprise, [Mr. Hyde] ever found himself more graciously received by him, and treated with more familiarity; upon which he always concluded, that if the archbishop had had any true friend, who would, in proper seasons, have dealt frankly with him in the most important matters, and wherein the errors were like to be most penal, he would not only have received it very well, but have profited himself by it. But it is the misfortune of most persons of that education (how worthy soever), that they have rarely friendships with men above their own condition; and that their ascent being commonly sudden, from low to high, they have afterwards rather dependants than friends, and are still deceived by keeping somewhat in reserve to themselves, even from those with whom they seem most openly to communicate; and which is worse, receive for the most part their informations and advertisements from clergymen who understand the least, and take the worst measure of human affairs, of all mankind that can write and read.

The archbishop of Canterbury had lain prisoner in the Tower, from the beginning of the parliament, full four years, without any prosecution till this time, when they brought him to the bars of both houses;[1] charging him with several articles of high treason; which, if all that was alleged against him had been true, could not have made him guilty of treason. They accused him of a design to bring in popery, and of having correspondence with the pope, and such like particulars, as the consciences of his greatest enemies absolved him from. No man was a greater or abler enemy to popery; no man a more resolute and devout son of the church of England. He was prosecuted by lawyers, assigned to that purpose, out of those, who from their own antipathy to the church and bishops, or from some disobligations received from him, were sure to bring passion, animosity, and malice enough of their own; what evidence soever they had from others. And they did treat him with all the rudeness, reproach, and barbarity imaginable; with which his judges were not displeased.

He defended himself with great and undaunted courage, and less passion than was expected from his constitution; answered all their objections with clearness and irresistible reason; and convinced all men of his integrity, and his detestation of all treasonable intentions. So that though few excellent men have ever had fewer friends to their persons, yet all reasonable men absolved him from any foul crime that the law could take notice of, and punish. However, when they had said all they could against him, and he all for himself that need to be said, and no such crime appearing, as the lords, as the supreme court of judicatory, would take upon them to judge him to be worthy of death, they resorted to their legislative power, and by ordinance of parliament, as they called it, that is, by a determination of those members who sat in the houses (whereof in the house of peers there were not above twelve), they appointed him to be put to death, as guilty of high treason. The first time that two houses of parliament had ever assumed that jurisdiction, or that ever ordinance had been made to such a purpose; nor could any rebellion be more against the law, than that murderous act.

---

[1] Laud was committed to the Tower in 1641, and tried in 1644.

When the first mention was made of their monstrous purpose, of bringing the archbishop to a trial for his life, the chancellor of the exchequer,[1] who had always a great reverence and affection for him, had spoken to the king of it, and proposed to him, that in all events, there might be a pardon prepared, and sent to him, under the great seal of England; to the end, if they proceeded against him in any form of law, he might plead the king's pardon; which must be allowed by all who pretended to be governed by the law; but if they proceeded in a martial, or any other extraordinary way, without any form of law, his majesty should declare his justice and affection to an old faithful servant, whom he much esteemed, in having done all towards his preservation that was in his power to do. The king was wonderfully pleased with the proposition; and took from thence occasion to commend the piety and virtue of the archbishop with extraordinary affection; and commanded the chancellor of the exchequer to cause the pardon to be drawn, and his majesty would sign and seal it with all possible secrecy; which at that time was necessary. Whereupon the chancellor sent for sir Thomas Gardiner, the king's solicitor, and told him the king's pleasure; upon which he presently prepared the pardon, and it was signed and sealed with the great seal of England, and carefully sent, and delivered into the archbishop's own hand, before he was brought to his trial; who received it with great joy, as it was a testimony of the king's gracious affection to him, and care of him, without any opinion that they who endeavoured to take away the king's life would preserve his by his majesty's authority.

When the archbishop's council had perused the pardon, and considered that all possible exceptions would be taken to it, though they should not reject it, they found, that the impeachment was not so distinctly set down in the pardon as it ought to be; which could not be helped at Oxford,[2] because they had no copy of it; and therefore had supplied it with all those general expressions, as, in any court of law, would make the pardon valid against any exceptions the king's own council could make against it. Hereupon, the archbishop had, by the same messenger, returned the pardon again to the chancellor, with such directions and copies as were necessary; upon which it was perfected accordingly, and delivered safely again to him, and was in his hands during the whole time of his trial. So when his trial was over, and the ordinance passed for the cutting off his head, and he called and asked, according to custom in criminal proceedings, what he could say more, why he should not suffer death? he told them, that he had the king's gracious pardon, which he pleaded, and tendered to them, and desired that it might be allowed.

Whereupon he was sent to the Tower, and the pardon read in both Houses; where, without any long debate, it was declared to be of no effect, and that the king could not pardon a judgment of parliament. And so, without troubling themselves farther, they gave orders for his execution; which he underwent with all Christian courage and magnanimity, to the admiration of the beholders, and confusion of his enemies. Much hath been said of the person of this great prelate before, of his great endowments, and natural infirmities; to which shall be added no more in this place (his memory deserving a particular celebration), than that his learning, piety, and virtue, have been attained by very few, and the greatest of his infirmities are common to all, even to the best men.

---

[1] Hyde himself; he succeeded Cottington as Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1643.

[2] Oxford the location of the King and his court at the time.

THE TEMPER AND SPIRIT OF THE NATION AFTER 1660

It will be convenient here, before we descend to those particulars which had an influence upon the minds of men, to take a clear view of the temper and spirit of that time; of the nature and inclination of the army; of the disposition and interest of the several factions in religion; all which appeared in their several colours, without dissembling their principles, and with equal confidence demanded the liberty of conscience they had enjoyed in and since the time of Cromwell; and the humour and the present purpose and design of the parliament itself, to whose judgment and determination the whole settlement of the kingdom, both in church and state, stood referred by the king's own declaration from Breda,[1] which by God's inspiration had been the sole visible motive to that wonderful change that had ensued.[2] And whosoever takes a prospect of all those several passions and appetites and interests, together with the divided affections, jealousies, and animosities of those who had been always looked upon as the king's party, which, if united, would in that conjuncture have been powerful enough to have balanced all the other; I say, whoever truly and ingenuously considers and reflects upon all this composition of contradictory wishes and expectations, must confess that the king was not yet the master of the kingdom, nor his authority and security such as the general noise and acclamation, the bells and the bonfires, proclaimed it to be; and that there was in no conjuncture more need, that the virtue and wisdom and industry of a prince should be evident, and made manifest in the preservation of his dignity, and in the application of his mind to the government of his affairs; and that all who were eminently trusted by him should be men of unquestionable sincerity, who with industry and dexterity should first endeavour to compose the public disorders, and to provide for the peace and settlement of the kingdom, before they applied themselves to make or improve their own particular fortunes. And there is little question, but if this good method had been pursued, and the resolutions of that kind, which the king had seriously taken beyond the seas, when he first discerned his good fortune coming towards him, had been executed and improved; the hearts and affections of all degrees of men were so prepared by their own natural inclinations and integrity, by what they had seen and what they had suffered, by their observations and experience, by their fears, or by their hopes; that they might have been all kneaded into as firm and constant an obedience and resignation to the king's authority, and to a lasting establishment of monarchic power, in all the just extents which the king could expect, or men of any public or honest affections could wish or submit to.

There was yet added to this slippery and uneasy posture of affairs, another mortification, which made a deeper impression upon the king's spirit than all the rest, and without which the worst of the other would have been in some degree remediable; that was, the constitution and disunion of those who were called and looked upon as his own party, which without doubt in the whole kingdom was numerous enough, and capable of being powerful enough to give the law to all the rest; which had been the ground of many unhappy attempts in the late time; that if any present force could be drawn together, and possessed of any such place in which they might make a stand without being overrun in a moment, the general concurrence of the kingdom would in a short time reduce the army,[3] and make the king superior to all his enemies; which imagination was enough confuted, though not enough extinguished, by the dearbought experience in the woeful enterprise at Worcester.[1] However, it had been now a very justifiable presumption in the king, to believe as well as hope, that he could not be long in England without such an apparency of his own party, that wished all that he himself desired, and such a manifestation of their authority, interest and power, that would prevent, or be sufficient to subdue, any froward disposition that might grow up in the parliament, or more extravagant demands in the army itself. An appearance there was of that people, great enough, who had all the wishes for the king which he entertained for himself. But they were so divided and disunited by private quarrels, factions, and animosities; or so unacquainted with each other; or, which was worse, so jealous of each other; the understandings and faculties of many honest men were so weak and shallow, that they could not be applied to any great trust; and others, who wished and meant well, had a peevishness, frowardness, and opiniatrety, that they would be engaged only in what pleased themselves, nor would join in any thing with such and such men whom they disliked. The severe and tyrannical government of Cromwell and the parliament had so often banished and imprisoned them upon mere jealousies, that they were grown strangers to one another, without any communication between them: and there had been so frequent betrayings and treacheries used, so many discoveries of meetings privately contrived, and of discourses accidentally entered into, and words and expressions rashly and unadvisedly uttered without any design, upon which multitudes were still imprisoned and many put to death; so that the jealousy was so universal, that few men who had never so good affections for the king, durst confer with any freedom together.

---

[1] declaration from Breda the declaration (April 4, 1660) in which the King promised the political and religious concessions that ushered in the Restoration; it is included in this anthology.

[2] that wonderful change the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660.

[3] the army Parliament's New Model Army.

But these unhappy and fatal miscarriages, and the sad spectacles which ensued, made not those impressions upon the affections and spirits of the king's friends as they ought to have done; nor rendered the wariness and discretion of those who had dissuaded the enterprise, and who were always imprisoned upon suspicion, how innocent soever, the more valued and esteemed: on the contrary, it increased the reproaches against the knot, as if their lâcheté and want of appearance and engaging had been the sole cause of the misfortune.[2] And after some short fits of dejection and acquiescence, upon the shedding so much blood of their friends and confederates, and the notorious discovery of being betrayed by those, who had been trusted by them, of the army; they began again to resume courage, to meet and enter upon new counsels and designs, imputing the former want of success to the want of skill and conduct in the undertakers, not to the all-seeing vigilance of Cromwell and his instruments, or to the formed strength of his government, not to be shaken by weak or ill-seconded conspiracies. Young men were grown up, who inherited their fathers' malignity, and were too impatient to revenge their death, or to be even with their oppressors, and so entered into new combinations as unskilful, and therefore as unfortunate as the former; and being discovered even before they were formed, Cromwell had occasion given him to make himself more terrible in new executions, and to exercise greater tyranny upon the whole party, in imprisonments, penalties, and sequestrations;[3] making those who heartily desired to be quiet, and who as much abhorred any rash and desperate insurrection, to pay their full shares of the folly of the other, as if all were animated by the same spirit. And this unjust and unreasonable rigour increased the reproaches and animosities in the king's friends against each other: the wiser and more sober part, who had most experience, and knew how impossible it was to succeed in such enterprises, and had yet preserved or redeemed enough of their fortunes to sit still and expect some hopeful revolution, were inexpressibly offended, and bitterly inveighed against those, who without reason disturbed their peace and quiet, by provoking the state to fresh persecutions of them who had given them no offence: and the other stirring and enraged party, with more fierceness and public disdain, protested against and reviled those who refused to join with them, as men who had spent all their stock of allegiance, and meant to acquiesce with what they had left under the tyranny and in the subjection of Cromwell. And thus they who did really wish the same things, and equally the overthrow of that government, which hindered the restoration of the king, grew into more implacable jealousies and virulencies against each other, than against that power that oppressed them both, and "poured out their blood like water" [Psalm 79:3]. And either party conveyed their apologies and accusations to the king: one insisting upon the impertinency of all such attempts; and the other insisting that they were ready for a very solid and well-grounded enterprise, were sure to be possessed of good towns, if, by his majesty's positive command, the rest, who professed such obedience to him, would join with them.

---

[1] the woeful enterprise at Worcester Cromwell decisively defeated an invading Scottish Royalist army under Charles II at the battle of Worcester (September 3, 1651).

[2] the knot the "Sealed Knot," the official (though ineffective) body for Royalist conspiracy in England; lâcheté feebleness, weakness, or cowardice.

[3] sequestrations Sequestration was the seizure of income from an estate, a money-raising tactic used extensively by Parliament against Royalists during the civil wars.

I have thought myself obliged to renew the memory of all these particulars, that the several vicissitudes and stages may be known, by which the jealousies, murmurs, and disaffections in the royal party amongst themselves, and against each other, had mounted to that height which the king found them at when he returned; when in truth very few men of active minds, and upon whom he could depend in any sudden occasion that might probably press him, can be named, who had any confidence in each other. All men were full of bitter reflections upon the actions and behaviour of others, or of excuses and apologies for themselves for what they thought might be charged upon them. The woeful vice of drinking, from the uneasiness of their fortune, or the necessity of frequent meetings together, for which taverns were the most secure places, had spread itself very far in that classis of men, as well as upon other parts of the nation, in all counties; and had exceedingly weakened the parts, and broken the understandings of many, who had formerly competent judgments, and had been in all respects fit for any trust; and had prevented the growth of parts in many young men, who had good affections, but had been from their entering into the world so corrupted with that excess, and other license of the time, that they only made much noise, and by their extravagant and scandalous debauches, brought many calumnies and disestimation upon that cause which they pretended to advance. They who had suffered much in their fortunes, and by frequent imprisonments and sequestrations and compositions,[1] expected large recompenses and reparations in honours which they could not support, or offices which they could not discharge, or lands and money which the king had not to give; as all dispassioned men knew the conditions which the king was obliged to perform, and that the act of indemnity discharged all those forfeitures which could have been applied to their benefit: and therefore they who had been without comparison the greatest sufferers in their fortunes, and in all respects had merited most, never made any inconvenient suits to the king, but modestly left the memory and consideration of all they had done or undergone, to his majesty's own gracious reflections. They were observed to be most importunate, who had deserved least, and were least capable to perform any notable service; and none had more esteem of themselves, and believed preferment to be more due to them, than a sort of men, who had most loudly begun the king's health in taverns, especially if for any disorders which had accompanied it they had suffered imprisonment, without any other pretence of merit, or running any other hazard.

---

[1] compositions fines paid by Royalists to avoid prosecution or confiscation of their estates.

This unhappy temper and constitution of the royal party, with whom he had always intended to have made a firm conjunction against all accidents and occurrences which might happen at home or from abroad, did wonderfully displease and trouble the king; and, with the other perplexities, which are mentioned before, did so break his mind, and had that operation upon his spirits, that finding he could not propose any such method to himself, by which he might extricate himself out of those many difficulties and labyrinths in which he was involved, nor expedite those important matters which depended upon the goodwill and despatch of the parliament, which would proceed by its own rules, and with its accustomed formalities, he grew more disposed to leave all things to their natural course, and God's providence; and by degrees unbent his mind from the knotty and ungrateful part of his business, grew more remiss in his application to it, and indulged to his youth and appetite that license and satisfaction that it desired, and for which he had opportunity enough, and could not be without ministers abundant for any such negotiations; the time itself, and the young people thereof of either sex having been educated in all the liberty of vice, without reprehension or restraint. All relations were confounded by the several sects in religion, which discountenanced all forms of reverence and respect, as relics and marks of superstition. Children asked not blessing of their parents; nor did they concern themselves in the education of their children; but were well content that they should take any course to maintain themselves, that they might be free from that expense. The young women conversed without any circumspection or modesty, and frequently met at taverns and common eating houses; and they who were stricter and more severe in their comportment, became the wives of the seditious preachers, or of officers of the army. The daughters of noble and illustrious families bestowed themselves upon the divines of the time, or other low and unequal matches. Parents had no manner of authority over their children, nor children any obedience or submission to their parents; but "everyone did that which was good in his own eyes" [Judges 17:6, 21:25]. This unnatural antipathy had its first rise from the beginning of the rebellion, when the fathers and sons engaged themselves in the contrary parties, the one choosing to serve the king, and the other the parliament; which division and contradiction of affections was afterwards improved to mutual animosities and direct malice, by the help of the preachers, and the several factions in religion, or by the absence of all religion: so that there were never such examples of impiety between such relations in any age of the world, Christian or heathen, as that wicked time, from the beginning of the rebellion to the king's return; of which the families of Hotham and Vane are sufficient instances;[1] though other more illustrious houses may be named, where the same accursed fruit was too plentifully gathered, and too notorious to the world. The relation between masters and servants had been long since dissolved by the parliament, that their army might be increased by the prentices against their masters' consent, and that they might have intelligence of the secret meetings and transactions in those houses and families which were not devoted to them; from whence issued the foulest treacheries and perfidiousness that were ever practised: and the blood of the master was frequently the price of the servant's villainy.

---

[1] Hotham and Vane Sir John Hotham (d. 1645) was appointed Governor of Hull by the King in 1639, but turned the city over to Parliament in 1642; he and his son of the same name fought against the King during the First Civil War, but were both executed by Parliament in 1645 for negotiating their return to the Royalist party. Sir Henry Vane the elder (1589–1655) had been Secretary of State but joined Parliament in 1641; his son, Sir Henry Vane the younger (1613–1662), had also held offices under the King, but became a leading official in the Commonwealth and was executed after the Restoration.

Cromwell had been most strict and severe in the forming the manners of his army, and in chastising all irregularities; insomuch that sure there was never any such body of men so without rapine, swearing, drinking, or any other debauchery, but the wickedness of their hearts: and all persons cherished by him, were of the same leaven, and to common appearance without the practice of any of those vices which were most infamous to the people, and which drew the public hatred upon those who were notoriously guilty of them. But then he was well pleased with the most scandalous lives of those who pretended to be for the king, and wished that all his were such, and took all the pains he could that they might be generally thought to be such; whereas in truth the greatest part of those who were guilty of those disorders were young men, who had never seen the king, and had been born and bred in those corrupt times, "when there was no king in Israel" [Judges 17:6, 18:1, 19:1, 21:25]. He was equally delighted with the luxury and voluptuousness of the Presbyterians, who, in contempt of the thrift, sordidness, and affected ill-breeding of the Independents, thought it became them to live more generously, and were not strict in restraining or mortifying the unruly and inordinate appetite of flesh and blood, but indulged it with too much and too open scandal, from which he reaped no small advantage; and wished all those, who were not his friends, should not only be infected, but given over to the practice of the most odious vices and wickedness.

In a word, the nation was corrupted from that integrity, good nature, and generosity, that had been peculiar to it, and for which it had been signal and celebrated throughout the world; in the room whereof the vilest craft and dissembling had succeeded. The tenderness of the bowels, which is the quintessence of justice and compassion, the very mention of good nature was laughed at and looked upon as the mark and character of a fool; and a roughness of manners, or hard-heartedness and cruelty was affected. In the place of generosity, a vile and sordid love of money was entertained as the truest wisdom, and any thing lawful that would contribute towards being rich. There was a total decay, or rather a final expiration of all friendship; and to dissuade a man from any thing he affected, or to reprove him for any thing he had done amiss, or to advise him to do any thing he had no mind to do, was thought an impertinence unworthy a wise man, and received with reproach and contempt. These dilapidations and ruins of the ancient candour and discipline were not taken enough to heart, and repaired with that early care and severity that they might have been; for they were not then incorrigible; but by the remissness of applying remedies to some, and the unwariness in giving a kind of countenance to others, too much of that poison insinuated itself into minds not well fortified against such infection: so that much of the malignity was transplanted, instead of being extinguished, to the corruption of many wholesome bodies, which, being corrupted, spread the diseases more powerfully and more mischievously.

THE PLAGUE AND THE FIRE OF LONDON, 1665–6

There begun now [Spring 1665] to appear another enemy, much more formidable than the Dutch,[1] and more difficult to be struggled with; which was the plague, that brake out in the winter, and made such an early progress in the spring, that though the weekly numbers did not rise high, and it appeared to be only in the outskirts of the town, and in the most obscure alleys, amongst the poorest people; yet the ancient men, who well remembered in what manner the last great plague (which had been near forty years before) first brake out, and the progress it afterwards made, foretold a terrible summer. And many of them removed their families out of the city to country habitations; when their neighbours laughed at their providence, and thought they might have stayed without danger: but they found shortly that they had done wisely.

---

[1] the Dutch with whom England was then at war, caused primarily by commercial rivalry (the second Anglo-Dutch war, 1665–1667).

In March it spread so much, that the parliament was very willing to part: which was likewise the more necessary, in regard that so many of the members of the house of commons were assigned to so many offices and employments which related to the war, and which required their immediate attendance.

After Christmas the rage and fury of the pestilence began in some degree to be mitigated, but so little, that nobody who had left the town had yet the courage to return thither: nor had they reason; for though it was a considerable abatement from the height it had been at, yet there died still between three and four thousand in the week, and of those, some men of better condition than had fallen before. The general [Albemarle][1] writ from thence, "that there still arose new difficulties in providing for the setting out the fleet, and some of such a nature, that he could not easily remove them without communication with his majesty, and receiving his more positive directions; and how to bring that to pass he knew not, for as he could by no means advise his majesty to leave Oxford, so he found many objections against his own being absent from London." Windsor was thought upon as a place where the king might safely reside, there being then no infection there: but the king had adjourned the term thither, which had possessed the whole town; and he was not without some apprehension, that the plague had got into one house.

In the end, towards the end of February, the king resolved that the queen and duchess and all their families should remain in Oxford; and that his majesty and his brother, with prince Rupert, and such of his council and other servants as were thought necessary or fit, would make a quick journey to Hampton-Court, where the general might be every day, and return again to London at night, and his majesty gave such orders as were requisite for the carrying on his service, and so after two or three days' stay there return again to Oxford; for no man did believe it counsellable, that his majesty should reside longer there, than the despatch of the most important business required: and with this resolution his majesty made his journey to Hampton-Court.

It pleased God, that the next week after his majesty came thither, the number of those who died of the plague in the city decreased one thousand; and there was a strange universal joy there for the king's being so near. The weather was as it could be wished, deep snow and terrible frost, which very probably stopped the spreading of the infection, though it might put an end to those who were already infected, as it did, for in a week or two the number of the dead was very little diminished. The general came and went as was intended: but the business every day increased; and his majesty's remove to a further distance was thought inconvenient, since there appeared no danger in remaining where he was.

And after a fortnight's or three weeks' stay, he resolved, for the quicker despatch of all that was to be done, to go to Whitehall, when there died above fifteen hundred in the week, and when there was not in a day seen a coach in the streets, but those which came in his majesty's train; so much all men were terrified from returning to a place of so much mortality. Yet it can hardly be imagined what numbers flocked thither from all parts upon the fame of the king's being at Whitehall, all men being ashamed of their fears for their own safety, when the king ventured his person. The judges at Windsor adjourned the last return of the term to Westminster-hall, and the town every day filled marvellously; and which was more wonderful, the plague every day decreased. Upon which the king changed his purpose, and, instead of returning to Oxford, sent for the queen and all the family to come to Whitehall: so that before the end of March the streets were as full, the exchange as much crowded, and the people in all places as numerous, as they had ever been seen, few persons missing any of their acquaintance, though by the weekly bills there appeared to have died above one hundred and threescore thousand persons: and many, who could compute very well, concluded that there were in truth double that number who died; and that in one week, when the bill mentioned only six thousand, there had in truth fourteen thousand died. The frequent deaths of the clerks and sextons of parishes hindered the exact account every week; but that which left it without any certainty was the vast number that was buried in the fields, of which no account was kept. Then of the Anabaptists and other sectaries, who abounded in the city, very few left their habitations; and multitudes of them died, whereof no churchwarden or other officer had notice; but they found burials, according to their own fancies, in small gardens or the next fields. The greatest number of those who died consisted of women and children, and the lowest and poorest sort of the people; so that, as I said before, few men missed any of their acquaintance when they returned, not many of wealth or quality or of much conversation being dead; yet some of either sort there were.

---

[1] The general George Monck, first Duke of Albemarle (1608–1670), largely responsible for the conduct of the Dutch war.

THE FIRE

It was upon the first day of that September, in the dismal year of 1666 (in which many prodigies were expected, and so many really fell out),[1] that that memorable and terrible fire brake out in London, which begun about midnight, or nearer the morning of Sunday, in a baker's house at the end of Thames Street next the Tower, there being many little narrow alleys and very poor houses about the place where it first appeared; and then finding such store of combustible materials, as that street is always furnished with in timber-houses, the fire prevailed so powerfully, that that whole street and the neighbourhood was in so short a time turned to ashes, that few persons had time to save and preserve any of their goods; but were a heap of people almost as dead with the sudden distraction, as the ruins were which they sustained. The magistrates of the city assembled quickly together, and with the usual remedies of buckets, which they were provided with: but the fire was too ravenous to be extinguished with such quantities of water as those instruments could apply to it, and fastened still upon new materials before it had destroyed the old. And though it raged furiously all that day, to that degree that all men stood amazed as spectators only, no man knowing what remedy to apply, nor the magistrates what orders to give; yet it kept within some compass, burned what was next, and laid hold only on both sides; and the greatest apprehension was of the Tower, and all considerations entered upon how to secure that place.

But in the night the wind changed, and carried the danger from thence, but with so great and irresistible violence, that as it kept the English and

---

[1] the dismal year of 1666 (in which many prodigies were expected) When Bibles became readily available in the vernacular, many were fascinated by the prophetic parts of such books as Revelation. The end of the world was thought to be imminent, and was expected to be heralded by remarkable events. 1666 was an especially popular date among those who forecast the millennium, because 666 was the number of the Beast who had first to be overthrown (Revelation 13:18).

Dutch fleets from grappling when they were so near each other, so it scattered the fire from pursuing the line it was in with all its force, and spread it over the city: so that they, who went late to bed at a great distance from any place where the fire prevailed, were awakened before morning with their own houses being in a flame; and whilst endeavour was used to quench that, other houses were discovered to be burning, which were near no place from whence they could imagine the fire could come; all which kindled another fire in the breasts of men, almost as dangerous as that within their houses.[1]

Monday morning produced first a jealousy, and then an universal conclusion, that this fire came not by chance, nor did they care where it began; but the breaking out in several places at so great distance from each other made it evident, that it was by conspiracy and combination. And this determination could not hold long without discovery of the wicked authors, who were concluded to be all the Dutch and all the French in the town, though they had inhabited the same places above twenty years. All of that kind, or, if they were strangers, of what nation soever, were laid hold of; and after all the ill usage that can consist in words, and some blows and kicks, they were thrown into prison. And shortly after, the same conclusion comprehended all the Roman Catholics, the papists, who were in the same predicament of guilt and danger, and quickly found that their only safety consisted in keeping within doors; and yet some of them, and of quality, were taken by force out of their houses, and carried to prison.

When this rage spread as far as the fire, and every hour brought reports of some bloody effects of it, worse than in truth they were, the king distributed many of the privy-council into several quarters of the city, to prevent, by their authorities, those inhumanities which he heard were committed. In the mean time, even they or any other person thought it not safe to declare, that they believed that the fire came by accident, or that it was not a plot of the Dutch and the French and papists to burn the city; which was so generally believed, and in the best company, that he who said the contrary was suspected for a conspirator, or at best a favourer of them. It could not be conceived how a house that was distant a mile from any part of the fire could suddenly be in a flame, without some particular malice; and this case fell out every hour. When a man at the furthest end of Bread Street, had made a shift to get out of his house his best and most portable goods, because the fire had approached near them; he no sooner had secured them, as he thought, in some friend's house in Holborn, which was believed a safe distance, but he saw that very house, and none else near it, in a sudden flame. Nor did there want, in this woeful distemper, the testimony of witnesses who saw this villainy committed, and apprehended men who they were ready to swear threw fireballs into houses, which were presently burning.

The lord Hollis and lord Ashley, who had their quarters assigned about Newgate Market and the streets adjacent, had many brought to them in custody for crimes of this nature; and saw, within a very little distance from the place where they were, the people gathered together in great disorder; and as they came nearer saw a man in the middle of them without a hat or cloak, pulled and hauled and very ill used, whom they knew to be a servant to the Portugal ambassador, who was presently brought to them. And a substantial citizen was ready to take his oath, "that he saw that man put his hand in his pocket, and throw into a shop a fireball; upon which he saw the house immediately on fire: whereupon, being on the other side of the way, and seeing this, he cried out to the people to stop that gentleman, and made all the haste he could himself"; but the people had first seized upon him, and taken away his sword, which he was ready to draw; and he not speaking nor understanding English, they had used him in the manner set down before. The lord Hollis told him what he was accused of, and "that he was seen to have thrown somewhat out of his pocket, which they thought to be a fireball, into a house which was now on fire": and the people had diligently searched his pockets to find more of the same commodities, but found nothing that they meant to accuse him of. The man standing in great amazement to hear he was so charged, the lord Hollis asked him, "what it was that he pulled out of his pocket, and what it was he threw into the house": to which he answered, "that he did not think that he had put his hand into his pocket; but he remembered very well, that as he walked in the street, he saw a piece of bread upon the ground, which he took up, and laid upon a shelf in the next house"; which is a custom or superstition so natural to the Portuguese, that if the king of Portugal were walking, and saw a piece of bread upon the ground, he would take it up with his own hand, and keep it till he saw a fit place to lay it down.

---

[1] another fire that is, fear that the fires were being deliberately set.

The house being in view, the lords with many of the people walked to it, and found the piece of bread just within the door upon a board, where he said he laid it; and the house on fire was two doors beyond it, which the man who was on the other side of the way, and saw this man put his hand into the house without staying, and presently after the fire break out, concluded to be the same house; which was very natural in the fright that all men were in: nor did the lords, though they were satisfied, set the poor man at liberty; but, as if there remained ground enough of suspicion, committed him to the constable, to be kept by him in his own house for some hours, when they pretended they would examine him again. Nor were any persons who were seized upon in the same manner, as multitudes were in all the parts of the town, especially if they were strangers or papists, presently discharged, when there was no reasonable ground to suspect; but all sent to prison, where they were in much more security than they could have been in full liberty, after they were once known to have been suspected; and most of them understood their commitment to be upon that ground, and were glad of it.

The fire and the wind continued in the same excess all Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, till afternoon, and flung and scattered brands burning into all quarters; the nights more terrible than the days, and the light the same, the light of the fire supplying that of the sun. And indeed whoever was an eyewitness of that terrible prospect, can never have so lively an image of the last conflagration till he beholds it; the faces of all people in a wonderful dejection and discomposure, not knowing where they could repose themselves for one hour's sleep, and no distance thought secure from the fire, which suddenly started up before it was suspected; so that people left their houses and carried away their goods from many places which received no hurt, and whither they afterwards returned again; all the fields full of women and children, who had made a shift to bring thither some goods and conveniences to rest upon, as safer than any houses, where yet they felt such intolerable heat and drought, as if they had been in the middle of the fire. The king and the duke, who rode from one place to another, and put themselves into great dangers amongst the burning and falling houses, to give advice and direction what was to be done, underwent as much fatigue as the meanest, and had as little sleep or rest; and the faces of all men appeared ghastly and in the highest confusion. The country sent in carts to help those miserable people who had saved any goods: and by this means, and the help of coaches, all the neighbour villages were filled with more people than they could contain, and more goods than they could find room for; so that those fields became likewise as full as the other about London and Westminster.

It was observed that where the fire prevailed most, when it met with brick buildings, if it was not repulsed, it was so well resisted that it made a much slower progress; and when it had done its worst, that the timber and all the combustible matter fell, it fell down to the bottom within the house, and the walls stood and enclosed the fire, and it was burned out without making a further progress in many of those places; and then the vacancy so interrupted the fury of it, that many times the two or three next houses stood without much damage. Besides the spreading, insomuch as all London seemed but one fire in the breadth of it, it seemed to continue in its full fury a direct line to the Thames side, all Cheapside from beyond the Exchange, through Fleet Street; insomuch as for that breadth, taking in both sides as far as the Thames, there was scarce a house or church standing from the bridge to Dorset-house, which was burned on Tuesday night after Baynard's Castle.

On Wednesday morning, when the king saw that neither the fire decreased nor the wind lessened, he even despaired of preserving Whitehall, but was more afraid of Westminster Abbey. But having observed by his having visited all places, that where there were any vacant places between the houses, by which the progress of the fire was interrupted, it changed its course and went to the other side; he gave order for pulling down many houses about Whitehall, some whereof were newly built and hardly finished, and sent many of his choice goods by water to Hampton Court; as most of the persons of quality in the Strand, who had the benefit of the river, got barges and other vessels, and sent their furniture for their houses to some houses some miles out of the town. And very many on both sides the Strand, who knew not whither to go, and scarce what they did, fled with their families out of their houses into the streets, that they might not be within when the fire fell upon their houses.

But it pleased God, contrary to all expectation, that on Wednesday, about four or five of the clock in the afternoon, the wind fell: and as in an instant the fire decreased, having burned all on the Thames side to the new buildings of the Inner Temple next to Whitefriars, and having consumed them, was stopped by that vacancy from proceeding further into that house; but laid hold on some old buildings which joined to Ram Alley, and swept all those into Fleet Street. And the other side being likewise destroyed to Fetter Lane, it advanced no further; but left the other part of Fleet Street to the Temple Bar, and all the Strand, unhurt, but what damage the owners of the houses had done to themselves by endeavouring to remove; and it ceased in all other parts of the town near the same time: so that the greatest care then was, to keep good guards to watch the fire that was upon the ground, that it might not break out again. And this was the better performed, because they who had yet their houses standing had not the courage to sleep, but watched with much less distraction; though the same distemper still remained in the utmost extent, that all this had fallen out by the conspiracy of the French and Dutch with the papists; and all jails were filled with those who were every hour apprehended upon that jealousy; or rather upon some evidence that they were guilty of the crime. And the people were so sottish, that they believed that all the French in the town (which no doubt were a very great number) were drawn into a body, to prosecute those by the sword who were preserved from the fire: and the inhabitants of a whole street have run in a great tumult one way, upon the rumour that the French were marching at the other end of it; so terrified men were with their own apprehensions.

When the night, though far from being a quiet one, had somewhat lessened the consternation, the first care the king took was, that the country might speedily supply markets in all places, that they who had saved themselves from burning might not be in danger of starving; and if there had not been extraordinary care and diligence used, many would have perished that way. The vast destruction of corn, and all other sorts of provisions, in those parts where the fire had prevailed, had not only left all that people destitute of all that was to be eat or drank; but the bakers and brewers, which inhabited the other parts which were unhurt, had forsaken their houses, and carried away all that was portable: insomuch as many days passed, before they were enough in their wits and in their houses to fall to their occupations; and those parts of the town which God had spared and preserved were many hours without anything to eat, as well as they who were in the fields. And yet it can hardly be conceived, how great a supply of all kinds was brought from all places within four and twenty hours. And which was more miraculous, in four days, in all the fields about the town, which had seemed covered with those whose habitations were burned, and with the goods which they had saved, there was scarce a man to be seen: all found shelter in so short a time, either in those parts which remained of the city and in the suburbs, or in the neighbour villages; all kind of people expressing a marvellous charity towards those who appeared to be undone. And very many, with more expedition than can be conceived, set up little sheds of brick and timber upon the ruins of their own houses, where they chose rather to inhabit than in more convenient places, though they knew they could not long reside in those new buildings.

The king was not more troubled at any particular, than at the imagination which possessed the hearts of so many, that all this mischief had fallen out by a real and formed conspiracy; which, albeit he saw no colour to believe, he found very many intelligent men, and even some of his own council, who did really believe it. Whereupon he appointed the privy-council to sit both morning and evening, to examine all evidence of that kind that should be brought before them, and to send for any persons who had been committed to prison upon some evidence that made the greatest noise; and sent for the lord chief justice, who was in the country, to come to the town for the better examination of all suggestions and allegations of that kind, there having been some malicious report scattered about the town, that the court had so great a prejudice against any kind of testimony of such a conspiracy, that they discountenanced all witnesses who came before them to testify what they knew; which was without any colour of truth. Yet many who were produced as if their testimony would remove all doubts, made such senseless relations of what they had been told, without knowing the condition of the persons who told them, or where to find them, that it was a hard matter to forbear smiling at their evidence. Some Frenchmen's houses had been searched, in which had been found many of those shells for squibs and other fireworks, frequently used in nights of joy and triumph; and the men were well known, and had lived many years there by that trade, and had no other: and one of these was the king's servant, and employed by the office of ordnance for making grenades of all kinds, as well for the hand as for mortar pieces. Yet these men were looked upon as in the number of the conspirators, and remained still in prison till their neighbours solicited for their liberty. And it cannot be enough wondered at, that in this general rage of the people no mischief was done to the strangers, that no one of them was assassinated outright, though many were sorely beaten and bruised.

Let the cause be what it would, the effect was very terrible; for above two parts of three of that great city were burned to ashes, and those the most rich and wealthy parts of the city, where the greatest warehouses and the best shops stood. The Royal Exchange, with all the streets about it, Lombard Street, Cheapside, Paternoster Row, St. Paul's church, and almost all the other churches in the city, with the Old Bailey, Ludgate, all Paul's churchyard even to the Thames, and the greatest part of Fleet Street, all which were places the best inhabited, were all burned without one house remaining.

The value or estimate of what that devouring fire consumed, over and above the houses, could never be computed in any degree: for besides that the first night (which in a moment swept away the vast wealth of Thames Street) there was [not] any thing that could be preserved in respect of the suddenness and amazement (all people being in their beds till the fire was in their houses, and so could save nothing but themselves), the next day with the violence of the wind increased the distraction; nor did many believe that the fire was near them, or that they had reason to remove their goods, till it was upon them, and rendered it impossible. Then it fell out at a season in the year, the beginning of September, when very many of the substantial citizens and other wealthy men were in the country, whereof many had not left a servant in their houses, thinking themselves upon all ordinary accidents more secure in the goodness and kindness of their neighbours, than they could be in the fidelity of a servant; and whatsoever was in such houses was entirely consumed by the fire, or lost as to the owners. And of this classis of absent men, when the fire came where the lawyers had houses, as they had in many places, especially Sergeants Inn in Fleet Street, with that part of the Inner Temple that was next it and Whitefriars, there was scarce a man to whom those lodgings appertained who was in town: so that whatsoever was there, their money, books, and papers, besides the evidences of many men's estates deposited in their hands, were all burned or lost, to a very great value. But of particular men's losses could never be made any computation.

It was an incredible damage that was and might rationally be computed to be sustained by one small company, the company of stationers, in books, paper, and the other lesser commodities which are vendible in that corporation, which amounted to no less than two hundred thousand pounds: in which prodigious loss there was one circumstance very lamentable. All those who dwelt near Paul's carried their goods, books, paper, and the like, as others of greater trades did their commodities, into the large vaults which were under St. Paul's church, before the fire came thither: which vaults, though all the church above the ground was afterwards burned, with all the houses round about, still stood firm and supported the foundation, and preserved all that was within them; until the impatience of those who had lost their houses, and whatsoever they had else, in the fire, made them very desirous to see what they had [saved], upon which all their hopes were founded to repair the rest.

It was the fourth day after the fire ceased to flame, though it still burned in the ruins, from whence there was still an intolerable heat, when the booksellers especially, and some other tradesmen, who had deposited all they had preserved in the greatest and most spacious vault, came to behold all their wealth, which to that moment was safe: But the doors were no sooner opened, and the air from without fanned the strong heat within, but first the driest and most combustible matters, broke into a flame, which consumed all, of what kind soever, that till then had been unhurt there. Yet they who had committed their goods to some lesser vaults, at a distance from that greater, had better fortune; and having learned from the second ruin of their friends to have more patience, attended till the rain fell, and extinguished the fire in all places, and cooled the air: and then they securely opened the doors, and received all from thence that they had there.

If so vast a damage as two hundred thousand pounds befell that little company of stationers in books and paper and the like, what shall we conceive was lost in cloth (of which the country clothiers lost all that they had brought up to Blackwell Hall against Michaelmas, which was all burned with that fair structure), in silks of all kinds, in linen, and those richer manufactures? Not to speak of money, plate, and jewels, whereof some were recovered out of the ruins of those houses which the owners took care to watch, as containing somewhat that was worth the looking for, and in which deluge there were men ready enough to fish.

The lord mayor, though a very honest man, was much blamed for want of sagacity in the first night of the fire, before the wind gave it much advancement: for though he came with great diligence as soon as he had notice of it, and was present with the first, yet having never been used to such spectacles, his consternation was equal to that of other men, nor did he know how to apply his authority to the remedying the present distress; and when men who were less terrified with the object pressed him very earnestly, that he would give order for the present pulling down those houses which were nearest, and by which the fire climbed to go further (the doing whereof at that time might probably have prevented much of the mischief that succeeded), he thought it not safe counsel, and made no other answer, than that he durst not do it without the consent of the owners. His want of skill was the less wondered at, when it was known afterwards, that some gentlemen of the Inner Temple would not endeavour to preserve the goods which were in the lodgings of absent persons, nor suffer others to do it, "because," they said, "it was against the law to break up any man's chamber."

The so sudden repair of those formidable ruins, and the giving so great beauty to all deformity (a beauty and a lustre that city had never before been acquainted with), is little less wonderful than the fire that consumed it.

It was hoped and expected that this prodigious and universal calamity, for the effects of it covered the whole kingdom, would have made impression, and produced some reformation in the license of the court: for as the pains the king had taken night and day during the fire, and the dangers he had exposed himself to, even for the saving the citizens' goods, had been very notorious,[1] and in the mouths of all men, with good wishes and prayers for him; so his majesty had been heard during that time to speak with great piety and devotion of the displeasure that God was provoked to. And no doubt the deep sense of it did raise many good thoughts and purposes in his royal breast. But he was narrowly watched and looked to, that such melancholic [thoughts] might not long possess him, the consequence and effect whereof was like to be more grievous than that of the fire itself; of which that loose company that was too much cherished, even before it was extinguished, discoursed as of an argument for mirth and wit to describe the wildness of the confusion all people were in; in which the scripture itself was used with equal liberty, when they could apply it to their profane purposes. And Mr. May presumed to assure the king, "that this was the greatest blessing that God had ever conferred upon him, his restoration only excepted: for the walls and gates being now burned and thrown down of that rebellious city, which was always an enemy to the crown, his majesty would never suffer them to repair and build them up again, to be a bit in his mouth and a bridle upon his neck; but would keep all open, that his troops might enter upon them whenever he thought necessary for his service, there being no other way to govern that rude multitude but by force."[2]

This kind of discourse did not please the king, but was highly approved by the company; and for the wit and pleasantness of it was repeated in all companies, infinitely to the king's disservice, and corrupted the affections of the citizens and of the country, who used and assumed the same liberty to publish the profaneness and atheism of the court. And as nothing was done there in private, so it was made more public in pasquils and libels,[1] which were as bold with reflections of the broadest nature upon the king himself, and upon those in whose company he was most delighted, as upon the meanest person.

---

[1] notorious well known, famous.

[2] probably Baptist May, bon viveur and holder of a minor court office.

—1702–04, 1759

---

[1] pasquils satires, lampoons, particularly those posted in public.

Gerrard Winstanley

1609 – ?1676

Born in Lancashire, the son of a mercer (a dealer in fabrics) with puritan sympathies, Winstanley worked in the London cloth trade until his business failed in 1643, when he moved to Cobham in Surrey to earn a living as a farm labourer. Most of the activities and writings (about twenty pamphlets and broadsheets) for which he is known date from the period 1648–1652. Like many other radicals of the revolutionary period, Winstanley disappears from the records after 1660, though he may be the Gerrard Winstanley who died a Quaker and corn chandler in 1676.

Winstanley's early pamphlets participate in the tradition of radical religious mysticism represented by Lawrence Clarkson (in his Seeker and Antinomian phases) and Abiezer Coppe. Like Coppe, Winstanley's search for Scripture's spiritual meaning led to a concern for social justice: Hell, he believed, was a mechanism of control used by clerics and the rich to oppress the poor. But Winstanley is best known for the political revelation that led to the Digger movement, a vision of agrarian communism first proclaimed in The New Law of Righteousness (1649) and set out in its most elaborate form in his last publication, The Law of Freedom in a Platform (1652). Winstanley argued that men could be free only when private property was abolished, all had access to the land and worked it in common, and no one worked for wages: social and economic inequities, he wrote, were a function of inequities in the distribution of property. While several Digger communes were founded to put these ideas into practice, the most famous was on St. George's Hill, near Winstanley's home in Cobham. Winstanley and others began to till the commons land there in April 1649; alarmed local landowners complained to Thomas Fairfax and the Council of State, who proved not to share their anxieties. But the owners persisted, pursued the Diggers in court, and led a mob to trample their crops. The Diggers resettled nearby, but were finally driven out in 1650. The experiment and the attempts to suppress it were widely reported at the time. The following Declaration was the second of two manifestos published to explain the project.

While the Digger movement is best known for Winstanley's political writings, Digger communities around the country produced a variety of texts, including songs written to popularize their cause. In 1650, the Digger community on St. George's Hill published The Diggers Mirth, a short pamphlet containing "verses composed and fitted to tunes, for the delight and recreation of all those who Dig, or own that work, in the Commonwealth of England." "The Digger's Song" included here was not among the songs published at the time, but was discovered in the manuscript papers of William Clarke, secretary to Cromwell's Council of War. Like the other Digger songs, its authorship is uncertain, though its similarity to verses scattered in Winstanley's pamphlets has led some to credit him with writing it.

* * *

A Declaration from the Poor Oppressed People of England

We whose names are subscribed, do in the name of all the poor oppressed people in England, declare unto you, that call yourselves lords of manors, and lords of the land, that in regard the King of Righteousness, our Maker, hath enlightened our hearts so far, as to see that the earth was not made purposely for you to be lords of it, and we to be your slaves, servants, and beggars; but it was made to be a common livelihood to all, without respect of persons: And that your buying and selling of land, and the fruits of it, one to another, is the cursed thing, and was brought in by war; which hath, and still does establish murder, and theft, in the hands of some branches of mankind over others, which is the greatest outward burden, and unrighteous power, that the creation groans under: For the power of enclosing land, and owning propriety,[1] was brought into the creation by your ancestors by the sword; which first did murder their fellow creatures, men, and after plunder or steal away their land, and left this land successively to you, their children. And therefore, though you did not kill or thieve, yet you hold that cursed thing in your hand, by the power of the sword; and so you justify the wicked deeds of your fathers; and that sin of your fathers shall be visited upon the head of you, and your children, to the third and fourth generation, and longer too, till your bloody and thieving power be rooted out of the land.

And further, in regard the King of Righteousness hath made us sensible of our burdens, and the cries and groanings of our hearts are come before him: We take it as a testimony of love from him, that our hearts begin to be freed from slavish fear of men, such as you are; and that we find resolutions in us, grounded upon the inward law of love, one towards another, to dig and plough up the commons and waste lands through England; and that our conversation shall be so unblameable, that your laws shall not reach to oppress us any longer, unless you by your laws will shed the innocent blood that runs in our veins.

For though you and your ancestors got your propriety by murder and theft, and you keep it by the same power from us, that have an equal right to the land with you, by the righteous law of creation, yet we shall have no occasion of quarrelling (as you do) about that disturbing devil, called particular propriety:[2] For the earth, with all her fruits of corn, cattle, and such like, was made to be a common storehouse of livelihood to all mankind, friend and foe, without exception.

And to prevent your scrupulous objections, know this, that we must neither buy nor sell; money must not any longer (after our work of the earth's community is advanced) be the great god, that hedges in some, and hedges out others; for money is but part of the earth: And surely, the Righteous Creator, who is King, did never ordain, that unless some of mankind do bring that mineral (silver and gold) in their hands to others of their own kind, that they should neither be fed, nor be clothed; no surely, for this was the project of tyrant-flesh (which landlords are branches of) to set his image upon money. And they make this unrighteous law, that none should buy or sell, eat, or be clothed, or have any comfortable livelihood among men, unless they did bring his image stamped upon gold or silver in their hands.

And whereas the Scriptures speak that the mark of the Beast is 666, the number of a man; and that those that do not bring that mark in their hands, or in their foreheads, they should neither buy nor sell, Revel. 13:16[–18]. And seeing the numbering letters round about the English money make 666,[3] which is the number of that kingly power and glory (called a Man), and seeing the age of the Creation is now come to the image of the Beast, or half day, and seeing 666 is his mark, we expect this to be the last tyrannical power that shall reign;[4] and that people shall live freely in the enjoyment of the Earth, without bringing the mark of the Beast in their hands, or in their promise;[1] and that they shall buy wine and milk, without money, or without price, as Isaiah speaks.[2]

---

[1] propriety property, but also possessions or ownership in general. See the brief discussion by Thomas Hobbes in Leviathan, chapter 18, where he lists protecting propriety as the seventh power of the sovereign; and the Putney Debates.

[2] particular propriety private property or ownership.

[3] that is, when the letters in the Latin abbreviations on some coinage were translated (selectively) into their equivalents in Roman numerals.

[4] referring to the British monarchy, overthrown with the execution of Charles I in January 1649.

For after our work of the earthly community is advanced, we must make use of gold and silver, as we do of other metals, but not to buy and sell withal; for buying and selling is the great cheat that robs and steals the earth one from another: It is that which makes some lords, other beggars, some rulers, others to be ruled; and makes great murderers and thieves to be imprisoners and hangers of little ones, or of sincere-hearted men.

And while we are made to labor the earth together, with one consent and willing mind; and while we are made free, that every one, friend and foe, shall enjoy the benefit of their creation, that is, to have food and raiment from the earth, their mother; and every one subject to give account of his thoughts, words, and actions to none, but to the one only righteous judge, and prince of peace; the spirit of righteousness that dwells, and that is now rising up to rule in every creature, and in the whole globe. We say, while we are made to hinder no man of his privileges given him in his creation, equal to one, as to another; what law then can you make, to take hold upon us, but laws of oppression and tyranny, that shall enslave or spill the blood of the innocent? And so yourselves, your judges, lawyers, and justices, shall be found to be the greatest transgressors, in, and over mankind.

But to draw nearer to declare our meaning, what we would have, and what we shall endeavour to the uttermost to obtain, as moderate and righteous reason directs us; seeing we are made to see our privileges, given us in our creation, which have hitherto been denied to us and our fathers since the power of the sword began to rule, and the secrets of the creation have been locked up under the traditional, parrot-like speaking, from the universities and colleges for scholars, and since the power of the murdering and thieving sword, formerly, as well as now of late years, hath set up a government, and maintains that government; for what are prisons, and putting others to death, but the power of the sword to enforce people to that government which was got by conquest and sword, and cannot stand of itself, but by the same murdering power? That government that is got over people by the sword and kept by the sword, is not set up by the King of Righteousness to be his law, but by covetousness, the great god of the world; who hath been permitted to reign for a time, times, and dividing of time, and his government draws to the period of the last term of his allotted time; and then the nations shall see the glory of that government that shall rule in righteousness, without either sword or spear,

And seeing, further, the power of righteousness in our hearts, seeking the livelihood of others as well as ourselves, hath drawn forth our bodies to begin to dig, and plough, in the commons and waste land, for the reasons already declared,

And seeing and finding ourselves poor, wanting food to feed upon, while we labor the earth to cast in seed, and to wait till the first crop comes up; and wanting ploughs, carts, corn, and such materials to plant the commons withal, we are willing to declare our condition to you, and to all, that have the treasury of the earth, locked up in your bags, chests, and barns, and will offer up nothing to this public treasury; but will rather see your fellow creatures starve for want of bread, that have an equal right to it with yourselves, by the law of creation: But this by the way we only declare to you, and to all that follow the subtle art of buying and selling the earth, with her fruits, merely to get the treasury thereof into their hands, to lock it up from them, to whom it belongs; that so, such covetous, proud, unrighteous, selfish flesh, may be left without excuse in the day of judgment.

---

[1] without using coins or notes, that is, without buying or selling.

[2] Isaiah 55:1.

And therefore, the main thing we aim at, and for which we declare our resolutions to go forth, and act, is this, to lay hold upon, and as we stand in need, to cut and fell, and make the best advantage we can of the woods and trees that grow upon the commons. To be a stock for ourselves, and our poor brethren, through the land of England, to plant the commons withal; and to provide us bread to eat, till the fruit of our labors in the earth bring forth increase; and we shall meddle with none of your proprieties (but what is called commonage) till the spirit in you, make you cast up your lands and goods, which were got, and still is kept in your hands by murder, and theft; and then we shall take it from the spirit that hath conquered you, and not from our swords, which is an abominable and unrighteous power, and a destroyer of the creation: But the son of man comes not to destroy, but to save.

And we are moved to send forth this Declaration abroad, to give notice to everyone whom it concerns, in regard we hear and see, that some of you, that have been lords of manors, do cause the trees and woods that grow upon the commons, which you pretend a royalty unto, to be cut down and sold for your own private use, whereby the common land, which your own mouths do say belongs to the poor, is impoverished, and the poor oppressed people robbed of their rights, while you give them cheating words, by telling some of our poor oppressed brethren that those of us that have begun to dig and plough up the commons, will hinder the poor; and so blind their eyes, that they see not their privilege, while you, and the rich free-holders make the most profit of the commons, by your overstocking of them with sheep and cattle; and the poor that have the name to own the commons, have the least share therein; nay, they are checked by you, if they cut wood, heath, turf, or furseys,[1] in places about the common, where you disallow.

Therefore we are resolved to be cheated no longer, nor be held under the slavish fear of you no longer, seeing the earth was made for us, as well as for you: And if the common land belongs to us who are the poor oppressed, surely the woods that grow upon the commons belong to us likewise: therefore we are resolved to try the uttermost in the light of reason, to know whether we shall be free men, or slaves. If we lie still, and let you steal away our birthrights, we perish; and if we petition we perish also, though we have paid taxes, given free quarter, and ventured our lives to preserve the nation's freedom as much as you, and therefore by the law of contract with you, freedom in the land is our portion as well as yours, equal with you: And if we strive for freedom, and your murdering, governing laws destroy us, we can but perish.

Therefore we require, and we resolve to take both common land and common woods to be a livelihood for us, and look upon you as equal with us, not above us, knowing very well that England the land of our nativity is to be a common treasury of livelihood to all, without respect of persons....

And we hope we may not doubt (at least we expect) that they that are called the great Council and powers of England, who so often have declared themselves, by promises and covenants, and confirmed them by multitude of fasting days, and devout protestations, to make England a free people, upon condition they would pay moneys, and adventure their lives against the successor of the Norman conqueror;[2] under whose oppressing power England was enslaved; and we look upon that freedom promised to be the inheritance of all, without respect of persons; and this cannot be, unless the land of England be freely set at liberty from proprietors, and become a common treasury to all her children, as every portion of the land of Canaan was the common livelihood of such and such a tribe, and of every member in that tribe, without exception, neither hedging in any, nor hedging out.[1]

---

[1] furseys furze or gorse, a kind of shrub (OED furzy).

[2] the successor of the Norman conqueror meaning King Charles I.

We say we hope we need not doubt of their sincerity to us herein, and that they will not gainsay our determinate course; howsoever, their actions will prove to the view of all, either their sincerity, or hypocrisy: We know what we speak is our privilege, and our cause is righteous, and if they doubt of it, let them but send a child for us to come before them, and we shall make it manifest four ways.

First, by the National Covenant,[2] which yet stands in force to bind Parliament and people to be faithful and sincere, before the Lord God Almighty, wherein every one in his several place hath covenanted to preserve and seek the liberty each of other, without respect of persons.

Secondly, by the late victory over King Charles, we do claim this our privilege, to be quietly given us, out of the hands of tyrant-government, as our bargain and contract with them; for the Parliament promised, if we would pay taxes, and give free quarter, and adventure our lives against Charles and his party, whom they called the common enemy, they would make us a free people; these three being all done by us, as well as by themselves, we claim this our bargain, by the law of contract from them, to be a free people with them, and to have an equal privilege of common livelihood with them, they being chosen by us, but for a peculiar work, and for an appointed time, from among us, not to be our oppressing lords, but servants to succour us. But these two are our weakest proofs. And yet by them (in the light of reason and equity that dwells in men's hearts) we shall with ease cast down, all those former enslaving Norman reiterated laws, in every King's reign since the conquest, which are as thorns in our eyes, and pricks in our sides, and which are called the ancient government of England.

Thirdly, we shall prove, that we have a free right to the land of England, being born therein as well as elder brothers, and that it is our right equal with them, and they with us, to have a comfortable livelihood in the earth, without owning any of our own kind, to be either lords or landlords over us: And this we shall prove by plain text of Scripture, without exposition upon them, which the scholars and great ones generally say, is their rule to walk by.

Fourthly, we shall prove it by the righteous law of our creation, that mankind in all his branches is the lord of the earth and ought not to be in subjection to any of his own kind without him, but to live in the light of the law of righteousness, and peace established in his heart.

And thus in love we have declared the purpose of our hearts plainly, without flattery, expecting love, and the same sincerity from you, without grumbling or quarrelling, being creatures of your own image and mould, intending no other matter herein, but to observe the law of righteous action, endeavouring to shut out of the creation the cursed thing, called particular propriety, which is the cause of all wars, bloodshed, theft, and enslaving laws, that hold the people under misery.

Signed for and in behalf of all the poor oppressed people of England, and the whole world.

Gerrard Winstanley [and forty-four others]

—1649

---

[1] See Numbers 34; Joshua 13–19.

[2] The Solemn League and Covenant, sworn by members of the House of Commons in September 1643, was a pledge to protect constitutional and Parliamentary liberties as well as to reform the church on Presbyterian lines.

The Diggers' Song

You noble Diggers all, stand up now, stand up now,
You noble Diggers all, stand up now,
The waste land to maintain, seeing Cavaliers by name
Your digging does disdain, and persons all defame
Stand up now, stand up now.

Your houses they pull down, stand up now, stand up now,
Your houses they pull down, stand up now.
Your houses they pull down to fright poor men in town,
But the gentry must come down, and the poor shall wear the crown.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

With spades and hoes and plows, stand up now, stand up now,
With spades and hoes and plows stand up now,
Your freedom to uphold, seeing Cavaliers are bold
To kill you if they could, and rights from you to hold.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

Their self-will is their law, stand up now, stand up now,
Their self-will is their law, stand up now.
Since tyranny came in they count it now no sin
To make a gaol a gin,[1] to starve poor men therein.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The gentry are all round, stand up now, stand up now,
The gentry are all round, stand up now.
The gentry are all round, on each side they are found,
Their wisdom's so profound, to cheat us of our ground.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The lawyers they conjoin, stand up now, stand up now,
The lawyers they conjoin, stand up now,
To arrest you they advise, such fury they devise,
The devil in them lies and hath blinded both their eyes.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The clergy they come in, stand up now, stand up now,
The clergy they come in, stand up now.
The clergy they come in, and say it is a sin
That we should now begin, our freedom for to win.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

The tithe they yet will have, stand up now, stand up now,
The tithes they yet will have, stand up now.
The tithes they yet will have, and lawyers their fees crave,
And this they say is brave, to make the poor their slave.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

'Gainst lawyers and gainst Priests, stand up now, stand up now,
Gainst lawyers and gainst Priests stand up now.
For tyrants they are both even flat against their oath,
To grant us they are loath, free meat, and drink, and cloth.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

The club is all their law, stand up now, stand up now,
The club is all their law, stand up now.
The club is all their law to keep men in awe,

---

[1] gin a snare or trap, or even an engine of torture (OED gin sb[1] 4, 5).

But they no vision saw to maintain such a law.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

The Cavaliers are foes, stand up now, stand up now,
The Cavaliers are foes, stand up now;
The Cavaliers are foes, themselves they do disclose
By verses not in prose to please the singing boys
Stand up now, Diggers all.

To conquer them by love, come in now, come in now,
To conquer them by love, come in now;
To conquer them by love, as it does you behove,
For he is King above, no power is like to love.
Glory here Diggers all.

—CA. 1649–50

Anne Bradstreet

ca. 1612 – 1672

Born in 1612, Anne was the second of six children of Thomas and Dorothy Yorke. When she was six years old, her father became page to Lord Compton who was then steward to the fourth Earl of Lincoln, a prominent Puritan. The family moved, as a result, to Sempringham Manor in Lincolnshire, where Anne was educated by tutors and able to access the libraries of both her father and the Earl. She contracted smallpox in 1628, and was married later that year to Simon Bradstreet, son of a non-conformist minister in Lincolnshire, a fortunate union by her own account. In 1630, the Bradstreets and Dudleys set sail for New England, landing at Salem, Massachusetts. They moved immediately to Charlestown, then to Newtown, and finally settled in Ipswich for several years before moving to Andover, where Anne spent the remainder of her life. Thomas Dudley became the governor of Massachusetts colony in 1634, the same year that Anne bore the first of eight children. In 1642, she distributed her first collection of poems in manuscript form. These poems were well received, inspiring the Puritan divine Cotton Mather to describe her as "a crown to her father." Without her knowledge, Bradstreet's brother-in-law John Woodbridge published her work in England under the title The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung up in America (1650). In 1661, Anne had a long and serious illness, but her husband, now secretary of the colony, was required to travel to England on state business. It was during his absence that she wrote her "poetical epistles" to her husband. Her later writing consisted mainly of elegies, occasional meditations and poems of supplication in the face of illness, affliction, and the absence of her family. Bradstreet died of consumption at Andover, September 16, 1672. A second edition of her poems was published posthumously in 1678 (Several Poems), but her prose contemplations, meditations and additional poems, preserved by her son Simon (the Andover Manuscript) remained unpublished until 1867. Bradstreet's corpus exhibits a facility in historical, political and religious verse as well as intensity and candour in the expression of personal grief, domestic pleasure and religious faith.

* * *

The Prologue[1]

1

To sing of wars, of captains, and of kings,
Of cities founded, commonwealths begun,
For my mean pen, are too superior things,
And how they all, or each, their dates have run:
Let poets, and historians set these forth,
My obscure verse, shall not so dim their worth.

2

But when my wond'ring eyes, and envious heart,
Great Bartas' sugared lines do but read o'er;[2]
Fool, I do grudge, the Muses did not part
'Twixt him and me, that over-fluent store;
A Bartas can do what a Bartas will,
But simple I, according to my skill.

3

From schoolboy's tongue, no rhetoric we expect,
Nor yet a sweet consort, from broken strings,
Nor perfect beauty, where's a main defect,

---

[1] The Prologue the Prologue to The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung up in America (London, 1650).

[2] Bartas Guillaume de Salluste du Bartas, much admired by English Puritans during Bradstreet's youth, was a French soldier and author of La Sepmaine (1578) and La Seconde Sepmaine (1584), lengthy religious poems noted for encyclopedic presentation of information and Calvinistic didacticism. Joshua Sylvester's translation, Divine Weeks and Works, was published in 1621.

My foolish, broken, blemished Muse so sings;
And this to mend, alas, no art is able,
'Cause nature made it so irreparable.

4

Nor can I, like that fluent sweet tongued Greek [1]
Who lisped at first, speak afterwards more plain.
By art, he gladly found what he did seek,
A full requital of his striving pain:
Art can do much, but this maxim's most sure,
A weak or wounded brain admits no cure.

5

I am obnoxious to each carping tongue,
Who says, my hand a needle better fits,
A poet's pen, all scorn, I should thus wrong;
For such despite they cast on female wits:
If what I do prove well, it won't advance,
They'll say it's stol'n, or else, it was by chance.

6

But sure the antique Greeks were far more mild,
Else of our sex, why feigned they those nine, [2]
And poesy made, Calliope's own child,
So 'mongst the rest, they placed the arts divine:
But this weak knot they will full soon untie,
The Greeks did nought but play the fool and lie.

7

Let Greeks be Greeks, and women what they are,
Men have precedency, and still excel,
It is but vain, unjustly to wage war,
Men can do best, and women know it well;
Preeminence in each, and all is yours,
Yet grant some small acknowledgment of ours.

8

And oh, ye high flown quills, that soar the skies,
And ever with your prey, still catch your praise,
If e'er you deign these lowly lines, your eyes
Give wholesome parsley wreath, I ask no bays:
This mean and unrefined ore of mine, [3]
Will make your glistering gold but more to shine.
—1650

A Dialogue between Old England and New, Concerning their Present Troubles.

Anno 1642

New England.

Alas, dear Mother, fairest queen, and best,
With honor, wealth, and peace, happy and blessed;
What ails thee hang thy head, and cross thine arms?
And sit i'th dust, to sigh these sad alarms?
What deluge of new woes thus overwhelm
The glories of thy ever famous realm?
What means this wailing tone, this mourning guise?
Ah, tell thy daughter, she may sympathize.

Old England.

Art ignorant indeed, of these my woes?
Or must my forced tongue these griefs disclose?
And must myself dissect my tattered state,
Which 'mazed Christendom stands wond'ring at?
And thou a child, a limb, and dost not feel
My weak'ned fainting body now to reel?
This physic-purging-potion I have taken,
Will bring consumption, or an ague quaking,
Unless some cordial thou fetch from high,
Which present help may ease this malady.
If I decease, dost think thou shalt survive?
Or by my wasting state, dost think to thrive?

---

[1] sweet tongued Greek Demosthenes (384–322 B.C.E.) was considered the greatest of Athenian orators. There is a legend that he overcame a speech defect by declaiming with pebbles in his mouth.

[2] nine The Nine Muses are the Greek deities who preside over music, poetry, the arts and sciences. Calliope is Muse of the heroic epic.

[3] ore "stuff" in the 1650 edition.

Then weigh our case, if't be not justly sad,
Let me lament alone, while thou art glad.

New England.

And thus, alas, your state you much deplore,
In general terms, but will not say wherefore:
What medicine shall I seek to cure this woe,
If th' wound's so dangerous I may not know?
But you perhaps would have me guess it out,
What, hath some Hengist, like that Saxon stout,
By fraud, and force, usurped thy flow'ring
crown, [1]
And by tempestuous wars thy fields trod down?
Or hath Canutus, that brave valiant Dane, [2]
The regal, peaceful scepter from thee ta'en?
Or is't a Norman, whose victorious hand [3]
With English blood bedews thy conquered land?
Or is't intestine wars that thus offend?
Do Maud, and Stephen for the crown contend? [4]
Do barons rise, and side against their king? [5]
And call in foreign aid, to help the thing?
Must Edward be deposed, or is't the hour [6]
That second Richard must be clapped i'th'
Tower? [7]
Or is the fatal jar again begun,
That from the red, white pricking roses sprung? [8]
Must Richmond's aid, the nobles now implore, [9]
To come, and break the tushes of the boar?
If none of these, dear mother, what's your woe?
Pray, do not fear Spain's bragging Armado? [10]
Doth your ally, fair France, conspire your wrack?
Or, do the Scots play false behind your back?

---

[1] Hengist The Anglo-Saxons came to Britain at the invitation of King Vortigern and were granted lands in the eastern part of the island in exchange for military service. When Hengist, the Anglo-Saxon leader, arrived in Kent (449 C.E.), he flooded England with pagan Saxons, eventually deposed Vortigern and succeeded to the kingdom in 455 C.E., reigning until his death in 488 C.E.

[2] Canutus Canute (Cnut), King of England, Norway, and Denmark (ca. 995–1035). Battles between the Dane Canute and the Wessex kings resulted in a pact in which Edmund Ironside held Wessex and Canute Mercia. On Edmund's death in 1017, Canute reigned over the realm of England until his death in 1035.

[3] Norman Edward the Confessor died in 1066 without an heir. There were two claimants to the throne: the Anglo-Saxon Harold, son of Godwin, and William of Normandy. Harold ruled for forty weeks and a day before William invaded and conquered England.

[4] Maud, and Stephen In 1125 Stephen, nephew of Henry I, swore fealty to Henry's daughter Matilda (Maud) as her father's successor. When Stephen proclaimed himself King after Henry's death, he was opposed by Matilda and his reign was troubled by internal wars. Though Matilda imprisoned Stephen for six months in 1141, during which time she reigned as Queen, she left England in 1148, withdrawing her claim to the throne in favour of her son Henry of Anjou. Henry waged war against Stephen until 1153, when Stephen named him as heir.

[5] Do barons rise...against the king After the death of his brother Richard I, the Lion-Hearted, John succeeded to England's throne. His tyrannical reign (1199–1216) and aggressive policy against the baronage caused the nobility to unite against him and to compel him to sign the Magna Carta in 1215.

[6] Edward Edward II experienced two civil wars during his reign. He defeated Thomas, Earl of Lancaster in 1322, but lost the rebellion led by his queen Isabella and her lover Roger Mortimer. It is believed that he was murdered in 1328.

[7] second Richard While still in his minority, Richard II succeeded to the throne after the death of Edward III in 1377. In 1399, when Richard II was in Ireland, Henry of Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt, returned from exile and was supported by Parliament in his bid for the throne. Richard II was imprisoned and apparently murdered the following year, making way for the first Lancastrian king, Henry IV.

[8] red, white pricking roses sprung The War of the Roses was a series of dynastic wars fought by the rival houses of Lancaster and York for the throne of England. The War began in 1455 with the struggle between Henry IV and Richard Plantagenet, third Duke of York, and ended in 1485 when Henry Tudor defeated Richard III's forces at Bosworth.

[9] Richmond's aid Richard III usurped the throne in 1483. Insurrections against him occurred from 1483 onwards until Henry Tudor, Earl of Richmond, arrived with troops and defeated him at Bosworth. Richmond was crowned Henry VII in 1485, the first monarch of the Tudor dynasty.

[10] Spain's bragging Armado In 1587, conflicts between England and Spain developed into a war when England offered to support the revolt of the Netherlands against Spanish rule and when the English executed Mary Queen of Scots. Philip II of Spain dispatched an armada in 1588, which was defeated by the forces of Queen Elizabeth I. Despite this defeat, England's war with Spain continued until 1604.

Doth Holland quit you ill, for all your love?
Whence is this storm, from earth, or heaven above? [1]
Is't drought, is't famine, or is't pestilence?
Dost feel the smart, or fear the consequence?
Your humble child entreats you, show your grief,
Though arms, nor purse she hath, for your relief:
Such is her poverty, yet shall be found
A suppliant for your help, as she is bound.

Old England.

I must confess, some of those sores you name,
My beauteous body at this present maim;
But foreign foe, nor feigned friend I fear,
For they have work enough (thou know'st) elsewhere;
Nor is it Alice's son and Henry's daughter, [2]
Whose proud contention cause this slaughter;
Nor nobles siding, to make John no king
French Lewis unjustly to the crown to bring;
No Edward, Richard to lose rule, and life,
Nor no Lancastrians, to renew old strife;
No crook-backed tyrant, now usurps the seat,
Whose tearing tusks did wound, and kill, and threat:
No Duke of York nor Earl of March to soil
Their hands in kindred's blood, whom they did foil:
No need of Tudor, roses to unite,
None knows which is the red, or which the white:
Spain's braving fleet a second time is sunk,
France knows, how of my fury she hath drunk;
By Edward Third, and Henry Fifth of fame,
Her lilies in mine arms avouch the same.
My sister Scotland hurts me now no more,
Though she hath been injurious heretofore.
What Holland is, I am in some suspense,
But trust not much unto his excellence;
For wants, sure some I feel, but more I fear,
And for the pestilence, who knows how near;
Famine, and plague, two sisters of the sword,
Destruction to a land doth soon afford;
They're for my punishments ordained on high,
Unless thy tears prevent it speedily.
But yet, I answer not what you demand,
To show the grievance of my troubled land;
Before I tell the effect, I'll shew the cause,
Which are my sins, the breach of sacred laws;
Idolatry, supplanter of a nation,
With foolish superstitious adoration;
And liked, and countenanced by men of might,
The Gospel is trod down, and hath no right;
Church offices are sold, and bought, for gain,
That Pope, had hope, to find Rome here again;
For oaths, and blasphemies did ever ear
From Beelzebub himself, such language hear? [3]
What scorning of the saints of the Most High,
What injuries did daily on them lie?
What false reports, which nick-names did they take,
Nor for their own, but for their master's sake?
And thou, poor soul, wast jeered among the rest,
Thy flying for the truth I made a jest;
For Sabbath-breaking, and for drunkenness,
Did ever land profaneness more express?
From crying bloods, yet cleansed am not I,
Martyrs, and others, dying causelessly:
How many Princely heads on blocks laid down,
For nought, but title to a fading crown?
'Mongst all the cruelties which I have done,
Oh, Edward's babes, and Clarence hapless son, [4]

---

[1] fair France…heaven above? Bradstreet refers to England's relations with France, Scotland and Holland in general terms in these lines and in ll. 78–84.

[2] ll. 65–84 In these lines Old England recites the account of England's history sketched by New England in ll. 39–52.

[3] Beelzebub One of the names of Satan; in its Latin and Syriac version it can mean "lord of the flies" (see Matthew 12:24, 27; Mark 3:22, Luke 11:15, 18).

[4] Edward's babes, and Clarence hapless son It is believed that Richard III effected the murder of his nephews in order to succeed to the throne.

O Jane, why didst thou die in flow'ring prime, [1]
Because of royal stem, that was thy crime;
For bribery, adultery, for thefts, and lies,
Where is the nation, I can't paralyze;
With usury, extortion, and oppression,
These be the Hydras of my stout transgression; [2]
These be the bitter fountains, heads, and roots,
Whence flowed the source, the sprigs, the boughs, and fruits;
Of more than thou canst hear, or I relate,
That with high hand I still did perpetrate;
For these, were threatened the woeful day,
I mocked the preachers, put it far away;
The sermons yet upon record do stand,
That cried, destruction to my wicked land:
These prophets' mouths (alas the while) was stopped,
Unworthily, some backs whipped, and ears cropped;
Their reverent cheeks, did bear the glorious marks
Of stinking, stigmatizing, Romish clerks;
Some lost their livings, some in prison pent,
Some grossly fined, from friends to exile went:
Their silent tongues to heaven did vengeance cry,
Who heard their cause, and wrongs judged righteously,
And will repay it sevenfold in my lap,
This is forerunner of my after clap,
Nor took I warning by my neighbors' falls,
I saw sad Germany's dismantled walls. [3]
I saw her people famished, nobles slain,
Her fruitful land, a barren heath remain.
I saw (unmoved) her armies foiled and fled,
Wives forced, babes tossed, her houses calcined,
I saw strong Rochel yielding to her foe, [4]
Thousands of starved Christians there also.
I saw poor Ireland bleeding out her last, [5]
Such cruelty as all reports have past.
My heart obdurate, stood not yet aghast.
Nor sip I of that cup, and just 't may be,
The bottom dregs reserved are for me.

New England.

To all you've said, sad mother, I assent
Your fearful sins, great cause there's to lament,
My guilty hands (in part) hold up with you,
A sharer in your punishment's my due,
But all you say, amounts to this effect,
Not what you feel, but what you do expect.
Pray in plain terms, what is your present grief,
Then let's join heads, and hands for your relief.

Old England.

Well, to the matter then, there's grown of late,
'Twixt king and peers a question of state,
Which is the chief, the law, or else the king,
One saith it's he, the other no such thing.
My better part in court of Parliament,
To ease my groaning land show their intent,
To crush the proud, and right to each man deal.

---

[1] O Jane...flow'ring prime Lady Jane Grey (1538–1554), great-granddaughter of Henry VII, was proclaimed Queen of England July 10, 1553, following the death of Edward VI. She reigned for nine days before Mary Tudor entered London and was proclaimed Queen. Lady Jane was imprisoned and beheaded six months later. Her Protestant piety was memorialized by John Foxe in his Acts and Monuments (London, 1563).

[2] Hydras Hydra was the fabulous many-headed snake of the marshes of Lerna, whose heads grew again as fast as they were cut off.

[3] Germany's dismantled walls During the Thirty Years War (1618–1648), the German Protestant forces in the Palatinate were defeated by the Catholic Princes of Germany and the Hapsburg empire.

[4] strong Rochel...to her foe La Rochelle was a Huguenot stronghold during the Wars of Religion (1562–1598). The Huguenots, French Protestant followers of Calvin, however, were ultimately stripped of all political power when La Rochelle fell after a siege of 14 months (1628).

[5] poor Ireland...out her last In the winter of 1641, there was a massacre of English Protestants in the Irish rebellion. John Temple's The Irish Rebellion (1646) gave a horrific account of the slaughter of English settlers. In Bradstreet's poem The Four Ages of Man, Old Age says of the Irish rebellion: "Three hundred thousand slaughtered innocents, / By bloody Popish, hellish miscreants; / Oh may you live, and so you will I trust / To see them swill in blood until they burst" (1678 edition).

To help the Church, and stay the commonweal,
So many obstacles comes in their way,
As puts me to a stand what I should say,
Old customs, new prerogatives stood on,
Had they not held law fast, all had been gone,
Which by their prudence stood them in such stead,
They took high Strafford lower by the head, [1]
And to their Laud be't spoke, they held i'th' Tower, [2]
All England's metropolitan that hour,
This done, an Act they would have passed fain,
No prelate should his bishopric retain; [3]
Here tugged they hard indeed, for all men saw,
This must be done by Gospel, not by law.
Next the militia they urged sore,
This was denied, I need not say wherefore.
The King displeased, at York himself absents, [4]
They humbly beg return, show their intents,
The writing, printing, posting to and fro,
Shows all was done, I'll therefore let it go.
But now I come to speak of my disaster,
Contention's grown 'twixt subjects and their master:
They worded it so long, they fell to blows,
That thousands lay on heaps, here bleeds my woes.
I that no wars, so many years have known,
Am now destroyed, and slaughtered by mine own, [5]
But could the field alone this cause decide,
One battle, two or three I might abide,
But these may be beginnings of more woe,
Who knows, the worst, the best may overthrow;
Religion, Gospel, here lies at the stake,
Pray now dear child, for sacred Zion's sake,
Oh pity me, in this sad perturbation,
My plundered towns, my houses' devastation,
My ravished virgins, and my young men slain,
My wealthy trading fallen, my dearth of grain,
The seed time's come, but ploughman hath no hope,
Because he knows not, who shall inn his crop:
The poor they want their pay, their children bread,
Their woeful mother's tears unpitied.
If any pity in thy heart remain,
Or any childlike love thou dost retain,
For my relief now use thy utmost skill,
And recompense me good, for all my ill.

New England

Dear mother cease complaints, and wipe your eyes,
Shake off your dust, cheer up, and now arise,
You are my mother, nurse, I once your flesh,
Your sunken bowels gladly would refresh:
Your griefs I pity much, but should do wrong,
To weep for that we both have prayed for long,
To see these latter days of hoped for good,
That Right may have its right, though't be with blood;
After dark Popery the day did clear,
But now the sun in's brightness shall appear,
Blest be the nobles of thy noble land,
With (ventured lives) for truth's defense that stand,
Blest be thy Commons, who for common good,
And thine infringed laws have boldly stood.

---

[1] high Strafford Thomas Wentworth (1593-1641), Earl of Strafford, Lord President of the Council of the North and Lord Deputy of Ireland, was executed for treason on May 12, 1641. Charles I never forgave himself for signing Strafford's death-warrant.

[2] Laud an unfriendly pun on the name of William Laud (1573-1645), Archbishop of Canterbury, who was imprisoned in 1641 and executed in 1645 at the age of seventy-three.

[3] an Act... bishopric retain The Root and Branch Petition, demanding the abolition of episcopacy, was presented to the House of Commons, December 11, 1640.

[4] at York himself absents Charles I left for York in March, 1642, after which Parliament voted to put the kingdom in a state of defence. They soon delivered to Charles I their "Nineteen Propositions" for settlement, which demanded "constitutional liberty." Charles rejected the propositions, claiming that their implementation would cause "a total subversion of the fundamental laws."

[5] slaughtered by mine own Here Bradstreet refers to the battles of the first Civil War (1642–1646).

Blest be thy counties which do aid thee still
With hearts, and states, to testify their will.
Blest be thy preachers, who do cheer thee on,
O cry, "the sword of God, and Gideon";[1]
And shall I not on those wish Mero's curse,[2]
That help thee not with prayers, arms, and purse,
And for myself, let miseries abound,
If mindless of thy state I e'er be found.
These are the days, the Church's foes to crush,
To root out prelates, head, tail, branch, and rush.
Let's bring Baal's vestments out, to make a fire,[3]
Their miters, surplices, and all their tire,
Copes, rochets, crosiers, and such trash,[4]
And let their names consume, but let the flash
Light Christendom, and all the world to see,
We hate Rome's whore, with all her trumpery.
Go on brave Essex, show whose son thou art,[5]
Not false to king, nor country in thy heart,
But those that hurt his people and his crown,
By force expel, destroy, and tread them down:
Let gaols be filled with th' remnant of that pack,
And sturdy Tyburn loaded till it crack,[6]
And ye brave nobles, chase away all fear,
And to this blessed cause closely adhere
O mother, can you weep, and have such peers.
When they are gone, then drown yourself in tears.
If now you weep so much, that then no more,
The briny ocean will o'erflow your shore,
These, these, are they (I trust) with Charles our King,
Out of all mists, such glorious days will bring,
That dazzled eyes beholding much shall wonder
At that thy settled peace, thy wealth and splendor,
Thy Church and weal, established in such manner,
That all shall joy that thou displayedst thy banner,
And discipline erected, so I trust,
That nursing kings, shall come and lick thy dust:
Then justice shall in all thy courts take place,
Without respect of persons, or of case,
Then bribes shall cease, and suits shall not stick long,
Patience, and purse of clients for to wrong:
Then high commissions shall fall to decay,
And pursuivants and catchpoles want their pay,[7]
So shall thy happy nation ever flourish,
When truth and righteousness they thus shall nourish.
When thus in peace: thine armies brave send out,
To sack proud Rome, and all her vassals rout:
There let thy name, thy fame, thy valor shine,
As did thine ancestors in Palestine,
And let her spoils, full pay, with interest be,
Of what unjustly once she polled from thee,
Of all the woes thou canst let her be sped,
Execute to th' full the vengeance threatened.
Bring forth the beast that ruled the world with's beck,[8]

---

[1] "the sword of God and Gideon" "When I blow with a trumpet, I and all that are with me, then blow ye the trumpets also on every side of all the camp, and say, 'The Sword of the Lord, and of Gideon'" (Judges 7:18; see also 7:20).

[2] Mero's curse "Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty" (Judges 5:23). In February, 1642, a fast day was observed in London for the sins of the nation. Steven Marshall preached at Westminster from this very text in Judges; his Meroz sermon was so popular that he was frequently invited to deliver it.

[3] Baal the name of a pagan god, most commonly applied to Hadad, the fertility god of Canaan.

[4] miters...and such trash the vestments and ritual objects of Laudian Anglicanism.

[5] brave Essex Robert Devereux, third Earl of Essex (1591–1646), accepted the command of the main parliamentary army in the first Civil War. He advocated a purely defensive war policy, and suggested reopening peace talks with the King.

[6] Tyburn the public gallows in London.

[7] pursuivants and catchpoles warrant officers (OED pursuivant sb 2; catchpole 2).

[8] Bring forth the beast The beast described in John's apocalyptic vision of Revelation was frequently associated with Papacy in Puritan rhetoric.

And tear his flesh, and set your feet on's neck,
And make his filthy den so desolate,
To th' 'stonishment of all that knew his state,
This done, with brandished swords, to Turkey go,
(For then what is't, but English blades dare do)
And lay her waste, for so's the sacred doom,
And do to Gog, as thou hast done to Rome. [1]
Oh Abraham's seed lift up your heads on high.
For sure the day of your redemption's nigh; [2]
The scales shall fall from your long blinded eyes, [3]
And him you shall adore, who now despise,
Then fullness of the nations in shall flow,
And Jew and Gentile, to one worship go,
Then follows days of happiness and rest,
Whose lot doth fall to live therein is blest:
No Canaanite shall then be found i'th' land,
And holiness, on horses' bells shall stand, [4]
If this make way thereto, then sigh no more,
But if at all, thou didst not see't before.
Farewell dear mother, Parliament, prevail,
And in a while you'll tell another tale.
—1650

The Flesh and the Spirit

In secret place where once I stood
Close by the banks of Lacrim flood [5]
I heard two sisters reason on
Things that are past, and things to come;
One Flesh was called, who had her eye
On worldly wealth and vanity;
The other Spirit, who did rear
Her thoughts unto a higher sphere:
Sister, quoth Flesh, what liv'st thou on
Nothing but meditation?
Doth contemplation feed thee so
Regardlessly to let earth go?
Can speculation satisfy
Notion without reality?
Dost dream of things beyond the moon
And dost thou hope to dwell there soon?
Hast treasures there laid up in store
That all in th' world thou count'st but poor?
Art fancy sick, or turned a sot [6]
To catch at shadows which are not?
Come, come, I'll show unto thy sense,
Industry hath its recompense.
What canst desire, but thou may'st see
True substance in variety?
Dost honor like? Acquire the same,
As some to their immortal fame:
And trophies to thy name erect
Which wearing time shall ne'er deject.
For riches dost thou long full sore?
Behold enough of precious store.
Earth hath more silver, pearls and gold,
Than eyes can see, or hands can hold.
Affect's thou pleasure? Take thy fill,
Earth hath enough of what you will.
Then let not go, what thou may'st find,
For things unknown, only in mind.

---

[1] Gog In Ezekiel's vision, Gog of the land of Magog appears as the enemy of Israel against whom God will rain fire and brimstone in the last days (38–39). In Revelation, Satan leads Gog and Magog against the New Jerusalem (20:2). Exegetes have associated Gog with the Anti-Christ. In Christ Triumphans John Foxe refers to Gog in his description of Satan's stirring up of the Turks against Palestine and eastern Europe, hence Bradstreet's association of Gog with Turkey.

[2] Abraham's seed...redemption's nigh "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Galatians 3:29).

[3] The scales...blinded eyes "And immediately there fell from his [Saul's] eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized" (Acts 9:18).

[4] holiness on horses' bells "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar" (Zechariah 14:20).

[5] Lacrim Latin lacrimae, "tears."

[6] sot fool (OED sot sb^{1} A.1).

Spirit Be still thou unregenerate part,
Disturb no more my settled heart,
For I have vowed (and so will do)
Thee as a foe, still to pursue.
And combat with thee will and must,
Until I see thee laid in th' dust.
Sisters we are, yea twins we be,
Yet deadly feud 'twixt thee and me;
For from one father are we not,
Thou by old Adam wast begot, [1]
But my arise is from above,
Whence my dear Father I do love.
Thou speak'st me fair, but hat'st me sore,
Thy flattering shows I'll trust no more.
How oft thy slave, hast thou me made,
When I believed, what thou hast said,
And never had more cause of woe
Than when I did what thou bad'st do.
I'll stop mine ears at these thy charms,
And count them for my deadly harms.
Thy sinful pleasures I do hate,
Thy riches are to me no bait,
Thine honors do, nor will I love;
For my ambition lies above.
My greatest honor it shall be
When I am victor over thee,
And triumph shall, with laurel head,
When thou my captive shalt be led,
How I do live, thou need'st not scoff,
For I have meat thou know'st not of;
The hidden manna I do eat,
The word of life it is my meat. [2]
My thoughts do yield me more content
Than can thy hours in pleasure spent.
Nor are they shadows which I catch,
Nor fancies vain at which I snatch,
But reach at things that are so high,
Beyond thy dull capacity;
Eternal substance I do see,
With which enriched I would be:
Mine eye doth pierce the heavens, and see [3]
What is invisible to thee.
My garments are not silk nor gold,
Nor such like trash which earth doth hold,
But royal robes I shall have on,
More glorious than the glist'ring sun;
My crown not diamonds, pearls, and gold,
But such as angels' heads enfold.
The city where I hope to dwell,
There's none on earth can parallel;
The stately walls both high and strong,
Are made of precious jasper stone;
The gates of pearl, both rich and clear,
And angels are for porters there;
The streets thereof transparent gold,
Such as no eye did e'er behold,
A crystal river there doth run,
Which doth proceed from the Lamb's throne:
Of life, there are the waters sure,
Which shall remain forever pure,
Nor sun, nor moon, they have no need,
For glory doth from God proceed:
No candle there, nor yet torchlight,
For there shall be no darksome night.
From sickness and infirmity,
For evermore they shall be free,
Nor withering age shall e'er come there,
But beauty shall be bright and clear;
This city pure is not for thee,
For things unclean there shall not be:
If I of heaven may have my fill,
Take thou the world, and all that will.
—1678

---

[1] old Adam "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam [Christ] was made a quickening spirit" (I Corinthians 15:45).

[2] The hidden manna... is my meat "He that has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it" (Revelation 2:17).

[3] ll. 77–106 Bradstreet's description of heaven is based on that found in Revelation 21:10–27 and 22:1–5.

The Author to Her Book

Thou ill-formed offspring of my feeble brain,
Who after birth did'st by my side remain,
Till snatched from thence by friends, less wise
than true [1]
Who thee abroad, exposed to public view,
Made thee in rags, halting to th' press to trudge,
Where errors were not lessened (all may judge).
At thy return my blushing was not small,
My rambling brat (in print) should mother call,
I cast thee by as one unfit for light,
Thy visage was so irksome in my sight;
Yet being mine own, at length affection would
Thy blemishes amend, if so I could: [2]
I washed thy face, but more defects I saw,
And rubbing off a spot, still made a flaw.
I stretched thy joints to make thee even feet,
Yet still thou run'st more hobbling than is meet;
In better dress to trim thee was my mind,
But nought save homespun cloth, i' th' house I find.
In this array, 'mongst vulgars mayst thou roam,
In critics' hands, beware thou dost not come;
And take thy way where yet thou art not known,
If for thy father asked, say, thou hadst none:
And for thy mother, she alas is poor,
Which caused her thus to send thee out of door.
—1678

To My Dear and Loving Husband

If ever two were one, then surely we.
If ever man were loved by wife, then thee;
If ever wife was happy in a man,
Compare with me ye women if you can.
I prize thy love more than whole mines of gold,
Or all the riches that the East doth hold.
My love is such that rivers cannot quench, [3]
Nor ought but love from thee, give recompense.
Thy love is such I can no way repay,
The heavens reward thee manifold I pray.
Then while we live, in love let's so persevere,
That when we live no more, we may live ever.
—1678

Another

Phoebus make haste, the day's too long, be gone, [4]
The silent night's the fittest time for moan;
But stay this once, unto my suit give ear,
And tell my griefs in either hemisphere:
(And if the whirling of thy wheels don't drowned)
The woeful accents of my doleful sound,
If in thy swift career thou canst make stay,
I crave this boon, this errand by the way,
Commend me to the man more loved than life,
Show him the sorrows of his widowed wife;
My dumpish thoughts, my groans, my brackish
tears
My sobs, my longing hopes, my doubting fears,
And if he love, how can he there abide?
My interest's more than all the world beside.
He that can tell the stars or ocean sand,

---

[1] Till snatched…than true Either Anne's sister Mercy, Mercy's husband Rev. John Woodbridge, or Rev. Nathanial Ward took possession of Bradstreeet's poems and carried them to England, where Bradstreet's brother-in-law John Woodbridge arranged for their publication (The Tenth Muse, 1650), despite her claims that she never intended to publish them.

[2] Would thy blemishes amend Bradstreet revised and added to her verse after the publication of The Tenth Muse. However, she did not live to see the second edition of her work (Several Poems, 1678).

[3] My love is such that rivers cannot quench "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would be utterly contemned" (Song of Solomon 8:7).

[4] Phoebus a name of Apollo, the Sun-god; the sun personified (OED).

Or all the grass that in the meads do stand,
The leaves in th' woods, the hail or drops of rain,
Or in a corn-field number every grain,
Or every mote that in the sunshine hops,
May count my sighs, and number all my drops:
Tell him, the countless steps that thou dost trace,
That once a day, thy spouse thou mayst embrace;
And when thou canst not treat by loving mouth,
Thy rays afar salute her from the south.[1]
But for one month I see no day (poor soul)
Like those far situate under the pole,
Which day by day long wait for thy arise,
O how they joy when thou dost light the skies.
O Phoebus, hadst thou but thus long from thine
Restrained the beams of thy beloved shine,
At thy return, if so thou could'st or durst
Behold a chaos blacker than the first.
Tell him here's worse than a confused matter,
His little world's a fathom under water,
Nought but the fervor of his ardent beams
Hath power to dry the torrent of these streams.
Tell him I would say more, but cannot well,
Oppressed minds, abruptest tales do tell.
Now post with double speed, mark what I say,
By all our loves conjure him not to stay.
—1678

In Memory of my Dear Grandchild Elizabeth Bradstreet Who Deceased August, 1665 Being A Year and Half Old

Farewell dear babe, my heart's too much content
Farewell sweet babe, the pleasure of mine eye,
Farewell fair flower that for a space was lent,
Then ta'en away unto eternity.
Blest babe why should I once bewail thy fate,
Or sigh thy days so soon were terminate;
Sith thou art settled in an everlasting state.

2

By nature trees do rot when they are grown.
And plums and apples thoroughly ripe do fall,
And corn and grass are in their season mown,
And time brings down what is both strong and tall.
But plants new set to be eradicate,
And buds new blown, to have so short a date,
Is by his hand alone that guides nature and fate.
—1678

Some Verses upon the Burning of Our House, July 10th, 1666[2]

In silent night when rest I took
For sorrow near I did not look,
I wakened was with thund'ring noise
And piteous shrieks of dreadful voice.
That fearful sound of "fire" and "fire,"
Let no man know is my desire.
I starting up the light did spy,
And to my God my heart did cry
To strengthen me in my distress
And not to leave me succourless.
Then coming out beheld a space
The flame consume my dwelling place,
And when I could no longer look
I blest his name that gave and took,[3]
That laid my goods now in the dust
Yea so it was, and so 'twas just.
It was his own, it was not mine
Far be it that I should repine,

---

[1] by loving mouth presumably "by kissing"; from the south i.e. in the winter when, for those of us in the northern hemisphere, the sun moves to the south of the sky.

[2] This poem was included in the Andover Manuscript and remained unpublished until 1867.

[3] I blest…and took "Then Job arose…and said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord" (Job 1:20–21).

He might of all justly bereft,
But yet sufficient for us left.[1]
When by the ruins oft I passed
My sorrowing eyes aside did cast
And here and there the places spy
Where oft I sat and long did lie,
Here stood that trunk, and there that chest
There lay that store I counted best.
My pleasant things in ashes lie
And them behold no more shall I.
Under the roof no guest shall sit,
Nor at thy table eat a bit.
No pleasant tale shall e'er be told
Nor things recounted done of old.
No candle e'er shall shine in thee
Nor bridegroom's voice e'er heard shall be.
In silence ever shalt thou lie
Adieu, Adieu, all's vanity.
Then straight I 'gin my heart to chide,
And did thy wealth on earth abide,
Didst fix thy hope on mouldering dust,
The arm of flesh didst make thy trust?[2]
Raise up thy thoughts above the sky
That dunghill mists away may fly.
Thou hast a house on high erect
Framed by that mighty Architect,
With glory richly furnished
Stands permanent though this be fled.
It's purchased and paid for too
By him who has enough to do.
A price so vast as is unknown
Yet by his gift is made thine own.
There's wealth enough I need no more,
Farewell my pelf, farewell my store.[3]
The world no longer let me love
My hope and treasure lies above.
—(1666)

To My Dear Children[4]

This book by any yet unread,
I leave for you when I am dead,
That being gone, here you may find
What was your living mother's mind.
Make use of what I leave in love
And God shall bless you from above.

A.B.

My dear children,

I knowing by experience that the exhortations of parents take most effect when the speakers leave to speak, and those especially sink deepest which are spoke latest, and being ignorant whether on my death bed I shall have opportunity to speak to any of you much less to all, thought it the best whilst I was able to compose some short matters, (for what else to call them I know not) and bequeath to you, that when I am no more with you, yet I may be daily in your remembrance, (although it is the least in my aim in what I now do) but that you may gain some spiritual advantage by my experience. I have not studied in this you read to show my skill, but to declare the truth, not to set forth myself, but the glory of God. If I had minded the former it had been perhaps better pleasing to you, but seeing the last is the best, let it be best pleasing to you.

The method I will observe shall be this—I will begin with God's dealing with me from my childhood to this day.

---

[1] He might of all justly bereft an ellipsis for "bereft us."

[2] arm of flesh "With him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God to help us, and to fight our battles" (II Chronicles 32:8).

[3] pelf wealth (OED pelf sb 3).

[4] This spiritual autobiography addressed to her children was found in the Andover Manuscript and remained unpublished until 1867.

In my young years about 6 or 7 as I take it I began to make conscience of my ways, and what I knew was sinful as lying, disobedience to parents, etc. I avoided it. If at any time I was overtaken with the like evils, it was a great trouble, and I could not be at rest 'till by prayer I had confessed it unto God.[1] I was also troubled at the neglect of private duties though too often tardy that way. I also found much comfort in reading the Scriptures, especially those places I thought most concerned my condition, and as I grew to have more understanding, so the more solace I took in them.

In a long fit of sickness which I had on my bed I often communed with my heart, and made my supplication to the Most High who set me free from that affliction.

But as I grew up to be about 14 or 15 I found my heart more carnal, and sitting loose from God, vanity and the follies of youth take hold of me.

About 16 the Lord laid his hand sore upon me and smote me with the smallpox. When I was in my affliction I besought the Lord, and confessed my pride and vanity and he was entreated of me, and again restored me. But I rendered not to him according to the benefit received.

After a short time I changed my condition and was married, and came into this country, where I found a new world and new manners at which my heart rose. But after I was convinced it was the way of God, I submitted to it and joined to the church at Boston.

After some time I fell into a lingering sickness like a consumption together with a lameness which correction I saw the Lord sent to humble and try me and do me good: and it was not altogether ineffectual.

It pleased God to keep me a long time without a child which was a great grief to me, and cost me many prayers and tears before I obtained one, and after him gave me many more, of whom I now take the care, that as I have brought you into the world, and with great pains, weakness, cares and fears brought you to this, I now travail in birth again of you till Christ be formed in you.

Among all my experiences of God's gracious dealings with me I have constantly observed this that he hath never suffered me long to sit loose from him, but by one affliction or other hath made me look home, and search what was amiss. So usually thus it hath been with me that I have no sooner felt my heart out of order, but I have expected correction for it, which most commonly hath been upon my own person, in sickness, weakness, pains, sometimes on my soul in doubts and fears of God's displeasure, and my sincerity towards him. Sometimes he hath smote a child with sickness, sometimes chastened by losses in estate, and these times (through his great mercy) have been the times of my greatest getting and advantage; yea I have found them the times when the Lord hath manifested the most love to me. Then have I gone to searching, and have said with David, "Lord search me and try me, see what ways of wickedness are in me, and lead me in the way everlasting":[2] and seldom or never but I have found either some sin I lay under which God would have reformed, or some duty neglected which he would have performed, and by his help I have laid vows and bonds upon my soul to perform his righteous commands.

If at any time you are chastened of God take it as thankfully and joyfully as in greatest mercies, for if ye be his ye shall reap the greatest benefit by it: It hath been no small support to me in times of darkness when the Almighty hath hid his face from me, that yet I have had abundance of sweetness and refreshment after affliction and more circumspection in my walking after I have been afflicted.[1] I have been with God like an untoward child, that no longer than the rod has been on my back (or at least in sight) but I have been apt to forget him and myself too. Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now I keep thy statutes.

---

[1] with the like evils Harvard edition; the Twayne edition reads "with the evils."

[2] Lord search me...way everlasting Psalm 139:23-24.

I have had great experience of God's hearing my prayers, and returning comfortable answers to me, either in granting the thing I prayed for, or else in satisfying my mind without it, and I have been confident it hath been from him, because I have found my heart through his goodness enlarged in thankfulness to him.

I have often been perplexed that I have not found that constant joy in my pilgrimage and refreshing which I supposed most of the servants of God have, although he hath not left me altogether without the witness of his Holy Spirit who hath oft given me his word and set to his seal that it shall be well with me. I have sometimes tasted of that hidden manna that the world knows not, and have set up my Ebenezer and have resolved with myself that against such a promise, such tastes of sweetness the gates of hell shall never prevail:[2] yet have I many times sinkings and droopings, and not enjoyed that felicity that sometimes I have done. But when I have been in darkness and seen no light, yet have I desired to stay myself upon the Lord, and when I have been in sickness and pain, I have thought if the Lord would but lift up the light of his countenance upon me, although he ground me to powder it would be but light to me; yea oft have I thought were I in hell itself and could there find the love of God toward me, it would be a heaven and could I have been in heaven without the love of God, it would have been a hell to me for in truth it is the absence and presence of God that makes heaven or hell.[3]

Many times hath Satan troubled me concerning the verity of the Scriptures, many times by atheism how I could know whether there was a God; I never saw any miracles to confirm me, and those which I read of how did [I] know but they were feigned. That there is a God my reason would soon tell me by the wondrous works that I see, the vast frame of the heaven and the earth, the order of all things night and day, summer and winter, spring and autumn, the daily providing for this great household upon the earth, the preserving and directing of all to its proper end. The consideration of these things would with amazement certainly resolve me that there is an Eternal Being. But how should I know he is such a God as I worship in Trinity, and such a Saviour as I rely upon. Though this hath thousands of times been suggested to me, yet God hath helped me over. I have argued thus with myself, that there is a God I see. If ever this God hath revealed himself it must be in his word, and this must be it or none. Have I not found that operation by it that no human invention can work upon the soul, hath no judgments befallen diverse who have scorned and contemned it, hath it not been preserved through all ages maugre all the heathen tyrants and all of the enemies who have opposed it? Is there any story but that which shows the beginnings of times, and how the world came to be as we see? Do we not know the prophecies in it fulfilled which could not have been so long foretold by any but God himself?

---

[1] hid his face "But your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear" (Isaiah 59:2). "For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted; neither hath he hid his face from him; but when he cried unto him, he heard" (Psalm 22:21).

[2] hidden manna "He that has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna...." (Revelation 2:17); set up my Ebenezer "Then Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Ebenezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us" (I Samuel 7:12); gates of hell "And I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my church: and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matthew 16:18).

[3] were I in hell itself Harvard edition; the Twayne edition reads: "were it hell itself."

When I have got over this block then have I another put in my way, that admit this be the true God whom we worship, and that be his word, yet why may not the Popish religion be the right. They have the same God, the same Christ, the same word. They only interpret it one way we another.

This hath sometimes stuck with me, and more it would, but the vain fooleries that are in their religion together with their lying miracles, and cruel persecutions of the saints, which admit were they as they term them yet not so to be dealt withal.

The consideration of these things and many the like would soon turn me to my own religion again.

But some new troubles I have had since the world has been filled with blasphemy, and sectaries, and some who havest been accounted sincere Christians have been carried away with them, that sometimes I have said, "Is there faith upon the earth?" and I have not known what to think. But then I have remembered the words of Christ that so it must be, and that if it were possible the very elect should be deceived.[1] "Behold," saith our Saviour, "I have told you before." That hath stayed my heart, and I can now say, "Return O my soul to thy rest, upon this rock Christ Jesus will I build my faith, and if I perish, I perish." But I know all the powers of hell shall never prevail against it. I know whom I have trusted, and whom I have believed and that he is able to keep that I have committed to his charge.[2]

Now to the King immortal, eternal invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever,[3]

Amen.

This was written in much sickness and weakness, and is very weakly and imperfectly done, but if you can pick any benefit out of it, it is the mark which I aimed at.

—1867

---

[1] words of Christ... be deceived "For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect" (Matthew 24:24; see also Mark 13:22).

[2] I know whom... committed to his charge II Timothy 1:12.

[3] Now to the King... for ever and ever I Timothy 1:17.

Richard Crashaw

1612 – 1649

Richard Crashaw was born in London, the only son of William Crashaw, a notable Puritan preacher and controversialist, a great hater of the Roman communion who in his will declared "Popery" to be "the heap and chaos of all heresies." Perhaps fortunately, William Crashaw did not live to see his son "go over" to Rome. Richard was educated at the Charterhouse, and later entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he excelled in languages, reading Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian and Spanish. Crashaw wrote a number of religious poems during his youth, and in 1634, the year in which he received his B.A., he published his first volume, Epigrammatum Sacrorum Liber. This work, published anonymously, contained 185 Latin epigrams. In 1636 Crashaw was admitted to Peterhouse, proceeding to the M.A. degree in 1638. Peterhouse was the centre in Cambridge of Laudian High Anglicanism, and in Crashaw's case the common suspicion that Laudians were on the way to Rome was perhaps justified. Although the precise date of his ordination is unknown, it is known that he was Curate of the church adjoining Peterhouse, Little St. Mary's, in 1639. During the Civil War the chapel at Peterhouse was sacked by Parliamentary forces, and Crashaw, who supported the Royalist cause, declined to accept the Solemn League and Covenant and was expelled in 1644. In February 1644 Crashaw was in Holland, and then proceeded to France. At a point when the Church of England seemed unlikely to survive, strong inducements were offered to Anglicans in exile to convert to Catholicism. Crashaw was among those who did so, and was relieved from poverty by Queen Henrietta Maria. Several editions of Crashaw's poetry were published in England after his departure. In 1646, a volume of his verse was printed in two parts. The first part was entitled, "Steps to the Temple. Sacred Poems. With other Delights of the Muses" and the second "The Delights of the Muses and other Poems, written on several occasions." Crashaw travelled to Italy in 1648 or 1649 with a letter of recommendation from Queen Henrietta Maria; there he obtained a position under the influential Cardinal Palotta. Letters from various sources suggest that Crashaw's criticism of the Cardinal's retinue resulted in his removal from his post for his own security. In 1649 he was appointed as subcanon of the Basilica church of Our Lady of Loreto, but died four months later.

* * *

Wishes.
To his (supposed) Mistress

Who ere she be,
That not impossible she
That shall command my heart and me;

Where ere she lie,
Locked up from mortal eye,
In shady leaves of destiny:

Till that ripe birth
Of studied fate stand forth,
And teach her fair steps to our Earth;

Till that divine
Idea, take a shrine
Of crystal flesh, through which to shine:

Meet you her my wishes,
Bespeak her to my blisses,
And be ye called my absent kisses.

I wish her beauty,
That owes not all his duty
To gaudy tire, or glistering shoo-ty. [1]

Something more than
Taffeta or tissue can,
Or rampant feather, or rich fan.

More than the spoil
Of shop, or silkworms' toil
Or a bought blush, or a set smile.

A face that's best
By its own beauty dressed,
And can alone commend the rest.

A face made up
Out of no other shop,
Than what nature's white hand sets ope. [2]

A cheek where youth,
And blood, with pen of truth
Write, what the reader sweetly ru'th. [3]

A cheek where grows
More than a morning rose:
Which to no box his being owes.

Lips, where all day
A lover's kiss may play,
Yet carry nothing thence away.

Looks that oppress
Their richest tires but dress
And clothe their simplest nakedness.

Eyes, that displaces
The neighbour diamond, and out faces
That sunshine by their own sweet graces.

Tresses, that wear
Jewels, but to declare
How much themselves more precious are.

Whose native ray,
Can tame the wanton day
Of gems, that in their bright shades play.

Each ruby there,
Or pearl that dare appear,
Be its own blush, be its own tear.

A well tamed heart,
For whose more noble smart,
Love may be long choosing a dart.

Eyes, that bestow
Full quivers on love's bow;
Yet pay less arrows than they owe.

Smiles, that can warm
The blood, yet teach a charm,
That chastity shall take no harm.

Blushes, that bin
The burnish of no sin,
Nor flames of ought too hot within.

Joys, that confess,
Virtue their mistress,
And have no other head to dress.

Fears, fond and flight, [4]
As the coy bride's, when night
First does the longing lover right.

---

[1] tire a form of attire, dress, apparel (OED attire sb 3); also a personal adornment or decoration (OED attire sb 2); shoo-ty ornamental shoe tie.

[2] ope form of open (OED).

[3] ru'th grieves for (OED rue v^1 3).

[4] flight fleeting (OED flight a 1).

Tears, quickly fled,
And vain, as those are shed
For a dying maidenhead.

Days, that need borrow,
No part of their good morrow,
From a fore spent night of sorrow.

Days, that in spite
Of darkness, by the light
Of a clear mind are day all night.

Nights, sweet as they,
Made short by lovers' play,
Yet long by th' absence of the day.

Life, that dares send
A challenge to his end,
And when it comes say Welcome Friend.

Sydnæan showers [1]
Of sweet discourse, whose powers
Can crown old Winter's head with flowers,

Soft silken hours,
Open suns; shady bowers,
'Bove all; nothing within that lours. [2]

What ere delight
Can make Day's forehead bright;
Or give down to the wings of Night.

In her whole frame,
Have nature all the name,
Art and ornament the shame.

Her flattery,
Picture and poesy,
Her counsel her own virtue be.

I wish, her store
Of worth, may leave her poor
Of wishes; and I wish—no more.

Now if Time knows
That her whose radiant brows,
Weave them a garland of my vows;

Her whose just bays,
My future hopes can raise,
A trophy to her present praise;

Her that dares be,
What these lines wish to see:
I seek no further, it is she.

'Tis she, and here
Lo I unclothe and clear,
My wishes' cloudy character.

May she enjoy it,
Whose merit dare apply it,
But Modesty dares still deny it.

Such worth as this is,
Shall fix my flying wishes,
And determine them to kisses.

Let her full Glory,
My fancies, fly before ye,
Be ye my fictions; but her story.
—1646

---

[1] Sydnæan showers in reference to the work of Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586).

[2] lours looks angry or sullen (OED lour v 1).

Saint Mary Magdalene
or
The Weeper[1]

Lo where a WOUNDED HEART with Bleeding EYES conspire.
Is she a FLAMING Fountain, or a Weeping fire![2]

I

Hail, Sister Springs!
Parents of silver-footed rills!
Ever bubbling things!
Thawing crystal! snowy hills,
Still spending, never spent! I mean
Thy fair eyes, sweet Magdalene!

II

Heavens thy fair eyes be;
Heavens of ever-falling stars.
'Tis seed-time still with thee
And stars thou sow'st, whose harvest dares
Promise the earth to countershine
Whatever makes heaven's forehead fine.

III

But we are deceived all.
Stars indeed they are too true;
For they but seem to fall,
As Heaven's other spangles do.
It is not for our earth & us
To shine in things so precious.

IV

Upwards thou dost weep.
Heaven's bosom drinks the gentle stream.
Where the milky rivers creep,
Thine floats above; & is the cream.
Waters above th' Heavens, what they be[3]
We are taught best by thy Tears & thee.

V

Every morn from hence
A brisk Cherub something sips
Whose sacred influence
Adds sweetness to his sweetest lips.
Then to his music. And his song
Tastes of this breakfast all day long.

VI

Not in the Evening's eyes
When they red with weeping are
For the Sun that dies,
Sits Sorrow with a face so fair,
No where but here did ever meet
Sweetness so sad, sadness so sweet.

VII

When Sorrow would be seen
In her brightest majesty
(For she is a Queen)
Then is she dressed by none but thee.
Then, & only then, she wears
Her proudest pearls; I mean, thy Tears.

VIII

The Dew no more will weep
The Primrose's pale cheek to deck,
The Dew no more will sleep
Nuzzled in the Lily's neck;

---

[1] Mary Magdalene, a follower of Christ who attended his crucifixion (John 19:25), was the first person he appeared to after the resurrection (John 20:1–18). An extensive legend grew around her, connecting her (often without evidence) with other stories in the New Testament. She was identified with Mary the sister of Martha (Luke 10:38–42, John 11:1–47) and the sinful woman who anointed the feet of Jesus with perfume and dried them with her hair (Luke 7:36–50). Her association with the latter figure resulted in numerous depictions of her weeping for her sins. She became known as The Weeper.

[2] This couplet, placed here in the 1648 edition, precedes the poem on a separate page in 1652. The present text is based upon the editions of 1648 and 1652.

[3] Waters above th' Heavens The reference is to Genesis 1:7.

Much rather would it be thy Tear,
And leave them both to tremble here.

IX

There's no need at all
That the balsam-sweating bough [1]
So coyly should let fall
His med'cinable tears; for now
Nature hath learn't to extract a dew
More sovereign & sweet from you.

X

Yet let the poor drops weep
(Weeping is the ease of woe)
Softly let them creep,
Sad that they are vanquish't so.
They, though to others no relief,
Balsam may be, for their own grief.

XI

Such the maiden gem
By the purpling vine put on,
Peeps from her parent stem
And blushes at the bridegroom sun.
This watery blossom of thy eyn, [2]
Ripe, will make the richer wine.

XII

When some new bright guest
Takes up among the stars a room,
And Heaven will make a feast,
Angels with crystal vials come
And draw from these full eyes of thine
Their master's water: their own wine.

XIII

Golden though he be,
Golden Tagus murmurs tho; [3]
Were his way by thee,
Content & quiet he would go.
So much more rich would he esteem
Thy silver, than his golden stream.

XIV

Well does the May that lies
Smiling in thy cheeks, confess
The April in thine eyes.
Mutual sweetness they express.
No April ere lent kinder showers,
Nor May returned more faithful flowers.

XV

O cheeks! Beds of chaste loves
By your own showers seasonably dash't
Eyes! nests of milky doves
In your own wells decently washt,
O wit of love! that thus could place
Fountain & Garden in one face.

XVI

O sweet contest; of woes
With loves, of tears with smiles disputing!
O fair, & Friendly Foes,
Each other kissing & confuting!
While rain & sunshine, cheeks & eyes
Close in kind contrarieties.

XVII

But can these fair Floods be
Friends with the bosom fires that fill thee
Can so great flames agree
Eternal tears should thus distil thee!
O floods, o fires! o suns o showers!
Mixed & made friends by Love's sweet powers.

---

[1] balsam an aromatic oily or resinous medicinal preparation for healing wounds or soothing pain (OED balsam sb 2).

[2] eyn form of the word eyes (OED eye sb).

[3] Tagus The river Tagus flows from eastern Spain, across Spain and Portugal, reaching the Atlantic Ocean at Lisbon.

XVIII

'Twas his well-pointed dart
That digg'd these wells, & dressed this Vine;
And taught the wounded Heart
The way into these weeping Eyn.
Vain loves avant! bold hands forbear! [1]
The Lamb hath dipp't his white foot here.

XIX

And now where're he strays,
Among the Galilean mountains, [2]
Or more unwelcome ways,
He's followed by two faithful fountains;
Two walking baths; two weeping motions;
Portable, & compendious oceans.

XX

O thou, thy lord's fair store!
In thy so rich & rare expenses,
Even when he show'd most poor,
He might provoke the wealth of princes.
What prince's wanton'st pride e're could
Wash with silver, wipe with gold.

XXI

Who is that King, but he
Who calls't his Crown to be called thine,
That thus can boast to be
Waited on by a wandering mine,
A voluntary mint, that strows [3]
Warm silver showers where 're he goes!

XXII

O precious Prodigal! [4]
Fair spend-thrift of thy self! thy measure
(Merciless love!) is all.
Even to the last Pearl in thy treasure.
All places, times, & objects be
Thy tear's sweet opportunity.

XXIII

Does the day-star rise?
Still thy stars do fall & fall
Does Day close his eyes?
Still the Fountain weeps for all.
Let night or day do what they will,
Thou hast thy task; thou weepest still.

XXIV

Does thy song lull the air?
Thy falling tears keep faith full time.
Does thy sweet-breath'd prayer
Up in clouds of incense climb?
Still at each sigh, that is, each stop,
A bead, that is, A Tear, does drop.

XXV

At these thy weeping gates,
(Watching their wat'ry motion)
Each winged moment waits,
Takes his Tear, & gets him gone.
By thine Eye's tinct ennobled thus [5]
Time lays him up; he's precious.

XXVI

Not, so long she lived,
Shall thy tomb report of thee;
But, so long she grieved,
Thus must we date thy memory.
Others by moments, months, & years
Measure their ages; thou, by Tears.

XXVII

So do perfumes expire.
So sigh tormented sweets, oppressed

---

[1] avant form of avaunt; be gone! Be off! Away! (OED avaunt 1).

[2] Galilean Jesus was raised in Nazareth, a town in Galilee (Luke 2:39, 40), where he also began his ministry (Luke 4:14–30).

[3] strows form of strews: scatters, spreads loosely (OED strew v 1).

[4] Prodigal one who spends money extravagantly (OED prodigal sb 1).

[5] tinct a transmuting elixir (OED tinct sb 3).

With proud unpitying fire.
Such Tears the suffering Rose that's vexed
With ungentle flames does shed,
Sweating in a too warm bed.

XXVIII

Say, ye bright brothers,
The fugitive sons of those fair Eyes
Your fruitful mothers!
What make you here? what hopes can tice [1]
You to be born? what cause can borrow
You from those nests of noble sorrow?

XXIX

Whither away so fast?
For sure the sordid earth
Your sweetness cannot taste
Nor does the dust deserve your birth.
Sweet, whither haste you then? o say
Why you trip so fast away?

XXX

We go not to seek,
The darlings of Aurora's bed, [2]
The rose's modest cheek
Nor the violet's humble head.
Though the Field's eyes too Weepers be Because they want such Tears as we.

XXXI

Much less mean we to trace
The fortune of inferior gems,
Preferred to some proud face
Or perched upon fear'd diadems.
Crowned heads are toys. We go to meet
A worthy object, our lord's Feet.
—1652

A Hymn to the Name and Honour of the Admirable Saint Teresa [3]

Love, thou art absolute sole lord
Of Life and Death. To prove the word,
We'll now appeal to none of all
Those thy old soldiers, great and tall,
Ripe men of martyrdom, that could reach down
With strong arms, their triumphant crown;
Such as could with lusty breath
Speak loud into the face of death
Their great Lord's glorious name, to none
Of those whose spacious bosoms spread a throne
For Love at large to fill: spare blood and sweat;
And see him take a private seat,
Making his mansion in the mild
And milky soul of a soft child.
Scarce has she learn't to lisp the name
Of Martyr; yet she thinks it shame
Life should so long play with that breath
Which spent can buy so brave a death. [4]
She never undertook to know
What death with love should have to do;
Nor has she e're yet understood
Why to show love, she should shed blood
Yet though she cannot tell you why,
She can love, & she can die.
Scarce has she blood enough to make
A guilty sword blush for her sake;
Yet has she a heart dares hope to prove

---

[1] tice a form of entice (OED tice).

[2] Aurora the Roman goddess of the dawn and hence the rising light of the morning (OED Aurora 1,2).

[3] Saint Teresa of Avila (1515–1582) was one of the most celebrated mystics and women of the Roman Catholic Church. She instigated the Carmelite Reform, returning the Carmelite Order to its original austerity and enclosure, with contemplation as the primary focus of the nuns. Despite substantial opposition from both civic and religious sources, Teresa established sixteen convents in Spain. Her writings include a spiritual autobiography and several mystical works. Gian Lorenzo Bernini (1598–1680) sculpted an image of her in a moment of mystical insight, being pierced by the arrow of divine light, in his white marble masterpiece "The Ecstasy of Saint Teresa."

[4] so brave a death Teresa writes in her autobiography of her desire as a child to become a martyr.

How much less strong is death than love.
Be love but there; let poor six years
Be posed with the maturest fears [1]
Man trembles at, you straight shall find
Love knows no nonage, nor the mind. [2]
'Tis love, not years or limbs that can
Make the Martyr, or the man.
Love touched her heart, & lo it beats
High, & burns with such brave heats;
Such thirsts to die, as dares drink up,
A thousand cold deaths in one cup.
Good reason. For she breathes all fire.
Her weak breast heaves with strong desire
Of what she may with fruitless wishes
Seek for amongst her mother's kisses.
Since 'tis not to be had at home
She'll travel to a Martyrdom.
No home for hers confesses she
But where she may a Martyr be.
She'll to the Moors; & trade with them,
For this unvalued diadem. [3]
She'll offer them her dearest breath,
With Christ's Name in't, in change for death.
She'll bargain with them; & will give Them God; teach them how to live
In him: or, if they this deny,
For him she'll teach them how to die.
So shall she leave amongst them sown
Her Lord's blood; or at least her own.
Farewell then, all the world! Adieu.
Teresa is no more for you.
Farewell, all pleasures, sports, & joys,
(Never till now esteemed toys)
Farewell what ever dear may be,
Mother's arms or father's knee
Farewell house, & farewell home!
She's for the Moors, & Martyrdom.
Sweet, not so fast! lo thy fair Spouse
Whom thou seekst with so swift vows,
Calls thee back, & bids thee come
T'embrace a milder Martyrdom.
Blest powers forbid, Thy tender life
Should bleed upon a barbarous knife;
Or some base hand have power to race [4]
Thy breast's chaste cabinet, & uncase
A soul kept there so sweet, o no;
Wise Heaven will never have it so.
Thou art Love's victim; & must die
A death more mystical & high.
Into Love's arms thou shalt let fall
A still-surviving funeral.
His is the dart must make the death
Whose stroke shall taste thy hallowed breath;
A dart thrice dipped in that rich flame
Which writes thy spouse's radiant Name [5]
Upon the roof of Heav'n; where ay
It shines, & with a sovereign ray
Beats bright upon the burning faces
Of souls which in that name's sweet graces
Find everlasting smiles. So rare,
So spiritual, pure, & fair
Must be th'immortal instrument
Upon whose choice point shall be sent
A life so loved; & that there be
Fit executioners for thee,
The fair'st & first-born sons of fire
Blest Seraphim, shall leave their quire [6]
And turn Love's soldiers, upon thee
To exercise their archery.
O how oft shalt thou complain
Of a sweet & subtle pain.

---

[1] posed with placed against (OED pose v^1 4a).

[2] nonage the condition of being underage; the period of legal infancy; minority (OED nonage sb ^{1}1).

[3] She'll to the Moors...unvalued diadem Living in an age in which martyrdoms were rare, Teresa and her brother believed that in order to become martyrs they would have to travel to a place where Christianity was unpopular (Life, Chapter 1).

[4] race to cut or slash (OED race v^3 1).

[5] thy spouse's radiant Name Jesus Christ.

[6] quire A form of the word "choir" (OED choir).

Of intolerable joys;
Of a death, in which who dies
Loves his death, & dies again.
And would for ever so be slain.
And lives, & dies; & knows not why
To live, but that he thus may never leave to die.
How kindly will thy gentle heart
Kiss the sweetly-killing dart!
And close in his embraces keep
Those delicious Wounds, that weep
Balsam to heal themselves with. Thus
When these thy deaths, so numerous,
Shall all at last die into one,
And melt thy Soul's sweet mansion;
Like a soft lump of incense, hasted
By too hot a fire, & wasted
Into perfuming clouds, so fast
Shalt thou exhale to Heaven at last
In a resolving sigh, & then
O what? Ask not the tongues of men.
Angels cannot tell, suffice,
Thy self shall feel thine own full joys
And hold them fast for ever. There
So soon as thou shalt first appear,
The moon of maiden stars, thy white
Mistress, attended by such bright [1]
Souls as thy shining self, shall come
And in her first ranks make thee room;
Where 'mongst her snowy family
Immortal welcomes wait for thee.
O what delight, when revealed Life shall stand [2]
And teach thy lips heav'n with his hand;
On which thou now may'st to thy wishes
Heap up thy consecrated kisses.
What joys shall seize thy soul, when she
Bending her blessed eyes on thee
(Those second smiles of Heav'n) shall dart
Her mild rays through thy melting heart!
Angels, thy old friends, there shall greet thee
Glad at their own home now to meet thee.
All thy good Works which went before
And waited for thee, at the door,
Shall own thee there; & all in one
Weave a constellation
Of crowns, with which the King thy spouse
Shall build up thy triumphant brows.
All thy old woes shall now smile on thee
And thy pains sit bright upon thee
All thy sorrows here shall shine,
All thy suff'rings be divine.
Tears shall take comfort, & turn gems
And wrongs repent to diadems.
Ev'n thy deaths shall live; & new
Dress the soul that erst they slew.
Thy wounds shall blush to such bright scars
As keep account of the Lamb's wars.
Those rare Works where thou shalt leave writ,
Love's noble history, with wit
Taught thee by none but him, while here
They feed our souls, shall clothe thine there.
Each heavenly word by whose hid flame
Our hard hearts shall strike fire, the same
Shall flourish on thy brows, & be
Both fire to us & flame to thee;
Whose light shall live bright in thy face
By glory, in our hearts by grace.
Thou shalt look round about, & see
Thousands of crowned Souls throng to be Themselves thy crown. Sons of thy vows
The virgin-births with which thy sovereign spouse
Made fruitful thy fair soul, go now
And with them all about thee bow
To Him, put on (he'll say) put on
(My rosy love) that thy rich zone [3]
Sparkling with the sacred flames
Of thousand souls, whose happy names

---

[1] The moon of maiden stars, thy white / Mistress the Virgin Mary.

[2] revealed Life Jesus Christ ("I am the way, and the truth, and the life"— John 14:6).

[3] zone a girdle or belt (OED zone sb 3).

Heav'n keeps upon thy score. (Thy bright
Life brought them first to kiss the light
That kindled them to stars.) And so
Thou with the Lamb, thy lord, shalt go;
And whereso'ere he sets his white
Steps, walk with Him those ways of light
Which who in death would live to see,
Must learn in life to die like thee.
—1648, 1652

John Cleveland

1613 – 1658

John Cleveland was the son of an impoverished charity school usher, who was in 1621 given a clerical living, from which, because he was a Royalist, he was ejected by the Parliament of 1644–1645. Like other poets of the time, Cleveland seems to have owed much to the instruction in Greek and Latin of his school teacher, Richard Vynes. Cleveland was an undergraduate at Christ's College, Cambridge, and then moved on to St. John's College, of which he became a Fellow in 1634. As he did not take holy orders, he was compelled by the statutes of his college to choose to become a lawyer or a physician; in fact he seems to have studied both law and medicine, and was generally regarded as an ornament of the college. When Cromwell was a candidate for Cambridge in the Long Parliament, Cleveland opposed him, and when Cromwell won the election by one vote, declared that "that single vote hath ruined the whole kingdom." As a Royalist, Cleveland was in 1645 ejected from his fellowship, and went to the Royalist army at Oxford, where he won a reputation for his personality and his verse. He was at Newark when the Royalist garrison there surrendered, and was thought notable enough by the King's enemies to be singled out in their propaganda sheet, the "Kingdom's Weekly Intelligencer," in which his employment was described as being "to gather all college rents within the power of the king's forces in those parts, which he distributes to such as are turned out of their fellowships at Cambridge for their malignancy." "The King's Disguise" and "The Rebel Scot" express powerfully Cleveland's sense of betrayal and disgust at the course of events; he is said to have predicted immediately that the Scots would betray Charles.

After the fall of Newark, Cleveland, unemployed and impoverished, was supported by fellow Royalists. According to Aubrey, he became great friends with Samuel Butler, the author of the immensely popular Hudibras, published after the Restoration. In 1655 Cleveland was arrested in Norwich on charges which included consorting with known Royalists and Papists, and imprisoned in Great Yarmouth for three months, after which he was released after writing a letter to Cromwell. Thereafter he depended for a living mainly on teaching, so that neither his legal nor his medical training contributed to his support. He died before the Restoration.

Cleveland took certain aspects of "metaphysical" style to extremes, and some anthologists have understandably represented him by his more accessible pieces. This is, however, a disservice to serious readers. The tortuous wit of his more important work is the play of a fundamentally serious mind contemplating momentous events, and as such is worth our attention.

* * *

The King's Disguise [1]

And why so coffin'd in this vile disguise,
Which who but sees blasphemes thee with his eyes?
My twins of light within their pent-house shrink,
And hold it their allegiance to wink. [2]
Oh for a state-distinction to arraign
Charles of high treason 'gainst my Sovereign.
What an usurper to his Prince is wont,

---

[1] The occasion of this bitter poem was Charles I's leaving Oxford, disguised as a gentleman's servant, on April 27, 1646 and surrendering himself to the Scots on May 5. The earliest extant manuscript version dates from January 1647. Henry Vaughan's "The King Disguised, written about the same time that Mr. John Cleveland wrote his," should also be consulted. The notes which follow are much indebted, in spite of occasional disagreement, to Brian Morris and Eleanor Withington, eds., The Poems of John Cleveland (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1967).

[2] to wink to close. OED wink v ^{1} 1 and 5 are relevant.

Cloister and shave him, he himself hath don't.
His muffled fabric speaks him a recluse,
His ruins prove it a religious house. [1]
The Sun hath mew'd his beams from off his lamp,
And Majesty defac'd the Royal stamp. [2]
Is't not enough thy Dignity's in thrall,
But thou'lt transcribe it in thy shape and all?
As if thy Blacks were of too faint a die,
Without the tincture of Tautology.
Flay an Egyptian for his Cassock skin
Spun of his Country's darkness, line't within
With Presbyterian budge, that drowsy trance,
The Synod's sable, foggy ignorance:
Nor bodily nor ghostly Negro could
Rough-cast thy figure in a sadder mould. [3]
This Privy-chamber of thy shape would be
But the Close mourner to thy Royalty. [4]
Then break the circle of thy Tailor's spell,
A Pearl within a rugged Oyster's shell. [5]
Heaven, which the Minster of thy Person owns,[6]
Will fine thee for Dilapidations.
Like to a martyr'd Abbey's coarser doom,
Devoutly alter'd to a Pigeon room:
Or like the College by the changeling rabble,
Manchester's Elves, transform'd into a Stable. [7]
Or if there be a profanation higher,
Such is the Sacrilege of thine Attire. [8]
By which th'art half depos'd, thou look'st like one
Whose looks are under Sequestration. [9]
Whose Renegado form, at the first glance,
Shews like the self-denying Ordinance. [10]
Angel of light, and darkness too, I doubt,
Inspir'd within, and yet posses'd without.
Majestic twilight in the state of grace,
Yet with an excommunicated face.
Charles and his Mask are of a different mint,
A Psalm of mercy in a miscreant print.
The Sun wears Midnight, Day is beetle-brow'd,
And Lightning is in Kelder of a cloud. [11]
Oh the accurst Stenography of fate! [12]
The Princely Eagle shrunk into a Bat.
What charm, what magic vapour can it be

---

[1] His muffled fabric…house OED fabric sb I 1 and 3b make it clear that the word could apply both to a building and to the human body; both meanings are relevant here; ruins reminds us that the dissolution of the monasteries during Henry VIII's reformation was much in mind to Cleveland's contemporaries, because the Roundheads defaced what they regarded as idolatrous ornamentation in churches.

[2] The Sun…Royal stamp These lines rely on the analogy (in the "Elizabethan world picture") between the Sun in the heavens and the King on earth; mew'd shed (OED mew v ^{1}1 c).

[3] Flay…mould i.e. if you were to flay; darkness one of the plagues of Egypt: Exodus 10:21–23; Presbyterian budge Presbyterians were anathema to Royalists of Cleveland's stamp; budge to be understood by reference to its meaning as noun and adjective (OED budge sb ^{1} a kind of fur and budge a 1 pompous, stiff, formal); that drowsy…ignorance in apposition to budge and so explaining more precisely what Cleveland means us to understand by that word; Synod a Presbyterian assembly (OED synod 1 b).

[4] Close mourner deep mourners (OED close a 11b).

[5] rugged "The Rugged-Oyster…is of a dull ash colour" (OED rugged a ^{1} 2).

[6] Minster monastery, monastery church, temple; see the various senses in OED. King Charles is especially consecrated by God, and being disguised is like a holy building in need of repair.

[7] Manchester's elves a reference to the Puritan take-over of the Universities; the Earl of Manchester was ordered in 1644 to "purify" Cambridge; the "elves" are his troops, a "changeling rabble" because they had turned away from their allegiance to the King.

[8] Sacrilege…Attire The subject-matter and tone of this poem indicates the importance attached to the visual symbols of monarchy.

[9] Sequestration an emotive word in the language of the time. Many of the Anglican clergy were deprived of their livings. See OED sequestration 4. Under "sequestrator" OED quotes Cleveland: "He is the State's Cormorant."

[10] self-denying Ordinance an Act passed in 1645 preventing anybody from simultaneously holding a command in the Army and a seat in either House of Parliament.

[11] Kelder womb, from the Dutch word for a cellar. Vaughan and Brome followed Cleveland in using the word.

[12] Stenography shorthand. OED quotes this line as the first figurative use of the word.

That checks his rays to this Apostasy? [1]
It is no subtle film of tiffany air,
No Cob-web vizard, such as Ladies wear,
When they are veiled on purpose to be seen,
Doubling their lustre by their vanquished Screen: [2]
No, the false scabbard of a prince is tough
And three-piled darkness, like the smokey slough
Of an imprisoned flame, 'tis Faux in grain,
Dark lantern to our bright meridian. [3]
Hell belched the damp, the Warwick-Castle-vote
Rang Britain's curfew, so our light went out. [4]
The black offender, should he wear his sin
For penance, could not have a darker skin.
Thy visage is not legible, the letters,
Like a Lord's name, writ in fantastic fetters:
Clothes where a Switzer might be buried quick,
As overgrown as the Body Politic. [5]
False beard enough, to fit a stage's plot,
For that's the ambush of their wit, God wot.
Nay all his properties so strange appear, [6]
Y' are not i' th' presence, though the King be there.
A Libel is his dress, a garb uncouth,
Such as the Hue and Cry once purged at mouth. [7]
Scribbling Assasinate, thy lines attest
An ear-mark due; Cub of the Blatant Beast, [8]
Whose breath before 'tis syllabled for worse,
Is blasphemy unfledg'd, a callow curse.
The Laplanders when they would sell a wind
Wafting to hell, bag up thy phrase, and bind
It to the Barque, which at the voyage end
Shifts Poop, and breeds the colic in the fiend. [9]
But I'le not dub thee with a glorious scar,
Nor sink thy Sculler with a Man of War. [10]
The black-mouth'd Si quis and this slandering suit,
Both do alike in picture execute. [11]
But since w' are all called Papists, why not date
Devotion to the rags thus consecrate. [12]
As Temples use to have their Porches wrought

---

[1] Apostasy abandonment of religious faith or moral allegiance (OED apostasy 1, with other senses relevant); rays Cleveland is returning to the Sun-King parallel; there is too an Eagle-King parallel, the Eagle being "the king of birds."

[2] It is no subtle film...Screen Cleveland seems to be playing here on the etymological relation between tiffany (muslin, cobweb lawn) and theophany, since manifestations of God always conceal as well as reveal. See OED tiffany 1 and 2.

[3] Faux Guy Fawkes, the first person discovered in the Gunpowder Plot (1605), was represented in prints as entering the House of Parliament bearing a dark lantern.

[4] the Warwick-Castle-vote In 1646 Parliament commanded that the King should be sent to Warwick Castle. The Scots did not comply; but Cleveland is seeing the vote as extinguishing the power of the monarchy.

[5] Clothes...Body Politic Members of the Swiss Guard (employed then by various European monarchs and to this day in the Vatican) were notoriously large; Charles I was a small man. Events have shown that the Body Politic has grown too large in relation to its Head, the King.

[6] properties in the double sense of "stage properties" and "attributes of the King."

[7] Hue and Cry Mercurius Britanicus issued a Hue and Cry after the King in its issue of July 28 – August 4, 1645; one editor was imprisoned and the other forced to apologize. OED hue and cry: outcry calling for the pursuit of a felon.

[8] An ear-mark due Cropping of the ears, in part or in whole, was a punishment meted out under Charles I to those deemed to have published seditious libel. Three authors of anti-episcopal pamphlets, Burton, Bastwicke and Prynne, were so punished in 1637; Blatant Beast a symbol of calumny, which appears in several books of Spenser's The Faerie Queene.

[9] Compare Vaughan's reference to Lapland witches in "Upon A Cloak," line 90. Among other activities, they sold winds to sailors. The Hue and Cry of Britanicus would sicken the devil himself.

[10] The sense is roughly "You are too insignificant to be honoured with my attention"; dub is to invest [somebody] with a new dignity or title (OED dub v^1 2).

[11] black-mouth'd slanderous, calumnious (OED); Si quis "If anyone"; the beginning of notices on the doors of churches asking if anyone knew good reason why a person should not be admitted to Holy Orders; the point is that such notices invite slander. The couplet is not entirely clear; in picture may suggest execution at one remove, as a picture is an imitation rather than a real person; this slandering suit perhaps referring to Charles's disguise.

[12] w' are all called Papists a common Puritan charge against those Anglicans who accepted Archbishop Laud's views on ceremonies.

With Sphinxes, creatures of an antick draught, [1]
And puzzling Portraitures, to shew that there
Riddles inhabited, the like is here.
But pardon Sir, since I presume to be
Clark of this Closet to Your Majesty; [2]
Me thinks in this your dark mysterious dress
I see the Gospel couched in Parables.
The second view my purblind fancy wipes,
And shews Religion in its dusky types.
Such a Text Royal, so obscure a shade
Was Solomon in Proverbs all arrayed. [3]
Now all ye brats of this expounding age,
To whom the spirit is in pupillage;
You that damn more then ever Sampson slew,
And with his engine, the same jaw-bone too: [4]
How is't Charles 'scapes your Inquisition free,
Since bound up in the Bible's Livery?
Hence cabinet-intruders, pick-locks hence, [5]
You that dim jewels with your Bristol-sense: [6]
And Characters, like Witches, so torment,
Till they confess a guilt, though innocent.
Keys for this Cypher you can never get,
None but S. Peter's ope's this Cabinet. [7]
This Cabinet, whose aspect would benight
Critic spectators with redundant light.
A Prince most seen, is least: What Scriptures call
The Revelation, is most mystical.
Mount then thou shadow royal, and with haste
Advance thy morning star, Charles's overcast.
May thy strange journey contradictions twist,
And force fair weather from a Scottish mist.
Heaven's Confessors are pos'd, those star-ey'd Sages,
To interpret an Eclipse thus riding stages. [8]
Thus Israel-like he travels with a cloud,
Both as a conduct to him, and a shroud.
But oh! he goes to Gibeon, and renews
A league with mouldy bread, and clouted shoes. [9]
—1647

The Rebel Scot [10]

How? Providence? and yet a Scottish crew? [11]
Then Madam Nature wears black patches too: [12]
What? shall our Nation be in bondage thus
Unto a Land that truckles under us?
Ring the bells backward; I am all on fire,

---

[1] Sphinxes emblematic of the inscrutable. For sculpted sphinxes, see OED sphinx 2; antick antique; draught here, "representation in sculpture"; this place is cited under OED draught sb X 27b.

[2] Clark etc. A Clerk of the Closet was an ecclesiastic in private attendance upon a monarch, a royal confessor (OED clerk sb 6c).

[3] Me thinks…arrayed The suggestion is that the disguise points to a mystery, as do "types" in religion; but the word arrayed points beyond "Solomon in Proverbs" to Matthew 6:29 and Solomon arrayed in all his glory, in contrast to the humble disguise of the King.

[4] with…the same jaw-bone too with the jaw-bone of an ass. See Judges 15:15.

[5] cabinet-intruders in reference to the publication of letters written by Charles, said to have been taken from a cabinet captured at the Battle of Naseby.

[6] Bristol-sense in reference to the "Bristol diamond" (OED Bristol 3). To have Bristol-sense is to suspect that all jewels are false; in this case the jewel is Charles.

[7] Only St. Peter will be able to interpret the character of the King.

[8] pos'd puzzled; Eclipse another reference to the Sun-King parallel; Charles is eclipsed by his disguise; stages divisions of a journey (OED stage sb IV).

[9] See Joshua 9:3–15, especially verse 5; clouted patched. The point of the last line is that the Scots were no more to be trusted than the inhabitants of Gibeon who deceived Joshua.

[10] The Scottish army entered England on January 19, 1644. Morris and Withington consider that the poem may have been written before the event, in view of the fact that Pym, mentioned in l. 10, died on December 8, 1643. Their view is that "the tone of the passage suggests that Pym is still alive." I fail to see that it does.

[11] Providence the cry of the New Model Army.

[12] patches small pieces of silk or court-plaster, worn on the face to conceal blemishes or to show off the complexion (OED patch sb^{1} 2). That is, it is unnatural for the Scots to rise up against the King. The next two lines express an English view of the inferiority of the Scots.

Not all the buckets in a Country Choir [1]
Shall quench my rage. A Poet should be fear'd
When angry, like a Comet's flaming beard. [2]
And where's the Stoic can his wrath appease
To see his Country sick of Pym's disease; [3]
By Scotch Invasion to be made a prey
To such Pig-wiggin Myrmidons as they? [4]
But that there's charm in verse, I would not quote
The name of Scot, without an antidote;
Unless my head were red, that I might brew [5]
Invention there that might be poison too.
Were I a drowsy Judge, whose dismal Note
Disgorgeth halters, as a Juggler's throat
Doth ribands: could I (in Sir Emp'rick's tone) [6]
Speak Pills in phrase, and quack destruction:
Or roar like Marshall, that Geneva-Bull, [7]
Hell and damnation a pulpit full:
Yet to express a Scot, to play that prize, [8]
Not all those mouth-Granadoes can suffice. [9]
Before a Scot can properly be cursed,
I must (like Hocus) swallow daggers first. [10]
 Come keen Iambicks, with your Badger's feet, [11]
And Badger-like, bite till your teeth do meet.
Help ye tart Satirists, to imp my rage,
With all the Scorpions that should whip this age. [12]
Scots are like witches; do but whet your pen,
Scratch till the blood come; they'll not hurt you then. [13]
Now as the Martyrs were enforc'd to take
The shapes of beasts, like hypocrites, at stake,
I'le bait my Scot so; yet not cheat your eyes,
A Scot within a beast is no disguise. [14]
 No more let Ireland brag, her harmless nation
Fosters no Venom, since the Scots' Plantation: [15]
Nor can ours feign'd Antiquity maintain;

---

[1] Ring the bells backward that is, beginning with the bass bell, as was done to warn of fire; Choir fire-buckets were kept in the choirs of churches.

[2] a Comet's flaming beard Comets were thought to presage disasters.

[3] Pym John Pym was a great Parliamentary leader. He was said at the time to have died of a disease induced by lice; Cleveland's point is that England is being overrun by the Scots as Pym was by lice.

[4] Pig-wiggin Myrmidons Myrmidons were originally a race of war-like men of ancient Thessaly; the word had come to mean "hired ruffians" by Cleveland's time; Pig-wiggin variously spelled and obscure in origin, but obviously a term of contempt; see OED pigwidgin. OED records no sense very satisfactory for this context; Dr. Johnson came close when he called it "a kind of cant word for anything petty or small"; I have no doubt that the exact sense Cleveland had in mind is conveyed in Edwin Brough's letter to The Times of June 7, 1923 when he listed it as one of the names given to the runt of a litter of pigs or dogs.

[5] Unless my head were red By tradition Judas had red hair, and so it was taken as signifying evil qualities.

[6] Sir Emp'rick a quack doctor.

[7] Marshall Stephen Marshall was a famous Puritan preacher, who became chief chaplain to the New Model Army.

[8] play that prize act that part (OED prize sb^2 b).

[9] mouth-Granadoes explosive speeches (by analogy with hand-grenade).

[10] Hocus a conjuror or juggler; the word is an abbreviation of Hocus-pocus, the origin of which is uncertain.

[11] Iambicks, with your Badger's feet Sir Thomas Browne discusses the opinion that the "Badger hath the legs of one side shorter than of the other" in Pseudodoxia Epidemica Book 3, Chapter 5.

[12] imp to improve the capacities of, as the flight of a falcon was improved by feathers engrafted in the wing. For scorpions, see I Kings 12:11.

[13] Scratch till the blood come Witches were thought to be unable to harm anybody who had drawn their blood; see I Henry VI, I.v.6: "Blood will I draw on thee, thou art a witch."

[14] the Martyrs Christians were blamed by Nero for a great fire in Rome in 64 C.E., and many were put to death, some by being clothed in animal skins and "thrown to the lions": like hypocrites but not really so, because they were forced to assume a false appearance; Scot within a beast a reference to the custom of painting the body with shapes of beasts, no disguise because they are truly beastly. Cleveland is seeing himself as an English dog baiting the Scottish bear.

[15] Ireland…no Venom a reference to the tradition that St. Patrick cleared all Ireland of snakes; the Scots' Plantation Ireland was colonized under both Elizabeth and James; it is estimated that 40,000 Scots settled in Ulster between 1610 and 1640, beginning the Presbyterian domination of that province and leading to the religio-political difficulties of our own time.

Since they came in, England hath wolves again.[1]
The Scot that kept the Tower, might have shown
(Within the grate of his own breast alone)
The Leopard and the Panther; and engrossed[2]
What all those wild Collegiates had cost
The honest High-shoes, in their Termly Fees,[3]
First to the savage Lawyer, next to these.
Nature her self doth Scotch-men beasts confess,
Making their Country such a wilderness:
A Land that brings in question and suspense
God's omnipresence, but that CHARLES came thence:
But that Montrose and Crawford's loyal band[4]
Aton'd their sins, and christ'ned half the Land.
Nor is it all the Nation hath these spots;
There is a Church, as well as Kirk of Scots:
As in a picture, where the squinting paint
Shews Fiend on this side, and on that side Saint.[5]
He that saw Hell in's melancholy dream,
And in the twilight of his Fancy's theme,
Scar'd from his sins, repented in a fright,
Had he view'd Scotland, had turn'd Proselyte.[6]
A land where one may pray with cursed intent,
O may they never suffer banishment!
Had Cain been Scot, God would have chang'd his doom,
Not forc'd him wander, but confin'd him home.[7]
Like Jews they spread, and as infection fly,
As if the Devil had Ubiquity.
Hence 'tis, they live at Rovers; and defy[8]
This or that Place, Rags of Geography.
They're citizens o'th world; they're all in all,
Scotland's a Nation Epidemical.
And yet they ramble not to learn the Mode
How to be dressed, or how to lisp abroad,
To return knowing in the Spanish shrug,[9]
Or which of the Dutch States a double Jug
Resembles most, in Belly, or in Beard:[10]
(The Card by which the Mariners are steer'd.)[11]
No; the Scots-Errant fight, and fight to eat;
Their Estrich-stomachs make their swords their meat:[12]
Nature with Scots as tooth-drawers hath dealt,
Who use to hang their teeth upon their belt.[13]
Yet wonder not at this their happy choice;
The serpent's fatal still to Paradise.

---

[1] England hath wolves There were no wolves in Cleveland's England, but their extirpation was more recent than was thought. Dryden, in The Hind and the Panther, also identified Presbyterians with wolves.

[2] The Scot that kept the Tower Sir William Balfour, dismissed in 1641 from his post as Lieutenant of the Tower, became a commander on the Parliamentary side; The Leopard and the Panther associated with lust and treachery; in Cleveland's time the Tower was a menagerie as well as a prison.

[3] honest High-shoes country people, who wore high shoes against mud; Cleveland means that when they come to London to consult their lawyers and see the animals in their Tower, Balfour could exhibit himself and take their money.

[4] Montrose and Crawford Scottish noblemen who fought for the King.

[5] the squinting paint…Saint referring to satirical pictures, common in the Reformation.

[6] He that saw Hell The specific reference is unclear; it would be all too easy, and probably inaccurate, to suggest Dante; had turn'd Proselyte the suggestion is that Scotland is worse than Hell, since to change from one religion to another is a stronger course of action than merely to repent.

[7] Had Cain been Scot etc. Morris and Withington say that these are the most famous lines in Cleveland. For Cain, see Genesis 4:1–15.

[8] at Rovers at random (the term is originally from archery, where it had a rather different meaning).

[9] the Spanish shrug Writers of the time were uninhibited in references to the habits of other nations; the body-language of inhabitants of the Mediterranean countries was a frequent subject of remark.

[10] the Dutch States leaders of the United Netherlands; a double Jug etc. the point is, to know which of the leaders looks like a two-pint jug (or the reference may be to a toby-jug, shaped like a human figure).

[11] The Card etc. in reference to the preceding five lines; these social observations form the chart (card) by which travellers find their way around the world.

[12] Estrich-stomachs There are many references in the period to the indiscriminate appetite of the ostrich.

[13] to hang their teeth upon their belt as tooth-drawers were depicted at the time.

Sure England hath the Hemerods, and these[1]
On the North Postern of the patient seize,
Like Leeches: thus they physically thirst[2]
After our blood, but in the cure shall burst.
Let them not think to make us run o'th' score,
To purchase Villeinage, as once before,
When an Act past, to stroke them on the head,
Call them good subjects, buy them ginger-bread.[3]
Nor gold, nor Acts of Grace; 'tis steel must tame
The stubborn Scot: A Prince that would reclaim
Rebels by yielding, doth like him (or worse)
Who saddled his own back to shame his horse.
 Was it for this you left your leaner soil,
Thus to lard Israel with Egypt's spoil?[4]
They are the Gospel's Life-guard; but for them,
The garrison of new Jerusalem,
What would the brethren do? the Cause! the Cause!
Sack-possets, and the Fundamental Laws![5]
Lord! what a goodly thing is want of shirts!
How a Scotch-stomach, and no meat, converts!
They wanted food and raiment; so they took Religion for their Seamstress and their Cook.
Unmask them well; their honours and estate,
As well as conscience, are sophisticate.[6]
Shrive but their Titles, and their money poise,
A Laird and twenty pence pronounc'd with noise,
When construed, but for a plain yeoman go,
And a good sober two-pence; and well so.[7]
Hence then you proud Impostors, get you gone,
You Picts in Gentry and Devotion:[8]
You scandal to the stock of Verse! a race
Able to bring the Gibbet in disgrace.
Hyperbolus by suffering did traduce
The Ostracism, and sham'd it out of use.[9]
The Indian that heaven did forswear,
Because he heard the Spaniards were there,
Had he but known what Scots in hell had been,
He would Erasmus-like have hung between.[10]
My Muse hath done. A Voider for the nonce![11]
I wrong the Devil, should I pick the bones.
That dish is his: for when the Scots decease,
Hell like their Nation feeds on Barnacles.
 A Scot, when from the Gallow-Tree got loose,
 Drops into Styx, and turns a Soland-Goose.[12]
—1647

---

[1] Hemerods A haemorrhoid (variously spelled) could refer to both an affliction of the anus and to a serpent whose bite caused unstoppable bleeding.

[2] physically thirst that is, as if the thirst were the result of a medical ailment.

[3] run o'th' score get into debt; as once before etc. a reference to an Act of February 1641, by which the Scots were voted a gratuity of £300,000.

[4] Egypt's spoil? Exodus 12:36.

[5] the Cause and the Fundamental Laws Puritan slogans, mocked after the Restoration in works such as Hudibras.

[6] sophisticate not genuine, dishonest (OED sophisticate ppl a 1 and 3).

[7] Shrive question, examine (OED shrive 7); two-pence the English penny was worth about ten Scotch pence.

[8] Picts Compare the reference in Marvell's Horatian Ode.

[9] Ostracism a method of temporary banishment practised in ancient Greece (OED). Hyperbolus was a demagogue who tried to banish others; instead he suffered banishment himself.

[10] Erasmus-like Aubrey wrote that "They were wont to say that Erasmus was Interdependent between Heaven and Hell, till, about the year 1655, the Conclave at Rome dammed him for a Heretique, after he had been dead 120 years" (Aubrey's Brief Lives, ed. Oliver Lawson Dick, London: Secker and Warburg, 1960, 103).

[11] Voider a utensil in which dirty dishes and scraps of food are placed when clearing the table after a meal (OED voider 3); for the nonce for the occasion.

[12] Barnacles…Soland-Goose It was still widely believed at the time that trees in the Orkney Islands bore barnacles that dropped into the water and turned into Soland geese. For other references see OED Solan 2.

Epitaph on the Earl of Strafford [1]

Here lies Wise and Valiant Dust,
Huddled up 'twixt Fit and Just:
Strafford, who was hurried hence
'Twixt Treason and Convenience.
He spent his Time here in a Mist;
A Papist, yet a Calvinist. [2]
His Prince's nearest Joy, and Grief.
He had, yet wanted all Relief. [3]
The Prop and Ruin of the State;
The People's violent Love, and Hate:
One in extremes lov'd and abhor'd.
Riddles lie here; or in a word, [4]
Here lies Blood; and let it lie
Speechless still, and never cry. [5]
—1647

The General Eclipse [6]

Ladies that guild the glittering Noon
And by Reflection mend his Ray,
Whose Beauty makes the sprightly Sun
To dance, as upon Easter-day;
    What are you now the Queen's away?

Courageous Eagles, who have whet
Your eyes upon Majestic Light,
And thence deriv'd such Martial heat,
That still your Looks maintain the Fight;
    What are you since the King's Goodnight? [7]

Cavalier-buds, whom Nature teems,
As a Reserve for England's Throne,
Spirits whose double edge redeems
The last Age, and adorns your own;
    What are you now the Prince is gone? [8]

---

[1] The Earl of Strafford was executed on May 12, 1641. This poem has been regarded as probably by Cleveland. For discussion see Morris and Withington, xxxiii. There it is said to be unlike any of Cleveland's genuine poems, "but considering the extreme tact enjoined by the event upon a Fellow of St. John's not yet irretrievably committed to the King's cause, it is what one might expect: a trail of consciously clever antitheses, half shielding and sophisticating the pathos of bloody 'riddles.' That Cleveland felt the full shock of the trial is evident from other allusions to Strafford scattered throughout his works." For the attribution to Clemen Paman (1612–1664), see Peter Davidson, Poetry and Revolution (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1998), 363, 547.

[2] A Papist, yet a Calvinist Cleveland, as a Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, which was also Strafford's college, may have heard that Strafford, thought of by the people as a "Papist," was in fact a Calvinist.

[3] wanted lacked; Relief punning on various senses of the word. Strafford was a wealthy landowner, so OED relief ^{2} 1 ("payment…made to the overlord") would apply; as someone who was tried and executed, and whose King signed his death-warrant, he might be said to lack "assistance in time of danger" (OED relief ^{2} 4). G.M. Trevelyan described the trial, attainder and execution of Strafford as a "high tragedy, unsurpassed for historical and human interest in the political annals of any time or land," and "the bitterest humiliation of Charles's life" (A Shortened History of England, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1976 reprint, 298).

[4] Riddles lie here Compare "The King's Disguise," l. 90.

[5] The last couplet represents a prayer that the blood of Strafford will not result in a blood-bath for the nation. Compare Macbeth III.iv: "It will have blood; they say, blood will have blood"; for the notion that guiltily shed blood cries out see Genesis 4:8-11 and Luke 11:49-51.

[6] This poem, not certainly by Cleveland, is described by Morris and Withington as "one of the many variations" on Wotton's famous lyric, "You meaner beauties of the Night."

[7] The imagery of this stanza may be understood by reference to the "eagle" imagery in "The King's Disguise." There has been disagreement as to whether the King's Goodnight refers to Charles I's surrender to the Scots in May 1646 or to his execution in January 1649. Morris and Withington favour the former, and argue that a date of May-June 1646 would not be contradicted by any other reference in the poem. I disagree, for reasons given below.

[8] the Prince In the light of the thought-pattern of this and the following stanza, which has to do with succession, this seems more likely to refer to the King's eldest son than to any other possible candidate.

As an obstructed Fountain's head
Cuts the Entail off from the Streams,
And Brooks are disinherited;
Honour and Beauty are mere Dreams,
    Since Charles and Mary lost their Beams. [1]

Criminal Valors! who commit
Your Gallantry, whose Pœan brings [2]
A Psalm of Mercy after it;
In this sad Solstice of the King's, [3]
    Your Victory hath mew'd her wings. [4]

See how your Soldier wears his Cage
Of Iron, like the Captive Turk, [5]
And as the Guerdon of his Rage!
See how your glimmering Peers do lurk,
    Or at the best work journey-work!

Thus 'tis a General Eclipse,
And the whole world is all a-mort; [6]
Only the House of Commons trips
The Stage in a Triumphant sort, [7]
    Now e'n John Lilburn take 'em for't. [8]
—1677

---

[1] Mary Charles I's Queen, Henrietta Maria.

[2] who commit / Your Gallantry The stanza refers to the Roundheads; this probably means that they send their gallantry to prison (where it will not trouble them by being operative in the world) and/or that they refer it to a Committee to avoid personal responsibility (OED commit v 2,3,4).

[3] whose Pœan...after it The Roundheads were known for an addiction to the Psalms. A Psalm of Mercy sung on the scaffold. The Roundheads could swing from psalms of praise to psalms of mercy without changing their tune. In this context (of scaffold reference) this sad Solstice of the King's seems more likely to refer to his death than to his giving himself up to the Scots.

[4] mew'd shed; presumably the sense is that the Roundheads' victory is hollow.

[5] The allusion is to Bajazeth in Marlowe's Tamburlaine Part I, IV. ii.

[6] all a-mort sick to death.

[7] sort manner (OED sort sb ^{2} III 21). Only the House of Commons suggests the exclusion of both the monarchy and the Lords, indicating a date after the votes of February 1649 abolishing the monarchy and the House of Lords. In the previous stanza glimmering indicates a faint, that is fading, light; journey-work work done for wages, with connotations of servility and inferiority (OED journey-work).

[8] Lilburn John Lilburne, a political agitator and influential pamphleteer, fought for Parliament from 1642 to 1645, but became disillusioned, as Barry Coward writes, with "the failure of the Long Parliament and the Westminster Assembly to bring about a 'godly reformation'." In 1645 he left the Army and expressed his disillusion in November 1646 with the pamphlet London's Liberty in Chains. It is not easy to say with any certainty what this line means. The e'n (even) reflects the fact that Lilburne had been a supporter of Parliament, but as it stands the line has two problems: (a) the grammatical mood of "take" appears to be optative, but that yields a problematic sense and (b) the meaning of "take" in either case (is it an ellipsis for "take to task"?). I suspect a misprint; if we emend to "takes" that yields a clear indicative sense, and the suggested ellipsis makes sense in relation to events of the first half of 1649. Although Lilburne was in the Tower in May 1649, the Commons took it for granted that the "disorders and mutinies" of that month were "occasioned by his means," and sent 400 men of two regiments known to be hostile to him to guard the Tower. Lilburne and his friends were segregated from other prisoners and "deprived of pen, ink and paper" (Pauline Gregg, Free-born John, London, 1961, 280).

Jeremy Taylor
1613 – 1667

The son of a Cambridge barber, Taylor was educated at Perse School and Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, taking holy orders in 1633 and his M.A. the year following. His eloquence as a substitute preacher at St. Paul's attracted the attention of Archbishop William Laud, who sent Taylor to Oxford, where he was made a fellow of All Souls College. He was chaplain to Laud and Charles I in the late 1630s, and served as chaplain to the King's household in Oxford during the first half of the 1640s (shortly before he was executed, Charles I sent Taylor a watch and some jewels). During a visit to Wales in 1645, he was captured and imprisoned by Parliamentary forces; upon his release he remained in Wales, living with the Earl of Carbery at his estate of Golden Grove in Carmarthenshire. It was during his years at Golden Grove that Taylor produced much of his most important work, including Holy Living (1650) and Holy Dying (1651), as well as many sermons. In 1655 Taylor was arrested once more and briefly imprisoned, for reasons that remain unclear. Two years later he was presented, at the suggestion of John Evelyn, with a lectureship in Lisburn in Ireland, where he would spend much of the remainder of his life; after the Restoration he was made Bishop of Down and Connor, and subsequently of Dromore, though his pleas for an English bishopric went unheeded. His other works include an argument for toleration, A Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying (1647); a life of Christ, The Great Exemplar (1649); XXVIII Sermons Preached at Golden Grove (1651); and XXV Sermons (1653).

For other meditations on death (a subject of both the funeral sermon for Lady Carbery and Holy Dying), see the selections from John Donne's Devotions; for the social role of women and issues connected with childbirth (both touched on in the funeral sermon), see the selections from The Gentlewoman's Companion and Elizabeth Clinton.

* * *

A Funeral Sermon, Preached at the Obsequies of the Right Honourable and Most Virtuous Lady The Lady Frances, Countess of Carbery[1]

For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again; neither doth God respect any person; yet doth he devise means that his banished be not expelled from him.
II Sam. 14:14.

When our blessed Saviour and his disciples viewed the temple, some one amongst them cried out, Magister aspice, quales lapides, "Master, behold what fair, what great stones are here!" Christ made no other reply but foretold their dissolution, and a world of sadness and sorrow which should bury that whole nation, when the teeming cloud of God's displeasure should produce a storm which was the daughter of the biggest anger, and the mother of the greatest calamity which ever crushed any of the sons of Adam, "The time shall come that there shall not be left one stone upon another."[2] The whole temple and the religion, the ceremonies ordained by God, and the nation beloved by God, and the fabric erected for the service of God, shall run to their own period, and lie down in their several graves. Whatsoever had a beginning can also have an ending, and it shall die, unless it be daily watered with the purls flowing from the fountain of life,[1] and refreshed with the dew of heaven, and the wells of God. And therefore God had provided a tree in paradise to have supported Adam in his artificial immortality: immortality was not in his nature, but in the hands and arts, in the favour and superadditions of God. Man was always the same mixture of heat and cold, of dryness and moisture; ever the same weak thing, apt to feel rebellion in the humours, and to suffer the evils of a civil war in his body natural: and therefore health and life was to descend upon him from heaven, and he was to suck life from a tree on earth; himself being but ingraffed into a tree of life, and adopted into the condition of an immortal nature: but he that in the best of his days was but a scion of this tree of life,[2] by his sin was cut off from thence quickly, and planted upon thorns, and his portion was for ever after among the flowers, which today spring and look like health and beauty, and in the evening they are sick, and at night are dead, and the oven is their grave. And as before, even from our first spring from the dust on earth, we might have died if we had not been preserved by the continual flux of a rare providence; so now that we are reduced to the laws of our own nature, "we must needs die." It is natural, and therefore necessary: it is become a punishment to us, and therefore it is unavoidable; and God hath bound the evil upon us by bands of natural and inseparable propriety, and by a supervening unalterable decree of heaven; and we are fallen from our privilege, and are returned to the condition of beasts, and buildings, and common things. And we see temples defiled unto the ground, and they die by sacrilege; and great empires die by their own plenty and ease, full humours, and factious subjects; and huge buildings fall by their own weight, and the violence of many winters eating and consuming the cement, which is the marrow of their bones; and princes die like the meanest of their servants; and every thing finds a grave and a tomb; and the very tomb itself dies by the bigness of its pompousness and luxury,

---

[1] Frances, Countess Carbery (d. 1650) and her husband, Richard Vaughan, second Earl of Carbery (ca. 1600–1686), were Taylor's patrons during the decade he spent in Wales.

[2] Mark 13:1–2. The Latin is from the Vulgate; the English translations are likely Taylor's own.

> ——— Phario nutantia pondera saxo
> Quæ cineri vanus dat ruitura labor[3]

and becomes as friable and uncombined dust as the ashes of the sinner or the saint that lay under it, and is now forgotten in his bed of darkness. And to this catalogue of mortality man is enrolled with a statutum est, "it is appointed for all men once to die, and after death comes judgment." And if a man can be stronger than nature, or can wrestle with a decree of heaven, or can escape from a divine punishment by his own arts, so that neither the power nor the providence of God, nor the laws of nature, nor the bands of eternal predestination can hold him, then he may live beyond the fate and period of flesh, and last longer than a flower: but if all these can hold us and tie us to conditions, then we must lay our heads down upon a turf, and entertain creeping things in the cells and little chambers of our eyes, and dwell with worms till time and death shall be no more. "We must needs die," that's our sentence: but that's not all;—

"We are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again." Stay,

1. We are as water, weak, and of no consistence, always descending, abiding in no certain place, unless where we are detained with violence; and every little breath of wind makes us rough and tempestuous, and troubles our faces; every trifling accident discomposes us; and as the face of the

---

[1] purls small streams (OED purl sb^2 1).

[2] scion a shoot of a plant cut for grafting or planting; by extension, a young descendant, usually of a noble family (OED scion 1, 2). The literal and metaphoric meanings both apply here.

[3] Martial, Epigrams, 1.88: "masses of Parian stone, gifts of vain labor doomed to fall."

waters wafting in a storm so wrinkles itself that it makes upon its forehead furrows deep and hollow like a grave; so do our great and little cares and trifles first make the wrinkles of old age, and then they dig a grave for us: and there is in nature nothing so contemptible, but it may meet with us in such circumstances, that it may be too hard for us in our weaknesses; and the sting of a bee is a weapon sharp enough to pierce the finger of a child or the lip of a man; and those creatures which nature hath left without weapons, yet they are armed sufficiently to vex those parts of men which are left defenceless and obnoxious to a sunbeam, to the roughness of a sour grape, to the unevenness of a gravelstone, to the dust of a wheel, or the unwholesome breath of a star looking awry upon a sinner.

2. But besides the weaknesses and natural decayings of our bodies, if chances and contingencies be innumerable, then no man can reckon our dangers, and the preternatural causes of our death; so that he is a vain person whose hopes of life are too confidently increased by reason of his health: and he is too unreasonably timorous, who thinks his hopes at an end when he dwells in sickness. For men die without rule, and with and without occasions; and no man suspecting or foreseeing any of death's addresses, and no man in his whole condition is weaker than another. A man in a long consumption is fallen under one of the solemnities and preparations to death: but at the same instant the most healthful person is as near death, upon a more fatal and a more sudden, but a less discerned cause. There are but few persons upon whose foreheads every man can read the sentence of death written in the lines of a lingering sickness, but they (sometimes) hear the passing-bell ring for stronger men, even long before their own knell calls at the house of their mother to open her womb, and make a bed for them.... There are sicknesses that walk in darkness, and there are exterminating angels that fly wrapt up in the curtains of immateriality and an uncommunicating nature; whom we cannot see, but we feel their force and sink under their sword, and from heaven the veil descends that wraps our heads in the fatal sentence. There is no age of man but it hath proper to itself some posterns and outlets for death, besides those infinite and open ports out of which myriads of men and women every day pass into the dark, and the land of forgetfulness. Infancy hath life but in effigie,[1] or like a spark dwelling in a pile of wood: the candle is so newly lighted, that every little shaking of the taper, and every ruder breath of air puts it out, and it dies. Childhood is so tender, and yet so unwary; so soft to all the impressions of chance, and yet so forward to run into them, that God knew there could be no security without the care and vigilance of an angel-keeper: and the eyes of parents and the arms of nurses, the provisions of art, and all the effects of human love and providence, are not sufficient to keep one child from horrid mischiefs, from strange and early calamities and deaths, unless a messenger be sent from heaven to stand sentinel, and watch the very playings and sleepings, the eatings and drinkings of the children; and it is a long time before nature makes them capable of help: for there are many deaths, and very many diseases to which poor babes are exposed; but they have but very few capacities of physic: to show that infancy is as liable to death as old age, and equally exposed to danger, and equally incapable of a remedy: with this only difference, that old age hath diseases incurable by nature, and the diseases of childhood are incurable by art: and both the states are the next heirs of death.

3. But all the middle way the case is altered: nature is strong, and art is apt to give ease and remedy, but still there is no security; and there the case is not altered. 1) For there are so many diseases in men that are not understood. 2) So many new ones every year. 3) The old ones are so changed in circumstance, and intermingled with so many collateral complications. 4) The symptoms are oftentimes so alike. 5) Sometimes so hidden and fallacious. 6) Sometimes none at all; as in the most sudden and most dangerous imposthumations.[1] 7) And then, the diseases in the inward parts of the body are oftentimes such to which no application can be made. 8) They are so far off, that the effects of all medicines can no otherwise come to them, than the effect and juices of all meats; that is, not till after two or three alterations and decoctions, which change the very species of the medicament. 9) And after all this, very many principles in the art of physic are so uncertain, that after they have been believed seven or eight ages, and that upon them much of the practice hath been established, they come to be considered by a witty man, and others established in their stead; by which men must practise, and by which three or four generations of men more (as happens) must live or die. 10) And all this while the men are sick, and they take things that certainly make them sicker for the present, and very uncertainly restore health for the future: that it may appear of what a large extent is human calamity, when God's providence hath not only made it weak and miserable upon the certain stock of a various nature, and upon the accidents of an infinite contingency; but even from the remedies which are appointed, our dangers and our troubles are certainly increased: so that we may well be likened to water; our nature is no stronger, our abode no more certain; if the sluices be opened, "it falls away and runneth apace"[Psalm 58:7]; if its current be stopped, it swells and grows troublesome, and spills over with a great diffusion; if it be made to stand still it putrefies: and all this we do. For,

---

[1] That is, infancy has but the form or likeness of life.

4. In all the process of our health we are running to our grave: we open our own sluices by viciousness and unworthy actions; we pour in drink, and let out life; we increase diseases, and know not how to bear them; we strangle ourselves with our own intemperance; we suffer the fevers and the inflammations of lust, and we quench our souls with drunkenness; we bury our understandings in loads of meat and surfeits: and then we lie down upon our beds, and roar with pain and disquietness of our souls: nay, we kill one another's souls and bodies with violence and folly, with the effects of pride and uncharitableness; we live and die like fools, and bring a new mortality upon ourselves; wars and vexatious cares, and private duels and public disorders, and every thing that is unreasonable, and every thing that is violent: so that now we may add this fourth gate to the grave: besides nature—and chance—and the mistakes of art—men die with their own sins, and then enter into the grave in haste and passion, and pull the heavy stone of the monument upon their own heads. And thus we make ourselves like water spilt on the ground; we throw away our lives as if they were unprofitable (and indeed most men make them so), we let our years slip through our fingers like water; and nothing is to be seen, but like a shower of tears upon a spot of ground; there is a grave digged, and a solemn mourning, and a great talk in the neighbourhood, and when the days are finished, they shall be, and they shall be remembered no more: and that's like water too, when it is spilt, "it cannot be gathered up again."

There is no redemption from the grave.

———inter se mortales mutua vivunt,
Et quasi cursores vitai lampada tradunt.[2]

Men live in their course and by turns; their light burns a while, and then it burns blue and faint, and men go to converse with spirits, and then they reach the taper to another; and as the hours of yesterday can never return again, so neither can the man whose hours they were, and who lived them over once, he shall never come to live them again, and live them better....

---

[1] imposthumations swellings or abscesses on the body (OED).

[2] Lucretius, De rerum natura, II.76, 79: "mortal creatures live dependent one upon another, and like runners pass on the torch of life."

This consideration I intend to you as a severe monitor and an advice of carefulness, that you order your affairs so that you may be partakers of the first resurrection; that is, from sin to grace, from the death of vicious habits to the vigour, life, and efficacy of an habitual righteousness. For..."Blessed are they that have part in the first resurrection, upon them the second death shall have no power" [Revelation 20:6]: meaning that they who by the power of Christ and his holy spirit were raised to life again, were holy and blessed souls, and such who were written in the book of God; and that this grace happened to no wicked and vicious person: so it is most true in the spiritual and intended sense: you only that serve God in a holy life; you who are not dead in trespasses and sins; you who serve God with an early diligence and an unwearied industry, and a holy religion, you and you only shall come to life eternal, you only shall be called from death to life; the rest of mankind shall never live again, but pass from death to death; from one death to another, to a worse; from the death of the body to the eternal death of body and soul. And therefore in the apostles' creed there is no mention made of the resurrection of wicked persons, but of "the resurrection of the body to everlasting life."[1] The wicked indeed shall be haled forth from their graves, from their everlasting prisons, where in chains of darkness they are kept unto the judgment of the great day: but this therefore cannot be called in sensu favoris [in the best or true sense] "a resurrection," but the solemnities of the eternal death; it is nothing but a new capacity of dying again; such a dying as cannot signify rest; but where death means nothing but an intolerable and never-ceasing calamity: and therefore these words of my text are otherwise to be understood of the wicked, otherwise of the godly: the wicked are spilt like water and shall never be gathered up again; no, not in the gatherings of eternity; they shall be put into vessels of wrath and set upon the flames of hell; but that is not a gathering but a scattering from the face and presence of God. But the godly also come under the sense of these words: they descend into their graves, and shall no more be reckoned among the living; they have no concernment in all that is done under the sun. Agamemnon hath no more to do with the Turks' armies invading and possessing that part of Greece where he reigned,[2] than had the hippocentaur who never had a being:[3] and Cicero hath no more interest in the present evils of Christendom, than we have to do with his boasted discovery of Catiline's conspiracy.[4] What is it to me that Rome was taken by the Gauls? and what is it now to Camillus if different religions be tolerated amongst us?[5] These things that now happen concern the living, and they are made the scenes of our duty or danger respectively: and when our wives are dead and sleep in charnel-houses, they are not troubled when we laugh loudly at the songs sung at the next marriage-feast; nor do they envy when another snatches away the gleanings of their husbands' passion.

It is true, they envy not, and they lie in a bosom where there can be no murmur; and they that are consigned to kingdoms, and to the feast of the marriage-supper of the Lamb, the glorious and eternal Bridegroom of holy souls, they cannot think our marriages here, our lighter laughings and vain rejoicings, considerable as to them. And yet there is a relation continued still: Aristotle said that to affirm the dead take no thought for the good of the living, is a disparagement to the laws of that friendship which in their state of separation they cannot be tempted to rescind.[1] And the church hath taught in general that they pray for us, they recommend to God the state of all their relatives, in the union of the intercession that our blessed Lord makes for them and us; and S. Ambrose gave some things in charge to his dying brother Satyrus, that he should do for him in the other world: he gave it him, I say, when he was dying, not when he was dead. And certain it is that though our dead friends' affection to us is not to be estimated according to our low conceptions, yet it is not less, but much more than ever it was; it is greater in degree, and of another kind.

---

[1] apostles' creed a fourth-century statement of faith included in the Anglican liturgy.

[2] Agamemnon in Homer, the King of Mycenae and commander of the Greek army against Troy.

[3] hippocentaur centaur; a creature part man, part horse.

[4] Cicero made his "boasted discovery" in his oration On Catiline.

[5] Camillus the saviour of Rome after the Gallic invasion (387/6 B.C.E.).

But then we should do well also to remember that in this world we are something besides flesh and blood; that we may not without violent necessities run into new relations, but preserve the affections we bore to our dead when they were alive. We must not so live as if they were perished, but so as pressing forward to the most intimate participation of the communion of saints. And we also have some ways to express this relation, and to bear a part in this communion, by actions of intercourse with them, and yet proper to our state: such as are, strictly performing the will of the dead, providing for, and tenderly and wisely educating their children, paying their debts, imitating their good example, preserving their memories privately, and publicly keeping their memorials, and desiring of God with hearty and constant prayer that God would give them a joyful resurrection, and a merciful judgment (for so S. Paul prayed in behalf of Onesiphorus), that "God would show them mercy in that day" [II Timothy 1:18], that fearful, and yet much to be desired day, in which the most righteous person hath need of much mercy and pity, and shall find it. Now these instances of duty show that the relation remains still; and though the relict of a man or woman hath liberty to contract new relations,[2] yet I do not find they have liberty to cast off the old, as if there were no such thing as immortality of souls. Remember that we shall converse together again; let us therefore never do any thing of reference to them which we shall be ashamed of in the day when all secrets shall be discovered, and that we shall meet again in the presence of God: in the mean time, God watcheth concerning all their interest, and he will in his time both discover and recompense. For though, as to us, they are like water spilt; yet to God they are as water fallen into the sea, safe and united in his comprehension and inclosures.

But we are not yet past the consideration of the sentence. This descending to the grave is the lot of all men, "neither doth God respect the person of any man"; the rich is not protected for favour, nor the poor for pity, the old man is not reverenced for his age, nor the infant regarded for his tenderness; youth and beauty, learning and prudence, wit and strength, lie down equally in the dishonours of the grave. All men, and all natures, and all persons resist the addresses and solemnities of death, and strive to preserve a miserable and unpleasant life; and yet they all sink down and die. For so have I seen the pillars of a building assisted with artificial props bending under the pressure of a roof, and pertinaciously resisting the infallible and prepared ruin,

Donec longa dies omni compage soluta
Ipsum cum rebus subruat auxilium,[3]

---

[1] Nicomachean Ethics, 1.11.

[2] relict widow or widower (OED relict sb 2).

[3] Maximianus, Elegies, I.173–74: "right then long time destroys our careful efforts, brings down the building with the props we fashioned."

till the determined day comes, and then the burden sunk upon the pillars, and disordered the aids and auxiliary rafters into a common ruin and a ruder grave: so are the desires and weak arts of man; with little aids and assistances of care and physic we strive to support our decaying bodies, and to put off the evil day; but quickly that day will come, and then neither angels nor men can rescue us from our grave; but the roof sinks down upon the walls, and the walls descend to the foundation; and the beauty of the face, and the dishonours of the belly, the discerning head and the servile feet, the thinking heart and the working hand, the eyes and the guts together shall be crushed into the confusion of a heap, and dwell with creatures of an equivocal production, with worms and serpents, the sons and daughters of our own bones, in a house of dirt and darkness.

. . . .

I have now done with my text, but yet am to make you another sermon. I have told you the necessity and the state of death, it may be, too largely for such a sad story; I shall therefore now with a better compendium teach you how to live,[1] by telling you a plain narrative of a life, which if you imitate, and write after the copy, it will make that death shall not be an evil, but a thing to be desired, and to be reckoned amongst the purchases and advantages of your fortune. When Martha and Mary went to weep over the grave of their brother, Christ met them there, and preached a funeral sermon, discoursing of the resurrection, and applying to the purposes of faith, and confession of Christ, and glorification of God [John 11:17–27]. We have no other, we can have no better precedent to follow: and now that we are come to weep over the grave of our dear sister, this rare personage, we cannot choose but have many virtues to learn, many to imitate, and some to exercise.

1. I chose, not to declare her extraction and genealogy; it was indeed fair and honourable; but having the blessing to be descended from worthy and honoured ancestors, and herself to be adopted and ingraffed into a more noble family; yet she felt such outward appendages to be none of hers, because not of her choice, but the purchase of the virtues of others, which although they did engage her to do noble things, yet they would upbraid all degenerate and less honourable lives than were those which began and increased the honour of the families. She did not love her fortune for making her noble; but thought it would be a dishonour to her if she did not continue a nobleness and excellency of virtue fit to be owned by persons relating to such ancestors. It is fit for us all to honour the nobleness of a family: but it is also fit for them that are noble to despise it, and to establish their honour upon the foundation of doing excellent things, and suffering in good causes, and despising dishonourable actions, and in communicating good things to others. For this is the rule in nature; those creatures are most honourable which have the greatest power, and do the greatest good: and accordingly myself have been a witness of it, how this excellent lady would by an act of humility and Christian abstraction strip herself of all that fair appendage and exterior honour which decked her person and her fortune, and desired to be owned by nothing but what was her own, that she might only be esteemed honourable according to that which is the honour of a Christian and a wise person.

2. She had a strict and severe education, and it was one of God's graces and favours to her: for being the heiress of a great fortune, and living amongst the throng of persons in the sight of vanities and empty temptations, that is, in that part of the kingdom where greatness is too often expressed in great follies and great vices, God had provided a severe and angry education to chastise the forwardness of a young spirit and a fair fortune, that she might for ever be so far distant from a vice, that she might only see it and loathe it, but never taste of it, so much as to be put to her choice whether she be virtuous or no. God, intending to secure this soul to himself, would not suffer the follies of the world to seize upon her by way of too near a trial or busy temptation.

---

[1] compendium an abbreviation, perhaps also with the Latin implication of a saving or profit (OED).

3. She was married young; and besides her business of religion, seemed to be ordained in the providence of God to bring to this honourable family a part of a fair fortune, and to leave behind her a fairer issue, worth ten thousand times her portion: and as if this had been all the public business of her life, when she had so far served God's ends, God in mercy would also serve hers, and take her to an early blessedness.

4. In passing through which line of providence, she had the art to secure her eternal interest, by turning her condition into duty, and expressing her duty in the greatest eminency of a virtuous, prudent, and rare affection, that hath been known in any example. I will not give her so low a testimony, as to say only that she was chaste; she was a person of that severity, modesty, and close religion, as to that particular, that she was not capable of uncivil temptation; and you might as well have suspected the sun to smell of the poppy that he looks on, as that she could have been a person apt to be sullied by the breath of a foul question.

5. But that which I shall note in her, is that which I would have exemplar to all ladies, and to all women: she had a love so great for her lord, so entirely given up to a dear affection, that she thought the same things, and loved the same loves, and hated according to the same enmities, and breathed in his soul, and lived in his presence, and languished in his absence; and all that she was or did, was only for and to her dearest lord:

Si gaudet, si flet, si tacet, hunc loquitur;
Cœnat, propinat, poscit, negat, innuit; unus
Nævius est;——[1]

And although this was a great enamel to the beauty of her soul, yet it might in some degrees be also a reward to the virtue of her lord: for she would often discourse it to them that conversed with her, that he would improve that interest which he had in her affection to the advantages of God and of religion; and she would delight to say, that he called her to her devotions, he encouraged her good inclinations, he directed her piety, he invited her with good books; and then she loved religion, which she saw was not only pleasing to God, and an act or state of duty, but pleasing to her lord, and an act also of affection and conjugal obedience; and what at first she loved the more forwardly for his sake, in the using of religion, left such relishes upon her spirit, that she found in it amiability enough to make her love it for its own. So God usually brings us to him by instruments of nature and affections, and then incorporates us into his inheritance by the more immediate relishes of heaven, and the secret things of the Spirit. He only was (under God) the light of her eyes, and the cordial of her spirits, and the guide of her actions, and the measure of her affections, till her affections swelled up into a religion, and then it could go no higher, but was confederate with those other duties which made her dear to God: which rare combination of duty and religion I choose to express in the words of Solomon, "She forsook not the guide of her youth, nor brake the covenant of her God" [Proverbs 2:17].

6. As she was a rare wife, so she was an excellent mother: for in so tender a constitution of spirit as hers was, and in so great a kindness towards her children, there hath seldom been seen a stricter and more curious care of their persons, their deportment, their nature, their disposition, their learning, and their customs: and if ever kindness and care did contest, and make parties in her, yet her care and her severity was ever victorious; and she knew not how to do an ill turn to their severer part, by her more tender and forward kindness. And as her custom was, she turned this also into love to her lord: for she was not only diligent to have them bred nobly and religiously, but also was careful and solicitous that they should be taught to observe all the circumstances and inclinations, the desires and wishes of their father; as thinking that virtue to have no good circumstances, which was not dressed by his copy, and ruled by his lines, and his affections. And her prudence in the managing her children was so singular and rare, that whenever you mean to bless this family, and pray a hearty and a profitable prayer for it, beg of God that the children may have those excellent things which she designed to them, and provided for them in her heart and wishes, that they may live by her purposes, and may grow thither whither she would fain have brought them. All these were great parts of an excellent religion, as they concerned her greatest temporal relations.

---

[1] Martial, Epigrams, 1.6: "if glad, if fearful, if mute, of her he speaks. He dines, drinks healths, asks, denies, or nods: Naevia is everything."

7. But if we examine how she demeaned herself towards God, there also you will find her not of a common, but of an exemplar piety. She was a great reader of Scripture, confining herself to great portions every day; which she read not to the purposes of vanity and impertinent curiosities, not to seem knowing or to become talking, not to expound and rule; but to teach her all her duty, to instruct her in the knowledge and love of God and of her neighbours; to make her more humble, and to teach her to despise the world and all its gilded vanities; and that she might entertain passions wholly in design and order to heaven. I have seen a female religion that wholly dwelt upon the face and tongue; that like a wanton and an undressed tree spends all its juice in suckers and irregular branches, in leaves and gum, and after all such goodly outsides you should never eat an apple, or be delighted with the beauties or the perfumes of a hopeful blossom. But the religion of this excellent lady was of another constitution; it took root downward in humility, and brought forth fruit upward in the substantial graces of a Christian, in charity and justice, in chastity and modesty, in fair friendships and sweetness of society. She had not very much of the forms and outsides of godliness, but she was hugely careful for the power of it, for the moral, essential, and useful parts; such which would make her be, not seem to be, religious.

8. She was a very constant person at her prayers, and spent all her time which nature did permit to her choice, in her devotions, and reading and meditating, and the necessary offices of household government; every one of which is an action of religion, some by nature, some by adoption. To these also God gave her a very great love to hear the word of God preached; in which because I had sometimes the honour to minister to her, I can give this certain testimony, that she was a diligent, watchful, and attentive hearer: and to this had so excellent a judgment, that if ever I saw a woman whose judgment was to be revered, it was hers alone: and I have sometimes thought that the eminency of her discerning faculties did reward a pious discourse, and placed it in the regions of honour and usefulness, and gathered it up from the ground, where commonly such homilies are spilt, or scattered in neglect and inconsideration. But her appetite was not soon satisfied with what was useful to her soul: she was also a constant reader of sermons, and seldom missed to read one every day; and that she might be full of instruction and holy principles, she had lately designed to have a large book, in which she purposed to have a stock of religion transcribed in such assistances as she would choose, that she might be "readily furnished and instructed to every good work."[1] But God prevented that, and hath filled her desires, not out of cisterns and little aqueducts, but hath carried her to the fountain, where she "drinks of the pleasure of the river" [Psalm 36:8] and is full of God.

9. She always lived a life of much innocence, free from the violences of great sins: her person, her breeding, her modesty, her honour, her religion, her early marriage, the guide of her soul, and the guide of her youth, were as so many fountains of restraining grace to her, to keep her from the dishonours of a crime. Bonum est portare jugum ab adolescentia, "it is good to bear the yoke of the Lord from our youth" [Lamentations 3:27]; and though she did so, being guarded by a mighty providence, and a great favour and grace of God from staining her fair soul with the spots of hell, yet she had strange fears and early cares upon her, but these were not only for herself, but in order to others, to her nearest relatives. For she was so great a lover of this honourable family of which now she was a mother, that she desired to become a channel of great blessings to it unto future ages, and was extremely jealous lest any thing should be done, or lest any thing had been done, though an age or two since, which should entail a curse upon the innocent posterity; and therefore (although I do not know that ever she was tempted with an offer of the crime) yet she did infinitely remove all sacrilege from her thoughts, and delighted to see her estate of a clear and disentangled interest: she would have no mingled rights with it; she would not receive any thing from the church, but religion and a blessing: and she never thought a curse and a sin far enough off, but would desire it to be infinitely distant; and that as to this family God had given much honour and a wise head to govern it, so he would also for ever give many more blessings: and because she knew the sins of parents descend upon children, she endeavoured by justice and religion, by charity and honour to secure that her channel should convey nothing but health, and a fair example and a blessing.

10. And though her accounts to God was made up of nothing but small parcels, little passions, and angry words, and trifling discontents, which are the allays of the piety of the most holy persons; yet she was early at her repentance; and toward the latter end of her days, grew so fast in religion, as if she had had a revelation of her approaching end, and therefore that she must go a great way in a little time: her discourses more full of religion, her prayers more frequent, her charity increasing, her forgiveness more forward, her friendships more communicative, her passion more under discipline; and so she trimmed her lamp, not thinking her night was so near, but that it might shine also in the daytime, in the temple, and before the altar of incense.

But in this course of hers, there were some circumstances, and some appendages of substance, which were highly remarkable.

1. In all her religion, and in all her actions of relation towards God, she had a strange evenness and untroubled passage, sliding toward her ocean of God and of infinity with a certain and silent motion. So have I seen a river deep and smooth passing with a still foot and a sober face, and paying to the fiscus,[2] the great exchequer of the sea, the prince of all the watery bodies, a tribute large and full: and hard by it a little brook skipping and making a noise upon its unequal and neighbour bottom: and after all its talking and bragged motion, it paid to its common audit no more than the revenues of a little cloud, or a contemptible vessel. So have I sometimes compared the issues of her religion to the solemnities and famed outsides of another's piety; it dwelt upon her spirit, and was incorporated with

---

[1] II Timothy 3:17. The "large book" would have had blank pages for manuscript transcription of passages from other texts.

[2] fiscus state treasury (Latin).

the periodical work of every day; she did not believe that religion was intended to minister to fame and reputation, but to pardon of sins, to the pleasures of God, and the salvation of souls. For religion is like the breath of heaven; if it goes abroad into the open air, it scatters and dissolves like camphor: but if it enters into a secret hollowness, into a close conveyance, it is strong and mighty, and comes forth with vigour and great effect at the other end, at the other side of this life, in the days of death and judgment.

2. The other appendage of her religion, which also was a great ornament to all the parts of her life, was a rare modesty and humility of spirit, a confident despising and undervaluing of herself. For though she had the greatest judgment, and the greatest experience of things and persons that I ever yet knew in a person of her youth, and sex, and circumstances; yet as if she knew nothing of it, she had the meanest opinion of herself; and like a fair taper, when she shined to all the room, yet round about her own station she had cast a shadow and a cloud, and she shined to everybody but herself. But the perfectness of her prudence and excellent parts could not be hid; and all her humility and arts of concealment, made the virtues more amiable and illustrious. For as pride sullies the beauty of the fairest virtues, and makes our understanding but like the craft and learning of a devil: so humility is the greatest eminency and art of publication in the whole world; and she in all her arts of secrecy and hiding her worthy things, was but "like one that hideth the wind, and covers the ointment of her right hand" [Proverbs 27:16].

I know not by what instrument it happened; but when death drew near, before it made any show upon her body or revealed itself by a natural signification, it was conveyed to her spirit: she had a strange secret persuasion that the bringing this child should be her last scene of life: and we have known, that the soul when she is about to disrobe herself of her upper garment, sometimes speaks rarely,

Magnifica verba mors prope admota excutit;[1]

sometimes it is prophetical; sometimes God by a superinduced persuasion wrought by instruments or accidents of his own, serves the ends of his own providence and the salvation of the soul. But so it was, that the thought of death dwelt long with her, and grew from the first steps of fancy and fear, to a consent, from thence to a strange credulity and expectation of it; and without the violence of sickness she died, as if she had done it voluntarily, and by design, and for fear her expectation should have been deceived, or that she should seem to have had an unreasonable fear, or apprehension; or rather (as one said of Cato) sic abiit e vita ut causam moriendi nactam se esse gauderet, "she died, as if she had been glad of the opportunity."[2]

And in this I cannot but adore the providence, and admire the wisdom and infinite mercies of God. For having a tender and soft, a delicate and fine constitution and breeding, she was tender to pain, and apprehensive of it, as a child's shoulder is of a load and burden. Grave est teneræ cervici jugum:[3] and in her often discourses of death, which she would renew willingly and frequently, she would tell, that she feared not death, but she feared the sharp pains of death. Emori nolo, me esse mortuam non curo;[4] the being dead, and being freed from the troubles and dangers of this world, she hoped would be for her advantage, and therefore that was no part of her fear: but she believing the pangs of death were great, and the use and aids of reason little, had reason to fear lest they should do violence to her spirit and the decency of her resolution. But God, that knew her fears and her jealousy concerning herself, fitted her with a death so easy, so harmless, so painless, that it did not put her patience to a severe trial. It was not (in all appearance) of so much trouble as two fits of a common ague; so careful was God to remonstrate to all that stood in that sad attendance that this soul was dear to him: and that since she had done so much of her duty towards it, he that began would also finish her redemption, by an act of a rare providence, and a singular mercy. Blessed be that goodness of God, who does so careful actions of mercy for the ease and security of his servants. But this one instance was a great demonstration that the apprehension of death is worse than the pains of death; and that God loves to reprove the unreasonableness of our fears, by the mightiness, and by the arts of his mercy.

---

[1] Seneca, Troades, 1.575: "when death draws near it drives out boastful words."

[2] Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, 1.30.74.

[3] Seneca, On Providence, IV.7: "to the tender neck the yoke is heavy."

[4] Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, 1.8.15 (quoting Epicharmus): "Dying I shun; of being dead I nothing reck."

She had in her sickness (if I may so call it, or rather in the solemnities and graver preparations towards death) some curious and well-becoming fears, concerning the final state of her soul: but from thence she passed into a deliquium, or a kind of trance, and as soon as she came forth of it, as if it had been a vision, or that she had conversed with an angel, and from his hand had received a label or scroll of the book of life, and there seen her name enrolled, she cried out aloud, "Glory be to God on high; now I am sure I shall be saved." Concerning which manner of discoursing we are wholly ignorant what judgment can be made: but certainly there are strange things in the other world; and so there are in all the immediate preparations to it; and a little glimpse of heaven, a minute's conversing with an angel, any ray of God, any communication extraordinary from the Spirit of comfort, which God gives to his servants in strange and unknown manners, are infinitely far from illusions; and they shall then be understood by us, when we feel them, and when our new and strange needs shall be refreshed by such unusual visitations.

But I must be forced to use summaries and arts of abbreviature in the enumerating those things in which this rare personage was dear to God and to all her relatives.

If we consider her person, she was in the flower of her age, of a temperate, plain and natural diet, without curiosity or an intemperate palate; she spent less time in dressing than many servants; her recreations were little and seldom, her prayers often, her reading much: she was of a most noble and charitable soul; a great lover of honourable actions, and as great a despiser of base things; hugely loving to oblige others, and very unwilling to be in arrear to any upon the stock of courtesies and liberality; so free in all acts of favour, that she would not stay to hear herself thanked, as being unwilling that what good went from her to a needful or an obliged person should ever return to her again; she was an excellent friend, and hugely dear to very many, especially to the best and most discerning persons; to all that conversed with her, and could understand her great worth and sweetness: she was of an honourable, a nice, and tender reputation; and of the pleasures of this world, which were laid before her in heaps, she took a very small and inconsiderable share, as not loving to glut herself with vanity, or take her portion of good things here below.

Jucundum quum ætas florida ver ageret;[1]

If we look on her as a wife, she was chaste and loving, fruitful and discreet, humble and pleasant, witty and compliant, rich and fair; and wanted nothing to the making her a principal and precedent to the best wives of the world, but a long life, and a full age.

If we remember her as a mother, she was kind and severe, careful and prudent, very tender, and not at all fond, a greater lover of her children's souls than of their bodies, and one that would value them more by the strict rules of honour and proper worth, than by their relation to herself.

---

[1] Catullus 68, l. 16: "when my youth in its flower was keeping jocund spring-time."

Her servants found her prudent, and fit to govern, and yet open-handed, and apt to reward; a just exactor of their duty, and a great rewarder of their diligence.

She was in her house a comfort to her dearest lord, a guide to her children, a rule to her servants, an example to all.

But as she related to God in the offices of religion, she was even and constant, silent and devout, prudent and material; she loved what she now enjoys, and she feared what she never felt, and God did for her what she never did expect: her fears went beyond all her evil; and yet the good which she hath received was, and is, and ever shall be beyond all her hopes.

She lived as we all should live and she died as I fain would die;

> Et cum supremos Lachesis perneverit annos,
> Non aliter cineres mando jacere meos.[1]

I pray God I may feel those mercies on my deathbed that she felt, and that I may feel the same effect of my repentance which she feels of the many degrees of her innocence. Such was her death, that she did not die too soon; and her life was so useful and so excellent, that she could not have lived too long. Nemo parum diu vixit qui virtutis perfectœ perfecto functus et munere.[2] And as now in the grave it shall not be enquired concerning her, how long she lived, but how well; so to us who live after her, to suffer a longer calamity, it may be some ease to our sorrows, and some guide to our lives, and some security to our conditions, to consider that God hath brought the piety of a young lady to the early rewards of a never ceasing and never dying eternity of glory. And we also, if we live as she did, shall partake of the same glories; not only having the honour of a good name, and a dear and honoured memory, but the glories of these glories, the end of all excellent labours, and all prudent counsels, and all holy religion, even the salvation of our souls in that day when all the saints, and amongst them this excellent woman, shall be shown to all the world to have done more, and more excellent things than we know of or can describe. Mors illos consecrat, quorum exitum et qui timent, laudant, "death consecrates and makes sacred that person whose excellency was such, that they that are not displeased at the death, and cannot dispraise the life; but they that mourn sadly, think they can never commend sufficiently."[3]

—1650

Holy Living and Holy Dying
(excerpts)

The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living

CHAP. I.
Consideration of the general instruments, and means serving to a holy life: by way of introduction

It is necessary that every man should consider, that since God hath given him an excellent nature, wisdom and choice, an understanding soul, and an immortal spirit, having made him Lord over the beasts, and but a little lower than the angels; he hath also appointed for him a work and a service great enough to employ those abilities, and hath also designed him to a state of life after this, to which he can only arrive by that service and obedience. And therefore as every man is wholly God's own portion by the title of creation: so all our labours and care, all our powers and faculties must be wholly employed in the service of God, even all the days of our life, that this life being ended, we may live with him for ever.

---

[1] Martial, Epigrams, 1.88: "when Lachesis shall spin my last years out, I charge that my ashes lie thus and not otherwise."

[2] Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, 1.45.109: "No one has lived too short a life who has discharged the perfect work of perfect virtue."

[3] Seneca, On Providence, 2; more literally, "death consecrates those whose end even those who fear must praise."

Neither is it sufficient that we think of the service of God as a work of the least necessity, or of small employment; but that it be done by us as God intended it; that it be done with great earnestness and passion, with much zeal and desire: that we refuse no labour, that we bestow upon it much time, that we use the best guides, and arrive at the end of glory by all the ways of grace, of prudence and religion.

And indeed if we consider how much of our lives is taken up by the needs of nature, how many years are wholly spent before we come to any use of reason, how many years more before that reason is useful to us to any great purposes, how imperfect our discourse is made by our evil education, false principles, ill company, bad examples, and want of experience; how many parts of our wisest and best years are spent in eating and sleeping, in necessary businesses, and unnecessary vanities, in worldly civilities, and less useful circumstances, in the learning arts and sciences, languages or trades; that little portion of hours that is left for the practises of piety and religious walking with God, is so short and trifling, that were not the goodness of God infinitely great, it might seen unreasonable or impossible for us to expect of him eternal joys in heaven, even after the well spending those few minutes which are left for God, and God's service, after we have served ourselves, and our own occasions.

And yet it is considerable, that the fruit which comes from the many days of recreation and vanity is very little, and although we scatter much, yet we gather but little profit: but from the few hours we spend in prayer and the exercises of a pious life, the return is great and profitable; and what we sow in the minutes and spare portions of a few years, grows up to crowns and sceptres in a happy and a glorious eternity.

1. Therefore, although it cannot be enjoined, that the greatest part of our time be spent in the direct actions of devotion and religion, yet it will become, not only a duty, but also a great providence to lay aside for the services of God, and the businesses of the Spirit as much as we can: because God rewards our minutes with long and eternal happinesses; and the greater portion of our time we give to God, the more we treasure up for ourselves; and No man is a better merchant than he that lays out his time upon God, and his money upon the poor.

2. Only it becomes us to remember and to adore God's goodness for it, that God hath not only permitted us to serve the necessities of our nature, but hath made them to become parts of our duty; that if we by directing these actions to the glory of God intend them as instruments to continue our persons in his service, he by adopting them into religion may turn our nature into grace, and accept our natural actions, as actions of religion. God is pleased to esteem it for a part of his service, if we eat or drink; so it be done temperately, and as may best preserve our health, that our health may enable our services towards him: And there is no one minute of our lives (after we are come to the use of reason) but we are, or may be doing the work of God, even then when we most of all serve ourselves.

3. To which if we add, that in these and all other actions of our lives we always stand before God, acting, and speaking and thinking in his presence, and that it matters not that our conscience is sealed with secrecy, since it lies open to God, it will concern us to behave ourselves carefully, as in the presence of our judge.

These three considerations rightly managed, and applied to the several parts and instances of our lives, will be like Elisha stretched upon the child [I

Kings 17:17–22], apt to put life and quickness into every part of it, and to make us live the life of grace, and do the work of God.

. . . .

—1650

The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying

CHAP. 2
A general preparation towards a holy and blessed death, by way of exercise

SECT. 1
Three precepts preparatory to a holy death to be practised in our whole life

1. He that would die well must always look for death, every day knocking at the gates of the grave,[1] and then the gates of the grave shall never prevail upon him to do him mischief. This was the advice of all the wise and good men of the world; who especially in the days and periods of their joy and festival egressions chose to throw some ashes into their chalices,[2] some sober remembrances of their fatal period. Such was the black shirt of Saladine, the tombstone presented to the Emperor of Constantinople on his Coronation day; the Bishop of Rome's two reeds with flax and wax taper, the Egyptian skeleton served up at feasts,[3] and Trimalchio's banquet in Petronius,[4] in which was brought in the image of a dead man's bones of silver with spondiles exactly turning to every of the guests,[5] and saying to everyone, that you, and you must die, and look not one upon another, for everyone is equally concerned in this sad representment. These in phantastic semblances declare a severe counsel and useful meditation; and it is not easy for a man to be gay in his imagination, or to be drunk with joy or wine, pride or revenge, who considers sadly that he must ere long dwell in a house of darkness and dishonour, and his body must be the inheritance of worms, and his soul must be what he pleases, even as a man makes it here by his living good or bad. I have read of a young hermit who being passionately in love with a young lady could not by all the arts of religion and mortification suppress the trouble of that fancy, till at last being told that she was dead and had been buried about fourteen days, he went secretly to her vault, and with the skirt of his mantle wiped the moisture from the carcase, and still at the return of his temptation laid it before him, saying, Behold this is the beauty of the woman thou didst so much desire; and so the man found his cure.[6] And if we make death as present to us, our own death, dwelling and dressed in all its pomp of fancy and proper circumstances, if anything will quench the heats of lust, or the desires of money, or the greedy passionate affections of this world, this must do it. But withall, the frequent use of this meditation, by curing our present inordinations will make death safe and friendly, and by its very custom will make that the King of terrors shall come to us without his affrighting dresses; and that we shall sit down in the grave as we compose ourselves to sleep, and do the duties of nature and choice. The old people that lived near the Riphæan mountains, were taught to converse with death, and to handle it on all sides and to discourse of it, as of a thing that will

---

[1] Taylor cites Seneca, Epistle CI.8, 10: "Begin at once to live, and count each separate day as a separate life" and "a day differs not a whit from eternity"; and Martial, Epigrams, IV.liv.3–4: "If thou art wise, use to the full, Collinus, all thy days, and ever deem that each day is thy last."

[2] egressions processions.

[3] Saladine...Egyptian skeleton Taylor's source for these four allusions to the use of objects as reminders of death (the memento mori tradition) was Philipp Camerarius, The Walking Library, trans. (from Latin) by John Molle (1621 and later eds.), I.xii.35–36.

[4] Trimalchio's banquet is in Petronius, Satyricon, 34.

[5] spondiles vertebrae (OED spondyle).

[6] Taylor's source for this story remains unidentified.

certainly come, and ought so to do.[1] Thence their minds and resolutions became capable of death, and they thought it a dishonourable thing, with greediness to keep a life that must go from us, to lay aside its thorns, and to return again circled with a glory and a diadem.

2. He that would die well must all the days of his life lay up against the day of death,[2] not only by the general provisions of holiness and a pious life indefinitely, but, provisions proper to the necessities of that great day of expense, in which a man is to throw his last cast for an eternity of joys or sorrows; ever remembering, that this alone well performed is not enough to pass us into Paradise, but that alone done foolishly is enough to send us to hell; and the want of either a holy life, or death, makes a man to fall short of the mighty price of our high calling. In order to this rule we are to consider what special graces we shall then need to exercise, and by the proper arts of the Spirit, by a heap of proportioned arguments, by prayers, and a great treasure of devotion laid up in Heaven, provide before hand a reserve of strength and mercy. Men in the course of their lives walk lazily and incuriously as if they had both their feet in one shoe, and when they are passively revolved to the time of their dissolution they have no mercies in store, no patience, no faith, no charity to God, or despite of the world, being without gust or appetite for the land of their inheritance, which Christ with so much pain and blood had purchased for them. When we come to die indeed, we shall be very much put to it to stand firm upon the two feet of a Christian, faith and patience. When we ourselves are to use the articles, to turn our former discourses into present practise, and to feel what we never felt before, we shall find it to be quite another thing to be willing presently to quit this life, and all our present possessions for the hopes of a thing which we were never suffered to see, and such a thing of which we may fail so many ways, and of which if we fail anyway we are miserable forever. Then we shall find how much we have need to have secured the Spirit of God, and the grace of faith by an habitual, perfect unmovable resolution. The same also is the case of patience, which will be assaulted with sharp pains, disturbed fancies, great fears, want of a present mind, natural weaknesses, frauds of the Devil, and a thousand accidents and imperfections. It concerns us therefore highly in the whole course of our lives, not only to accustom ourselves to a patient suffering of injuries and affronts, of persecutions and losses, of cross accidents and unnecessary circumstances; but also by representing death as present to us, to consider with what arguments then to fortify our patience; and by assiduous and fervent prayer to God, all our life long call upon God to give us patience, and great assistances, a strong faith and a confirmed hope, the Spirit of God, and his Holy angels' assistants at that time, to resist and to subdue the devil's temptations and assaults; and so to fortify our hearts that it break not into intolerable sorrows and impatience, and end in wretchlessness and infidelity.[3] But this is to be the work of our life, and not to be done at once; but as God gives us time by succession, by parts and little periods. For it is very remarkable that God who giveth plenteously to all creatures, he hath scattered the firmament with stars as a man sows corn in his fields, in a multitude bigger than the capacities of humane order; he hath made so much variety of creatures, and gives us great choice of meats and drinks, although any one of both kinds would have served our needs; and so in all instances of nature; yet in the distribution of our time, God seems to be strait-

---

[1] Taylor cites Lucan, Pharsalia, I.458–62. In classical writing, the Riphæan mountains were a mythical range north of the known parts of Europe.

[2] Taylor cites Seneca, Epistle CI.8: "one who daily puts the finishing touches to his life is never in want of time."

[3] wretchlessness recklessness (OED).

handed, and gives it to us, not as nature gives us rivers, enough to drown us, but drop by drop, minute after minute, so that we never can have two minutes together, but he takes away one when he gives us another. This should teach us to value our time, since God so values it, and by his so small distribution of it, tells us, it is the most precious thing we have. Since therefore in the day of our death, we can have but still the same little portion of this precious time, let us in every minute of our life, I mean, in every discernable portion lay up such a stock of reason and good works, that they may convey a value to the imperfect and shorter actions of our death-bed; while God rewards the piety of our lives by his gracious acceptation and benediction, upon the actions preparatory to our death-bed.

3. He that desires to die well and happily, above all things must be careful, that he do not live a soft, a delicate and voluptuous life; but a life severe, holy, and under the discipline of the cross; under the conduct of prudence and observation, a life of warfare and sober counsels, labour and watchfulness. No man wants cause of tears and a daily sorrow. Let every man consider what he feels and acknowledge his misery; let him confess his sin and chastise it; let him bear his cross patiently, and his persecutions nobly, and his repentances willingly and constantly; let him pity the evils of all the world, and bear his share of the calamities of his brother; let him long and sigh for the joys of Heaven; let him tremble and fear because he hath deserved the pains of hell; let him commute his eternal fear with a temporal suffering, preventing God's judgement by passing one of his own; let him groan for the labours of his pilgrimage, and the dangers of his warfare; and by that time he hath summed up all these labours; and duties, and contingencies, all the proper causes, instruments and acts of sorrow, he will find, that for a secular joy and wantonness of spirit, there are not left many void spaces of his life. It was Saint James's advice; "Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep; let your laughter be turned into mourning, and your joy into weeping" [James 4:9]: And Bonaventure in the life of Christ, reports that the H. Virgin Mother said to S. Elizabeth, "That Grace does not descend into the soul of a man but by prayer and by affliction."[1] Certain it is, that a mourning spirit, and an afflicted body are great instruments of reconciling God to a sinner, and they always dwell at the gates of atonement and restitution. But besides this; a delicate and prosperous life is hugely contrary to the hopes of a blessed eternity. "Woe be to them that are at ease in Sion" [Amos 6:1]; so it was said of old; and our B. Lord said, "Woe be to you that laugh, for you shall weep" [Luke 6:25]: but "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted" [Matthew 5:4]. Here or hereafter we must have our portion of sorrows. He that now goeth on his way weeping and beareth forth good seed with him, shall doubtless come again with joy, and bring his sheaves with him [Psalm 126:6]. And certainly , he that sadly considers the portion of Dives [Luke 16:19–31], and remembers that the account which Abraham gave him for the unavoidableness of his torment, was because he had his good things in this life, must in all reason, with trembling run from a course of banquets, and faring deliciously every day, as being a dangerous estate, and a consignation to an evil greater than all danger, the pains and torment of unhappy souls. If either by patience or repentance, by compassion or persecution, by choice or by conformity, by severity or discipline, we allay the festival follies of a soft life, and profess under the cross of Christ, we shall more willingly and more safely enter into our grave: But the death-bed of a voluptuous man upbraids his little and cozening prosperities, and exacts pains made sharper by the passing from soft beds, and a softer mind. He that would die holily and happily,

---

[1] St. Bonaventure, Meditationes vitae Christi, sect. 3.

must in this world love tears, humility, solitude and repentance.[1]

SECT. 2

Of daily examination of our actions, in the whole course of our health, preparatory to our death-bed

He that will die well and happily, must dress his soul by a diligent and frequent scrutiny: He must perfectly understand, and watch the state of his soul; he must set his house in order before he be fit to die. And for this there is great reason, and great necessity.

Reasons for a daily examination

1. For if we consider the disorders of every day, the multitude of impertinent words, the great portions of time spent in vanity, the daily omissions of duty, the coldness of our prayers, the indifference of our spirit in holy things, the uncertainty of our secret purposes, our infinite deceptions and hypocrisies, sometimes not known, very often not observed by ourselves; our want of charity, our not knowing in how many degrees of action and purpose every virtue is to be exercised, the secret adherencies of pride, and too forward complacency in our best actions, our failings in all our relations, the niceties of difference between some virtues and some vices, the secret indiscernible passages from lawful to unlawful in the first instances of change, the perpetual mistakings of permissions for duty, and licentious practises for permissions, our daily abusing the liberty that God gives us, our unsuspected sins in the managing a course of life certainly lawful, our little greedinesses in eating, our surprises in the proportions of our drinkings, our too great freedoms and fondnesses in lawful loves, our aptness for things sensual, and our deadness and tediousness of spirit in spiritual employments, besides infinite variety of cases of conscience that do occur in the life of every man, and in all intercourses of every life, and that the productions of sin are numerous and increasing, like the families of the Northern people, or the genealogies of the first patriarchs of the world; from all this we shall find that the computations of a man's life are busy as the table of sines and tangents, and intricate as the accounts of eastern merchants: and therefore it were but reason we should sum up our accounts at the foot of every page, I mean, that we call ourselves to scrutiny every night when we compose ourselves to the little images of death.

2. For if we make but one general account, and never reckon till we die, either we shall only reckon by great sums, and remember nothing but clamorous and crying sins, and never consider concerning particulars, or forget very many; or if we could consider all that we ought, we must needs be confounded with the multitude and variety. But if we observe all the little passages of our life, and reduce them into the order of accounts and accusations, we shall find them multiply so fast, that it will not only appear to be an ease to the accounts of our death-bed, but by the instrument of shame will restrain the inundation of evils; it being a thing intolerable to humane modesty to see sins increase so fast, and virtues grow up so slow; to see every day stained with the spots of leprosy, or sprinkled with the marks of a lesser evil.

3. It is not intended, we should take accounts of our lives only to be thought religious, but that we may see our evil and amend it, that we dash our sins against the stones, that we may go to God, and to a spiritual guide, and search for remedies and apply them. And indeed no man can well observe his own growth in grace, but by accounting seldomer returns of sin, and a more frequent victory over temptations; concerning which every man makes his observations according as he makes his inquiries and search after himself: In order to this it was that

---

[1] Taylor cites Lucan, Pharsalia, VIII.21–23.

Saint Paul wrote; before receiving the Holy Sacrament "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat" [I Corinthians 11:28]. This precept was given in those days when they communicated every day,[1] and therefore a daily examination also was intended.

4. And it will appear highly fitting, if we remember that at the day of judgement, not only the greatest lines of life, but every branch and circumstance of every action, every word, and thought shall be called to scrutiny and severe judgement; insomuch that it was a great truth which one said; "Woe be to the most innocent life if God should search into it, without mixtures of mercy."[2] And therefore we are here to follow S. Paul's advice; "Judge yourselves and you shall not be judged of the Lord" [I Corinthians 11:31]. The way to prevent God's anger is to be angry with ourselves, and by examining our actions and condemning the criminal, by being assessors in God's tribunal, at least we shall obtain the favour of the court. As therefore, every night we must make our bed the memorial of our grave, so let our evening thoughts be an image of the days of judgement.

5. This advice was so reasonable and proper an instrument of virtue, that it was taught even to the scholars of Pythagoras by their master. "Let not sleep seize upon the regions of your senses, before you have three times recalled the conversation and accidents of the day":[3] Examine what you have committed against the Divine Law, what you have omitted of your duty, and in what you have made use of the Divine Grace to the purposes of virtue and religion, joining the Judge reason to the legislative mind or conscience, that God may reign there as a law-giver and a judge. Then Christ's kingdom is set up in our hearts; then we always live in the eye of our judge, and live by the measures of reason, religion, and sober counsels.

—1651

---

[1] communicated received communion.

[2] St. Augustine, Confessions, IX.xiii.34.

[3] Taylor cites Hierocles, Commentarius in aurea carmina.

Samuel Butler

1613 – 1680

Little is known of Samuel Butler's life. The son of a Worcestershire farmer and clerk, he was educated at King's School, Worcester, and according to one source proceeded to Cambridge, although no records of his matriculation have been found. Butler worked as a clerk in various households including that of one of Cromwell's generals, Sir Samuel Luke, on whom the figure of Hudibras may be based. His first publication, when he was forty-seven, was an anonymous tract supporting the Stuart cause. In 1661 Butler held a stewardship to Richard Vaughan, Earl of Carbery, at Ludlow Castle, but he held this position only briefly. In December 1661 the first part of Hudibras was published and Butler achieved instant fame. The poem delighted the court, but apparently little was done to help Butler financially. The second part of Hudibras was printed a year later, and the third section was introduced at the end of 1677. Butler's financial position appears to have deteriorated after he resigned his post at Ludlow, and Charles did little to alleviate his situation until 1677 when Butler was finally awarded a pension, three years before he died of consumption.

* * *

Hudibras

(Excerpts)

THE FIRST PART CANTO I

THE ARGUMENT

Sir Hudibras his passing worth,
The manner how he sallied forth:
His arms and equipage are shown;
His horse's virtues, and his own.
Th' adventure of the Bear and Fiddle
Is sung, but breaks off in the middle.

When civil Fury first grew high,
And men fell out they knew not why;
When hard words, Jealousies and Fears,
Set folks together by the ears,
And made them fight, like mad or drunk,
For Dame Religion as for punk, [1]
Whose honesty they all durst swear for,
Though not a man of them knew wherefore:
When Gospel-trumpeter, surrounded
With long-eared rout, to battle sounded,
And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist, instead of a stick:
Then did Sir Knight abandon dwelling,
And out he rode a Colonelling.

A wight he was, whose very sight would [2]
Entitle him Mirror of Knighthood; [3]
That never bent his stubborn knee
To any thing but Chivalry,
Nor put up blow, but that which laid
Right worshipful on shoulder-blade:
Chief of domestic knights and errant,
Either for chartel or for warrant: [4]
Great on the bench, great in the saddle,
That could as well bind o're, as swaddle:
Mighty he was at both of these,

---

[1] punk a prostitute, strumpet, harlot (OED punk sb^{1}).

[2] wight a human being, man or woman, person (OED wight sb 2).

[3] Mirror of Knighthood a Spanish romance translated into English in the late sixteenth century.

[4] chartel a written challenge, a letter of defiance (OED cartel sb 1).

And styled of war as well as peace.
(So some rats of amphibious nature,
Are either for the Land or Water.)
But here our Authors make a doubt,
Whether he were more wise, or stout.
Some hold the one, and some the other:
But howso'er they make a pother,
The difference was so small, his Brain
Outweighed his Rage but half a grain:
Which made some take him for a tool
That Knaves do work with, call'd a Fool.
And offer to lay wagers, that
As Montaigne, playing with his Cat, [1]
Complains she thought him but an Ass,
Much more she would Sir Hudibras.
(For that's the name our valiant knight
To all his challenges did write.)
But they're mistaken very much,
'Tis plain enough he was no such.
We grant, although he had much wit,
H' was very shy of using it,
As being loath to wear it out,
And therefore bore it not about,
Unless on Holy-days, or so,
As men their best apparel do.
Beside 'tis known he could speak Greek,
As naturally as pigs squeak:
That Latin was no more difficile,
Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle.
Being rich in both he never scanted
His bounty unto such as wanted;
But much of either would afford
To many that had not one word.
For Hebrew roots, although th' are found
To flourish most in barren ground,
He had such plenty, as sufficed
To make some think him circumcised:
And truly so perhaps, he was
'Tis many a pious Christian's case.

He was in Logic a great critic
Profoundly skill'd in Analytic.
He could distinguish, and divide
A hair 'twixt South and South-west side:
On either which he would dispute,
Confute, change hands, and still confute.
He'd undertake to prove by force
Of argument, a man's no horse.
He'd prove a buzzard is no fowl,
And that a Lord may be an owl;
A calf an Alderman, a Goose a Justice,
And rooks Committee-men and Trustees. [2]
He'd run in debt by disputation,
And pay with ratiocination.
All this by syllogism, true [3]
In mood and figure, he would do.

For Rhetoric, he could not ope
His mouth, but out there flew a trope:
And when he happened to break off
I'th' middle of his speech, or cough,
H' had hard words ready, to shew why,
And tell what rules he did it by.
Else when with greatest art he spoke,
You'd think he talked like other folk.
For all a rhetorician's rules
Teach nothing but to name his tools.
His ordinary rate of speech
In loftiness of sound was rich,
A Babylonish dialect,
Which learned pedants much affect.
It was a particoloured dress

---

[1] Montaigne, playing with his cat In his essay An Apology for Raymond Sebonde, Montaigne writes, "when I play with my cat, who knows if I am not a pastime to her more than she is to me" (Donald Frame, The Complete Essays of Montaigne: Stanford, 1958, p.331).

[2] rooks cheats, swindlers (OED rook sb^{1} 2b) To rook is to clean of money by fraud, extortion, or other means (OED rook v^{1} 1); Committee men men who facilitated the appropriation and sale of lands owned by Royalists or the Church on behalf of Parliament.

[3] syllogism specious reasoning, used in humorous allusion to its sense in logic (OED syllogism 1b).

Of patched and piebald languages
'Twas English cut on Greek and Latin,
Like Fustian heretofore on Satin. [1]
It had an odd promiscuous tone,
As if h' had talked three parts in one.
Which made some think, when he did gabble,
Th' had heard three labourers of Babel; [2]
Or Cerberus himself pronounce [3]
A leash of languages at once.
This he as volubly would vent,
As if his stock would ne're be spent.
And truly to support that charge
He had supplies as vast and large.
For he could coin or counterfeit
New words, with little or no wit:
Words so debased and hard, no stone
Was hard enough to touch them on.
And when with hasty noise he spoke 'em,
The ignorant for current took 'em.
That had the Orator who once,
Did fill his mouth with pebble stones [4]
When he harangued; but known his phrase
He would have used no other ways.

In Mathematics he was greater
Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater: [5]
For he by geometric scale
Could take the size of pots of ale;
Resolve by sines and tangents straight, [6]
If bread or butter wanted weight;
And wisely tell what hour o'th' day
The clock does strike, by Algebra.

Besides he was a shrewd Philosopher,
And had read every text and gloss over:
What e're the crabbed'st author hath
He understood b'implicit Faith,
What ever Sceptic could inquire for;
For every why he had a wherefore:
Knew more than forty of them do,
As far as words and terms could go.
All which he understood by rote,
And as occasion served, would quote;
No matter whether right or wrong:
They might be either said or sung.
His notions fitted things so well,
That which was which he could not tell:
But oftentimes mistook the one
For th'other, as Great Clerks have done.
He could reduce all things to acts
And knew their natures by abstracts,
Where entity and quiddity, [7]
The ghosts of defunct bodies, fly;
Where truth in person does appear,
Like words congealed in Northern Air.

He knew what's what, and that's as high
As Metaphysic wit can fly.
In School-Divinity as able
As he that hight Irrefragable; [8]
Profound in all the nominal
And real ways beyond them all,

---

[1] Fustian coarse cloth made of cotton and flax; also, inflated, turgid or inappropriately lofty language (OED fustian sb 1 and 2).

[2] Babel Genesis 11:1-9. The attempt to build a tower that would reach heaven was punished by God through a fragmentation of one universal language into many languages.

[3] Cerberus the many-headed dog that guards the underworld in Greek mythology.

[4] the Orator who once…pebble stones Plutarch writes in his Lives that the great orator Demosthenes overcame speech defects by speaking with pebbles in his mouth.

[5] Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater Tycho Brache, a Danish astronomer of the sixteenth century, designed the "Tychonic" system of the universe. Erra Pater was the alleged author of a sixteenth-century almanac which contained medical advice and weather predictions based on astrology.

[6] Resolve by sines and tangents The sine, the tangent and the secant are the three fundamental trigonometrical functions. See OED sine 2.

[7] quiddity the real nature or essence of a thing; that which makes a thing what it is (OED quiddity sb^{1}1).

[8] As he that hight Irrefragable Alexander of Hales, a Franciscan theologian of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was known as the Doctor Irrefragabilis.

And with as delicate a hand
Could twist as tough a Rope of Sand.
And weave fine cobwebs, fit for skull
That's empty when the Moon is full;
Such as take lodgings in a Head
That's to be let unfurnished.
He could raise scruples dark and nice,
And after solve 'em in a trice:
As if Divinity had catched
The itch, of purpose to be scratched;
Or, like a Mountebank, did wound
And stab her self with doubts profound,
Only to shew with how small pain
The sores of faith are cured again;
Although by woeful proof we find,
They always leave a scar behind.
He knew the seat of Paradise,
Could tell in what degree it lies:
And, as he was disposed, could prove it,
Below the moon, or else above it:
What Adam dreamt of when his bride
Came from her closet in his side: [1]
Whether the Devil tempted her
By a high Dutch interpreter:
If either of them had a navel;
Who first made music malleable:
Whether the Serpent at the Fall
Had cloven feet, or none at all.
All this, without a gloss or comment,
He would unriddle in a moment
In proper terms, such as men smatter
When they throw out and miss the matter.

. . . .

A Squire he had whose name was Ralph,
That in th' adventure went his half.
(Though writers, for more stately tone,
Do call him Ralpho; 'tis all one:
And when we can with metre safe,
We'll call him so, if not plain Raph.
For rhyme the rudder is of verses,
With which like ships they steer their courses.)
An equal stock of wit and valor
He had laid in, by birth a tailor.
The mighty Tyrian Queen that gained [2]
With subtle shreds a tract of land,
Did leave it with a castle fair
To his great ancestor, her heir:
From him descended cross-legged knights,
Famed for their faith and warlike fights
Against the bloody cannibal,
Whom they destroyed both great and small.
This sturdy Squire had as well
As the bold Trojan knight, seen hell, [3]
Not with a counterfeited pass
Of Golden Bough, but true gold-lace.
His knowledge was not far behind
The knight's, but of another kind,
And he another way came by it:
Some call it Gifts, and some New light; [4]
A Liberal Art, that costs no pains
Of study, industry, or brains.
His wits were sent him for a token,
But in the carriage cracked and broken.
Like commendation nine-pence, crooked
With to and from my love, it looked.
He ne're considered it, as loath
To look a gift-horse in the mouth;
And very wisely would lay forth
No more upon it than 'twas worth.
But as he got it freely, so
He spent it frank and freely too.
For saints themselves will sometimes be
Of gifts that cost them nothing, free.
By means of this, with hem and cough,
Prolongers to enlightened Snuff,

---

[1] What Adam dreamt of... closet in his side Genesis 3:7–4:24.

[2] The mighty Tyrian Queen Dido (Virgil, Aeneid, i. 367–8).

[3] the bold Trojan knight Aeneas (Virgil, Aeneid, vi. 187ff). Aeneas used a magical golden bough to access the underworld.

[4] Some call it Gifts, and some New light The sectarians used both the terms "gifts" and "new light" to refer to divine inspiration.

He could deep Mysteries unriddle,
As easily as thread a needle;
For as of vagabonds we say,
That they are ne're beside their way:
Whate're men speak by this new Light,
Still they are sure to be i'th' right.
'Tis a dark-lantern of the spirit,
Which none see by but those that bear it:
A Light that falls down from on high,
For spiritual trades to cozen by: [1]
An Ignis Fatuus, that bewitches, [2]
And leads men into pools and ditches,
To make them dip themselves, and sound
For Christendom in dirty pond; [3]
To dive like wild fowl for Salvation,
And fish to catch Regeneration. [4]
This Light inspires, and plays upon
The nose of Saint, like bagpipe-drone,
And speaks through hollow empty soul;
As through a trunk, or whisp'ring hole,
Such language as no mortal ear
But spiritual eaves-droppers can hear.
So Phœbus or some friendly Muse [5]
Into small poet's song infuse;
Which they at second-hand rehearse
Through reed or bagpipe, verse for verse.

Thus Ralph became infallible,
As three or four-legg'd oracle,
The ancient cup, or modern chair;
Spoke truth point-blank, though unaware:
For mystic learning, wondrous able
In Magic, Talisman, and Cabal, [6]
Whose primitive tradition reaches
As far as Adam's first green breeches:
Deep-sighted in Intelligences,
Ideas, Atoms, Influences;
And much of Terra Incognita, [7]
Th'intelligible world could say:
A deep occult philosopher,
As learn'd as the wild Irish are,
Or Sir Agrippa, for profound [8]
And solid lying much renown'd:
He Anthroposophus, and Floud, [9]
And Jacob Behmen understood; [10]
Knew many an amulet and charm,
That would do neither good nor harm:
In Rosicrucian lore as learned, [11]

---

[1] cozen to cheat, defraud by deceit (OED cozen v 1).

[2] Ignis Fatuus a thing that deludes or misleads by means of fugitive appearances (OED will o' the wisp fig. 1); also marsh fire, marsh light (OED marsh 4). Referred to under several names in early modern literature, reflecting the hazards of cross-country travel in those days.

[3] To make them dip…in dirty pond refers to baptism by immersion as opposed to the sprinkling of water used to baptize by the established Protestant church.

[4] Regeneration in religious use: the process or fact of being born again in a spiritual sense, the state resulting from this (OED regeneration 2).

[5] Phœbus one of the names for Apollo, a Greek god associated with music among other things.

[6] Cabal the name given in post-biblical Hebrew to the oral tradition handed down from Moses to the Rabbis of the Mishnah and the Talmud (OED cabbala 1).

[7] Terra Incognita unknown land (commonly used in early cartography).

[8] Sir Agrippa Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa von Nettesheim (1486–1535), philosopher and cabalist who published a work celebrating hermetic beliefs and later renounced his former faith in magic.

[9] Anthroposophus Thomas Vaughan (1621–1666), brother to Henry Vaughan the poet, wrote a number of hermetic texts; Floud Robert Fludd (1574–1637), hermetic philosopher. These four writers represented mystical nonsense to those of a more rationalist bent, like Butler and, after him, Jonathan Swift. Of one of Vaughan's works, Swift wrote that it was "a piece of the most unintelligable Fustian, that, perhaps, was ever published in any Language."

[10] Jacob Behmen Jacob Boehme (1575–1624), a Silesian mystic, many of whose works were translated into English in the 1640s and 1650s. The unintelligibility of his style makes him fair game for Butler's satire, but there are also passages of penetrating spiritual insight which won the admiration of William Law in the eighteenth century and S.T. Coleridge in the nineteenth.

[11] Rosicrucian The Rosicrucians were reputedly the members of a society or order founded in the late fifteenth century by one Christian Rosencreuz. They were said to claim various forms of secret and magic knowledge, such as the transmutation of metals, the prolongation of life, and power over the elements. See OED rosicrucian sb 1.

As he that Verè adeptus earned.[1]
He understood the speech of birds[2]
As well as they themselves do words:
Could tell what subtlest Parrots mean,
That speak and think contrary clean;
What Member 'tis of whom they talk
When they cry Rope, and Walk, Knave, walk.
He'd extract numbers out of matter,
And keep them in a glass, like water,
Of sov'reign pow'r to make men wise;
For dropped in blurred, thick-sighted eyes,
They'd make them see in darkest night,
Like owls, though purblind in the light.
By help of these (as he professed)
He had First Matter seen undressed:
He took her naked all alone,
Before one rag of Form was on.
The chaos too he had descry'd,
And seen quite through, or else he ly'd:
Not that of paste-board which men shew
For groats at Fair of Bartholmew;[3]
But its great grandsire, first o'th' name,
Whence that and Reformation came:
Both Cousin-germans, and right able
T'inveigle and draw in the rabble.[4]
But Reformation was, some say,
O'th' younger house to Puppet-play.
He could foretell whats'ever was
By consequence to come to pass.
As death of great men, alterations,
Diseases, battles, inundations.
All this without th'eclipse of Sun,
Or dreadful Comet, he hath done,
By inward light, a way as good,
And easy to be understood.
But with more lucky hit than those
That use to make the Stars depose,
Like Knights o'th' Post, and falsely charge[5]
Upon themselves what others forge:
As if they were consenting to
All mischief in the world men do:
Or like the Dev'l, did tempt and sway 'em
To rogueries, and then betray 'em.
They'll search a Planet's house, to know
Who broke and robbed a house below:
Examine Venus, and the Moon,
Who stole a thimble or a spoon:
And though they nothing will confess,
Yet by their very looks can guess,
And tell what guilty aspect bodes,
Who stole, and who received the goods.
They'll question Mars, and by his look
Detect who 'twas that nimm'd a cloak:[6]
Make Mercury confess and peach
Those thieves which he himself did teach.
They'll find i'th' Physiognomies
O'th' Planets all men's destinies:
Like him that took the doctor's bill,
And swallowed it instead o'th' pill.
Cast the Nativity o'th' question,[7]
And from positions to be guessed on,
As sure as if they knew the moment
Of native's birth, tell what will come on't.
They'll feel the pulses of the Stars,

---

[1] Verè adeptus adept in truth. The word adept was used and assumed by alchemists who professed to have attained the great secret (OED adept sb b).

[2] One of the alleged magical powers of the Rosicrucians was the ability to understand the speech of animals and birds.

[3] Fair of Bartholmew Bartholomew's fair, founded in the twelfth century by the prior of St. Bartholomew, was held at the end of August. By the seventeenth century the fair had become a spectacle of noisy entertainment, trade and celebration. The playwright Ben Jonson wrote a drama, Bartholomew Fair, about the corruption and chicanery of the event.

[4] Cousin-germans persons or things closely related or allied to another; near relatives (OED cousin-german fig 2).

[5] Knights o' th'Post notorious perjurers; those who get their living by giving false evidence (OED knight of the Post).

[6] nimm'd a cloak stole a cloak; nim to steal (OED nim v 3).

[7] Nativity birth considered astrologically; a horoscope (OED nativity 4). Native is the subject of the horoscope (OED native sb 2).

To find out agues, coughs, catarrhs;
And tell what crisis does divine
The rot in sheep, or mange in swine:
In men what gives or cures the itch,
What makes them cuckolds, poor or rich:
What gains or loses, hangs or saves;
What makes men great, what fools or knaves;
But not what wise, for only of those
The Stars (they say) cannot dispose,
No more then can the Astrologians.
There they say right, and like true Trojans.
This Ralpho knew, and therefore took
The other Course, of which we spoke.
—1662

A Romance-Writer [1]

Pulls down old histories to build them up finer again, after a new model of his own designing. He takes away all the lights of truth in history to make it the fitter tutoress of life; for Truth herself has little or nothing to do in the affairs of the world, although all matters of the greatest weight and moment are pretended and done in her name, like a weak princess that has only the title, and falsehood all the power. He observes one very fit decorum in dating his histories in the days of old and putting all his own inventions upon ancient times; for when the world was younger, it might perhaps love and fight, and do generous things at the rate he describes them; but since it is grown old, all these heroic feats are laid by and utterly given over, nor ever like to come in fashion again; and therefore all his images of those virtues signify no more than the statues upon dead men's tombs, that will never make them live again. He is like one of Homer's gods, that sets men together by the ears and fetches them off again how he pleases; brings armies into the field like Janello's leaden soldiers;[2] leads up both sides himself, and gives the victory to which he pleases, according as he finds it fit the design of his story; makes love and lovers too, brings them acquainted, and appoints meetings when and where he pleases, and at the same time betrays them in the height of all their felicity to miserable captivity, or some other horrid calamity; for which he makes them rail at the gods and curse their own innocent stars when he only has done them all the injury; makes men villains, compels them to act all barbarous inhumanities by his own directions, and after inflicts the cruellest punishments upon them for it. He makes all his knights fight in fortifications, and storm one another's armor before they can come to encounter body for body, and always matches them so equally one with another that it is a whole page before they can guess which is likely to have the better; and he that has it is so mangled that it had been better for them both to have parted fair at first; but when they encounter with those that are no knights, though ever so well armed and mounted, ten to one goes for nothing. As for the ladies, they are every one the most beautiful in the whole world, and that's the reason why no one of them, nor all together with all their charms, have power to tempt away any knight from another. He differs from a just historian as a joiner does from a carpenter; the one does things plainly and substantially for use, and the other carves and polishes merely for show and ornament.[3]
—1759 (ca. 1667-69)

---

[1] The following two works of prose are extracts from Butler's Characters, a work in which he represents numerous human types. For other examples, see the selections from the Overburian Character, Felltham, Earle, and Breton.

[2] Janello Butler's first editor, Robert Thyer, writes "this alludes to some Kind of Puppet-Performance in those Times, as I find the name Janello, in another imperfect piece of Butler's introduced as belonging to a famous Operator in that Art." Thyer's edition was first published in 1759.

[3] joiner a worker in wood who does lighter and more ornamental work than that of a carpenter, as the construction of the furniture and fittings of a house or ship (OED joiner sb 2).

A Rabble

Is a congregation or assembly of the States-general[1] sent from their several and respective shops, stalls, and garrets. They are full of controversy, and every one of a several judgment concerning the business under present consideration, whether it be mountebank, show, hanging, or ballad-singer. They meet, like Democritus's[2] atoms, in vacuo,[3] and by a fortuitous jostling together produce the greatest and most savage beast in the whole world; for though the members of it may have something of human nature while they are asunder, when they are put together they have none at all, as a multitude of several sounds make one great noise unlike all the rest, in which no one particular is distinguished. They are a great dunghill where all sorts of dirty and nasty humours meet, stink, and ferment, for all the parts are in a perpetual tumult. 'Tis no wonder they make strange Churches, for they take naturally to any imposture, and have a great antipathy to truth and order as being contrary to their original confusion. They are a herd of swine possessed with a dry devil that run after hanging instead of drowning. Once a month they go on pilgrimage to the gallows, to visit the sepulchres of their ancestors, as the Turks do once a week. When they come there they sing psalms, quarrel, and return full of satisfaction and narrative. When they break loose they are like a public ruin, in which the highest parts lie undermost, and make the noblest fabrics heaps of rubbish. They are like the sea, that's stirred into a tumult with every blast of wind that blows upon it, till it become a watery Apennine, and heap mountain billows upon one another, as once the giants did in the war with heaven. A crowd is their proper element, in which they make their way with their shoulders as pigs creep through hedges. Nothing in the world delights them so much as the ruin of great persons or any calamity in which they have no share, though they get nothing by it. They love nothing but themselves in the likeness of one another, and, like sheep, run all that way the first goes, especially if it be against their governors, whom they have a natural disaffection to.

—1759 (CA. 1667-69)

---

[1] States-general a legislative assembly representing the three estates, viz. clergy, nobles and commons or burghers of a whole realm, principality, or commonwealth (OED).

[2] Democritus (ca. 460–ca. 370 B.C.E.) Greek philosopher who taught of the atom and its relation to the world.

[3] in vacuo in a vacuum.

Rowland Watkyns

ca. 1614 – 1664

Rowland Watkyns was a native of Herefordshire. His parentage has not been established with absolute certainty. However, a pedigree from the Heraldic Visitation of Hereford, 1634, refers to a Rowland Watkins who was the third son of Samuell Watkins and Sibell Parry (both spellings of the surname occurring in the pedigree). The "most dear and pious Uncle, Mr. James Parry, Parson of Tedstone," to whom Watkyns dedicated a poem, was probably Sibell's brother. The Rowland of this pedigree had three brothers and four sisters; the eldest son, James, is described as having been aged 26 in 1634. Rowland's place in the family cannot be determined exactly, though the format of the pedigree suggests that at least one sister as well as two brothers were born before him. His wife's name is not known. He wrote "an epitaph" upon "his beloved daughter, Susanna," who was born in 1655 and died in 1658. A son matriculated at Jesus College, Oxford. His name, Samuel, that of Rowland's father in the pedigree cited above, strengthens the case that the pedigree refers to the poet. There is no record that Watkyns graduated from either university, but he is likely to have been an undergraduate at Jesus College, Oxford, which had a strong Welsh connection.[1]

Watkyns became the vicar of Llanfrynach, four miles south-east of Brecon, in 1635. He was dispossessed of his living, probably in 1648, one of several clergy so treated by the Brecon Sequestration Committee before the Act for the Propagation of the Gospel in Wales came into effect in 1650. He was restored to his living at the Restoration, and held it until his death. Watkyns's Flamma Sine Fumo (1662) is divided into three sections: a collection of verse mostly on religious and ethical themes; seventy-three Proverbial Sentences in couplets; and A Looking-Glasse for the Sicke, or signs of several Diseases, With their Cures and Remedies. The poems reveal a Laudian Anglican contemptuous of "the New Illiterate lay-Teachers." Like his neighbour, the better-known poet Henry Vaughan, Watkyns wrote on Christ's Nativity, the feast disliked by so many Puritans, and on the Virgin Mary.

There is no known record of political activism, beyond poems apparently addressed in manuscript to Royalist acquaintances. Whereas Vaughan kept up a constant stream of publication from 1646 to 1655, Watkyns did not publish his poems until 1662, when it had become not merely safe but possibly advantageous to do so.

A Looking-Glasse for the Sicke suggests that Watkyns may have practised as a physician while he was deprived of his living, and so have been in competition with Vaughan. In relation to contemporary medical controversy, they took opposing positions. Watkyns advocated herbal and questioned "mineral" cures; the Vaughan brothers practised Paracelsian or "chymical" medicine. Such differences may underlie an apparent antipathy between the two men, indicated by the fact that no reference to Watkyns appears in Vaughan's work, while a poem prefaced to Flamma Sine Fumo contains rather transparently veiled, and certainly hostile, references to Vaughan.

Watkyns's work has no great aesthetic appeal, but is interesting in relation to contemporary doctrinal and social conflicts, and enhances our knowledge of Royalist society in Breconshire during the interregnum.

---

[1] The pedigree is reprinted in Paul C. Davies's edition of Flamma Sine Fumo (Cardiff: U of Wales P, 1968), p. xii. However, Davies considered the identification with the Rowland of that pedigree to be "hazardous." For the reasons here given, I consider it virtually certain that the identification is correct.

To the Reader

I am not eagle ey'd to face the Sun,
My mind is low, and so my verse doth run.
I do not write of stars to make men wonder.
Or planets how remote they move asunder.
My shallow river thou may'st ford with ease,
Ways, which are fair, and plain can ne'er displease. [1]
—1662

The Anabaptist

Ostende Anabaptistam, & ego ostendam monstrum. [2]

What wouldst thou have? a King, a Lord, a
Knight,
A Bishop, Priest are monsters in thy sight;
No Church, nor Altar, and no Law must be
To dictate but thy conscience unto thee.
If thou art displeas'd with Laws Divine, and Civil,
I know not what will fit thee, but the Devil.
—1662

Upon the Mournful Death of our Late Soveraign Lord Charles the First, King of England, &c.

I read of a Confessor, and a King,
A King, and Martyr is a stranger thing.
Our Charles was both: A King both just, and wise,
A holy Martyr, and sweet sacrifice:
Thieves did consent to kill the just; but why?
When that the Wolf is Judge, the Lamb must die?
He went to Canaan for three Kingdoms' good,
Through the red-sea of his own sacred blood: [3]
Thus John the Baptist died, that holy one,
Whilst Herod did usurp King David's throne. [4]
By his beheading it may well be said,
Three kingdoms by injustice lost their head; [5]
If e'er I shall the aid of saints implore,
Thy shrine alone (good Charles) I will adore;
Lord, let my soul unto thy Kingdom come,
To see King Charles crown'd for his Martyrdom.
—1662

---

[1] In this prefatory poem, Watkyns seems to have had Henry Vaughan in mind. Consider the first line, in relation to Vaughan's statement in "The Star" that "eagles eye not stars"; the third, in relation to the fact that the words "star" and "stars" occur forty-six times in Silex Scintillans; and the last, in relation to the fact that Vaughan, in the title of Olor Iscanus ("The Swan of Usk"), laid claim to be the poet of a river. For more on the relationship of Vaughan and Watkyns, see Alan Rudrum, "Resistance, Collaboration and Silence: Henry Vaughan and Breconshire Royalism" in The English Civil Wars in the Literary Imagination, ed. Claude J. Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth (Columbia: U of Missouri P, 1999), pp. 102–118.

[2] Ostende Anabaptistam, & ego ostendam monstrum "Show me an Anabaptist, and I will show you a monster." The word Anabaptist was properly used to designate religious groups who refused to allow their children to be baptized and instituted adult baptism. See the article "Anabaptists" in ODCC. The word was used rather loosely as a term of abuse in this period, to refer to various groups of radical sectaries; the content of the poem suggests that Watkyns may have had the Quakers in mind.

[3] He went to Canaan etc. The Exodus (the escape of the Israelites from captivity in Egypt) was read by Christians as a type of the escape of the Christian soul from the snares of the devil, with Joshua prefiguring Jesus. Watkyns is writing within a Royalist tradition which saw Charles I not merely as a martyr but as a Christ-like figure.

Thus John the Baptist died etc. As was common at the time, Watkyns is interpreting the events of his own time in the light of biblical history.

[5] Three kingdoms England, Scotland and Ireland.

The Common People[1]

Neutrum modò, mas modo vulgus.[2]

The many-headed Hydra, or the people,
Now build the church, then pull down bells and steeple:
Today for learned bishops, and a king,
They shout with one consent: tomorrow sing
A different note: One while the people cry
To Christ Hosanna; then him crucify:
And thus the wavering multitude will be
Constant in nothing but inconstancy:
When these together swarm, the kingdom fears;
They are as fierce as tigers, rude as bears.
—1662

The Holy Sepulchre

Christ is our Rock, who in a rock is lain,
The lesser rock the greater doth contain:
Out of a rock they newly hewed his grave,
The new man Christ thus a new tomb must have:[3]
No creature might repose or lay his head,
Without presumption, in the Creator's bed:
The lily of the valley, Sharon's rose,[4]
His fragrant grave in a sweet garden chose.
This rock did shelter Christ two days; but he
An everlasting refuge is to me:
He is the Rock, that doth our souls relieve
With water, which doth life eternal give.[5]
—1662

The New Illiterate Lay-Teachers[6]

Εχας, ἕχας ἕςε βέβηλοι[7]

Why trouble you religion's sacred stream,
And tear Christ's coat, which had no rent, or seam?
And you do patch it too with ragged clouts
Of false opinions, and fantastic doubts.
The skillful husbandman must till, and sow,
That ground's ill dressed, where blind men hold the plough.
Now in the Temple every saucy Jack
Opens his shop, and shows his pedlar's pack.
Instead of candles we enjoy the snuff,
For precious balm we have but kitchen-stuff.
The ruder sort are by these teachers led,
Who acorns eat, and might have better bread;
If this a propagation shall be found,
These build the house, which pull it to the ground;[8]

---

[1] Expressions of contempt for the common people were not peculiar to Royalists; they are to be found on both sides of the political conflict.

[2] "The common people, now masculine, now neither the one thing nor the other."

[3] The new man in reference to Christ as "the second Adam."

[4] the lily of the valley, Sharon's rose "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys" (Song of Solomon 2:1). Christians interpreted the Song as an allegory of Christ's love for his Bride, the Church; and the understanding was that Christ was the lily and the rose. More recently, these words are understood to have been spoken by the bride; see the New English Bible.

[5] He is the Rock etc. "they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ" (I Corinthians 10:4).

[6] The new illiterate Lay-Teachers Members of radical religious groups, believing in the doctrine of the "inner light," and that preaching was "a gift of the Spirit," held that a university education was not necessary for a preacher. Several of the Anglican clergy in Watkyns' vicinity were dispossessed of their livings, as he was; but in many cases they were not replaced. This poem suggests that nevertheless radical sectarian preachers, perhaps itinerants, did hold forth from their pulpits.

[7] Εχας, ἕχας ἕςε βέβηλοι "Far off, far off, o profane ones." Paul C. Davies notes that this was a formula recited at the beginning of the Mysteries to warn off the uninitiated (Flamma Sine Fumo p. 158).

[8] propagation The reference is to "An Act for the Better Propagation and Preaching of the Gospel in Wales," ordered by Parliament in February, 1649. Henry Vaughan, in his Life of Paulinus, wrote that Paulinus "preferred the indignation and hatred of the multitude to their love, he would not buy their friendship with the loss of Heaven, nor call those Saints and propagators, who were Devils and destroyers" (quoted from F.E. Hutchinson, Henry Vaughan: A Life and Interpretation, Oxford: Clarendon P, 1947, p. 115).

This is mere hocus-pocus; a strange slight,
By putting candles out, to gain more light.[1]
Mad men by virtue of this propagation,
Have Bedlam left, and preach'd for Reformation.
And they might well turn preachers, for we had
Many that were more foolish, and more mad.
The tinker being one of excellent mettle,
Begins to sound his doctrine with his kettle.
And the laborious ploughman I bewail,
Who now doth thresh the pulpit with his flail.
The lousy tailor with his holy thimble
Doth patch a sermon up most quick and nimble.
He doth his skill, and wisdom much express,
When with his goose he doth the Scripture press.[2]
The chandler now a man of light we find,
His candle leaves a stinking snuff behind.
The apothecary, who can give a glister
Unto a holy brother or a sister;
Hath one dram of the spirit, and can pray,
Or preach, and make no scruple of his way.
Thus false coin doth for current money pass.
And precious stones are valued less than glass.
Not disputation, but a rigid law
Must keep these frantic sectarists in awe.[3]
The itch of disputation will break out
Into a scab of error; which without
Some speedy help will soon infect and run
Through all the flock, where it hath once begun.
I will take heed in these bad times, and care
To shut my shop, but keep my constant ware.
Lord let thy tender vine no longer bleed,
Call home thy shepherds which thy lambs may feed.
—1662

---

[1] mere hocus-pocus the deceptive patter of a conjuror (OED Hocus-Pocus).

[2] his goose the tailor's smoothing iron (OED goose sb 5).

[3] Not disputation, etc. This couplet foreshadows the harsh penal laws against Non-conformists passed after the Restoration.

Margaret Fell

1614 – 1702

Born in Marsh Grange, Lancashire, to John Askew and Margaret Pyper, Margaret Fell was to become the most prominent female Quaker of the seventeenth century. In 1632, she married the barrister Thomas Fell of Swarthmore Hall, near Ulverston, by whom she had nine children. Thomas Fell later served as a Member of Parliament for Lancashire. While her husband was in London in 1652, Fell received George Fox into her home, not an uncommon event, for she often opened her house to religious persons. However, in this instance, Fox converted Fell, her children and many of her servants to Quakerism during his stay. On his return, Thomas Fell accommodated his wife's beliefs, though he never converted to Quakerism. Swarthmore Hall was to become the centre of Quakerism for the next thirty-eight years, and Margaret Fell one of its staunchest defenders.

After her conversion, Fell vigorously advocated liberty of conscience in matters of religion in a series of pamphlets published over a forty-year period. She wrote to both Oliver Cromwell and Charles II to protest the persecution of the Quakers. In response to her pleas, Charles II agreed to let the Quakers have their liberty, but despite his promise, they were "hardly used, and taken up at their meetings generally, even until many prisons throughout the nation was filled with them." (Fell's brief autobiography, from which this quotation is taken, is published in A Brief Collection of Remarkable Passages [London, 1710].) In 1663, five years after her husband's death, Fell was called before the magistrates at Ulverston for permitting illegal meetings at Swarthmore Hall. Upon refusing the oath of allegiance, she was committed to prison at Lancaster Castle. She remained imprisoned until 1668 because she refused to agree to any stipulation preventing Quaker meetings at Swarthmore Hall. During her imprisonment at Lancaster Castle, Fell wrote Women's Speaking Justified (1666), a judicious and thorough defence of a woman's right to speak in church. Her treatise should be read in light of the Quaker call for women's public ministry which, as Trevett reminds us, "encompassed not just preaching, prophecy and other overtly 'religious' activity, but also any witnessing to the faith, be it in the home, the marketplace or workplace, in the steeple-house, the law-courts and the prison" (Christine Trevett, Women and Quakerism in the 17^th^ Century [York: The Ebor P, 1995], 58).

In 1669, Fell married George Fox. The happiness of their union was short-lived as Fell was imprisoned in Lancaster Castle early in 1670 and not released until the following year. When not visiting the imprisoned, sharing brief interludes with George Fox, or arranging interviews with royalty, Fell resided at Swarthmore for the remainder of her life and continued to be fined for permitting Quaker meetings to be held in her home. She outlived her second husband by eleven years, dying at Swarthmore in 1702.

* * *

Women's Speaking Justified, Proved, and Allowed of by the Scriptures[1]

Whereas it has been an objection in the minds of many, and several times hath been objected by the clergy, or ministers, and others, against women's speaking in the church; and so consequently may be taken, that they are condemned for meddling in the things of God; the ground of which objection, is taken from the Apostle's words, which he writ in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. 14. vers. 34, 35.[2] And also what he writ to Timothy in the First Epistle, chap. 2 vers. 11, 12. But how far they wrong the Apostle's intentions in these Scriptures, we shall show clearly when we come to them in their course and order. But first let me lay down how God himself hath manifested his will and mind concerning women, and unto women.

And first, when God created man in his own image: in the image of God created he them, male and female: And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply: And God said, Behold I have given you of every herb, etc. Gen. 1.[3] Here God joins them together in his own image, and makes no such distinctions and differences as men do; for though they be weak, he is strong; and as he said to the Apostle, His grace is sufficient, and his strength is made manifest in weakness, II Cor. 12:9. And such has the Lord chosen, even the weak things of the world, to confound the things which are mighty; and things which are despised, hath God chosen, to bring to nought things that are, I Cor. 1.[4] And God hath put no such difference between the male and female as men would make.

It is true, The serpent that was more subtle than any other beast of the field, came unto the woman, with his temptations, and with a lie: his subtlety discerning her to be more inclinable to hearken to him, when he said, If ye eat, your eyes shall be opened: and the woman saw that the fruit was good to make one wise: there the temptation got into her, and she did eat, and gave to her husband, and he did eat also, and so they were both tempted into the transgression and disobedience; and therefore God said unto Adam, when that he hid himself when he heard his voice, Hast thou eaten of the tree which I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat? And Adam said, The woman which thou gavest me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. And the Lord said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. Here the woman spoke the truth unto the Lord. See what the Lord saith, vers. 15. after he had pronounced sentence on the serpent: I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel, Gen. 3.[5]

Let this word of the Lord, which was from the beginning, stop the mouths of all that oppose women's speaking in the power of the Lord; for he hath put enmity between the woman and the serpent; and if the seed of the woman speak not, the seed of the serpent speaks; for God hath put enmity between the two seeds, and it is manifest, that those that speak against the woman and her seed's speaking, speak out of the enmity of the old serpent's seed;[1] and God hath fulfilled his word and his promise, When the fullness of time was come, he hath sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons, Gal. 4:4, 5.

---

[1] This treatise was first published in 1666. The present text is taken from the 1667 edition.

[2] the Apostle's words The Apostle Paul writes, "Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church" (I Corinthians 14:34–35). "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence" (I Timothy 2:11–12).

[3] Genesis 1:27–29.

[4] I Corinthians 1:27–28.

[5] Genesis 3:1, 5, 6, 11–13, 15.

Moreover, the Lord is pleased, when he mentions his church, to call her by the name of woman, by his prophets, saying, I have called thee as a woman forsaken, and grieved in spirit, and as a wife of youth, Isa. 54.[2] Again, How long wilt thou go about, thou backsliding daughter? For the Lord hath created a new thing in the earth, a woman shall compass a man, Jer. 31:22. And David, when he was speaking of Christ and his church, he saith, The king's daughter is all glorious within, her clothing is of wrought gold; she shall be brought unto the king: with gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought; they shall enter into the king's palace, Psal. 45.[3] And also King Solomon in his Song, where he speaks of Christ and his church, where she is complaining and calling for Christ, he saith, If thou knowest not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way by the footsteps of the flock, Cant.1:8.c. 5.9. And John, when he saw the wonder that was in heaven, he saw a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars; and there appeared another wonder in heaven, a great red dragon stood ready to devour her child: here the enmity appears that God put between the woman and the dragon, Revelations 12.[4]

Thus much may prove that the church of Christ is a woman, and those that speak against the woman's speaking, speak against the church of Christ, and the seed of the woman, which seed is Christ; that is to say, those that speak against the power of the Lord, and the Spirit of the Lord speaking in a woman, simply, by reason of her sex, or because she is a woman, not regarding the seed, and Spirit, and power that speaks in her; such speak against Christ, and his church, and are of the seed of the serpent, wherein lodgeth the enmity. And as God the Father made no such difference in the first creation, nor never since between the male and the female, but always out of his mercy and loving kindness, had regard unto the weak, so also, his Son, Christ Jesus, confirms the same thing. When the Pharisees came to him, and asked him, if it were lawful for a man to put away his wife, he answered and said unto them, Have you not read, that he that made them in the beginning, made them male and female, And said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh, wherefore they are no more twain but one flesh; what therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder, Mat. 19.[5]

Again, Christ Jesus, when he came to the city of Samaria, where Jacob's well was, where the woman of Samaria was; you may read, in John 4, how he was pleased to preach the everlasting gospel to her; and when the woman said unto him, I know that when the Messiah cometh (which is called Christ), when he cometh, he will tell us all things; Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee am he;[6] this is more than ever he said in plain words to man or woman (that we read of) before he suffered. Also he said unto Martha, when she said, she knew that her brother should rise again in the last day, Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth shall never die. Believest thou this? She answered, Yea Lord, I believe thou art the Christ, the Son of God. Here she manifested her true and saving faith, which few at that day believed so on him, John 11:25, 26.

---

[1] old serpent "And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world" (Revelation 12:9).

[2] Isaiah 54:6.

[3] Psalm 45:13–15.

[4] Revelation 12:1,3–4.

[5] Matthew 19:4–6.

[6] John 4:25–26.

Also that woman that came unto Jesus with an alabaster box of very precious ointment, and poured it on his head as he sat at meat; it's manifested that this woman knew more of the secret power and wisdom of God, than his disciples did, that were filled with indignation against her; and therefore Jesus saith, Why do ye trouble the woman, for she hath wrought a good work upon me? Verily, I say unto you, wheresoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her, Matt. 26, Mark 14:3.[1] Luke saith further, She was a sinner, and that she stood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with her tears and did wipe them with the hair of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with ointment. And when Jesus saw the heart of the Pharisee that hath bidden him to his house, he took occasion to speak unto Simon, as you may read in Luke 7 and he turned to the woman, and said, Simon, Seest thou this woman? Thou gavest me no water to my feet but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head: Thou gavest me no kiss, but this woman, since I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet: My head with oil thou didst not anoint, but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment: Wherefore I say unto thee, her sins, which are many, are forgiven her, for she hath loved much, Luke 7:37, to the end.[2]

Also there was many women which followed Jesus from Galilee ministering unto him, and stood afar off when he was crucified, Mat. 28:55,[3] Mark 15. Yea even the women of Jerusalem wept for him insomuch that he said unto them, Weep not for me, ye daughters of Jerusalem, but weep for yourselves, and for your children, Luke 23:28.

And certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary Magdalen, and Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward's wife, and many others which ministered unto him of their substance, Luke 8:2, 3.

Thus we see that Jesus owned the love and grace that appeared in women, and did not despise it, and by what is recorded in the Scriptures, he received as much love, kindness, compassion, and tender dealing towards him from women, as he did from any others, both in his lifetime, and also after they had exercised their cruelty upon him, for Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of Jesus, beheld where he was laid: And when the sabbath was past, Mary Magdalen, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had brought sweet spices that they might anoint him: And very early in the morning, the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun; and they said among themselves, who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? And when they looked, the stone was rolled away, for it was very great: Mark 16:1, 2, 3, 4, Luke 24:1, 2, and they went down into the sepulchre, and as Matthew saith, The angel rolled away the stone, and he said unto the women, Fear not, I know whom ye seek, Jesus which was crucified: He is not here, he is risen, Mat. 28.[4] Now Luke saith thus, That there stood two men by them in shining apparel, and as they were perplexed and afraid, the men said unto them, He is not here; remember how he said unto you when he was in Galilee, that the Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again, and they remembered his words, and returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things to the eleven, and to all the rest.[5]

It was Mary Magdalene and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and the other women that were with them, which told these things to the Apostles. And

---

[1] Matthew 26:10,13; Mark 14:3–9.

[2] Luke 7:37,38,44–47.

[3] The biblical verse actually cited is Matthew 27:55.

[4] Matthew 28:2,5–6.

[5] Luke 24:4–9.

their words seemed unto them as idle tales, and they believed them not.[1] Mark this, ye despisers of the weakness of women, and look upon yourselves to be so wise: But Christ Jesus doth not so, for he makes use of the weak: For when he met the women after he was risen, he said unto them, All Hail, and they came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him; then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid, go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there they shall see me, Mat. 28:10, Mark 16:9. And John saith, when Mary was weeping at the sepulchre, that Jesus said unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? what seekest thou? And when she supposed him to be the gardener, Jesus saith unto her, Mary; she turned herself, and saith unto him, Rabboni, which is to say, Master. Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father, but go to my brethren, and say unto them I ascend unto my Father, and your Father, and to my God, and your God, John 20:16, 17.

Mark this, you that despise and oppose the message of the Lord God that he sends by women. What had become of the redemption of the whole body of mankind, if they had not believed the message that the Lord Jesus sent by these women, of and concerning his resurrection? And if these women had not thus, out of their tenderness and bowels of love, who had received mercy, and grace, and forgiveness of sins, and virtue, and healing from him, which many men also had received the like, if their hearts had not been so united and knit unto him in love, that they could not depart as the men did, but sat watching, and waiting, and weeping about the sepulchre until the time of his resurrection, and so were ready to carry his message, as is manifested, else how should his disciples have known, who were not there?

Oh blessed and glorified be the glorious Lord, for this may all the whole body of mankind say, though the wisdom of man, that never knew God, is always ready to except against the weak; but the weakness of God is stronger than men, and the foolishness of God is wiser than men.[2]

And in Acts 18, you may read how Aquila and Priscilla took unto them Apollos, and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly; who was an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures: yet we do not read that he despised what Priscilla said, because she was a woman, as many now do.

And now to the Apostle's words, which is the ground of the great objection against women's speaking: And first, I Cor. 14. let the reader seriously read that chapter, and see the end and drift of the Apostle in speaking these words: For the Apostle is there exhorting the Corinthians unto charity, and to desire spiritual gifts, and not to speak in an unknown tongue, and not to be children in understanding, but to be children in malice, but in understanding to be men; and that the spirits of the prophets should be subject to the prophets, for God is not the author of confusion, but of peace: And then he saith, Let your women keep silence in the church, etc.[3]

Where it doth plainly appear that the women, as well as others, that were among them, were in confusion, for he saith, How is it brethren? when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done to edifying.[4] Here was no edifying, but all was in confusion speaking together: Therefore he saith, If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at most by three, and that by course, and let one interpret; but if there by no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church.[5] Here the man is commanded to keep silence as well as the woman, when they are in confusion and out of order.

---

[1] Luke 24:10–11.

[2] I Corinthians 1:25.

[3] I Corinthians 14:34.

[4] I Corinthians 14:26.

[5] I Corinthians 14:27–28.

But the Apostle saith further, They are commanded to be in obedience, as also saith the law; and if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home, for it is a shame for a woman to speak in the church.[1]

Here the Apostle clearly manifests his intent; for he speaks of women that were under the law, and in that transgression as Eve was, and such as were to learn, and not to speak publicly, but they must first ask their husbands at home, and it was a shame for such to speak in the church: And it appears clearly, that such women were speaking among the Corinthians, by the Apostle's exhorting them from malice and strife, and confusion, and he preacheth the law unto them, and he saith, in the law it is written, With men of other tongues, and other lips, will I speak unto this people, vers. 2.[2]

And what is all this to women's speaking that have the everlasting Gospel to preach, and upon whom the promise of the Lord is fulfilled, and his Spirit poured upon them according to his word, Acts 2:16, 17, 18?[3] And if the Apostle would have stopped such as had the Spirit of the Lord poured upon them, why did he say just before, If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace and you may all prophesy one by one?[4] Here he did not say that such women should not prophesy as had the revelation and Spirit of God poured upon them, but their women that were under the law, and in the transgression, and were in strife, confusion and malice in their speaking, for if he had stopped women's praying or prophesying, why doth he say: Every man praying or prophesying having his head covered, dishonoureth his head; but every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head? Judge in yourselves, Is it comely that a woman pray or prophesy uncovered? For the woman is not without the man, neither is the man without the woman, in the Lord, I Cor. 11:3, 4, 13.[5]

Also that other Scripture, in I Tim. 2, where he is exhorting that prayer and supplication be made everywhere, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting; he saith in the like manner also, That women must adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefastness and sobriety, not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearl[s], or costly array; He saith, Let women learn in silence with all subjection, but I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence; for Adam was first formed, then Eve; and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression.[6]

Here the Apostle speaks particularly to a woman in relation to her husband, to be in subjection to him, and not to teach, nor usurp authority over him, and therefore he mentions Adam and Eve: But let it be strained to the utmost, as the opposers of women's speaking would have it, that is, that they should not preach nor speak in the church, of which there is nothing here: Yet the Apostle is speaking to such as he is teaching to wear their apparel, what to wear, and what not to wear; such as were not come to wear modest apparel, and such as were not come to shamefastness and sobriety, but he was exhorting them from broidered hair, gold, and pearls, and costly array; and such are not to usurp authority over the man, but to learn in silence with all subjection, as it becometh women professing godliness, with good works.

---

[1] I Corinthians 14:34–35.

[2] The biblical verse actually cited is I Corinthians 14:21.

[3] "But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel; And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: And on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy" (Acts 2:16–18).

[4] I Corinthians 14:30–31.

[5] The biblical verses actually cited are I Corinthians 11:4,5,13 and 11.

[6] I Timothy 2:9, 11–14.

And what is all this to such as have the power and Spirit of the Lord Jesus poured upon them, and have the message of the Lord Jesus given unto them? Must not they speak the word of the Lord because of these undecent and unreverent women that the Apostle speaks of, and to, in these two Scriptures? And how are the men of this generation blinded, that bring these Scriptures, and pervert the Apostle's words, and corrupt his intent in speaking of them, and by these Scriptures endeavour to stop the message and word of the Lord God in women, by contemning and despising of them? If the Apostle would have had women's speaking stopped, and did not allow of them, why did he entreat his true yoke-fellow to help those women who laboured with him in the Gospel? Phil. 4:3. And why did the Apostles join together in prayer and supplication with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren, Acts 1:14, if they had not allowed, and had union and fellowship with the Spirit of God, wherever it was revealed in women as well as others? But all this opposing and gainsaying of women's speaking hath risen out of the bottomless pit, and spirit of darkness that hath spoken for these many hundred years together in this night of apostasy, since the revelations have ceased and been hid, and so that spirit hath limited and bound all up within its bond and compass, and so would suffer none to speak, but such as that spirit of darkness, approved of, man or woman.[1]

And so here hath been the misery of these last ages past, in the time of the reign of the beast, that John saw when he stood upon the sand of the sea, rising out of the sea, and out of the earth, having seven heads and ten horns, Rev. 13. In this great city of Babylon, which is the woman that hath sitten so long upon the scarlet-coloured beast, full of names, of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns; and this woman hath been arrayed and decked with gold, and pearls, and precious stones, and she hath had a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations, and hath made all nations drunk with the cup of her fornication; and all the world hath wondered after the beast, and hath worshipped the dragon that gave power to the beast; and this woman hath been drunk with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus;[2] and this hath been the woman that hath been speaking and usurping authority for many hundred years together: And let the times and ages past testify how many have been murdered and slain, in ages and generations past; every religion and profession (as it hath been called) killing and murdering one another, that would not join one with another. And thus the Spirit of Truth, and the power of the Lord Jesus Christ hath been quite lost among them that have done this; and this mother of harlots hath sitten as a queen, and said, She should see no sorrow, but though her days have been long, even many hundred of years, for there was power given unto the beast, to continue forty and two months, and to make war with the saints, and to overcome them;[3] and all that have dwelt upon the earth have worshipped him, whose names are not written in the book of the life of the Lamb, slain from the foundation of the world.[4]

But blessed be the Lord, his time is over, which was above twelve hundred years, and the darkness is past, and the night of apostasy draws to an end, and the true light now shines, the morning-light, the bright morning star, the root and offspring of David, he is risen, he is risen, glory to the highest for evermore; and the joy of the morning is come, and the bride, the Lamb's wife, is making herself ready, as a bride that is adorning for her husband,

---

[1] apostasy abandonment or renunciation of one's religious faith or moral allegiance (OED apostasy 1).

[2] In this great…martyrs of Jesus Here Fell paraphrases Revelation 17:2–6.

[3] She should see no sorrow Revelation 18:7; power given unto…two months Revelation 13:5.

[4] and all that…of the world Revelation 13:8.

and to her is granted that she shall be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white, and the fine linen is the righteousness of the saints: The holy Jerusalem is descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God, and her light is like a jasper stone, clear as crystal.[1]

And this is that free woman that all the children of the promise are born of; not the children of the bondwoman, which is Hagar, which genders to strife and to bondage, and which answers to Jerusalem which is in bondage with her children; but this is the Jerusalem which is free, which is the mother of us all.[2] And so this bondwoman and her children, that are born after the flesh, have persecuted them that are born after the Spirit, even until now; but now the bondwoman and her seed is to be cast out, that hath kept so long in bondage and in slavery, and under limits; this bondwoman and her brood is to be cast out, and our holy city, the new Jerusalem, is coming down from heaven, and her light will shine throughout the whole earth, even as a jasper stone, clear as crystal, which brings freedom and liberty, and perfect redemption to her whole seed; and this is that woman and image of the eternal God, that God hath owned, and doth own, and will own for evermore.

More might be added to this purpose, both out of the Old Testament and New, where it is evident that God made no difference, but gave his good Spirit, as it pleased him, both to man and woman, as Deborah, Huldah and Sarah.[3] The Lord calls by his prophet Isaiah, Hearken unto me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord, look unto the rock from whence ye were hewn, and to the hole of the pit from whence ye were digged; look unto Abraham your father and to Sarah that bare you, for the Lord will comfort Sion, etc. Isa. 5.[4] And Anna the prophetess, who was a widow of fourscore and four years of age, which departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day, she coming in at that instant, (when old Simeon took the child Jesus in his arms, and) she gave thanks unto the Lord, and spake of him to all them who looked for redemption in Jerusalem, Luke 2:36,37,38. And Philip the evangelist, into whose house the Apostle Paul entered, who was one of the seven, Acts 6:3. He had four daughters which were virgins, that did prophesy, Acts 21.

And so let this serve to stop that opposing spirit that would limit the power and Spirit of the Lord Jesus, whose Spirit is poured upon all flesh, both sons and daughters, now in his resurrection; and since that the Lord God in the creation, when he made man in his own image, he made them male and female; and since that Christ Jesus, as the Apostle saith, was made of a woman, and the power of the highest overshadowed her, and the Holy Ghost came upon her, and the holy thing that was born of her, was called the Son of God, and when he was upon the earth, he manifested his love, and his will, and his mind, both to the woman of Samaria, and Martha, and Mary her sister, and several others, as hath been showed;[5] and after his resurrection also manifested himself unto them first of all, even before he ascended unto his Father. Now when Jesus was risen, the first day of the week, he appeared first unto Mary Magdalene, Mark 16:9. And thus the Lord Jesus hath manifested himself and his power, without respect of persons, and so let all mouths be stopped that would limit him, whose power and Spirit is infinite, that is pouring it upon all flesh.

---

[1] This passage is a collation and paraphrase of Revelation 22:16,17, Revelation 19:7–8, and Revelation 21:2,11.

[2] not the children...of us all Hagar was the Egyptian bondwoman of Abraham's wife Sarah. When Sarah was infertile, Abraham fathered a child (Ishmael) upon Hagar. After the birth of her son Isaac, Sarah asked Abraham to "cast out this bondwoman and her son" (Genesis 21). Fell cites Paul's typological exposition of Genesis 21: "For it is written that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise. Which things are an allegory: for these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all" (Galatians 4:22–26).

[3] For biblical accounts of these three women, see Judges 4–5, II Kings 22:14, and Genesis 12–23 respectively.

[4] The biblical verses actually cited are Isaiah 51:1–3.

[5] and since...of a woman Galatians 4:4; and the power...of God Luke 1:35.

And thus much in answer to these two Scriptures, which have been such a stumbling block; that the ministers of darkness have made such a mountain of: But the Lord is removing all this, and taking it out of the way.

—1667

Lawrence Clarkson (or Claxton)

1615 – 1667

The confusion about this author's name derives from the fact that it is written Clarkson in the earlier tracts and Claxton in the later ones. The correct form is likely to be Clarkson, a common name around Preston, in Lancashire, where he was born, but there pronounced "Clackson." Clarkson was brought up in the Church of England, but developed a puritan intolerance of May poles and dancing on the Sabbath, and set off on a religious journey that took him through virtually all of the many forms of Christianity available in the England of his time. He was successively a Presbyterian, Independent, Antinomian, Anabaptist or "Dipper," Seeker, Ranter and, finally, Muggletonian. In one of these phases he turned against conventional sexual morality, and preached sexual liberation for women. He was imprisoned as an Anabaptist, and only freed when he renounced "dipping." He was also imprisoned by the House of Commons for a tract considered blasphemous, after which he was to be banished, "and not to return upon pain of death." In fact he did not leave the country, but travelled around earning his living through preaching, astrology, a magic act, and quack medicine.

Clarkson's spiritual journey demonstrates in one person's experience the increasingly radical religious options available in the 1640s and 1650s, and incidentally records a great deal of social history. His travels reflect the new mobility of the 1640s, with marching soldiers and the politically or religiously restless mingling with local populations to an unprecedented degree; they also reveal how radicalized individuals or communities made and maintained contact with one another, and the important role played in these communities by printers and booksellers.

The Lost Sheep Found has an agenda: it represents a bid for the leadership of the Muggletonian sect after the death of co-founder John Reeve (born 1608) in 1658. Clarkson signals his ambition on the title page of the book, where he describes himself as "the only true converted Messenger of Christ Jesus," an implicit snub to the claims of Reeve's cousin, and co-founder of the sect, Lodowick Muggleton (1609–1698). Clarkson lost this battle, however, and went on to accept a subordinate role in the sect, with which he remained affiliated for the rest of his life. (For Clarkson's relations with the Muggletonians, see A.L. Morton, The World of the Ranters [London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1970], pp. 138–42.)

Clarkson's death was probably an indirect result of the Fire of London. He borrowed money to lend to those who needed capital to rebuild, and was imprisoned for debt after someone defaulted on a loan. Given the mortality rate in seventeenth-century prisons, it is not surprising that he should die after a year's incarceration. The Lost Sheep Found (1660) is one of the liveliest and most interesting "spiritual autobiographies" of the time. For other examples of the genre, see the selections from John Bunyan's Grace Abounding and Anne Bradstreet.

* * *

The Lost Sheep Found:

or, The Prodigal returned to his Father's house, after many a sad and weary Journey through many Religious Countries

Having published several writings in confirmation of this spiritual last commission that ever shall appear in this unbelieving world,[1] a well-wisher to this commission, yea a man of no mean parts nor parentage in this, reason's kingdom,[1] much importuned me to publish to this perishing world, the various leadings forth of my spirit through each dispensation,[2] from the year 1630, to this year 1660, and that for no other end, than that reason, or the devil's mouth might be stopped, with the hypocrisy of his heart laid naked, and the tongues of faith with praises opened, to consider what variety of by-paths, and multiplicity of seeming realities, yet absolute notions, the souls of the elect may wander or travel through, seeking rest, and yet find none till the day unexpected, that soul as a brand be plucked out of the fire of his own righteousness, or professed wickedness, unto the true belief of a real commission which quencheth all the fiery darts of sin that dispensations have left cankering in his soul, (mind this) as have but patience, and thou shalt hear the more I labored for perfect cure and peace in my soul, the further I was from it, insomuch that I was resolved to seek forth no more, supposing my self in as perfect health and liberty in my spirit, as any then professing an unknown God whatsoever.

---

[1] Muggleton and Reeve claimed to be the "two witnesses" promised in Revelation 11:3–6, whose arrival marked the end of this world and the beginning of the new age of the spirit; the revelation of their role was to be God's last intervention in the world.

As do but seriously mind this ensuing epistle, and thou mayest in me read thy own hypocrisy and dissimulation in point of worship all along; as in that year 1630, being of the age of fifteen years, and living with my parents in the town of Preston in Amounderness,[3] where I was born, and educated in the form and worship of the Church of England, then established in the title of the Episcopal, or Bishops' Government; then, and in that year, my heart began to enquire after the purest ministry held forth under that form, not being altogether void of some small discerning, who preached Christ more truly and powerfully, as I thought, than another, and unto them was I only resolved to follow their doctrine above any other, and to that end my brethren being more gifted in the knowledge of the Scriptures than myself, and very zealous in what they knew, that they did often prevail with Mr. Hudson our town-lecturer,[4] to admit of such ministers as we judged were true laborious ministers of Christ, who when they came, would thunder against superstition, and sharply reprove sin, and profaning the Lord's-day; which to hear, tears would run down my cheeks for joy: so having a pitiful superstitious fellow the minister of our town,[5] I spared no pains to travel to Standish and other places, where we could hear of a Godly minister, as several times I have gone ten miles, more or less, fasting all the day, when my parents never knew of it, and though I have been weary and hungry, yet I came home rejoicing. Then the ministers had an order, that none should receive the sacrament, but such as would take it at the railed altar kneeling,[6] which I could not do, and therefore went to such ministers in the country that gave it fitting. Now a while after Mr. Starby the minister of our town, taking notice of leaving our parish, informed our father the danger of his children going into heresy, and the trouble that would ensue upon our father and his children, besides the disgrace of all good church-men, which did much incense our father, but all to no purpose, for I thought it conscience to obey God before man; however I being under my father's tuition, he cast a strict eye over me, and would force me to read over the prayers in the Book of Common Prayer and

---

[1] Muggleton and Reeve taught that reason was the creation of the devil.

[2] dispensation religious system.

[3] in Lancashire.

[4] Lecturers were ordained stipendiary ministers (often deacons) appointed by town corporations or parishes for regular preaching; the position was often associated with Puritanism.

[5] an orthodox Church of England minister; "superstitious" was a pejorative term used to link the Church of England with Catholicism.

[6] one of many directives made by the Archbishop of Canterbury, William Laud. "The Godly" regarded Laud's efforts to promote ceremony in worship as innovatory and Catholicizing.

Practice of Piety,[1] which I have done, till they have fallen asleep and my self, this was our devotion in those days; but increasing in knowledge, I judged to pray another man's form, was vain babbling, and not acceptable to God:[2] and then the next thing I scrupled, was asking my parents' blessing, that often times in the winter mornings, after I have been out of my bed, I have stood freezing above, and durst not come down till my father was gone abroad, and the reason I was satisfied, the blessing or prayers of a wicked man God would not hear, and so should offend God to ask him blessing; for either of these two ways I must, down on my knees, and say, father pray to God to bless me, or give me your blessing for God's sake, either of which I durst not use with my lips, but was in me refrained; and I improved my knowledge in the doctrine of those men I judged was the true Ministers of God, so that with tears many times I have privately sought the Lord as I thought, whether those things that the puritanical priests preached, was my own, and the more I was troubled, that I could not pray without a book as my brethren did, fain would I have been judged a professor with them, but wanted parts,[3] yet often times have had motions to tender my self to prayer amongst them, but durst not, and to that end I might be admitted to pray with them, I have prayed alone to try how I could pray, but could not utter my self as I knew they did: so I remember there was a day of humiliation to be set apart by the Puritans so called, to seek God by prayer and expounding of Scriptures, against which day I took my pen, and writ a pretty form of words, so got them by heart, and when the day came I was called to improve my gifts, at which I was glad, yet in a trembling condition lest I should be foiled; however, to prayer I went, with a devotion as though I had known the true God, but alas, when I was in the midst of that prayer, I left my form of words, and so was all in a sweat as though I had been sick, and so came off like a hypocrite as I was, which so seized on my soul, that I thought for my hypocrisy damnation would be my portion; however it humbled me, that I was glad to become one of the meanest of the number, still full of fears that when I died, I should go to hell; in which time I writ all the hypocrisy of my heart in a letter to send to Mr. Hudson our lecturer, to know his judgement whether such a soul as there related might be saved? in the interim comes a motion within me, saying, Ah fool, why dost thou send to man that knows not what will become of his own soul? burn it, and wait upon me; which letter I did burn, and not many weeks after I had a gift of prayer that was not inferior to my brethren, for which I was glad for the goodness of God to my soul; and as I increased in knowledge, so was my zeal, that I have many times privately prayed with rough hard cinders under my bare knees, that so God might hear me; and when I could not end my prayers with tears running down my cheeks, I was afraid some sin shut the attention of God from me: and thus did I do for a few years, in which time the bishops began to totter and shake, yea, for their cruelty and superstition, was totally routed.

Now if then you had asked me what I thought God was, the devil was, what the angels' nature was, what Heaven and Hell was, and what would become of my soul after death?

My answer had plainly been this: That my God was a grave, ancient, holy, old man, as I supposed sat in Heaven in a chair of gold, but as for his nature I knew no more than a child: and as for the devil, I really believed was some deformed person out of man, and that he could where, when, and how, in what shape appear he pleased; and therefore the devil was a great scarecrow, in so much that every black thing I saw in the night, I thought was the devil. But as for the angels, I knew nothing at all; and for Heaven I thought was a glorious place, with variety of rooms suitable for Himself, and his son Christ, and the Holy Ghost: and Hell, where it was I knew not, but judged it a local place, all dark, fire and brimstone, which the devils did torment the wicked in, and that forever; but for the soul at the hour of death, I believed was either by an angel or a devil fetched immediately to Heaven or Hell. This was the height of my knowledge under the Bishops' Government, and I am persuaded was the height of all Episcopal ministers then living; so that surely if they shall be established for a national ministry, they will not impose such ceremonies as then they did, but are grown wiser about God and devil; for they will find the major part of England is grown wiser, so cannot stoop to an inferior light; therefore if ye now begin to stand, take heed lest ye fall.

---

[1] Practice of Piety a popular devotional treatise by Lewis Bayley (second edition published 1612), and one of the books John Bunyan mentions in Grace Abounding as an influence.

[2] A belief in the authenticity of extemporary over set forms of prayer was one of the broad defining elements of Puritanism.

[3] parts abilities, talents, skills (OED part 12).

Secondly, after this I travelled into the church of the Presbyterians,[1] where still I made brick of straw and clay, nay there I found my soul the more oppressed, and further ensnared in the land of Egypt, burning brick all the day; but I knowing no further light, I was willing to bear their yoke, and sometimes found it pleasant; for herein consisted the difference of the Presbyterian and Episcopal, only in a few superstitious rites and ceremonies,[2] as also their doctrine was more lively than the Episcopal, for they would thunder the pulpit with an unknown God, which then I thought was true, and sharply reprove sin, though since I saw we were the greatest sinners; but however their doctrine I liked, it being the highest I then heard of. So war being begun betwixt the Episcopal and the Presbyterian,[3] I came for London, where I found them more precise than in our popish country of Lancashire; for with us the Lord's-day was highly profaned by the toleration of maypoles, dancing and rioting, which the Presbyterians hated, and in their doctrine cried out against, which thing my soul also hated, though yet I was not clear but the steeple was the house of God, from that saying of David, Psalm 84:10, saying, "For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand: I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness"; so that I finding out the ablest teachers in London; as then I judged was Mr. Calamy, Case, Brooks,[4] and such like, unto whom I daily resorted, if possible, to get assurance of salvation, not neglecting to receive the ordinance of breaking of bread from them, judging in so doing, I "showed forth the Lord's death till he came."[5] Now the persecution of the bishops fell so heavy upon the Presbyterian ministers, that some fled for New England; and Hooker had left several books in print,[6] which so tormented my soul, that I thought it impossible to be saved; however, I labored what in me lay, to find those signs and marks in my own soul, and to that end neglected all things that might hinder it; and thus for a certain time I remained a hearer of them till such time that wars began to be hot, and they pressed the people to send out their husbands and servants to help the Lord against the mighty, by which many a poor soul knowing no better, was murdered, and murdered others, taking the Bible in their pockets, and the Covenant in their hats,[1] by me was esteemed the work and command of the Lord, not at all minding the command of the second commission to the contrary, as in II Cor. 10:4 saying, "We do not war after the flesh, for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds, &c." This was not by me understood, but as they did in the old time in Moses his commission, so I thought we might do then; in which time the Presbyterians began to be a great people, and in high esteem, and at that time there was a great slaughter of the Protestants in Ireland,[2] that London was thronged with their ministers and people, and several collections was gathered for them: but this I observed, that as the Presbyterians got power, so their pride and cruelty increased against such as was contrary to them, so that:

---

[1] Presbyterians the logical next step, from being a "puritan" within the established Church to being a "puritan" outside it, within an alternative system of church government.

[2] an argument Milton summarizes in his sonnet "On the New Forcers of Conscience" as "New Presbyter is but Old Priest writ Large."

[3] The Bishops' Wars (1639–1640); see Charles I, A Proclamation (1639) and Information from the Scottish Nation (1640).

[4] Presbyterian divines Edmund Calamy (1600–1666) and Thomas Case (1598–1682), and the Independent minister Thomas Brooks (1608–1680).

[5] I Corinthians 11:26.

[6] Thomas Hooker (?1586–1647), New England divine.

Thirdly I left them, and travelled to the Church of the Independents;[3] for this I observed as wars increased, so variety of judgements increased: and coming to them, of which was Mr. Goodwin,[4] and some others, I discerned their doctrine clearer, and of a more moderate spirit. Now the greatest difference betwixt them, was about baptizing of infants, pleading by Scripture, that none but the infants or children of believers ought to be baptized; and that none of them must receive the Sacrament, as then it was called, but such as was church-members, judging all that was not congregated into fellowship, were not of God, but the world: so that about these things I was searching the truth thereof, and labored in the letter of the Scripture to satisfy my judgement; in the interim hearing of one Doctor Crisp,[5] to him I went, and he held forth against all the aforesaid churches, that let his people be in society or no, though walked all alone, yet if he believed that Christ Jesus died for him, God beheld no iniquity in him: and to that end I seriously perused his books, and found it proved by Scripture, as it is written Number 23:21: "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel." This was confirmed by other Scriptures, that I conceived whose sins Christ died for, their sin was to be required no more; for thus thinking when the debt was paid, the creditor would not look upon him as indebted to him, yet this I ever thought Christ never died for all, though the Scripture was fluent to that purpose, yet I found Scriptures to the contrary, and was ever as touching that satisfied, that as Christ prayed for none but such as was given him out of the world, "I pray for them, I pray not for the world,"[6] so that I thought he did not die for them he would not pray for, which thought now I know is true, and have by pen, and can by tongue make good the same. But I must return to the time then under Doctor Crisp's doctrine, in which I did endeavor to become one of those that God saw no sin, and in some measure I began to be comforted therewith, but how, or which way to continue in the same I could not tell; having as yet but little understanding in the Scripture I was silent, only still enquiring after the highest perch of light then held forth in London, in which time Mr. Randel appeared, with Mr. Simpson, with such a doctrine as Doctor Crisp, only higher and clearer, which then was called antinomians, or against the law,[1] so that I left all church-fellowship, and burning of brick in Egypt, and travelled with them up and down the borders, part Egypt, and part wilderness.

---

[1] Covenant the Scottish National Covenant (1638), the signers of which vowed to maintain the Presbyterian cause against royal and Laudian innovations.

[2] a great slaughter during the Irish rebellion of 1641.

[3] Independents also known as Congregationalists; believers in the independence or autonomy of each local congregation (and therefore deniers of the legitimacy of a state church).

[4] Thomas Goodwin (1600–1680), the Independent divine who would attend Cromwell on his deathbed.

[5] Tobias Crisp (1600–1643), Puritan minister linked with the rise of Antinomianism (see below). The three volumes of his Christ Alone Exalted were published in 1643 (vols. 1–2) and 1648 (vol. 3).

[6] John 17:9.

Fourthly, take notice in this sect [the Antinomians] I continued a certain time, for church it was none, in that it was but part form, and part none; in which progress I had a great sort of professors acquainted with me, so began to be somebody amongst them, and having a notable gift in prayer, we often assembled in private, improving my gifts, judging then the best things of this world was only prepared for the Saints, of which then I judged my self one, not knowing any other but that God was a spirit, and did motion in and out into his Saints, and that this was God's kingdom, and we his people; and therefore I judged God did fight for us against our enemies, that so we might enjoy him in liberty. At which time Paul Hobson brake forth with such expressions of the in-comes and out-goes of God,[2] that my soul much desired such a gift of preaching, which after a while Hobson and I being acquainted, he had a captain's place under Colonel Fleetwood for Yarmouth,[3] so that thither with him I went, and there tarried a soldier with them, at which time I had a small gift of preaching, and so by degrees increased into a method, that I attempted the pulpit at Mr. Wardel's parish in Suffolk, and so acquainted my gifts more and more in public, that having got acquaintance at Norwich, I left the company at Yarmouth; so after a few days I was admitted into a pulpit two or three times: so coming a man from Pulom [Pulham] side in Norfolk and hearing of me, was greatly affected with my doctrine, but especially my prayer, and was very urgent with me to go to their parish of Russel, which within two weeks after I assented to be there such a day, which was against the Fast-day; for at that time the Parliament had established a monthly fast, which was the last Wednesday of the month: at the set time I came to the place appointed, where this man had given notice to the best affected people in those parts, what a rare man was to preach that day, which thing I was ambitious of, as also to get some silver. Well, to the master I went, and as was my doctrine, so was their understanding, though I say't, as young as I was, yet was not I inferior to any priest in those days. So in conclusion of my day's work there came several in the church-yard to me, and gave me thanks for my pains, yea, hoped the Lord would settle me among them, which news I was glad to hear; so for the next Lord's-day by goodman Mays and Burton was I invited to preach at Pulom, which was a great parish; so upon liking I went, and was well approved of by all the godly, so there for a time I was settled for twenty shillings a week, and very gallantly was provided for, so that I thought I was in Heaven upon earth judging the priests had a brave time in this world, to have a house built for them, and means provided for them, to tell the people stories of other men's works. Now after I had continued half a year, more or less, the ministers began to envy me for my doctrine, it being free grace,[4] so contrary to theirs, and that the more, their people came from their own parish to hear me, so that they called me "sheep-stealer" for robbing them of their flock, and to that end came to catch and trap me at several lectures where I was called, that at last they prevailed with the heads of the parish to turn me out, so I slighting them as they could me, we parted, and then having many friends, I was importuned to come and live with them, so above all I chose Robert Marchant's house my lodging place, because his daughter I loved; and for a certain time preached up and down several churches, both of Suffolk and Norfolk, and many times in private, that I had a great company. Now in the interim there was one John Tyler a Colchester man frequented those parts where then I inhabited, who was a teacher of the Baptists,[1] and had a few scattered up and down the country, which several times we had meetings and converse about a lawful minister. Now I knowing no other but that those sayings, "Go ye teach all nations, baptizing them, and lo I am with you to the end of the world";[2] that continuance to the end of the world, was the loadstone that brought me to believe that the baptism of the Apostles was as much in force now, as in their days, and that command did as really belong to me as to them; so being convinced, for London I went to be further satisfied, so that after a little discourse with Patience, I was by him baptized in the water that runneth about the Tower,[3] after which I stayed at London about a week.

---

[1] Giles Randall (born ca. 1608), charged in the Star Chamber in 1643 with Anabaptism, Antinomianism, and Familism; and John Simpson (d. 1662). Antinomianism is the general name for the belief that the "new dispensation" of divine grace won by Christ's sacrifice freed Christians from the need to observe any moral law.

[2] Paul Hobson (d. 1666); a Particular Baptist and a captain in the New Model Army whose frequent preaching around the country attracted the ire of heretic hunters such as Thomas Edwards.

[3] George Fleetwood (1623–1672), Colonel of Horse in the New Model Army, later one of the regicides (pardoned).

[4] free grace the doctrine of the unmerited favour of God.

Fifthly, then for Suffolk again I travelled through the Church of the Baptists, and was of Robert Marchant's family received with joy, for I had the love of all the family; and though he had four daughters marriageable, yet there was one I loved above any in that country; though I was beloved of other friends' daughters far beyond her in estate, yet for her knowledge and moderation in spirit, I loved her; so there up and down a certain time I continued preaching the gospel, and very zealous I was for obedience to the commands of Christ Jesus; which doctrine of mine converted many of my former friends and others to be baptized, and so into a church fellowship was gathered to officiate the order of the Apostles, so that really I thought if ever I was in a true happy condition, then I was, knowing no other but as aforesaid, that this command of Christ did as really belong to me as to them; and we having the very same rule, as elders and deacons, with dipping, and breaking of bread in the same manner as they, I was satisfied we only were the Church of Christ in this world.

Thus having a great company, and baptizing of many into that faith, there was no small stir among the priests what to do with me, which afterwards they got a warrant from the Parliament, to apprehend Mr. Knowles and my self,[4] for then Knowles was about Ipswich preaching that doctrine, and baptizing certain people into that faith; now they apprehended Mr. Knowles in Ipswich gaol, and from thence with their warrant came to secure me, so in the week day after privately assembled in a friend's house, within three miles of Ay, there came in an officer from the Parliament with certain soldiers, and two constables, with some of the parish, having clubs and staves surrounded the house, I being earnest in my doctrine, and at that time was very much pressing the people, that without submitting to baptism all their profession was nothing, proving by Scripture that as Christ was our pattern, so we must follow him as example, which could not be unless we kept his commandments, as it is written, "If ye love me, keep my commandments":[5] Now dipping being a command of Christ; I judged them rebels that did profess the name of Christ, and not submit their bodies to the ordinance of Christ, and that Christ requires obedience from none but such as was capable of being taught, and therefore no children, but men and women, ought to receive the ordinance of baptism, in which time some of the officers hearing me, interrupted me in my doctrine, and told me I must leave off, and go along with them, showing me the authority they had from the Parliament; however, some of our friends would have opposed them, but I saw it was in vain, and so desired our friends to be quiet, and said, we must not only profess Christ, but also suffer for him; so it being in the wintertime, and almost night, they hasted me for Ay, though I, with our friends, desired but so much liberty as to go to my wife's father's house for linen and other necessaries, and they would engage for my appearance before the committee at Bury; but all in vain, then my wife told them they should provide a horse for her, for whither ever I went, she would go: at which they were very much incensed, but all to no purpose, so at last a trooper would have her to ride behind him, but she with scorn refused, then they got her furniture to ride behind me, so taking leave with our friends, to Ay that night we were carried; now one of them went before to provide lodging, so the town having intelligence they had taken a great Anabaptist,[1] there was no small waiting for my coming, that when I came into the entering of the town, the inhabitants had beset both sides of the streets to see my person, supposing an Anabaptist had been a strange creature, but when they beheld me, with my wife, they said one to another, he is like one of us, yea, they are a very pretty couple, it is pity I should suffer: so to the inn I came, where a great company was in the yard to behold me; so being unhorsed, they guarded me to our lodging, and great provision was made for supper, where many a pot was spent that night to see my face;[2] so to bed we went, and in the next room by soldiers guarded, so in the morning we were hasted for St. Edmonds Bury, which that morning Captain Harvey gave out many sad and grievous words what the committee would do with me, but the devil was deceived; however I said little: so they came to me with a bill what I had to pay for beer, wine, and meat; unto which I said, I had none, but if I had, I would pay none, it was sufficient I was wrongfully deprived of my freedom, and not to pay for their rioting; however they told me, I must before I go; then keep me here still: surely, said I, your masters that set you on work, are able to pay you your wages. Well, they said before I came out of prison, if I were not hanged, I should pay it; then said I, rest your selves contented till that day: so towards Bury we took our journey, and one was gone before to inform the committee I was taken; against my appearance they were assembled in a full committee, of which as I take it, Captain Bloyes of Woodbridge was then chairman. So to the hall I was guarded, the room being full, I was conveyed up to the chairman, who asked, my name? To which I replied, this was strange that you had a warrant to take me, and know not my name. Well, that was no matter, do you tell us your name; so I told them. What countryman are you? I said Lancashire. What made you travel so far off into these parts? The like motions that moved others, moved me. How long have you professed this way of dipping? Not so long as I ought to have done, had my understanding been enlightened. What then, you approve of what you do? Otherways I should not do it. How many have you dipped in these parts? I being a free born subject of this nation ought not to accuse my self; but you are to prove your charge, by sufficient witness against me, but however I being brought before you for my obedience to the commands of Christ, I am neither afraid nor ashamed to tell you what I have done: but to give you an account how many I have dipped, that I cannot tell. Then you have dipped some? Yea, that I have. After what manner do you dip them? After a decent order. We are informed you dip both men and women naked? As unto that you are not rightly informed. Where is your Jordan you dip them in? Though it is not Jordan, yet there are several places convenient. Do you not dip them in the night? Yea. And why do you not dip them in the day, it being an ordinance of Christ as you say? Because such as you are not able to bear the truth. Then said Sir William Spring, but Mr. Claxton, have not you forced some in the water against their wills? That is contrary to Scripture. Did you not one time, being on horseback, with a switch force some into the water? Let them that so informed you, affirm it before you to my face. But Mr. Claxton, who were those that you dipped about Framingham? At this time I cannot remember, but several I have dipped there aways. Did not you dip six sisters there about at one time? I never dipped six at one time. Then said Sir John Rowse, we are informed you dipped six sisters one night naked. That is nothing to me what you are informed, for I never did such a thing; nay further, it is reported, that which of them you liked best, you lay with her in the water? Surely your experience teacheth you the contrary, that nature hath small desire to copulation in water, at which they laughed; But, said I, you have more cause to weep for the unclean thoughts of your heart. Mr. Claxton have not you a wife? One that brought me, said she is in town. Where is she? Fetch her hither. She being without the door, came in quickly, and took me by the hand. Well, said the chairman, you are a loving woman, is this your husband? Yes, he is my husband. How long have you been married? About two months. Where were you married? At Waybread in my father's house. Who married you? My husband, with the consent of my parents, and the church. At that there was a great laughter, and said, your husband marry you to himself, that is against the law; I being vexed at their folly, answered, marriage is no other, but a free consent in love each to the other before God, and who was sufficient to publish the contract as my self? Nay but Mr. Claxton, you are not rightly informed as touching a true marriage. I say I was married according to truth: then if your marriage be lawful, we are not lawfully married. I question not yours, look ye to that; but this I know, and can prove, I am married according to the word of God; neither can your law repeal the contract of that couple, that hath their parents' consent, and the church confirming the same. Well, well, we shall give you the hearing, but how many was present when you took her to your wife? About twelve. What did you say to her and the church? First, I sought the Lord by prayer for a blessing upon that ordinance, and then I declared unto her parents and the church what had passed betwixt she and I, and that before them all I took her by the hand, and asked her if she was not willing to take me for her husband during life? To which she assented, as also her parents approved of it, and gave her to me with the confirmation of the church. Then said the chairman, what think you gentlemen, of this marriage? They said it was a strange marriage. What then Mrs. Claxton, you look upon this man your lawful husband? Yea, I deny all other men in the world. Then you have lain with him? I ought to lie with no other. But Mrs. Claxton, did your husband dip you before, or after he became your husband? Before I was contracted in public? How or after what manner did your husband dip you? in your clothes or naked? Sir, we defy any indecent carriage, if you were dipped in your clothes you would spoil them, and besides it might endanger your life with cold: we have clothes for both men and women provided for that purpose. What, were you plunged over head and ears? So saith the Scripture. What [1] Baptists proponents of the conscious baptism of believers as the basis of a gathered church. After the Restoration, Baptists moved closer in temper to Presbyterians and Independents; in the decades before 1660, however, they were associated with the period's more radical religious and political movements.

---

[2] Matthew 28:19–20.

[3] the Tower of London. Clarkson was baptised on November 6, 1644.

[4] Hanserd Knollys (ca. 1599–1691), Particular Baptist; later associated with the Fifth Monarchists.

[5] John 14:15.

---

[1] Anabaptist a name used of various radical religious groups on the continent with roots in the German Reformation, groups whose beliefs were the subject of a great deal of fear-mongering. Used in England as a term of abuse, with implications of polygamy, the denial of private property, and the erasure of all hierarchy.

[2] that is, many drinks (sold in pots) were bought at the inn as an excuse to see the prisoner.

Mr. Claxton, did you go with her into the water? No, I stood on the bank side. Mrs. Claxton, were not you amazed, or almost drowned? No sir, the obedience to the command of God did shut out all fear and cold. What, did not you go to bed after dipped? I had a warm bed with dry linen provided. Did not your husband lodge with you that night? There is no such wickedness among us. Why what matter, you were married before God. Till we were publicly before witness, we had no such custom, and let me tell you, if it be the practice of your church, it is not so in ours. Nay woman, be not angry, I do not say you did so, for truly I am as much against sin as you are. But Mrs. Claxton, we have an order to secure your husband, and there to endure the pleasure of the Parliament, what will you do? we have no order to stay you. If you stay my husband, you must stay me also. Why, are you willing to go to gaol with your husband? For the cause of Christ I am willing to suffer imprisonment. Then you are resolved yours is the way of truth. Then said I, for the present I know no truth but this. Well Mr. Claxton, after a while you will be otherwise informed. Never to turn back again. We are to commit you to custody, that so you may seduce no more people. Sir, I must obey your pleasure, but I shall not deny to be obedient to the command of Christ. Well, we shall talk with you another time: so they ordered to make my mittimus,[1] and in my presence gave it Captain Poe my keeper, and said, Mr. Claxton, you may take notice that the Parliament is favorable to you, that they will not send you to the common gaol, but to a house where none but men of quality are kept in custody. Then said Poe, who was my gaoler, what shall his wife do? Then said my wife, where ever my husband is, there will I be, then the committee ordered her with me: so coming thither, there was none but two papist knights, and a sea captain, so after we had supped, we were directed to our chamber, which was a large chamber, and pretty good furniture. Now under a week I told Captain Poe that I was not able to board at half a crown a meal. Then, saith he, you must go to the common gaol. Thither would I go, for I am not ashamed to sit in the stocks in the marketplace, for the name of Christ. So he informed the committee, but they would not remove me, and said, he must agree for the chamber, and I find my self diet. At this Poe was vexed, and sent up his handmaid mistress Tuck, to agree with me for the chamber at four shillings a week, which for the space of half a year I gave her, in which time our people increased, there being William Muly and some others of this way in Bury, I had oftentimes money from the army, and the churches at London and Colchester, so that I wanted for nothing; and some came to my chamber, and there I preached unto them, in so much that the keeper informed the committee, who that Sunday at night assembled, to consider what to do with me: in conclusion they shut me close prisoner, and kept my wife from me, which was more grief to me than the rest. Well, against the next Lord's-day I appointed our friends to stand before my window on the Angel-hill, that being the way for all the great ones of the town to go to their worship, so at the very instant time putting my head forth of the window, I did boldly exhort the people to beware of the priests, and while it is the time of your health, submit your souls and bodies in obedience to the true baptism, and be no longer deluded to think that your infants are commanded to obey, or capable of an ordinance imposed upon them. Oh for shame, if not for fear, stand still and hear the truth related by his true and lawful minister, otherwise turn back again; at which a great sort of people gave attention, which did enrage the priest and magistrate, yet they knew not what to do with me, but charged me to do so no more. Then said I, take heed how you keep my wife from me: is this to do as you would be done unto? so they forthwith took off the padlock, and let my friends come to me. After this I had the liberty of the whole house, nay, to sit at the street-door; for he had no prisoners but such as gave in great security for their safe imprisonment; and as for me, and Westrop my fellow-prisoner, they feared not our going away, only they were afraid I should dip some. So a little after, spring coming on, I got liberty, not being well, to go abroad with a keeper, and Captain Gray, who was called Captain Drink-water, was to go with me. Now above all the rest, I desired Captain Gray to go with me to a wood a mile distant from me; it having rained over night, the brook was up, so a man coming with a pole, I desired him to lay it over, which he did, so I went over first, and the Captain followed me, and shaking the pole, he fell in to the middle in water, and in a trembling condition he was, lest the committee should hear of it;[1] so to the wood we went, and there he dried his hose and stockings, so after we came to prison again, the committee hearing of it, questioned Captain Gray, but he told them the truth, at which they laughed. After I had lain there a long time, Mr. Sedgewick and Mr. Erbery came to visit me,[2] with whom I had great discourse, and after they were gone, I had a great contest in my mind, as touching the succession of baptism, which I could not see but in the death of the Apostles, there was never since no true administrator; for I could not read there was ever any that had power by imposition of hands, to give the Holy Ghost, and work miracles as they did; so that in the death of them I concluded baptism to either young or old, was ceased. Now observe, I could discern this, but could not by the same rule see that preaching and prayer was to cease: for this now I know, as in the death of the Apostles, and them commissionated by them, the commission ceased, as unto all their form and worship. So finding I was but still in Egypt burning brick, I was minded to travel into the wilderness; so seeing the vanity of the Baptists, I renounced them and had my freedom. Then:

---

[1] mittimus warrant committing a person to prison.

Sixthly, I took my journey into the society of those people called Seekers,[3] who worshipped God only by prayer and preaching, therefore to Ely I went, to look for Sedgewick and Erbery but found them not, only their people were assembled: with whom I had discourse, but found little satisfaction; so after that for London I went to find Seekers there, which when I came, there was divers fallen from the Baptists as I had done, so coming to Horn in Fleet-lane and Fleten in Seacoal-lane, they informed me that several had left the church of patience, in seeing the vanity of Kiffen and others,[4] how highly they took it upon them, and yet could not prove their call successively; so glad was I there was a people to have society withal; then was I moved to put forth a book which was the first that ever I writ, bearing this title, The Pilgrimage of Saints, by church cast out, in Christ found, seeking truth,[5] this being a suitable piece of work in those days, that it wounded the churches; which book Randel owned, and sold many for me.[6] Now as I was going over London-bridge, I met with Thomas Gun a teacher of the Baptists, who was a man of a very humble, moderate spirit, who asked me if I owned the Pilgrimage of Saints? I told him yea: then said he, you have writ against the church of Christ, and have discovered your self an enemy to Christ. Then I said, it is better be a hypocrite to man than to God, for I find as much dissimulation, covetousness, back-biting and envy, yea as filthy wickedness among some of them, as any people I know: and notwithstanding your heaven-like carriage, if all your faults were written in your forehead, for ought I know, you are a hypocrite as well as I; which afterwards it was found out he had lain with his landlady many times; and that he might satisfy his lust, upon slighty [slight] errands he sent her husband into the country, that so he might lodge with his wife all night; which being found out, so smote his conscience, that he privately took a pistol and shot himself to death in Georges-fields. As all along in this my travel I was subject to that sin, and yet as saint-like, as though sin were a burden to me, so that the fall of this Gun did so seize on my soul, that I concluded there was none could live without sin in this world; for notwithstanding I had great knowledge in the things of God, yet I found my heart was not right to what I pretended, but full of lust and vain-glory of this world, finding no truth in sincerity that I had gone through, but merely the vain pride and conceit of reason's imagination, finding my heart with the rest, seeking nothing but the praise of men in the height of my prayer and preaching, yet in my doctrine through all these opinions, pleading the contrary, yea abasing myself, and exalting a Christ that then I knew not. Now after this I returned to my wife in Suffolk, and wholly bent my mind to travel up and down the country, preaching for monies, which then I intended for London, so coming to Colchester where I had John Aplewhit, Purkis, and some other friends, I preached in public; so going for London, a mile from Colchester, I set my cane upright upon the ground, and which way it fell, that way would I go; so falling towards Kent, I was at a stand what I should do there, having no acquaintance, and but little money, yet whatever hardship I met withal, I was resolved for Gravesend, so with much ado I got that night to a town called Bilrekey, it being in the height of summer, and in that town then having no friends, and I think but six pence, I lodged in the Church porch all night, so when day appeared, I took my journey for Gravesend, and in the way I spent a groat of my six pence, and the other two pence carried me over the water; so being in the town, I enquired for some strange opinionated people in the town, not in the least owning of them, but seemingly to ensnare them, which they directed me to one Rugg a victualler, so coming in, though having no monies, yet I called for a pot of ale, so after a few words uttered by me, the man was greatly taken with my sayings, in so much that he brought me some bread and cheese, with which I was refreshed, and bid me take no care, for I should want for nothing, you being the man that writ The Pilgrimage of Saints, I have had a great desire to see you, with some soldiers and others, so for the present he left me, and informed Cornet Lokier[1] and the rest, that I was in town, who forthwith came to me, and kindly received me, and made way for me to preach in the Blockhouse; so affecting my doctrine, they quartered me in the officers' lodging, and two days after they carried me to Dartford, where there I preached; so against the next Lord's-day came for Gravesend; and there preached in the marketplace, which was such a wonder to the town and country, that some for love, and others for envy, came to hear, that the priest of the town had almost none to hear him, that if the magistrate durst, he would have apprehended me; for I boldly told them God dwelled not in the temple made with hands; neither was any place more holy than another, proving by Scripture, that where two or three were gathered in his name, God was in the midst of them, and that every believer was the temple of God, as it is written, "God dwelleth with a humble and contrite spirit";[1] So after this we went to Maidston and Town-maulin, and there I preached up and down, so at last having given me about five pounds, I went to my wife and promised in two weeks to return again, which I did, but I found not Lokier nor the rest so affectionate as before, for he had a gift of preaching, & therein did seek honor, so suspicious of my blasting his reputation, slighted and persecuted me, so that I left them, and towards Maidston travelled, so one Bulfinch of Town-maulin having friends towards Canterbury, persuaded me to go with them, and so against the next Lord's-day, having no steeple free, we had a gentleman's barn free, where a great company was assembled: then for Sandwich I went, and up and down found friends, so coming to Canterbury there was some six of this way, amongst whom was a maid of pretty knowledge, who with my doctrine was affected, and I affected to lie with her, so that night prevailed, and satisfied my lust, afterwards the maid was highly in love with me, and as gladly would I have been shut of her, lest some danger had ensued, so not knowing I had a wife she was in hopes to marry me, and so would have me lodge with her again, which fain I would, but durst not, then she was afraid I would deceive her, and would travel with me, but by subtlety of reason I persuaded her to have patience, while I went into Suffolk, and settled my occasions, then I would come and marry her, so for the present we parted, and full glad was I that I was from her delivered, so to Maidston I came, and having got some six pounds, returned to my wife, which a while after I went for Kent again, but found none of the people so zealous as formerly, so that my journey was but a small advantage to me, and then I heard the maid had been in those parts to seek me, but not hearing of me, returned home again, and not long after was married to one of that sect, and so there was an end of any further progress into Kent. Then not long after I went for London, and some while remained preaching at Bowe in Mr. Sterry's place,[2] and London-stone, but got nothing; so to Suffolk I went, and having but one child, put it to nurse, intending to go to my parents in Lancashire. So leaving my wife at my cousin Anderton's, I hearing of Seekers in Hartfordshire, went thither, and at last was hired by Mr. Hickman to preach at Peters in St. Albans, so being liked, I was hired for a month longer, so fetched my wife, and there continued till such time the town of Sanderidge took me for their minister, and settled me in the vicarage, where Sir John Garret, Colonel Cox, and Justice Robotom came constantly to hear me, and gave me several gifts, so that in Heaven I was again; for I had a high pitch of free grace, and mightily flown in the sweet discoveries of God, and yet not at all knowing what God was, only an infinite Spirit, which when he pleased did glance into his people the sweet breathings of his Spirit; and therefore preached, it was not sufficient to be a professor, but a possessor of Christ, the possession of which would cause a profession of him, with many such high-flown notions, which at that time I knew no better, nay, and in truth I speak it, there was few of the clergy able to reach me in doctrine or prayer; yet notwithstanding, not being an university man, I was very often turned out of employment, that truly I speak it, I think there was not any poor soul so tossed in judgement, and for a poor livelihood, as then I was. Now in this my prosperity I continued not a year, but the patron being a superstitious cavalier, got an order from the Assembly of Divines to call me in question for my doctrine,[3] and so put in a drunken fellow in my room: and thus was I displaced from my Heaven upon earth, for I was dearly beloved of Smiths and Thrales, the chief of the parish. Well, there was no other way but for London again, and after a while sent my goods for Suffolk by water: now at this I concluded all was a cheat, yea preaching itself, and so with this apprehension went up and down Hartfordshire, Bedford, and Buckinghamshire, and by my subtlety of reason got monies more or less; as of one at Barton, I had twelve pounds for the printing of a book against the commonalty of England,[1] impeaching them for traitors, for suffering the Parliament their servants, to usurp over them, judging the commonwealth was to cut out the form, and shape of their grievances, and send it up to their servants the Parliament to finish, showing, as the commonwealth gave the Parliament power, so they were greater than the Parliament, with matter to the effect. And then being presented to a small parish in Lincolnshire, thither I went, but finding no society to hear, I grew weary thereof, and stayed with some friends at Oford, so with a little monies went home again, and not long after going into Lincolnshire, I preached in several places, that at last Captain Cambridge hearing of me, and was much affected with me, and made me teacher to their company, and said I should have all necessaries provided me and a man allowed me; then I was well recruited and horsed, so that I judged it was the mercy of God to me, my distress being great, and my care for my family. Now after a while our regiment went for London, so though I had preached in Lincoln, Horncastle, Spilsby, and many other places, yet they would excuse me for two months, having no need of preaching at London, so with what monies I had I went to my wife, and stayed there a while, and so came for London. Now our regiment being Twistons [George Twisleton's], quartered in Smith-field, but I quartered in a private house, who was a former friend of mine, asked me if I heard not of a people called My one flesh?[2] I said no, what was their opinion, and how should I speak with any of them? Then she directed me to Giles Calvert.[3] So that now friends, I am travelling further into the wilderness, having now done burning of brick, I must still wander in the mountains and deserts; so coming to Calvert, and making enquiry after such a people, he was afraid I came to betray them, but exchanging a few words in the height of my language, he was much affected, and satisfied I was a friend of theirs, so he writ me a note to Mr. Brush, and the effect thereof was, the bearer hereof is a man of the greatest light I ever yet heard speak, and for ought I know indeed of receiving of him you may receive an angel, so to Mr. Brush I went, and presented this note, which he perused, so bid me come in, and told me if I had come a little sooner, I might have seen Mr. Coppe,[4] who then had lately appeared in a most dreadful manner; so there being Mary Lake, we had some discourse, but nothing to what was in me, however they told me, if next Sunday I would come to Mr. Melis in Trinity-lane, there would that day some friends meet. Now observe at this time my judgment was this, that there was no man could be freed from sin, till he had acted that so called sin, as no sin, this a certain time had been burning within me, yet durst not reveal it to any, in that I

---

[1] in case they might think he had been baptised.

[2] William Sedgwick (ca. 1610–1663), Independent minister with connections to the Seekers, and William Erbery or Erbury (1604–1654), New Model Army chaplain, political radical, and Seeker (see below).

[3] Seekers rejected all forms of the visible church (e.g., baptism), in anticipation of a new dispensation that would supersede those offered by the Old and New Testaments.

[4] William Kiffin or Kiffen (1616–1701), merchant and Baptist minister. In the early 1640s he had been apprenticed to John Lilburne.

[5] No copies are extant of this book, published in 1646; it appears from the title to adopt a Seeker stance.

[6] Giles Randall, a London bookseller responsible for the publication of several books expounding the doctrine of the spirit within.

---

[1] Nicholas Lockyer, later a Leveller agitator and participant in the Putney Debates.

---

[1] Isaiah 57:15.

[2] Mr. Sterry's place possibly Peter Sterry (1613–1672), Independent minister and later Cromwell's chaplain.

[3] Assembly of Divines also known as the Westminster Assembly. A body of 151 nominated members representing a wide spectrum of religious views (though dominated by Presbyterians), appointed by the

---

Long Parliament to reform the English church.

[1] A Generall Charge or, Impeachment of High Treason, in the Name of Justice Equity, against the Communality of England (1647), an uncharacteristically political pamphlet with ideas close to those of the Levellers.

[2] My one flesh Nothing is known of this group other than what Clarkson writes here; he clearly intends readers to associate it with the Ranters (see below).

[3] Giles Calvert a bookseller active in London from 1639 to his death in 1663. In the late 1640s, Calvert published Ranter, Leveller, and Digger works (including about half of Gerrard Winstanley's writings); in the 1650s he published early Quaker literature and was appointed one of the official printers to the Council of State.

[4] Coppe Abiezer Coppe (1619–1672), Ranter. See the introduction to the selections from his A Fiery Flying Roll.

thought none was able to receive it, and a great desire I had to make trial, whether I should be troubled or satisfied therein: so that:

Seventhly, I took my progress into the wilderness, and according to the day appointed, I found Mr. Brush, Mr. Rawlinson, Mr. Goldsmith, with Mary Lake, and some four more: now Mary Lake was the chief speaker, which in her discourse was something agreeable, but not so high as was in me experienced, and what I then knew with boldness declared, in so much that Mary Lake being blind, asked who that was that spake? Brush said the man that Giles Calvert sent to us, so with many more words I affirmed that there was no sin, but as man esteemed it sin, and therefore none can be free from sin, till in purity it be acted as no sin, for I judged that pure to me, which to a dark understanding was impure, for to the pure all things, yea all acts were pure: thus making the Scripture a writing of wax, I pleaded the words of Paul, "That I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there was nothing unclean, but as man esteemed it,"[1] unfolding that was intended all acts, as well as meats and drinks, and therefore till you can lie with all women as one woman, and not judge it sin, you can do nothing but sin: now in Scripture I found a perfection spoken of, so that I understood no man could attain perfection but this way, at which Mr. Rawlinson was much taken, and Sarah Kullin being then present, did invite me to make trial of what I had expressed, so as I take it, after we parted, she invited me to Mr. Wats in Rood-lane, where was one or two more like her self, and as I take it, lay with me that night: now against next Sunday it was noised abroad what a rare man of knowledge was to speak at Mr. Brush's; at which day there was a great company of men and women, both young and old; and so from day to day increased, that now I had choice of what before I aspired after, insomuch that it came to our officer's ears; but having got my pay I left them, and lodged in Rood-lane; where I had clients many, that I was not able to answer all desires, yet none knew our actions but our selves; however I was careful with whom I had to do. This lustful principle increased so much, that the Lord Mayor with his officers came at midnight to take me, but knowing thereof, he was prevented. Now Coppe was by himself with a company ranting and swearing, which I was seldom addicted to, only proving by Scripture the truth of what I acted; and indeed Solomon's writings was the original of my filthy lust, supposing I might take the same liberty as he did, not then understanding his writings was no Scripture, that I was moved to write to the world what my principle was, so brought to public view a book called The Single Eye,[2] so that men and women came from many parts to see my face, and hear my knowledge in these things, being restless till they were made free, as then we called it. Now I being as they said, Captain of the Rant,[3] I had most of the principal women came to my lodging for knowledge, which then was called the Headquarters. Now in the height of this ranting, I was made still careful for moneys for my wife, only my body was given to other women: so our company increasing, I wanted for nothing that heart could desire, but at last it became a trade so common, that all the froth and scum broke forth into the height of this wickedness, yea began to be a public reproach, that I broke up my quarters, and went into the country to my wife, where I had by the way disciples plenty, which then Major Rainsborough,[1] and Doctor Barker was minded for Mr. Walis of Elford, to there I met them, where was no small pleasure and delight in praising of a God that was an infinite nothing, what great and glorious things the Lord had done, in bringing us out of bondage, to the perfect liberty of the sons of God, and yet then the very notion of my heart was to all manner of theft, cheat, wrong, or injury that privately could be acted, though in tongue I professed the contrary, not considering I brake the law in all points (murder excepted:) and the ground of this my judgement was, God had made all things good, so nothing evil but as man judged it; for I apprehended there was no such thing as theft, cheat, or a lie, but as man made it so: for if the creature had brought this world into no propriety, as mine and thine, there had been no such title as theft, cheat, or a lie; for the prevention hereof Everard and Gerrard Winstanley did dig up the Commons,[2] that so all might have to live of themselves, then there had been no need of defrauding, but unity one with another, not then knowing this was the devil's kingdom, and reason lord thereof, and that reason was naturally inclined to love itself above any other, and to gather to itself what riches and honor it could, that so it might bear sway over its fellow creature; for I made it appear to Gerrard Winstanley there was a self-love and vain-glory nursed in his heart, that if possible, by digging to have gained people to him, by which his name might become great among the poor commonalty of the nation, as afterwards in him appeared a most shameful retreat from Georges-hill,[3] with a spirit of pretended universality, to become a real tithe-gatherer of propriety; so what by these things in others, and the experience of my own heart, I saw all that men spake or acted, was a lie, and therefore my thought was, I had as good cheat for something among them, and that so I might live in prosperity with them, and not come under the lash of the law; for here was the thought of my heart from that saying of Solomon, Eccles. 3:19: "For that which befalleth the sons of men, befalleth beasts, even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other, yea, they have all one breath, so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast; for all is vanity, all go into one place, all art of the dust, and all turn to dust again." So that the 18th and 19th verses of Ecclesiastes was the rule and direction of my spirit, to eat and to drink, and to delight my soul in the labor of my mind all the days of my life, which I thought God gave me as my portion, yea to rejoice in it as the gift of God, as said that wise head-piece Solomon; for this then, and ever after, till I came to hear of a commission,[4] was the thought of my heart, that in the grave there was no more remembrance of either joy or sorrow after. For this I conceived, as I knew not what I was before I came in being, so for ever after I should know nothing after this my being was dissolved; but even as a stream from the ocean was distinct in itself while it was a stream, but when returned to the ocean, was therein swallowed and become one with the ocean; so the spirit of man while in the body, was distinct from God, but when death came it returned to God, and so became one with God, yea God itself; yet notwithstanding this, I had sometimes a relenting light in my soul, fearing this should not be so, as indeed it was contrary; but however, then a cup of wine would wash away this doubt.

---

[1] Romans 14:14.

[2] A Single Eye All Light, No Darkness; or Light and Darkness One (London: Giles Calvert, 1650), a sustained argument that no act is intrinsically sinful, that "swearing, drunkenness, adultery, and theft" are sins only if the person committing them believes them to be so. Parliament ordered this "impious and blasphemous" book burned in September 1650.

[3] Clarkson is the only source for this claim to leadership. The term "Ranter" was applied pejoratively to a loose assortment of religious and social radicals of the period; it is unclear how organized a group the Ranters were, or even if they could be called a group at all except in the imagination of those seeking to define unacceptable behaviour in a time of rapid religious, political, and social change.

---

[1] William Rainsborough, a New Model Army officer with Leveller sympathies, and a participant in the Putney debates. In 1650 he was cited in the Commons for countenancing Clarkson's (prohibited) A Single Eye.

[2] William Everard (fl. 1643–49) and Winstanley (ca. 1609–?1676), the major figures of the Digger movement, a form of agrarian communism. They believed that true freedom was possible only when private property was abolished, and that the common lands should be worked to the benefit of all. See the selections from Winstanley.

[3] St. George's Hill, near Cobham in Surrey, the site of the best known Digger experiment in tilling commons and waste lands (summer 1649). The settlement was dispersed as a result of pressure from local landowners. Clarkson implies that Winstanley's "retreat" was from his principles.

[4] a commission the Muggletonian commission.

But now to return to my progress, I came for London again, to visit my old society; which then Mary Midleton of Chelsford and Mrs. Star was deeply in love with me, so having parted with Mrs. Midleton, Mrs. Star and I went up and down the country as man and wife, spending our time in feasting and drinking, so that taverns I called the house of God; and the drawers,[1] messengers; and sack, divinity; reading in Solomon's writings it must be so, in that it made glad the heart of God; which before, and at that time, we had several meetings of great company, and that some, no mean ones neither, where then, and at that time, they improved their liberty, where Doctor Paget's maid stripped herself naked, and skipped among them, but being in a cook's shop, there was no hunger, so that I kept myself to Mrs. Star, pleading the lawfulness of our doings as aforesaid, concluding with Solomon all was vanity. In the interim the Parliament had issued forth several warrants into the hands of church-members, which knew me not by person, but by name, so could not take me, though several times met with me, that at last the Parliament to him that could bring me before them, would give a hundred pounds, so that one Jones for lucre of money, knowing me, got a warrant to apprehend me, who meeting me in the four swans within Bishopsgate, told me he had a warrant from the High Court of Parliament to take me. Let me see it, said I, you have no power to serve it without an officer, and so would have escaped, but could not the people so thronged about me, and a great tumult there was, some fighting with him for an informer, but being a city trooper, and some more of his company with him, they carried me, as I take it, to Alderman Andrews, where they searched my pockets; but having dropped an almanac that had the names of such as sold my books for me, they found it, and carried it to the Parliament, so informed the House I was taken, and likewise desired to know what they should do with me, who gave order to bring me by water to Whitehall-stairs, and deliver me to Barkstead's [Colonel John Barkstead's] soldiers, where after a while a messenger was sent to take me into custody, where I was lodged in Whitehall over against the Dial, and two soldiers guarded me night and day, for which I was to pay; but some being of my principle, they would guard me for nothing, and a captain of theirs would give me moneys; so after two days I was sent for before the committee of Parliament to be examined: so being called in, they asked me my name, my country, with many such frivolous things; so coming to the business in hand, Mr. Weaver being the chairman, asked me if I lodged in Rood-lane? To which I answered, once I did. Wherefore did you lodge there? Because I had a friend there of whom I hired a chamber. What company of men and women were those that came to you? To instance their names I cannot, but some came as they had business with me. Who were those women in black bags that came to you? As now I know not. But Mr. Claxton, we are informed, you have both wives and maids that lodgeth with you there? Those that informed you, let them appear face to face, for I never lay with any but my own wife. No: for you call every woman your wife? I say I lie with none but my wife, according to law, though in the unity of the spirit, I lie with all the creation. That is your sophistication, but deal plainly before God and man, did not you lie with none in Rood-lane, and others' places, besides your wife? I do deal plainly as you, but I being a free-born subject ought not to accuse myself, in that you are to prove your charge. Mr. Claxton confess the truth, it will be better for you:

---

[1] drawers tapsters.

for we assure you shall suffer no wrong. What I know is truth, I have, and shall speak. What did you at Mrs. Croes' in Rederiff? I had conference with the people. As you were preaching, you took a pipe of tobacco, and women came and saluted you, and others above was committing adultery. This is more than I remember? No, you will not remember any thing against you: but surely you cannot but remember this almanac is yours, and these men's names your own handwriting. Yea I did write them. Was not these men your disciples? They were not mine, but their own. Did not Major Rainsborough, and the rest lie with other women? Not as I know. But Mr. Claxton do you remember this book is yours? I never saw that before, but may be some of the like nature I have. Why, did not you write this book? That you are to prove. Here is the two first letters of your name. What is that to me? it may serve for other names as well as mine. Did not Major Rainsborough and these men give you monies to print this book? How should they give me monies to print that which neither I nor they knew of. This book must be yours, for it speaks your language, suitable to your practise. I being but a stranger to you, how should you know my language or practise? Though you will confess nothing, yet we have witness to prove it. Let them be examined in my presence: so calling Jones that betrayed me, did you never see Mr. Claxton lie with no woman? I have heard him talk of such things, but saw no act. Though you cannot, there is some will, therefore Mr. Claxton deal plainly, that though you lay with none, yet did not you allow it none others? I saw no evil in them to disallow; and gentlemen let me speak freely to you, suppose I were your servant, entrusted with your secrets, and knew that you were traitors against this present power, would you take it well for me to impeach you, and bear witness against you? At which, either the Earl of Denby, or the Earl of Salisbury said, no: such a servant deserved to be hanged; at which they laughed and said, this was a case of another nature. I say as it is in the one, so it is in the other. Well then, Mr. Claxton, you will not confess the truth. You say you have witness to prove it. However the truth I have confessed, and no more can be expected. Do not you know one Coppe? Yea I know him, and that is all, for I have not seen him above two or three times. Then they said, this is a sad principle, which if not routed, all honest men will have their wives deluded. One of them said, he feared not his wife she was too old, so they dismissed me to the place from whence I came, and said we shall report it to the House, that so with speed you may have your trial, but I think it was about fourteen weeks before I received the sentence of the House, which took up the House a day and half work, as John Lilborn said,[1] stood the nation in a thousand pounds. And thus they sat spending the commonwealth's monies, about frivolous things. Now having passed some votes, at last they carried the day for my banishment, which vote that day was printed, and pasted upon many posts about the city of London, that Lawrence Claxton "should remain in New-Bridewel a month and a day, and then the High Sheriff of London conduct him to the High Sheriff in Kent, and so to be banished England, Scotland and Ireland, and the Territories thereof during life, and Major Rainsborough to be no longer Justice during his life."[2] Now when my month was expired, their vote was not executed, so after a while I came forth of prison, and then took my journey with my wife to my house in Stainfield, and from thence I took my progress into Cambridgeshire, to the towns of Foxen and Orwel where still I continued my ranting principle, with a high hand.

Now in the interim I attempted the art of astrology and physic, which in a short time I gained, and therewith travelled up and down

---

[1] John Lilburne (1615–1657), Leveller leader and pamphleteer; Lilburne often refers to financial issues in his writings.

[2] The banishment was ordered on September 17, 1650.

Cambridgeshire and Essex, as Linton and Saffronwalden, and other country towns, improving my skill to the utmost, that I had clients many, yet could not be therewith contented, but aspired to the art of magic, so finding some of Doctor Ward's and Woolerd's manuscripts,[1] I improved my genius to fetch goods back that were stolen, yea to raise spirits, and fetch treasure out of the earth, with many such diabolical actions, as a woman of Sudbury in Suffolk assisted me, pretending she could do by her witch-craft whatever she pleased; now something was done, but nothing to what I pretended, however monies I gained, and was up and down looked upon as a dangerous man, that the ignorant and religious people was afraid to come near me, yet this I may say, and speak the truth, that I have cured many desperate diseases, and one time brought from Glenford to a village town wide of Laxham to Doctor Clark,[2] two women and one man that had bewitched his daughter, who came in a frosty cold night, tormented in what then Clark was a doing, and so after that his daughter was in perfect health, with many such like things, that it puffed up my spirit, and made many fools believe in me, for at that time I looked upon all was good, and God the author of all, and therefore have several times attempted to raise the devil, that so I might see what he was, but all in vain, so that I judged all was a lie, and that there was no devil at all, nor indeed no God but only nature, for when I have perused the Scriptures I have found so much contradiction as then I conceived, that I had no faith in it at all, no more than a history, though I would talk of it, and speak from it for my own advantage, but if I had really then related my thoughts, I neither believed that Adam was the first creature, but that there was a creation before him, which world I thought was eternal, judging that land of Nod where Cain took his wife, was inhabited a long time before Cain, not considering that Moses was the first writer of Scripture, and that we were to look no further than what there was written; but I really believed no Moses, Prophets, Christ, or Apostles, nor no resurrection at all: for I understood that which was life in man, went into that infinite bulk and bigness, so called God, as a drop into the ocean, and the body rotted in the grave, and forever so to remain.

In the interim came forth a people called Quakers,[3] with whom I had some discourse, from whence I discerned that they were no further than burning brick in Egypt, though in a more purer way than their fathers before them; also their God, their devil, and their resurrection and mine, was all one, only they had a righteousness of the law which I had not; which righteousness I then judged was to be destroyed, as well as my unrighteousness, and so kept on my trade of preaching, not minding anything after death, but as aforesaid, as also that great cheat of astrology and physic I practised, which not long after I was beneficed in Mersland, at Terington and St. Johns, and from thence went to Snetsham in Norfolk, where I was by all the town received, and had most of their hands for the presentation, then for London I went, and going to visit Chetwood my former acquaintance, she, with the wife of Middleton, related to me the two witnesses;[4] so having some conference with Reeve the prophet, and reading his writings, I was in a trembling condition; the nature thereof you may read in the introduction of that book (Look about you, for the

---

[1] possibly Samuel Ward (d. 1643) of Cambridge. Woolerd remains unidentified.

[2] possibly Gilbert Clark, a student of Samuel Ward's.

[3] Quakers founded by George Fox (1624–1691) in the late 1640s. Their reliance on the inner light led Quakers to dispense with consecrated buildings, ordained ministers, or set liturgy of any kind; their refusal to take oaths, pay tithes, or acknowledge social hierarchy led to widespread persecution. Clarkson wrote against the Quakers in The Quakers Downfal (1659).

[4] Muggleton and Reeve, who claimed to be the "two witnesses" promised in Revelation 11:3–6.

devil that you fear is in you)[1] considering how sadly I had these many years spent my time, and that in none of these seven churches could I find the true God, or right devil;[2] for indeed that is not in the least desired, only to prate of him, and pray to him we knew not, though it is written, "It is life eternal to know the true God,"[3] yet that none of them minds, but from education believeth him to be an eternal, infinite spirit, here, there, and everywhere; which after I was fully persuaded, that there was to be three commissions upon this earth,[4] to bear record to the three titles above, and that this was the last of those three: upon the belief of this I came to the knowledge of the two seeds, by which I knew the nature and form of the true God, and the right devil, which in all my travels through the seven churches I could never find, in that now I see, it was only from the revelation of this commission to make it known.

Now being at my journey's end, as in point of notional worship, I came to see the vast difference of faith from reason, which before I conclude, you shall hear, and how that from faith's royal prerogative all its seed in Adam was saved, and all reason in the fallen angel was damned, from whence I came to know my election and pardon of all my former transgressions; after which my revelation growing, moved me to publish to the world, what my Father was, where he liveth, and the glory of his house, as is confirmed by my writings now in public; so that now I can say, of all my formal righteousness, and professed wickedness, I am stripped naked, and in room thereof clothed with innocency of life, perfect assurance, and seed of discerning with the spirit of revelation.

[The autobiographical narrative over, the text continues with a theological question-and-answer section about Muggletonian doctrine.]

—1660

---

[1] by Clarkson, published in 1659.

[2] seven churches the seven churches he passed through from the Church of England to Ranting; Clarkson probably chose the number (and consequently organized his narrative) to coincide with the "seven churches" of Revelation 1:4.

[3] John 17:3.

[4] three commissions a doctrine based ultimately on the writings of the mystic Joachim of Fiore (ca. 1132–1202), in which all of history is divided into three great periods: the age of the Father, lived under Law until the end of the Old Testament dispensation; the age of the Son, lived under grace until the end of the New Testament dispensation; and the forthcoming age of the Spirit. Joachimite ideas, with their promise of the dawning of a new religious order, were very popular among the radical religious sects of the 1640s.

Richard Overton

fl. 1640 – 1664

Little is known of Overton's life before 1640, though he might be the Richard Overton who matriculated at Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1631 and acted in the college company. Some scholars think he spent the 1630s as a professional actor and/or playwright; this speculation is based primarily on the "theatricality" of his polemical writing. Overton began his rise to prominence in 1640–42, when he published numerous pamphlets attacking the foundations of English religious, political, legal, and economic life. Using an imaginative variety of satiric and fictive strategies, Overton targeted episcopacy, economic monopolies, the civil law, and royal councillors, often singling out individuals, particularly archbishop William Laud, for special attention. In late 1642 or 1643, he apparently spent some time in the radical religious communities in Amsterdam. He also wrote Mans Mortalitie (1644), a theological work in which he denied the immortality of the soul between death and the Resurrection; along with Milton's Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1644), this tract provoked the Parliamentary investigation of unlicensed printing that would lead Milton to write Areopagitica (1644). In 1645–46, Overton attacked the growing intolerance of the victorious Presbyterians in a series of pamphlets that employed the persona of Martin Marpriest (adopted from the late sixteenth-century Martin Marprelate tracts). The best known is The Araignement of Mr. Persecution (1645), an allegorical trial that might have inspired John Bunyan's Vanity Fair trial scene in The Pilgrim's Progress. In the second half of the 1640s, Overton worked closely with other Leveller leaders, writing or co-writing dozens of pamphlets and newspaper editorials calling for the political, social, and economic reforms that constituted the basis of the Leveller programme. Little again is known of Overton after the waning of the Levellers in 1649. In the 1650s he was involved in various shadowy plots aimed against Oliver Cromwell, and a warrant for his arrest in 1663 implies he survived into the Restoration. But the place and date of his death are unknown.

The following narrative is excerpted from The Picture of the Councel of State (1649), which contains narratives by Overton, John Lilburne, and Thomas Prince describing their arrest in March 1649 for their role in the publication of The Second Part of England's New Chains Discovered (1649), an attack on Cromwell's Council of State. Along with William Walwyn, all were imprisoned for their refusal to answer questions and thereby incriminate themselves. Overton spends much of his narrative refuting the politically resonant charge that he was caught sleeping with another man's wife. Political and religious radicals of the period were frequently accused of advocating free love (the "community of women," as the officer who arrests Overton puts it). The charge stemmed largely from anxiety that these radical platforms threatened all property—which included wives—and concomitant gender hierarchies: what might wives do if given this freedom? Characteristic of Overton's writing is his use of dialogue to dramatize his confrontation with authorities, and his legalistic reproduction of the actual documents involved. For more on the Levellers, see the selections from the Putney Debates and William Walwyn.

◆

The Proceedings of the Council of State Against Richard Overton, now Prisoner in the Tower of London, 1649

Upon the twenty eighth of March 1649, a party of horse and foot commanded by Lieut. Colonel [Daniel] Axtel (a man highly pretending to religion,) came betwixt five and six of the morning to the house where I then lodged, in that hostile manner to apprehend me, as by the sequel appeared.

But now, to give an account of the particular circumstances attending that action, may seem frivolous, as to the public; but in regard the Lieutenant Colonel was pleased so far to out-strip the capacity of a saint, as to betake himself to the venomed arrows of lying calumnies and reproaches, to wound (through my sides) the too much forsaken cause of the poor oppressed people of this long wasted Commonwealth: like as it hath been the practice of all perfidious tyrants in all ages. I shall therefore trouble the reader with the rehearsal of all the occurrent circumstances which attended his apprehension of me, that the world may clearly judge betwixt us. And what I here deliver from my pen as touching this matter, I do deliver it to be set upon the record of my account, as I will answer it at the dreadful day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be opened, and every one receive according to his deeds done in the flesh: and God so deal with me at that day, as in this thing I speak the truth: And if the rancorous spirits of men will not be satisfied therewith, I have no more to say but this, to commit myself to God in the joyful rest of a good conscience, and not value what insatiable envy can suggest against me. Thus then to the business itself.

In the house where I then lodged that night there lived three families, one of the gentlemen being my very good friend, with whom all that night he and I only lay in bed together, and his wife and child lay in another bed by themselves: and when they knocked at the door, the gentleman was up and ready, and his wife also, for she rose before him, and was suckling her child: and I was also up, but was not completely dressed; and of this the gentleman (her husband) hath taken his oath before one of the Masters of the Chancery.[1] And we three were together in a chamber discoursing, he and I intending about our business immediately to go abroad, and hearing them knock, I said, Yonder they are come for me. Whereupon, some books that lay upon the table in the room, were thrown into the beds betwixt the sheets (and the books were all the persons he found there in the beds, except he took us for printed papers, and then there were many;) and the gentleman went down to go to the door; and as soon as the books were cast aside, I went to put on my boots; and before the gentleman could get down the stairs, a girl of the house had opened the door, and let them in, and so meeting the gentleman upon the stairs, Axtel commanded some of the soldiers to seize upon him, and take him into custody, and not suffer him to come up: And I hearing a voice from below, that one would speak with me, I went to the chamber door (it being open) and immediately appeared a musketeer (Corporal Neaves, as I take it) and he asked me if my name were not Mr. Overton: I answered, it was Overton; and so I sat me down upon the bed side to pull on my other boot, as if I had but new risen, the better to shelter the books; and that Corporal was the first man that entered into the chamber, and after him one or two more, and then followed the Lieutenant Colonel; and the Corporal told me, I was the man they were come for, and bade me make me ready: and the Lieutenant Colonel when he came in, asked me how I did, and told me, they would use me civilly, and bid me put on my boots, and I should have time enough to make me ready: And immediately upon this the Lieutenant Colonel began to abuse me with scandalous language, and asked me, if the gentlewoman who then sat suckling her child, were not one of my wives, and averred that she and I lay together that night. Then the gentleman hearing his wife called whore, and abused so shamefully, got from the soldiers, and ran up stairs; and coming into the room where we were, he taxed the Lieutenant Colonel for abusing of his wife and me, and told him, that he and I lay together that night: But the Lieutenant Colonel, out of that little discretion he had about him, took the gentleman by the hand, saying, How dost thou, brother cuckold? using other shameful ignorant and abusive language, not worthy repeating. Well, upon this his attempt thus to make me his prisoner, I demanded his warrant; and he showed me a warrant from the Council of State, with Mr. Bradshaw's hand to it,[1] and with the broad seal of England to it, (as he called it) to apprehend Lieutenant Colonel Lilburne, Mr. Walwyn, Mr. Prince,[2] and myself, wherever they could find us. And as soon as I was dressed, he commanded the musketeers to take me away; and as soon as I was down stairs, he remanded me back again into the chamber where he took me, and then told me, he must search the house, and commanded the trunks to be opened, or they should be broken open: and commanded one of the soldiers to search my pockets. I demanded his warrant for that: He told me, he had a warrant, I had seen it. I answered, That was for the apprehension of my person; and bid him show his warrant for searching my pockets, and the house: and according to my best remembrance, he replied, He should have a warrant. So little respect had he to law, justice, and reason; and vi & armis [by force of arms], right or wrong, they fell to work, (inconsiderately devolving all law, right, and freedom betwixt man and man into their sword; for the consequence of it extends from one to all) and his party of armed horse and foot (joined to his over-hasty exorbitant will) was his irresistible warrant: And so they searched my pockets, and took all they found in them, my money excepted, and searched the trunks, chests, beds, &c. And the Lieutenant Colonel went into the next chamber, where lived an honest soldier (one of the Lieutenant General's [Cromwell's] regiment) and his wife, and took away his sword, and vilified the gentleman and his wife, as if she had been his whore, and took him prisoner for lying with a woman, as he said. He also went up to the gentleman who lets out the rooms, and cast the like imputations upon his wife, as also upon a maid that lives in the house, and gave it out in the court and street, amongst the soldiers and neighbours that it was a bawdy-house, and that all the women that lived in it were whores, and that he had taken me in bed with another man's wife. Well, he having ransacked the house, found many books in the beds, and taken away all such writings, papers, and books, of what sort or kind soever, that he could find, and given them to the soldiers, (amongst which he took away certain papers which were my former meditations upon the works of the creation, entitled God's Word confirmed by his Works;[3] wherein I endeavoured the probation of a God,[4] a creation, a state of innocence, a fall, a resurrection, a restorer, a day of judgment, &c. barely from the consideration of things visible and created: and these papers I reserved to perfect and publish as soon as I could have any rest from the turmoils of this troubled Commonwealth: and for the loss of those papers I am only troubled: all that I desire of my enemies' hands, is but the restitution of those papers, that whatever becomes of me, they may not be buried in oblivion, for they may prove useful to many). Well, when the Lieutenant Colonel had thus far mistaken himself, his religion and reason thus unworthily to abuse me and the household in that scandalous nature, unbeseeming the part of a gentleman, a soldier, or a Christian (all which titles he claimeth) and had transgressed the limits of his authority, by searching, ransacking, plundering, and taking away what he pleased, he marched me in the head of his party to Paul's Church-yard, and by the way commanded the soldiers to lead me by the arm; and from thence, with a guard of three companies of foot, and a party of horse, they forced me to Whitehall; and the soldiers carried the books some upon their muskets, some under their arms: but by the way (upon our march) the Corporal that first entered the room (whose word in that respect is more valuable than Axtel's) confessed unto me (in the audience of the soldier they took also with them from the place of my lodging) that the Lieutenant Colonel had dealt uncivilly and unworthily with me, and that there was no such matter of taking me in bed with an other woman, &c. And this the said soldier will depose upon his oath.

---

[1] hath taken his oath Overton reproduces the affidavit at the end of the narrative. The Chancery was the court of the Lord Chancellor, a Master one of the Chancellor's twelve assistants.

---

[1] John Bradshaw (1602–1659), president from 1649–1652 of the Council of State, the country's executive body throughout the Interregnum; Bradshaw presided at the trial of Charles I.

[2] The three Leveller leaders arrested at the same time as Overton: John Lilburne (1615–1657), a Lieutenant-Colonel of dragoons when he left the Parliamentary army in 1645; William Walwyn (1600–1680); and Thomas Prince (fl. 1640–1653). Lilburne and Walwyn both published numerous pamphlets on liberty and toleration in addition to their work on behalf of the Leveller cause.

[3] This book, apparently a theological treatise, does not appear to have been subsequently published.

[4] probation proof, demonstration.

When I came to Whitehall, I was delivered into the hands of Adjutant General Stubber, where I found my worthy friends Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburne, Mr. Walwyn, and Mr. Prince in the same captivity under the martial usurpation: and after I had been there a while, upon the motion of Lieutenant Colonel Lilburne, that Lieutenant Colonel Axtel, and I might be brought face to face about the matter of scandal that was raised, he coming there unto us, and questioned about the report he had given out, there averred, that he took me abed with another man's wife; and being asked if he saw us actually in bed together, he answered, we were both in the chamber together, and the woman had scarce got on her coats, (which was a notorious untruth) and she sat suckling of her child, and from these circumstances he did believe we did lie together, and that he spake according to his conscience what he believed: These were his words, or to the like effect, to which I replied, as aforementioned. But how short this was of a man pretending so much conscience and sanctity as he doth I leave to all unprejudiced people to judge: it is no point of Christian faith (to which [he] is so great a pretender) to foment a lie for a wicked end, and then to plead it his belief and conscience, for the easier credence of his malicious aspersion: but though the words "belief" and "conscience" be too specious evangelical terms, no truly conscientious person will say they are to be used, or rather abused to such evil ends. Well in that company I having taxed him for searching my pockets, and without warrant, he answered; that because I was so base a fellow, he did what he could to destroy me. And then the better to make up the measure of the reproach he had raised, he told us, it was now an opinion amongst us to have community of women;[1] I desired him to name one of that opinion, he answered me, It may be that I was of that opinion, and I told him, it may be that he was of that opinion, and that my may be was as good as his may be: whereupon he replied, that I was a saucy fellow. Surely the Lieutenant Colonel at that instance had forgot the bugget from whence he dropped,[2] I presume when he was a peddler in Harfordshire he had not so lofty an esteem of himself, but now the case is altered, the gentleman is become one of the grandees of the Royal palace:

---

[1] community of women free love; see headnote. An accusation also made against the Ranters and other religious radicals.

[2] bugget a budget; a pouch, bag, or wallet, usually made of leather (OED budget 1); referring to the officer's "peddler" pedigree.

one of the (mock-) Saints in season, now judging the earth, inspired with providence and opportunities at pleasure of their own invention as quick and nimble as an hocas spocas, or a fiend in a juggler's box, they are not flesh and blood, as are the wicked, they are all spiritual, all heavenly, the pure chameleons of the time, they are this or that or what you please, in a trice, in a twinkling of an eye; there is no form, no shape that you can fancy among men, into which their spiritualities are not changeable at pleasure; but for the most part, these holy men present themselves in the perfect figure of angels of light, of so artificial resemblance, enough to deceive the very elect if possible, that when they are entered into their sanctum sanctorum [holy of holies], their holy convocation at Whitehall, they then seem no other than a choir of archangels, of cherubims and seraphims, chanting their false holy Hallelujahs of victory over the people, having put all principalities and powers under their feet, and the Kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the Kingdom is theirs, and all dominions, even all the people shall serve and obey them, (excuse me, it is but their own counterfeit dialect, under which their pernicious hypocrisy is veiled that I retort into their bosoms, that you may know them within and without, not that I have any intention of reflection upon holy writ) and now these men of Jerusalem (as I may term them) those painted sepulchres of Sion after their long conjuring together of providences, opportunities and seasons one after another, dressed out to the people in the sacred shade of God's time, (as after the language of their new fangled saintships I may speak it) they have brought their seasons to perfection, even to the season of seasons, now to rest themselves in the large and full enjoyment of the creature for a time, two times and half a time, resolving now to wear out the true asserters of the people's freedom,[1] and to change the time and laws to their exorbitant ambition and will; while all their promises, declarations and engagements to the people must be nulled and made cyphers, and cast aside as waste paper, as unworthy the fulfilment, or once the remembrance of those gentlemen, those magnificent stems of our new upstart nobility, for now it is not with them as in the days of their engagement at Newmarket and Triploe heath,[2] but as it was in the days of old with corrupt persons, so is it in ours, Tempora mutantur—.[3]

But to proceed to the story: the Lieutenant Colonel did not only show his weakness, (or rather his iniquity) in his dealing with me, but he convents the aforesaid soldier of Lieutenant General's regiment before divers of the officers at Whitehall, and there he renders the reason wherefore he made him a prisoner, because said he, he takes Overton's part, for he came and asked him how he did, and bid him be of good comfort, and he lay last night with a woman: To which he answered, It is true, but the woman was my wife. Then they proceeded to ask, when they were married, and how they should know she was his wife, and he told them where and when, but that was not enough, they told him, he must get a certificate from his Captain that he was married to her and then he should have his liberty.

Friends and country-men, where are you now? what shall you do that have no captains to give you certificates? sure you must have the banns of matrimony re-asked at the Conventicle of Gallants at Whitehall, or at least you must thence have a congregational licence, (without offence be it spoken to true churches) to lie with your wives, else how shall your wives be chaste or the children legitimate? they have now taken cognizance over your wives and beds, whither will they next? Judgement is now come into the hand of the armed-fury saints. My masters have a care what you do, or how you look upon your wives, for the new Saints militant are paramount all laws, King, Parliament, husbands, wives, beds, &c. But to let that pass.

---

[1] true asserters of the people's freedom the Levellers.

[2] their engagement at Newmarket and Triploe heath high points of army radicalism and unity: a general rendezvous of the New Model Army was held in Newmarket on June 4–5, 1647 during which officers and soldiers engaged not to disband until various grievances had been redressed; a second rendezvous was held on Triploe Heath, not far from Cambridge, a few days later on June 10.

[3] Tempora mutantur nos et metamur in illis "times change and we change with them," an epigram attributed to John Owen (1560?–1622).

Towards the evening we were sent for, to go before the Council of State at Darby-house, and after Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburne, and Mr. Walwyn had been before them, then I was called in, and Mr. Bradshaw spake to me, to this effect.

Master Overton, the Parliament hath seen a book, entitled The Second Part of England's New Chains Discovered, and hath passed several votes thereupon, and hath given order to this Council to make inquiry after the authors and publishers thereof, and proceed upon them as they see cause, and to make a return thereof unto the House: And thereupon he commanded Mr. Frost their secretary to read over the said votes unto me, which were to this purpose, as hath since been publicly proclaimed:

Die Martis 27 Martii, 1649. [Tuesday 27 March]

The House being informed of a scandalous and seditious book printed, entitled, The Second Part of England's New Chains Discovered.

The said book was this day read.

Resolved upon the question by the Commons assembled in Parliament, That this printed paper, entitled, The Second Part of England's New Chains Discovered etc. doth contain most false, scandalous, and reproachful matter, and is highly seditious and destructive to the present government, as it is now declared and settled by Parliament, tends to division and mutiny in the army, and the raising of a new war in the Commonwealth, and to hinder the present relief of Ireland, and to the continuing of free-quarter:[1] And this House doth further declare, that the authors, contrivers, and framers of the said papers, are guilty of high treason, and shall be proceeded against as traitors; and that all persons whatsoever, that shall join with, or adhere unto, and hereafter voluntarily aid or assist the authors, framers, and contrivers of the aforesaid paper, in the prosecution thereof, shall be esteemed as traitors to the Commonwealth, and be proceeded against accordingly.

Then Mr. Bradshaw spake to me much after this effect:

Master Overton, this Council having received information, that you had a hand in the contriving and publishing of the book, sent for you by their warrant to come before them; besides, they are informed of other circumstances at your apprehension against you, that there were divers of the books found about you. Now Mr. Overton, if you will make any answer thereunto, you have your liberty.

To which I answered in these words, or to the like effect:

Sir, what title to give you, or distinguish you by, I know not; indeed, I confess I have heard by common report, that you go under the name of a Council of State; but for my part, what you are I cannot well tell; but this I know, that had you (as you pretend) a just authority from the Parliament, yet were not your authority valuable or binding, till solemnly proclaimed to the people: so that for my part, in regard you were pleased thus violently to bring me before you, I shall humble crave at your hands, the production of your authority, that I may know what it is, for my better information how to demean my self.[2]

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, we are satisfied in our authority.

---

[1] free-quarter the obligatory provision of room and board to soldiers.

[2] your authority A few months earlier, King Charles had at his trial challenged the authority of a judicial body headed by John Bradshaw in similar terms, though for different reasons.

R. OVERTON Sir, if I may not know it, however I humbly desire, that I may be delivered from under the force of the military power; for having a natural and legal title to the rights of an Englishman, I shall desire that I may have the benefit of the law of England, (which law taketh no cognizance of the sword). And in case you or any man pretend matter of crime against me, in order to a trial, I desire I may be resigned up to the civil magistrate, and receive a free and legal trial in some ordinary court of justice, according to the known law of the land; that if I be found a transgressor of any established declared law of England, on God's name let me suffer the penalty of that law.

Further, Sir, in case I must still be detained a prisoner, it is my earnest desire, that I may be disposed to some prison under the jurisdiction and custody of the civil authority: For, as for my own part, I cannot in conscience (to the common right of the people) submit myself in any wise to the trial or custody of the sword; for I am no soldier, neither hath the army any authority over me, I owe them neither duty nor obedience, they are no sheriffs, justices, bailiffs, constables, or other civil magistrates: So that I cannot, neither will I submit unto their power, but must take the boldness to protest against it.

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, if this be your answer, you may withdraw.

R. OVERTON: Sir, I humbly desire a word or two more.

LIEUT. GEN. [CROMWELL]: Let him have liberty.

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, you may speak on.

R. OVERTON: Gentlemen, for future peace and security sake, I shall humbly desire to offer this unto your consideration; namely, that if you think it meet: That you would choose any four men in England, pick and choose where you please; and we (for my part, I speak it freely in my own behalf, and I think I may say as much in theirs) shall endeavour to the utmost of our power by a fair and moderate discourse, to give the best account and satisfaction concerning the matter of difference betwixt us, that we can, that if possible, peace and agreement may be made: And this, after the weakness of my small understanding, I judge to be a fair and reasonable way: if you shall be pleased to accept of it, you may; if not, you may use your pleasure; I am in your hand, do with me as you think good, I am not able to hinder you.

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, if this be all you have to say, withdraw.

R. OVERTON: Sir, I have said.

So I was commanded into a little withdrawing room close by the Council; and I supposed they would have taken my motion into consideration: But after I had been there a while, I was ordered to the room again, where Lieutenant Colonel Lilburne, Mr. Walwyn, &c. were.

And now that it may be clear unto the whole world, that we heartily desire the prevention and cessation of all differences and divisions that may be bred and break forth in the land, to the hazard, if not actual embroilment thereof in a new exundation of blood in the prosecution of this controversy,[1] we do freely from the heart (that heaven and earth may bear witness betwixt our integrity to the peace of the Commonwealth, and their dealings with us) make this proffer as to be known to the whole world; that we (in the first place I may best speak for myself; and I so far know the minds of Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburne, Mr. Walwyn, and Mr. Prince, that I may as freely speak it in their behalfs) will, by the assistance of God, give any four men in England that they shall choose (although the Lieutenant General, and the Commissary General be two of them)[2] a free and moderate debate (if they shall think it no scorn) touching all matters of difference betwixt us, as to the business of the Commonwealth (for therein doth consist the controversy betwixt us) that if possibly, new flames and combustions may be quenched, and a thorough and an hearty composure be made betwixt us, upon the grounds of an equal and just government. And that the business may be brought to a certain issue betwixt us, let them, if they please, choose two umpires out of the House, or elsewhere, and we will choose two; and for our parts, we shall stand to the free determination or sentence, that these four, or any three of them shall pass betwixt us. Or else, if they please but to center upon the Agreement of the People with amendments according to our late sad apprehensions,[1] presented to the House upon the 26 of February 1648 [that is, 1649], for our parts, we shall seal a contract of oblivion for all bypast matters, relating either to good name, life, liberty or estate; saving, of making accompt for the public monies of the Commonwealth: And in such an agreement we will center, to live and die with them in the prosecution thereof. And if this be not a fair and peaceable motion, let all well-minded people judge.

---

[1] exundation overflow, inundation (OED).

[2] Commissary General Henry Ireton (1611–1651), Commissary-General of Horse, Oliver Cromwell's son-in-law, and a leader in the negotiations among the army, the King, and the Parliament in the later 1640s.

But if nothing will satisfy them but our blood, we shall not (through the might of God) be sparing of that, to give witness to the right and freedom of this Commonwealth against their usurpation and tyranny; but let them know this, that building hath a bad foundation that is laid in the blood of honest men, such as their own knowledge and consciences bear them record, are faithful to the common interest and safety of the people: out of our ashes may possibly arise their destruction. This I know, God is just, and he will repay the blood of the innocent upon the head of the tyrant. But to return to the narrative.

After some small space that we had all been before them, we were called in again; first, Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburne, then Mr. Walwyn, and then myself: And coming before them the second time, Mr. Bradshaw, spake to this effect:

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, the Council hath taken your answer into consideration, and they are to discharge their duty to the Parliament, who hath ordered them to make enquiry after the book, entitled, The Second Part of England's New Chains, &c. And thereof they are to give an account to the House: And the Council hath ordered me to put this question unto you. Whether you had an hand in the contriving or publishing this book, or no?

R. OVERTON: Sir, I well remember, that since you cut off the King's head, you declared (or at least the Parliament, from whence you pretend the derivation of your authority) that you would maintain the known fundamental laws of the land, and preserve them inviolable, that the meanest member of this Commonwealth, with the greatest, might freely and fully enjoy the absolute benefit thereof. Now gentlemen, it is well known, and that unto yourselves, that in cases criminal, as now you pretend against me, it is against the fundamental laws of this Commonwealth to proceed against any man by way of interrogatories against himself, as you do against me: and I believe (gentlemen) were you in our cases, you would not be willing to be so served yourselves; (what you would have other men do unto you, that do you unto them.) So that for my part, gentlemen, I do utterly refuse to make answer unto any thing in relation to my own person, or any man or men under heaven; but do humbly desire, that if you intend by way of charge to proceed to any trial of me, that it may be (as before I desired at your hands) by the known established law of England, in some ordinary court of justice appointed for such cases (extraordinary ways being never to be used, but abominated, where ordinary ways may be had) and I shall freely submit to what can be legally made good against me.

---

[1] Agreement of the People a revised version of the Leveller manifesto, first published in October 1647 (see the selection from the Putney Debates), republished by Lilburne, Walwyn, Prince, and Overton in May 1649 while they were prisoners in the Tower.

But I desire that in the mean time you would be pleased to take notice, that though in your eye I seem so highly criminal, as by those votes you pretend; yet am I guilty of nothing, not of this paper, entitled, The Second Part of England's New Chains, in case I had never so much an hand in it, till it be legally proved: for the law looketh upon no man to be guilty of any crime, till by law he be convicted; so that, I cannot esteem myself guilty of any thing, till by the law you have made the same good against me.

And further sir, I desire you to take notice, that I cannot be guilty of the transgression of any law, before that law be in being: it is impossible to offend that which is not; where there is no law there is no transgression: Now, those votes on which you proceed against me are but of yesterday's being; so that, had I an hand in that book whereof you accuse me, provided it were before those votes, you cannot render me guilty by those votes: If I had done any thing in it, since the votes (provided you had solemnly proclaimed the same) then you might have had some colour to have proceeded against me: but I have but newly heard the votes, and since that you know I could do nothing.

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, I would correct your judgment in one thing: We are not upon any trial of you; we are only upon the discharge of our duty, and that trust committed unto us by the Parliament, to make enquiry after the authors, contrivers and framers of the book; and having information against yourself and your comrades, we sent for you, and are to return your answer to the House, howsoever you dispute their authority.

R. OVERTON: Dispute their authority, Sir! That's but your supposition, and supposition is no proof. And Sir, as you say you are to discharge your duty, so must I discharge mine. And as for matter of trial, I am sure you tax me in a criminal way, and proceed to question me thereupon. But Sir, I conceive it my duty to answer to none of your questions in that nature, and therefore shall utterly refuse.

Now gentlemen, I desire you to take notice, that I do not oppose you as you are members of the Commonwealth; for it is well known, and I think to some here, that I have ever been an opposer of oppression and tyranny, even from the days of the bishops to this present time; and the books that I have writ and published do in some measure bear witness thereof, and it is well known, that my practice hath ever been answerable thereunto. I suppose no man can accuse me, but that I have opposed tyranny where-ever I found it: It is all one to me under what name or title soever oppression be exercised, whether under the name of King, Parliament, Council of State, under the name of this, or that, or any thing else; for tyranny and oppression is tyranny and oppression to me where-ever I find it, and where-ever I find it I shall oppose it, without respect of persons.

I know I am mortal and finite, and by the course of nature my days must have a period, how soon I know not; and the most you can do, it is but to proceed to life; and for my part, I had rather die in the just vindication of the cause of the poor oppressed people of this Commonwealth, than to die in my bed; and the sooner it is, the welcomer, I care not if it were at this instant, for I value not what you can do unto me.

But gentlemen, I humbly desire yet a word or two. I confess, I did not expect so much civility at your hands as I have found, and for the same I return you hearty thanks.

Now whereas you commonly say, That we will have no bottom, center no where, and do tax us by the votes you read unto me, of destruction to the present government, division and mutiny in the army, &c. But here I do profess unto you, as in the presence of the all-seeing God, before whom one day I must give an account of all my actions, that in case you will but conclude upon an equal and just government by way of an Agreement of the People, as was honourably begun by the general officers of the army; and but free that article in it which concerns the liberty of God's worship from the vexatious entanglements and contradictions that are in it, that so conscientious people might freely (without any fear of an insulting clergy) live quietly and peaceably in the enjoyment of their consciences; as also to add unto it a bar against regality, and the House of Lords; as also to make provision in it against the most weighty oppressions of the land; that thereby they may be utterly removed, and for the future prevented, and the people settled in freedom and safety: And then, for my part, neither hand, foot, pen, tongue, mouth or breath of mine shall move against you; but I shall with my utmost power, with hand, heart, life and blood, assist you in the prosecution thereof, and therein center. Try me, and if I fail of my word, then let me suffer.

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, if you have no more to say, you may withdraw.

R. OVERTON: Sir, I humbly crave the further addition of a word or two. Gentlemen, I desire (as I did before) that I may (according to the common right of the people of England) be forthwith freed from under the power of the sword, and be delivered into the hands of the Civil Magistrate, in case I shall be still detained a prisoner; for I am so much against the intrusion of the military power into the seat of the Magistrate, that I had rather you would fetter me legs and hands, and tie me neck and heels together, and throw me into a dungeon, and not allow me so much as the benefit of bread and water till I be starved to death, than I would accept of the best down-bed in England, with suitable accommodation, under the custody of the sword.

PRESIDENT: Mr. Overton, I would correct your judgment a little, you are not under the military power, but under the civil authority; for by the authority of Parliament this Council by their warrant hath sent for you.

R. OVERTON: Sir, it is confessed, that pro forma tantum, for matter of form, ink or paper, I am under the civil authority, but essentially and really, I am under the martial power; for that warrant by which I was taken, was executed upon me by the military power, by a party of horse, and divers companies of foot in arms, and in that hostile manner (like a prisoner of war) I was led captive to Whitehall, and there ever since, till commanded hither, I was kept amongst the soldiers, and I am still under the same force: Besides, Sir, these men are mere soldiers, no officers of the magistracy of England, they brought no warrant to me from any Justice of Peace, neither did carry me before any Justice of Peace, but seized on me, and kept me by their own force: Therefore it is evident and clear to me, that I am not under the civil, but the martial power.

PRESIDENT: Master Overton, if this be your answer, you may withdraw.

R. OVERTON: Sir, I have said.

And so I was conducted to the room where they had disposed Lieutenant Colonel Lilburne and Mr. Walwyn: And the next news we heard from them, was, of our commitment to the Tower, and Master Prince and I were joined as yoke-fellows in one warrant; a copy whereof is as followeth;

> These are to will and require you, to receive herewith into your custody the persons of Master Richard Overton, and Master Thomas Prince, and them safely to keep in your prison of the Tower of London, until you receive further order: They being committed to you upon suspicion of High Treason; of which you are not to fail; and for which this shall be your warrant: Given at the Council of State at Darby-House this twenty-eighth day of March, 1649.

Signed in the name, and by the order of the Council of State, appointed by authority of Parliament.

To the Lieutenant of the Tower,
Jo. Bradshaw, President.

Thus all uninterested, unprejudiced persons, (who measure things as they are in themselves, having nothing in admiration with respect of persons, who simply and sincerely mind the freedom and prosperity of the Commonwealth) may clearly see, as in a glass, by this taste of aristocratical tyranny towards us, a perfect and lively resemblance of the Council of State; Ex pede Leonem, you may know a lion by his foot, or a bear by his paw: by this you may see their nature and kind, what and from whence they are, and whether they tend, by this line you may measure the height depth and breadth of their new architecture of state, and by making our case but yours, you will find yourselves new fettered in chains, such as never England knew or tasted before; that you may (truly if you will but measure it in the consequence thereof,) break forth and cry out, their little finger is thicker than our father's loins; our fathers made our yoke heavy, but these add unto our yoke; our fathers chastised us with whips, but these chastise us with scorpions.[1] Who would have thought in the days of their glorious pretences for freedom, in the days of their engagements, declarations and remonstrances, while they were the hope of the oppressed, the joy of the righteous, and had the mighty confluence of all the afflicted and well-minded people of the land about them, (I principally reflect upon the victors of the times) I say, who would have thought to have heard, seen, or felt such things from their hands as we have done? Who would have thought such glorious and hopeful beginnings should have vanished into tyranny? Who would have thought to have seen those men end in the persecution and imprisonment of persons whom their own consciences tell them, to be men of known integrity to the Commonwealth; and which is so evident and demonstrative, that thousands in this nation can bear record thereof; and that those men should be so devilish, so tyrannical and arbitrary, as after their imprisonment, to rake hell, and skim the devil, to conjure out matter of charge or accusation against them, that they might have their blood, as in our case they have done, sending abroad their bloodhounds to search and pry out in every corner, what could be made out against us, going up and down like roaring lions seeking how they might devour us; one offering Mistress Prince her husband's liberty, and the £1000 they owe him, if he will but discover what he knoweth (as they are pleased to imagine) against us; and not only so, but some members of the House (as Mr. Kiffin confessed in respect of himself)[2] negotiate with the principal leaders of several congregations of religious people about the town, to promote a petition, which was no other but in order to their bloody design against us; that those conscientious people (surprised by their fraudulent suggestions and craft) might (not truly understanding the business) appear in the disownment and discountenance of us; and in the approbation and furtherance of the prosecutors of their bloody votes of High Treason, intentionally breathed out against us: for could they by their delusions overwhelm us once in the odium of religious people; with the venomous contagion of their malicious clamours, bug-bears, reproaches and lies, beget us under the anathema of the churches, then they think they may with ease and applause cut us off; for that's the venom lieth under the leaf, how finely soever they zeal it over; that so our friends and brethren (thus surprised and overtaken) may become our butchers, and think they do God and their country good service while they slay us; but let them beware how they contract the guilt of our blood upon their heads; for assuredly the blood of the innocent will be upon them, and God will repay it; I speak not this to beg their mercy, I abhor it, I bid defiance to what all the men and devils in earth or hell can do against me in the discharge of my understanding and conscience for the good of this Commonwealth; for I know my redeemer liveth, and that after this life I shall be restored to life and immortality, and receive according to the innocency and uprightness of my heart: Otherwise, I tell you plainly, I would not thus put my life and well-being in jeopardy, and expose myself to those extremities and necessities that I do; I would creaturize, be this or that or any thing else, as were the times, eat, drink, and take my pleasure; turn Judas or any thing to flatter great men for promotion: but blessed be the God of heaven and earth, he hath given me a better heart, and better understanding. But to proceed;

---

[1] a reference to II Chronicles 10:10–11.

[2] Mr. Kiffin William Kiffin (1616–1701), a prominent Baptist minister.

That which is most to our astonishment, we understand of a truth, that Master Kiffin (to whose congregation my back-friend Axtel is a retainer) Master Spilsbury, Master Patience (who vilified the book entitled The Second Part of England's New Chains, and yet confessed he never saw it or heard it read, as by evidence can be made good) Mr. Fountain, Mr. Drapes, Mr. Richardson, Mr. Couset, Mr. Tomlins, and Mr. Wade the schoolmaster became their pursuivants or bloodhounds, to hunt us to the Bar of the House of Commons with a petition (most evidently and clearly in pursuance of our blood) entitled The Humble Petition and Representation of the several Churches of God in London commonly (though falsely) called Anabaptists, April 12, 1649, tacitly and curiously in a most religious veil pointing at, and reflecting upon us, as interrupters of the settlement of the liberty and freedom of this Commonwealth;[1] heady, high-minded, unruly, disobedient, presumptuous, self-willed, condemners of rulers, dignities and civil government, whoremasters, drunkards, cheaters, &c. as if it were not with those men, as with the publican and sinner, disowning the book entitled The Second Part, &c. which at that juncture of time, all circumstances duly weighed, was an absolute justification of those votes of High Treason, and of prosecution against us as traitors, for the tendency of those votes were vented at us, and that their own knowledge and consciences tells them to be true, so that they could have done no more in order to our blood, than what they did in that matter, so as to hand it off fairly and covertly preserving to themselves the reputation of the churches of God: and to add unto their impiety against us, they juggle with the churches, present it in the name of the churches of God in London called Anabaptists, and in their names remonstrate that they (meaning the churches, as by the title they speak) neither had nor have heart nor hand in the framing, contriving, abetting, or promotion of the said paper, which though read in several of our public meetings, we do solemnly profess, it was without our consent, being there openly opposed by us. Notwithstanding it is notoriously evident, that the generality of the people dissented from their petition against us; and as upon good intelligence I am informed, they had scarce ten in some congregations to sign it, in some not above 2 or 3, in some none; and in the main they had not the tithe of the people:[2] and yet those men like a consistory of bishops, a synod of presbyters, or a New England classis, presume upon the assumption of the name of several churches of God,[1] as if to themselves they had purchased the monopoly or patent thereof, or as if the persons of Mr. Kiffin, Mr. Patience, &c. were so many several churches, (hence sprang the papal, prelatical, and presbyterial supremacy over the consciences of people) and therefore it behoveth the people to have a care of their leaders.

---

[1] This pamphlet, signed by a number of Independent ministers, reflected the split between the Independents (politically ascendent after the execution of the King), and the Levellers, who pushed for further reforms on religious and political issues. In it, the ministers disavow support for the Leveller text, England's New Chains Discovered (1649), that appears to have been submitted to them for signature.

[2] tithe ten percent.

We have had the name of King, the name of Parliament, the name of the army, &c. surprised, abused, and usurped against us by the hand of our exorbitant enemies, but never before, the name of several churches of God, and those styled Anabaptists; hear O heavens, and judge O earth! Was there ever the like fact attempted or perpetrated amongst the churches of God? such wickedness is not once to be named amongst them: And I do not doubt but the well-minded Christian people of those several churches presented by that petition, will vindicate themselves from the aspersion thereby laid upon them; for I cannot believe till I see it, that those people would do any thing, or own any thing that might but so much as seemingly tend to our blood, or our imprisonment; I am confident they abhor it: And they cannot in conscience do less than to disavow that bloody petition (as to its tendency against us) and till they do it, they will be sharers in the public guilty of our imprisonment, yea, and of our blood, for (however God may divert the wicked purposes of men), that petition is guilty of our blood.

I confess, for my part, I am a man full of sin, and personal infirmities, and in that relation I will not take upon me to clear or justify myself; but as for my integrity and uprightness to the Commonwealth, to whatsoever my understanding tells me is for the good of mankind, for the safety, freedom, and tranquillity of my country, happiness and prosperity of my neighbours, to do to my neighbour as I would be done by, and for the freedom and protection of religious people: I say as to those things, (according to the weak measure of my understanding and judgment) I know my integrity to be such, that I shall freely (in the might of God) sacrifice my life to give witness thereunto; and upon that accompt I am now in bonds, a protestor against the aristocratical tyranny of the Council of State, scorning their mercy, and bidding defiance to their cruelty, had they ten millions more of armies, & Cromwells to perpetrate their inhumanities upon me; for I know they can pass but to this life; when they have done that, they can do no more; and in this case of mine, he that will save his life shall lose it; I know my life is hid in Christ, and if upon this accompt I must yield it, welcome, welcome, welcome by the grace of God.

And as for those reproaches and scandals like the smoke of the bottomless pit, that are fomented against me; whereby too many zealous tender spirited people are prejudiced against my person, ready to abhor the thing I do, though never so good, for my person sake; I desire such to remove their eyes from persons to things: if the thing I do be good, it is of God; and so look upon it, and not upon me, and so they shall be sure not to mistake themselves, nor to wrong me: And I further desire such to consider, that tales, rumours, slanderings, backbitings, lies, scandals &c. tossed up and down like clouds with the wind, are not the fruits of the spirit, neither are they weapons of God's warfare, they are of the devil and corruption, and betray in the users of them an evil mind: It is a certain badge of a deceiver to take up whisperings and tales of men's personal failings to inflect them to the cause those persons maintain, by such means to gain advantages upon them.

Consider whether the things I hold forth and profess as in relation to the Commonwealth, be not for the good of mankind, and the preservation of God's people: and if they be, my personal failings are not to be reckoned as a counter-balance against them. As I am in myself in respect to my own personal sins and transgressions; so I am to myself and to God, and so I must give an account; the just must stand by his own faith: But as I am in relation to the Commonwealth, that all men have cognizance of, because it concerns their own particular lives, livelihoods and beings, as well as my own; and my failings and evils in that respect I yield up to the cognizance of all men, to be righteously used against me. So that the business is, not how great a sinner I am, but how faithful and real to the Commonwealth; that's the matter concerneth my neighbour, and whereof my neighbour is only in this public controversy to take notice; and for my personal sins that are not of civil cognizance or wrong unto him, to leave them to God, whose judgment is righteous and just. And till persons professing religion be brought to this sound temper, they fall far short of Christianity; the spirit of love, brotherly charity, doing to all men as they would be done by, is not in them; without which they are but as a sounding brass, and a tinkling cymbal, a whited wall, rottenness and corruption, let their ceremonial formal practice of religion be never so angel-like or specious.

---

[1] consistory…synod…classis judicial bodies for ecclesiastical causes in the established, Presbyterian, and Independent churches respectively; Overton objects to the presumption of representation made by these and similar bodies.

There is a great noise of my sins and iniquities: but which of my asperser's ox or ass have I stolen? which of them have I wronged the value of a farthing? They tax me with filthiness, and strange impieties; but which amongst them is innocent? he that is innocent, let him throw the first stone; otherwise let him lay his hand on his mouth: I have heard of as odious failings, even of the same nature whereof they tax me (and it may be, upon better evidence) amongst them, laid open to me, even of the highest in present power, as well as amongst eminent persons in churches; which I ever have counted unworthy to be used as an engine against them in the controversy of the Commonwealth: But if they will not be quiet, I shall be forced, in honour to my own reputation, to open the cabinet of my asperser's infirmities, that the world may see what sort of men they are that they say unto others, thou shalt not steal, and steal themselves: I shall be sorry to be forced to it; but if they will not be content, necessity hath no law, I shall (as Mr. John Goodwin said to Mr. Edwards, if he would not be quiet)[1] make all their reputations as a stinking carcass.

And although they think they have such firm matters against me, let them not be too hasty to pursue me with reproach any further, lest it recoil with a vengeance upon themselves: for it is an old and a true saying, One tale is good till another be told. Therefore let no man judge before the time, lest he be judged; for I am able to vindicate myself to all rational men, as clear as the sun at noon day, in what I have done.

Much I might have said as in relation to the illegality of our apprehension, commitment, &c. But for the present I shall omit it to further opportunity, or the engagement of some more abler pen: And so I shall commit myself and my ways to God alone, with cheerfulness and alacrity of spirit, rejoicing that he hath counted me worthy to bear witness once more against the oppressors of the people, and to suffer for the sake of the poor, against the insulting tyrants of the times.

RICHARD OVERTON

From my aristocratical captivity in the Tower of London; April 4, 1649.

Dulce est pro Patria mori.[2]

---

[1] John Goodwin (1594?–1665), prominent Independent minister and controversialist; Thomas Edwards (1599–1647), a zealous Presbyterian who attacked the Independents among others in repeatedly updated editions of Gangraena (1646); for more on Edwards, see the selection from Gangraena.

[2] From Horace, Odes, III.ii.13: "it is sweet to die for one's country."

POSTSCRIPT

Courteous Reader, for thy better satisfaction concerning the infamous scandal raised by Lieutenant Colonel Axtel upon me, I thought meet to subjoin hereunto a copy of an affidavit concerning the matter: But I have forborne the publishing of the deponent's name in print, upon his own desire; yet those of my friends who are desirous, I shall be ready to show unto them the original copy: A transcript whereof is as followeth.

A.B. of the parish of St. Anne Aldersgate, citizen and pewterer of London, aged thirty six years or thereabouts, maketh oath, that whereas Lieutenant Colonel Axtel, upon his apprehending of Mr. Richard Overton, upon Wednesday, between five and six of the clock in the morning, being the twenty ninth of March last past, 1649, by an order from the Council of State, did raise and make a report, that he took the said Mr. Overton in bed with this deponent's wife, that that report was and is altogether false and scandalous; for that this deponent and the said Mr. Overton, the Tuesday night next preceding the said Wednesday, did lie both together all that night in one and the self same bed; and this deponent's wife and his little child in another bed of this deponent's house or lodgings. And that the next morning, before the said Lieutenant Colonel Axtel knocked at the door, this deponent, with his wife, with the said Mr. Overton, were all up and ready (saving that Mr. Overton had not put on his boots, band and cuffs) and were altogether in a chamber of this deponent's house, where this deponent's wife was then suckling of her child: and this deponent hearing some body knock at the door, went down to open it; which was readily done by a girl of the same house. Whereupon the said Lieutenant Colonel Axtel (meeting this deponent upon the stairs, and asking him if he were Mr. Overton; to which this deponent replying, No;) commanded the musketeers (who attended him) to take this deponent into custody, and he himself went directly up into the chamber with some musketeers attending him. All which this deponent affirmeth upon his oath to be true.

A.B.

Jurat. 4 Aprilis, 1649
Rob. Aylet[1]
—1649

---

[1] Jurat...Aylet the jurator or sworn assessor, an assistant to a judge; the person in front of whom this affidavit was signed.

Sir John Denham

1615 – 1669

John Denham, the only son of an Irish judge, was born in Dublin but grew up at Egham, in Surrey, the location of Cooper's Hill. He matriculated at Trinity College, Oxford, in 1631, where, according to Anthony à Wood, he was "looked upon as a slow, dreaming young man, and more addicted to gaming than study." Though he wrote an essay against gambling to allay his father's fears, he continued to gamble, and after he inherited his father's estate in 1638, squandered a great deal of money. In 1636, practising the time-honoured method of learning by example, he translated several books of the Aeneid. When the civil wars began, Denham, then high sheriff of Surrey, took up arms for the King. In 1642 he was taken prisoner by Sir William Waller and sent to London, but was soon allowed to go to Oxford, where he lived for five years. The first edition of Cooper's Hill was published in that year; the poem was to go through several revisions and, after the execution of Charles I, a major transmutation. As in so many poems of the time, its ostensible subject (it is a topographical poem) is a vehicle for political reflection. In 1644 Denham's goods were sold by order of Parliament. The poet George Wither, a captain for the Parliament, is said to have been granted Denham's property of Egham; but shortly afterwards Wither was taken prisoner, and Denham is said to have asked Charles I to pardon him on the grounds that while Wither lived "he should not be the worst poet in England." During the exile of Charles II, Denham acted as courier for him and for Henrietta Maria; he spent two years with the exiled royal family, chiefly in Holland. After the Restoration Denham was rewarded for his loyalty to the royal cause; he was made surveyor-general of works, a position for which he was not well qualified, but in his later years he had Christopher Wren as his deputy. In 1655 Denham, by then a widower, married his second wife, Margaret, who soon became known as one of the mistresses of James, Duke of York, the future James II. When she died in 1667, a scandal erupted to the effect that Denham had poisoned her cup of chocolate; an alternative version was that the Duke and Duchess of York were responsible. All this, and a brief mental illness, probably caused by a head injury, made his final years difficult. Cooper's Hill was one of the most admired poems of the time; of it Dryden said that "for the majesty of its style [it] is and ever will be the standard of exact writing." Denham was buried in Westminster Abbey, near the monument to Chaucer.

* * *

Cooper's Hill[1]

Sure we have poets, that did never dream
Upon Parnassus, nor did taste the stream[2]
Of Helicon, and therefore I suppose[3]
Those made not poets, but the poets those.
And as courts make not kings, but kings the court;
So where the muses, and their troops resort,
Parnassus stands; if I can be to thee
A poet, thou Parnassus art to me.
Nor wonder, if (advantag'd in my flight,

---

[1] Cooper's Hill a hill in the north of Denham's childhood home Egham, in Surrey, England.

[2] Parnassus a twin-peaked mountain north of Delphi. In mythology, the summit of Parnassus was one of the chief seats of the Muses and of Apollo, god of poetry.

[3] Helicon the largest mountain of Boetia. According to mythology, the summit contained the sanctuary of the Muses in a glen, and slightly below the summit is a spring which was struck from a rock by Pegasus's foot. This spring is said to be the inspiration of poets (OCD).

By taking wing from thy auspicious height)
Through untrac't ways, and airy paths I fly,
More boundless in my fancy, than my eye.
Exalted to this height, I first look down
On Paul's, as men from thence upon the town. [1]
Paul's, the late theme of such a muse, whose flight [2]
Hath bravely reached and soar'd above thy height:
Now shalt thou stand, though Time, or Sword, or Fire,
Or Zeal (more fierce than they) thy fall conspire,
Secure, while thee the best of poets sings,
Preserv'd from ruin by the best of kings.
As those who rais'd in body, or in thought
Above the Earth, or the air's middle vault, [3]
Behold how winds, and storms, and meteors grow, [4]
How clouds condense to rain, congeal to snow,
And see the Thunder form'd, before it tear
The air, secure from danger and from fear;
So rais'd above the tumult and the crowd
I see the city in a thicker cloud
Of business, than of smoke; where men like Ants
Toil to prevent imaginary wants;
Yet all in vain, increasing with their store,
Their vast desires, but make their wants the more.
As food to unsound bodies, though it please
The appetite, feeds only the disease;
Where with like haste, though several ways they run: [5]
Some to undo, and some to be undone:
While Luxury, and wealth, like War and Peace,
Are each the other's ruin, and increase,
As rivers lost in seas some secret vein
Thence reconveys, there to be lost again.
Some study plots, and some those plots t'undo,
Others to make 'em, and undo 'em too,
False to their hopes, afraid to be secure,
Those mischiefs only which they make, endure,
Blinded with light, and sick of being well,
In tumults seek their peace, their heaven in hell.
Oh happiness of sweet retir'd content!
To be at once secure, and innocent.
Windsor the next (where Mars with Venus dwells, [6]
Beauty with strength) above the valley swells
Into my eye, as the late married Dame,
(Who proud, yet seems to make that pride her shame)
When Nature quickens in her pregnant womb
Her wishes past, and now her hopes to come:
With such an easy and unforc'd ascent,
Windsor her gentle bosom doth present:
Where no stupendious cliff, no threatning heights
Access deny, no horrid steep affrights,
But such a rise, as doth at once invite
A pleasure, and a reverence from the sight.
Thy Master's Emblem, in whose face I saw [7]
A friend-like sweetness, and a king-like awe;
Where Majesty and love so mixed appear,
Both gently kind, both royally severe.
So Windsor, humble in itself, seems proud
To be the base of that majestic load,
Than which no hill a nobler burthen bears,
But Atlas only, that supports the spheres. [8]
Nature this mount so fitly did advance,
We might conclude, that nothing is by chance,
So plac't, as if she did on purpose raise
The Hill, to rob the builder of his praise;

---

[1] Paul's St. Paul's Cathedral, destroyed in 1666 by the Great Fire.

[2] such a muse in allusion to Edmund Waller's poem, "Upon his Majesties repairing of Pauls."

[3] vault the apparent concave surface formed by the sky (OED vault *sb*¹ 1c).

[4] meteors any atmospheric phenomena, including winds, snow, hail, etc. (OED meteor 1).

[5] with...ways with similar haste, though in different directions.

[6] Windsor Windsor Castle, one of the residences of British royalty, is visible from Cooper's Hill; Mars with Venus dwells Charles I and his wife, Henrietta Maria.

[7] Thy Master's Emblem Windsor Castle is seen as the emblem of Charles I.

[8] Atlas according to mythology, a Titan who holds up the sky.

For none commends his judgement, that doth choose
That which a blind man only could refuse;
Such are the Towers which th'hoary Temples grace [1]
Of Cibele, when all her heavenly race [2]
Do homage to her, yet she cannot boast
Amongst that numerous, and celestial host,
More heroes than can Windsor, nor doth Fame's
Immortal book record more noble names.
Not to look back so far, to whom this Isle
Must owe the glory of so brave a pile;
Whether to Caesar, Albanact, or Brute,
The British Arthur, or the Danish Knute, [3]
(Though this of old no less contest did move,
Then when for Homer's birth seven cities strove) [4]
(Like him in birth, thou shouldst be like in Fame,
As thine his fate, if mine had been his Flame.)
But whoso'ere it was, nature design'd
First a brave place, and then as brave a mind;
Nor to recount those several Kings, to whom
It gave a Cradle, or to whom a Tomb;
But thee (great Edward) and thy greater son, [5]
He that the lilies wore, and he that won, [6]
And thy Bellona, who deserves her share [7]
In all thy glories; of that royal pair [8]
Which waited on thy triumph, she brought one,
Thy son the other brought, and she that son;
Nor of less hopes could her great offspring prove,
A Royal Eagle cannot breed a Dove.
Then didst thou found that Order: whether love [9]
Or victory thy Royal thoughts did move,
Each was a noble cause, nor was it less
I'th institution, than the great success,
Whilst every part conspires to give it grace,
The King, the Cause, the Patron, and the place, [10]
Which foreign Kings, and Emperors esteem
The second honour to their Diademe.
Had thy great destiny but given thee skill,
To know as well, as power to act her will,
That from those Kings, who then thy captives were,
In after-times should spring a Royal pair, [11]
Who should possess all that thy mighty power,
Or thy desires more mighty did devour;
To whom their better fate reserves what ere
The Victor hopes for, or the vanquished fear;
That blood, which thou and thy great grandsire shed,
And all that since these sister nations bled,
Had been unspilt, had happy Edward known
That all the blood he spilt, had been his own;
Thou hadst extended through the conquer'd East,
Thine and the Christian name, and made them blest
To serve thee, while that loss this gain would bring,
Christ for their God, and Edward for their King;
When thou that Saint thy Patron didst design,
In whom the Martyr, and the Soldier join;

---

[1] hoary ancient; venerable from age, time-honoured (OED hoary a 1c).

[2] Cibele often referred to as mother of the gods (OCD).

[3] Albanact...Brute...Knute According to legend, Brute (or Brutus), the great grandson of the Trojan Aeneus, was one of the founding fathers of Britain, settling in England in the twelfth century B.C.E. Knute (or Canute) was a king of Denmark in the eleventh century who led a number of Viking raids into England.

[4] Homer The birthplace of the Greek author Homer was frequently disputed (OCD).

[5] great Edward Edward III of England.

[6] He that the lilies wore Edward claimed the French throne, and the French lily, through his mother, Isabella of France; he that won Edward's son, the Black Prince.

[7] Bellona Queen Philippa, wife of Edward III.

[8] that royal pair David II of Scotland was captured while Philippa was overseeing England in the absence of her son and husband. John II of France was captured by the Black Prince at the battle of Poitiers.

[9] didst thou found that Order Edward III created the Order of the Garter in 1348.

[10] the patron St. George is the patron saint of England.

[11] a Royal pair Charles I, of the Scottish royal house of Stuart; Henrietta Maria, daughter of Henri IV of France.

And when thou didst within the Azure round, [1]
(Who evil thinks may evil him confound) [2]
The English armies encircle, thou didst seem
But to foretell, and prophesy of him, [3]
Who has within that Azure round confin'd
These Realms, which Nature for their bound design'd.
That bound which to the world's extremest ends,
Endless herself, her liquid arms extends;
In whose heroic face I see the Saint
Better expressed, than in the liveliest paint;
That fortitude which made him famous here,
That heavenly piety, which Saints him there,
Who when this Order he forsakes, may he
Companion of that sacred Order be.
Here could I fix my wonder, but our eyes,
Nice as our tastes, affect varieties;
And though one please him most, the hungry guest
Tastes every dish, and runs through all the feast;
So having tasted Windsor, casting round
My wandring eye, an emulous Hill doth bound [4]
My more contracted sight, whose top of late
A chapel crown'd, till in the common fate [5]
The neighbouring Abbey fell, (may no such storm
Fall on our times, where ruin must reform.)
Tell me (my Muse) what monstrous dire offence,
What crime could any Christian King incense [6]
To such a rage? was't Luxury, or Lust?
Was he so temperate, so chaste, so just?
Were these their crimes? they were his own, much more.
But they (alas) were rich, and he was poor;
And having spent the treasures of his Crown,
Condemns their Luxury, to feed his own;
And yet this act, to varnish o're the shame
Of sacrilege, must bear devotion's name;
And he might think it just, the cause, and time
Considered well; for none commits a crime,
Appearing such, but as 'tis understood,
A real, or at least a seeming good.
While for the Church his learned pen disputes, [7]
His much more learned sword his pen confutes;
Thus to the Ages past he makes amends,
Their charity destroys, their faith defends. [8]
Then did Religion in a lazy Cell,
In empty, airy contemplations dwell;
And like the block unmoved lay, but ours
As much too active like the stork devours.
Is there no temperate Region can be known,
Betwixt their frigid, and our Torrid Zone?
Could we not wake from that lethargic dream,
But to be restless in a worse extreme?
And for that lethargy was there no cure,
But to be cast into a calenture? [9]
Can knowledge have no bound, but must advance
So far, to make us wish for ignorance?
And rather in the dark to grope our way,
Than led by a false guide to err by day?
Parting from thence 'twixt anger, shame, and fear
Those for what's past, and this for what's too near:
My eye descending from the Hill surveys
Where Thames amongst the wanton valleys strays; [10]
Thames the most lov'd of all the Ocean's sons,
By his old sire to his embraces runs,

---

[1] Azure round the badge of the Garter. Azure is the blue colour in coats of arms (OED azure a 3).

[2] the motto of the Order of the Garter: Honi soit quy mal y pense.

[3] But to foretell, and prophesy of him Charles I.

[4] emulous Hill St. Anne's Hill, a smaller hill near to Cooper's Hill.

[5] A chapel crown'd Chertsey Abbey, a Benedictine monastery. After the English Reformation, Henry VIII suppressed and ransacked the monasteries.

[6] Christian King Henry VIII.

[7] his learned pen disputes a reference to the religious writings of Henry VIII.

[8] an allusion to Henry's title Fidei Defensor, still borne by British monarchs.

[9] calenture fever (OED calenture 2).

[10] Thames The Thames runs 210 miles from the Cotswolds through London to the North Sea.

Hasting to pay his tribute to the Sea,
Like mortal life to meet Eternity:
And though his clearer sand no golden veins,
Like Tagus and Pactolus streams contains, [1]
His genuine, and less guilty wealth t'explore,
Search not his bottom, but behold his shore;
O're which he kindly spreads his spacious wing,
And hatches plenty for th'ensuing Spring,
Nor with a furious, and unruly wave,
Like profuse Kings, resumes the wealth he gave:
No unexpected inundations spoil
The mower's hopes, nor mock the plowman's toil:
Then like a lover he forsakes his shores,
Whose stay with jealous eyes his spouse implores,
Till with a parting kiss he saves her tears,
And promising return, secures her fears;
As a wise King first settles fruitful peace
In his own Realms, and with their rich increase Seeks war abroad, and then in triumph brings
The spoils of Kingdoms, and the Crowns of Kings:
So Thames to London doth at first present
Those tributes, which the neighbouring countries sent;
But at his second visit from the East,
Spices he brings, and treasures from the West;
Finds wealth where 'tis, and gives it where it wants,
Cities in deserts, woods in cities plants,
Rounds the whole Globe, and with his flying towers
Brings home to us, and makes both Indies ours:
So that to us no thing, no place is strange
Whilst thy fair bosom is the world's Exchange:
O could my verse freely and smoothly flow,
As thy pure flood, heav'n should no longer know
Her old Eridanus, thy purer stream [2]
Should bathe the gods, and be the poets' theme.
Here Nature, whether more intent to please
Us or herself with strange varieties,
(For things of wonder give no less delight
To the wise maker's, than beholder's sight.
Though these delights from several causes move,
For so our children, thus our friends we love.)
Wisely she knew the harmony of things,
As well as that of sounds, from discords springs;
Such was the discord, which did first disperse
Form, order, beauty through the universe;
While dryness moisture, coldness heat resists,
All that we have, and that we are subsists:
While the steep horrid roughness of the wood
Strives with the gentle calmness of the flood.
Such huge extremes when Nature doth unite,
Wonder from thence results, from thence delight;
The stream is so transparent, pure, and clear,
That had the self-enamour'd youth gaz'd here, [3]
So fatally deceiv'd he had not been,
While he the bottom, not his face had seen.
And such the roughness of the Hill, on which
Diane her toils, and Mars his tents might pitch. [4]
And as our surly supercilious lords,
Big in their frowns, and haughty in their words,
Look down on those, whose humble fruitful pain
Their proud, and barren greatness must sustain:
So looks the Hill upon the stream, between
There lies a spacious, and a fertile Green;
Where from the woods, the Dryades oft meet [5]
The Nayades, and with their nimble feet [6]
Soft dances lead, although their airy shape
All but a quick Poetic sight escape;
There Faunus and Sylvanus keep their Courts, [7]

---

[1] Tagus and Pactolus rivers famous in antiquity for their golden sands.

[2] Eridanus mythical river often associated with the Po (OCD); also used in astronomy as a name for a large constellation of stars in the Southern Hemisphere.

[3] the self-enamour'd youth Narcissus, a beautiful youth who loved no one until he saw his own reflection in water and fell in love with that; finally he pined away and died (OCD).

[4] Diane a Roman goddess associated with the hunt.

[5] Dryades nymphs supposed to inhabit trees (OED dryad 1).

[6] Nayades river nymphs (OED naiades).

[7] Faunus god of the herdsmen, often identified with Inuus, fertilizer of cattle, and with Pan. He was primarily of the forests (OCD); Sylvanus Roman god of uncultivated land (OCD).

And thither all the horrid host resorts,
(When like the elixir, with his evening beams, [1]
The Sun has turn'd to gold the silver streams)
To graze the ranker mead, that noble herd, [2]
On whose sublime, and shady fronts is rear'd
Nature's great masterpiece, to shew how soon
Great things are made, but sooner much undone.
Here have I seen our Charles, when great affairs [3]
Give leave to slacken, and unbend his cares,
Chasing the royal Stag; the gallant beast,
Rous'd with the noise, 'twixt hope and fear distressed,
Resolves 'tis better to avoid, than meet
His danger, trusting to his winged feet:
But when he sees the dogs, now by the view
Now by the scent his speed with speed pursue,
He tries his friends, among the lesser herd,
Where he but lately was obey'd, and feared,
Safety he seeks; the herd unkindly wise,
Or chases him from thence, or from him flies;
Like a declining Statesman, left forlorn
To his friends' pity, and pursuers' scorn;
Wearied, forsaken, and pursued, at last
All safety in despair of safety plac't;
Courage he thence assumes, resolv'd to bear
All their assaults, since 'tis in vain to fear;
But when he sees the eager chase renew'd,
Himself by dogs, the dogs by men pursu'd;
When neither speed, nor art, nor friends, nor force
Could help him, towards the stream he bends his course;
Hoping those lesser beasts would not assay [4]
An Element more merciless then they:
But fearless they pursue, nor can the flood
Quench their dire thirst, (alas) they thirst for blood.
As some brave Hero, whom his baser foes
In troops surround, now these assail, now those,
Though prodigal of life, disdains to die [5]
By vulgar hands, but if he can descry
Some nobler foe's approach, to him he calls
And begs his fate, and then contented falls:
So the tall stag, amids the lesser hounds
Repels their force, and wounds returns for wounds,
Till Charles from his unerring hand lets fly
A mortal shaft, then glad and proud to die
By such a wound, he falls, the crystal flood
Dying he dyes, and purples with his blood:
This a more innocent, and happy chase
Than when of old, but in the self-same place,
Fair Liberty pursued, and meant a prey
To tyranny, here turn'd, and stood at bay.
When in that remedy all hope was plac't,
Which was, or should have been at least, the last.
For armed subjects can have no pretence
Against their Princes, but their just defence;
And whether then, or no, I leave to them
To justify, who else themselves condemn.
Yet might the face be just, if we may guess
The justness of an action from success,
Here was that Charter seal'd, wherein the Crown [6]
All marks of arbitrary power lays down:
Tyrant and Slave, those names of hate and fear,
The happier style of King and Subject bear:
Happy, when both to the same center move;
When Kings give liberty, and Subjects love.
Therefore not long in force this Charter stood
Wanting that seal, it must be seal'd in blood.
The Subjects arm'd, the more their Princes gave,
But this advantage took, the more to crave:
Till Kings by giving, give themselves away,
And even that power, that should deny, betray.

---

[1] elixir by which metals were thought to change into gold (OED elixir sb 1).

[2] ranker mead a more luxurious meadow (OED rank a A III 10), (OED mead^2 a).

[3] Charles Charles I.

[4] assay attack, assault, assail (OED assay v 14).

[5] prodigal lavish in the disposal of things (OED a prodigal A 3).

[6] Charter the Magna Carta, signed in 1215 by King John, limited the power of the monarchy.

"Who gives constrain'd, but his own fear reviles,
Not thank'd, but scorn'd; nor are they gifts, but spoils,"
And they, whom no denial can withstand,
Seem but to ask, while they indeed command.
Thus all to limit Royalty conspire,
While each forgets to limit his desire.
Till kings like old Antaeus by their fall,[1]
Being forc't, their courage from despair recall,
When a calm river rais'd with sudden rains,
Or snows dissolv'd o'reflows th'adjoining plains,
The husbandmen with high rais'd banks secure[2]
Their greedy hopes, and this he can endure.
But if with bays, and dams they strive to force,
His channel to a new, or narrow course,
No longer then within his banks he dwells,
First to a torrent, then a deluge swells;
Stronger, and fiercer by restraint, he roars,
And knows no bound, but makes his powers his shores:
Thus Kings by grasping more than they can hold,
First made their Subjects by oppressions bold,
And popular sway by forcing Kings to give
More, than was fit for Subjects to receive,
Ran to the same extreme; and one excess
Made both, by stirring to be greater, less;
Nor any way, but seeking to have more,
Makes either lose, what each possessed before.
Therefore their boundless power let Princes draw
Within the channel, and the shores of Law,
And may that Law, which teaches Kings to sway
Their Sceptres, teach their Subjects to obey.
—1642

---

[1] Antaeus a mythical king of Libya, and son of the Earth, who compelled all strangers to wrestle with him. If they managed to throw him to the ground, he would gain strength from his mother, the Earth. He was finally killed by Hercules who lifted him from the ground before crushing him to death (OCD).

[2] husbandmen men who till or cultivate the soil; farmers (OED husbandman 1a).

Sir Roger L'Estrange

1616 – 1704

Born into a well-to-do Norfolk family and studying probably at Cambridge, L'Estrange served in the King's army under Prince Rupert and spent three years in a Parliamentary prison for his part in a Royalist plot. Upon his release in 1648 he promoted an unsuccessful Royalist uprising in Kent, then fled to Holland; Edward Hyde (later Earl of Clarendon) put him to work in the service of the exiled Charles II. L'Estrange returned to England in 1653, and in the late 1650s was writing pamphlets in favour of the monarchy. At the Restoration he worked as pamphleteer, government spy, and journalist, serving as editor of the semi-official papers The News and The Intelligencer (1663–66) and later The Observator (1681–87). The primary targets of his early work were Republicans (a 1660 pamphlet entitled No Blind Guides answered Milton) and Presbyterians (whom he blamed for the wars and the execution of Charles I); his later work attacked Whigs and dissenters. He was knighted by James II.

L'Estrange's denunciation of liberty of the press in this 1663 text won him an appointment as Surveyor of the Press, a position he would hold almost continuously up to the 1688 Revolution. In addition to providing a great deal of information about seventeenth-century printing and the book trade, L'Estrange's Considerations reveals how seriously the power of the press was taken by those who blamed the civil wars on pamphleteering: "persons are pardoned," L'Estrange writes, "but not books." Drawing on an extensive web of informers, he sought to curb a trade that had greatly expanded since the early 1640s. L'Estrange bragged in 1670 of having suppressed 600 pamphlets, and one printer, John Twyn, was hanged, drawn, and quartered on L'Estrange's evidence. But on the whole his efforts were not very successful, and his was one of the last attempts in England to enforce a rigid control of printing. L'Estrange lost his position after the Revolution, and supported himself by writing translations, including the fables of Aesop (1692) and the works of Josephus (1702).

◆

Considerations and Proposals in Order to the Regulation of the Press

I think no man denies the necessity of suppressing licentious and unlawful pamphlets, and of regulating the press; but in what manner, and by what means this may be effected, that's the question. The two main points are printing, and publishing.[1]

The instruments of setting the work afoot are these. The adviser, author, compiler, writer, corrector, and the persons for whom, and by whom; that is say, the stationer (commonly), and the printer. To which may be added, the letter-founders, and the smiths, and joiners, that work upon presses.

The usual agents for publishing are the printers themselves, stitchers,[2] binders, stationers, hawkers, mercury-women,[3] peddlers, ballad-singers, posts, carriers, hackney-coachmen, boatmen, and mariners. Other instruments may be likewise employed, against whom a general provision will be sufficient. Hiding, and concealing of unlawful books, is but in order to publishing, and may be brought under the same rule.

Touching the adviser, author, compiler, writer, and corrector, their practices are hard to be retrieved, unless the one discover the other.

---

[1] publishing distributing.

[2] stitchers in bookbinding, those who sewed the gatherings together.

[3] mercury-women the (usually female) sellers of pamphlets or newsbooks, which were often called "mercuries" (OED mercury sb 2e).

This discovery may be procured partly by a penalty upon refusing to discover, and partly by a reward to the discoverer; but let both the penalty and the reward be considerable, and certain: and let the obligation of discovery run quite through, from the first mover of the mischief to the last disperser of it....

Concerning the confederacy of stationers and printers, we shall speak anon: but the thing we are now upon, is singly printing, and what necessarily relates to it.

One great evil is the multiplicity of private presses, and consequently of printers, who for want of public and warrantable employment are forced either to play the knaves in corners, or to want bread.

The remedy is, to reduce all printers and presses that are now in employment to a limited number; and then to provide against private printing for the time to come, which may be done by the means following.

First: the number of printers and presses being resolved upon, let the number of their journeymen[1] and apprentices be likewise limited: and in like manner, the number of master-founders,[2] and of their journeymen and their apprentices; all which to be allowed of and approved by such person or persons, as shall be authorised for that purpose; neither let any joiner, carpenter, or smith presume to work for or upon any printing press, without such allowance as aforesaid, according to the direction of the late act for printing.[3]

Secondly, let all such printers, letter-founders, joiners, carpenters, and smiths, as shall hereafter be allowed, as aforesaid, be respectively and severely interrogated before their admittance, in order to the discovery of supernumerary printers and presses. That is:

1. Let the printers be questioned about private presses they have at any time wrought upon for so many years last past, and the time when, and for, and with whom: and what other printers and presses they know of at present, beside those of the present establishment.

2. Let the founders be also examined, what letter they have furnished since such a time;[4] when and for whom, and what other printers &c.

3. Let the joiners, carpenters, and smiths be questioned likewise what presses they have erected, or amended, &c. when, and for whom? and what other presses, printers, &c.—as before.

And if after such examination it shall appear at any time within so many months, that any man has wilfully concealed or denied the truth, let him forfeit his employment as a person not fit to be trusted, and let the informer be taken into his place if he be capable of it, and desire it; or else, let him be rewarded some other way. The same course may be taken also concerning English printers and presses beyond the seas.

This may serve as to the discovery of private printers and presses already in employment: Now to prevent underhand-dealing for the future, and to provide against certain other abuses in such as are allowed.

First: Let a special care be taken of card-makers, leather-gilders, flock-workers, and quoif-drawers;[5] either by expressly inhibiting their use of such presses as may be applied to printing of books, or by tying them up to the same terms and conditions with printers; and let no other tradesman whatsoever presume to make use of a printing-press, but upon the same conditions, and under the same penalties with printers.

---

[1] journeymen craftsmen who have served their apprenticeship and are qualified to work for wages.

[2] master-founders makers of type for printing.

[3] An Act for Preventing the Frequent Abuses in Printing Seditious... Books... and for Regulating of Printing and Printing Presses (1662), called "The Licensing Act" for its restitution of the licensing system instituted by Archbishop Laud in 1637.

[4] letter type.

[5] all trades that could use a press of some sort in their work: respectively, makers of playing cards or maps and charts; leather decorators; workers of flock, a material made from wool or cloth refuse; and makers of head-coverings (coifs).

Secondly. Let no press or printing house be erected or let, and let no joiner, carpenter, smith, or letter-founder work for a printing-house, without notice (according to the late Act).

Thirdly. Let no materials belonging to printing, no letters ready founded, or cast, be imported or bought without the like notice, and for whom (according to the late Act).

Fourthly. Let every master printer be bound at least, if not sworn, not to print, cause or suffer to be printed in his house, or press, any book or books without lawful licence (according to the late Act).

Fifthly. Let no master printer be allowed to keep a press but in his own dwelling house, and let no printing house be permitted with a back door to it.

Sixthly. Let every master printer certify what warehouses he keeps, and not change them without giving notice.

Seventhly. Let every master printer set his name to whatsoever he prints, or causes to be printed (according to the late Act).

Eighthly. Let no printer presume to put upon any book, the title, marque, or vignette, of any other person who has the privilege of sole printing the same, without the consent of the person so privileged (according to the late Act) and let no man presume to print another man's copy.

Ninthly. Let no printer presume either to reprint, or change the title of any book formerly printed, without licence; or to counterfeit a licence, or knowingly to put any man's name to a book as the author of it, that was not so.

Tenthly. Let it be penal to antedate any book; for by so doing, new books will be shuffled among old ones to the increase of the stock.

Eleventhly. Let the price of books be regulated.

Twelfthly. Let no journeyman be employed without a certificate from the master where he wrought last.

Thirteenthly. Let no master discharge a journeyman, nor he leave his master, under 14 days notice, unless by consent.

Fourteenthly. Let the persons employed be of known integrity, so near as may be; free of the said mysteries, and able in their trades (according to the late Act)....

Next to printing follows publishing or dispersing, which, in and about the town, is commonly the work of printers, stitchers, binders, stationers, mercury-women, hawkers, peddlers, and ballad singers.

Concerning printers, stitchers, and binders; the penalty may be double, where the fault is so: That is, where the same person (for example) is found to be both printer and disperser of the same unlawful books, he may be punished in both capacities: of the rest (the stationer excepted) little need be said but that they may be punishable, and the penalty suited to the quality of the offender.

The most dangerous people of all are the confederate stationers, and the breaking of that knot would do the work alone. For the closer carriage of their business they have here in the town, their private warehouses, and receivers.

Let every stationer certify, what warehouses he keeps, and not change them without giving notice.

Let the receivers and concealers of unlawful or unlicensed books be punished as the dispersers of them, unless within 12 hours after such receipt they give notice to [a person to be named] that they have such quantities of books in their custody, and to whom they belong.

They hold intelligence abroad by the means of posts, carriers, hackney-coachmen, boatmen, and mariners: and for fear of interceptions they correspond by false names, and private tokens; so that if a letter or packet miscarry, people may not know what to make on't. As for the purpose: so many dozen of gloves stands for so many dozen of books. Such a marque for such a price, &c.

They enter in their day books, only in general terms, such and such parcels of books, without naming particulars.

1. Let every stationer living in or about London be obliged to keep a day book of the particulars of all the unlicensed books and papers which he sends, causes or allows to be sent, by any of the messengers above-mentioned, into any parts of his Majesty's Dominions; and let him enter the names likewise of the persons to whom he sends them, under a penalty; if either he be proved to have kept a false book, or to have corresponded under a false name, and let every stationer elsewhere (i.e. within the Kingdom of England, and Dominion of Wales) be obliged to keep a day book likewise, of what unlicensed books and papers he receives, and from whom, upon the like penalty.

2. Let no stationer presume to send, cause or allow to be sent, either by land, or water, any dry-fats, bales, packs, maunds, or other fardells,[1] or packets of printed books, or papers, without superscribing them in such sort, that they may be known to be books, together with the names of the persons from whom they are sent, and to whom they are directed: under pain of forfeiting all parcels of books that are not so superscribed, or otherwise that are advertised under false names.

3. Let every hackney-coachman, carrier, boatman, or mariner, that knowingly transgresses in the private conveyance of such letters or packets as aforesaid, be subjected to a particular penalty.

Concerning books imported. They must be first prepared beyond the seas; secondly, conveyed hither; and thirdly, received and distributed here.

Let the English printer, vender, or utterer of any books written in the English tongue, or by an English man, in any other tongue and printed beyond the seas, to the dishonour of his Majesty or of the established government, be required to appear from beyond the seas, by a certain day, and under such a penalty; which if he refuse, or wilfully fail to do, let it be made penal for any person living within his Majesty's Dominions (after sufficient notice of his such contempt), to hold any further correspondence with him, either by message, letter, or otherwise, till he hath given satisfaction for his offence.

Let a general penalty be laid upon the importers of any English books, whatsoever, printed beyond the seas. And so likewise upon the contractors: for the receivers, concealers, and dispersers of any books whatsoever, imported into this realm, and disposed of without due authority. It rests now to be considered. First what books are to be suppressed, and secondly, into what hands the care of the press is to be committed.

The books to be suppressed are as follows

First, all printed papers pressing the murder of the late King.

Secondly, all printed justifications of that execrable act.

Thirdly, all treatises denying his Majesty's title to the Crown of England.

Fourthly, all libels against the person of his sacred Majesty, his blessed father, or the Royal Family.

Fifthly, all discourses manifestly tending to stir up the people against the established government.

Sixthly, all positions terminating in this treasonous conclusion, that his Majesty may be arraigned, judged, and executed, by his people: such as are these following:

---

[1] all containers for transporting goods: dry-fat any large vessel (cask, barrel, tub) used to hold dry goods (OED); maunds wicker or woven baskets (OED); fardells bundles or parcels (OED).

Coordination;[1] the sovereignty of the two houses, or of the House of Commons; or of the diffusive body of the people, in case of necessity. The justification of the war raised in 1642 in the name of King and Parliament. The defence of the legality and obligation of the covenant.[2] The separation of the King's person from his authority. The denial of his Majesty's power in ecclesiastical affairs. The maintaining that the Long Parliament is not yet dissolved.

If it be objected that this looks too far back; it may be answered that persons are pardoned, but not books. But to more particular reasons for the suppressing of old pamphlets.

First, it is (with reverence) a duty both from his sacred Majesty and his Parliament, to the honour, and memory of the late King, to deliver the reputation of that blessed martyr from the diabolical calumnies and forgeries which are yet extant against his person, and government.

Secondly, it is as much a duty toward our present sovereign, of whose Royal Family, and person, as much ill is said, and published, as is possible for the wit of man to utter, or for the malice of Hell to invent.

Thirdly, in relation to political ends, and to the security of the public, they ought to be suppressed: for they do not only revile, and slander his Majesty's royal person, but many of them disclaim his very title to the crown; and others subject his prerogative, and consequently his sacred life to the sovereign power of the people; and this is done too, with all the advantages of a pestilent and artificial imposture. Now why a pamphlet should be allowed to proclaim this treason to the world, which but whispered in a corner would certainly bring a man to the gallows, is not easily comprehended.

Fourthly, it makes the English nation cheap in the eyes of the world, to find the blood and virtues of the late King, appear so little to be considered, beside the hazardous consequence of blasting the Royal cause, and of discouraging loyalty to future generations, by transmitting the whole party of the Royalists, in so many millions of virulent libels, to posterity, for a prostitute rabble of villains and traitors.

Fifthly, these desperate libels and discourses do not only defame the government, encourage and enrich the faction, and poison the people; but, while they are permitted, those stationers and printers that would otherwise be honest are forced either to play the knaves for company, or to break: for there's scarce any other trading for them, but in that trash. Their customers will be supplied, and if they ask for any of these treasonous books, they must either furnish them, or lose their custom.

Sixthly, the same reason that prohibits new pamphlets, requires also the suppressing of old ones (of the same quality), for 'tis not the date that does the mischief, but the matter, and the number. If they be plausible, and cunning enough to deceive, and then numerous enough to spread, Buchanan and Knox will do the business as sure as Baxter and Calamy.[3] Besides that in some respects, the old ones have a great advantage of the new: for being written in times of freedom, and managed by great masters of the popular style, they speak plainer and strike homer to the capacity and humour of the multitude; whereas they that write in the fear of a law, are forced to cover their meaning under ambiguities, and hints, to the greater hazard of the libeller, than of the public.

---

[1] Coordination in this context, the idea that the three estates (King, Lords, and Commons) shared or co-ordinated executive power, the King being just one of three.

[2] the covenant the Solemn League and Covenant (1643), an agreement between the Scottish Covenanters and Parliament to impose Presbyterianism in England and Ireland and to safeguard constitutional liberties won by Parliament.

[3] George Buchanan (1506–1582), Scottish historian and political theorist who opposed royal absolutism; John Knox (1515?–1572), the dominant figure of the Scottish reformation; Richard Baxter (1615–1691), prolific puritan divine; Edmund Calamy (1600–1666), English Presbyterian divine.

Seventhly, they must be suppressed, in order to a future regulation: for otherwise 'tis but antedating new books, and making them pass for old ones (which may be done with very little hazard of detection) or else, as any saleable book grows scarce 'tis but reprinting it with a false date, and by these additions, and recruits, a stock of seditious pamphlets shall be kept in motion to the end of the world. In fine, if they are not fit to be sold, they are not fit to be kept; for a verbal prohibition without an actual seizure will be rather an advantage to the private trade, than a hindrance; and bring profit to the factious book-sellers and printers, that have copies lie upon their hands, by enhancing the prices.

. . . .

[L'Estrange prints excerpts from a variety of texts expressing opinions he thinks unacceptable.] I could add more, and worse to the instances already given, but these shall suffice for a taste. The question is now, by whom the government and oversight of the press is to be undertaken, and the contest lies at present betwixt the booksellers and printers, which although concorporate by an ancient grant, are in this point become competitors; and since they have divided themselves, they shall be here likewise distinctly considered.

The Stationers are not to be entrusted with the care of the press, for these following reasons

First, they are both parties and judges: for diverse of them have brought up servants to the mystery of printing which they still retain in dependence: Others again are both printers and stationers, themselves; so that they are entrusted (effectually) to search for their own copies; to destroy their own interests; to prosecute their own agents, and to punish themselves: for they are the principal authors of those mischiefs which they pretend now to redress, and the very persons against whom the penalties of this intended regulation are chiefly levelled.

Secondly, it is not advisable to rely upon the honesty of people (if it may be avoided) where that honesty is to their loss: especially if they be such as have already given proof that they prefer their private gain before the well-fare of the public: which has been the stationer's case throughout our late troubles, some few excepted, whose integrity deserves encouragement.

Thirdly, in this trust, they have not only the temptation of profit to divert them from their duty (a fair part of their stock lying in seditious ware) but the means of transgressing with great privacy and safety: for, make them overseers of the press, and the printers become totally at their devotion; so that the whole trade passes through the fingers of their own creatures, which, upon the matter, concludes rather in a combination, than a remedy.

Fourthly, it seems a little too much to reward the abusers of the press with the credit of superintending it: upon a confidence that they that destroyed the last king for their benefit, will now make it their business to preserve this to their loss.

Fifthly, it will cause a great disappointment of searches, when the persons most concerned shall have it in their power to spoil all, by notices, partiality, or delay....

The Printers are not to be trusted with the government of the press

First, all the arguments already objected against the stationers hold good also against the printers, but not fully so strong. That is, they are both parties, and judges. Self-ended, (upon experiment) under the temptation of profit. Offenders as well as the stationers; and in all abuses of the press, confederate with them. Besides, they will have the same influence upon searches; and they have probably as little stomach to a regulation, as the other…

Secondly, it were a hard matter to pick out twenty master-printers, who are both free of the trade, of ability to manage it, and of integrity to be entrusted with it: most of the honester sort being impoverished by the late times, & the great business of the press being engrossed by Oliver [Cromwell's] creatures.…

To conclude: both printers and stationers, under colour of offering a service to the public, do effectually design one upon another. The printers would beat down the book-selling trade, by managing the press as themselves please, and by working upon their own copies. The stationers, on the other side, they would subject the printers to be absolutely their slaves; which they effected in a large measure already, by so increasing the number, that the one half must either play the knaves, or starve.

The expedient for this must be some way to disengage the printers from that servile and mercenary dependence upon the stationers, upon which they are at present subjected. The true state of the business being as follows.

First, the number of master-printers is computed to be about 60, whereas 20 or 24 would dispatch all the honest work of the nation.

Secondly, these master-printers have above 100 apprentices (that is, at least 20 more than they ought to have by the law).

Thirdly, there are, beside aliens,[1] and those that are free of other trades,[2] at least 150 journey-men, of which number, at least 30 are superfluous; to which 30 there will be added about 36 more, beside above 50 supernumerary apprentices, upon the reduction of the master-printers to 24.…

These supernumerary printers were at first introduced by the book-sellers, as a sure way to bring them both to their prices and purposes; for the number being greater than could honestly live upon the trade, the printers were enforced either to print treason, or sedition, if the stationer offered it, or to want lawful work, by which necessity on the one side, and power on the other, the combination became exceeding dangerous, and so it still continues; but how to dissolve it, whether by dis-incorporating the Company of Stationers, and subjecting the printers to rules apart, and by themselves; or by making them two distinct companies, I do not meddle.

This only may be offered, that in case those privileges and benefits should be granted to both stationers and printers, which they themselves desire in point of trade; yet in regard that several interests are concerned, that of the kingdom on the one side, and only that of the companies on the other; it is but reason that there should be several super-intending powers, and that the smaller interest should give place, and be subordinate to the greater: That is, the master and wardens to manage the business of their respective trade, but withal, to be subjected to some superior officer, that should over-look them both on behalf of the public. [L'Estrange proposes six surveyors of the press, independent of the Company of Stationers, each of whom would examine and license books before publication.]

Now concerning penalties and rewards

1. The gain of printing some books is ten times greater, if they escape, than the loss, if they be taken: so that the damage bearing such a disproportion to the profit, is rather an allurement to offend, than a discouragement.

---

[1] aliens resident foreigners.

[2] free of other trades Completion of apprenticeship within any guild could allow a "freeman" to work in another trade.

2. As the punishment is too small, for the offender; so is the reward also, for the informer: for reckon the time, trouble, and money, which it shall cost the prosecutor to recover his allotment, he shall sit down at last a loser by the bargain: and more than that, he loses his credit, and employment, over and above, as a betrayer of his fellows; so great is the power and confidence of the delinquent party.

The way to help this, is, to augment both the punishment and the reward; and to provide that the inflicting of the one, and the obeying of the other, may be both easy and certain: for to impose a penalty and to leave the way of raising it, so tedious and difficult as in this case hitherto it is, amounts to no more than this: if the informer will spend ten pound 'tis possible he may recover five: and so the prosecutor must impose a greater penalty upon himself, than the law does upon the offender; or else all comes to nothing.

An expedient for this inconvenience is highly necessary; and why may not the oath of one credible witness or more, before a Master of the Chancery, or a Justice of the Peace, serve for a conviction. Especially the person accused being left at liberty before such oath taken, either to appear to the Privy-Council, or to abide the decision.

Now to the several sorts of penalties, and to the application of them.

The ordinary penalties I find to be these: death, mutilation, imprisonment, banishment, corporal pains, disgrace, pecuniary mulcts:[1] which penalties are to applied with regard to the quality of the offence, and to the condition of the delinquent.

The offence is either blasphemy, heresy, schism, treason, sedition, scandal, or contempt of authority.

The delinquents are the advisers, authors, compilers, writers, printers, correctors, stitchers, and binders of unlawful books and pamphlets: together with all publishers, dispersers and concealers of them in general: and all stationers, posts, hackney-coachmen, carriers, boatmen, mariners, hawkers, mercury-women, peddlers, and ballad-singers so offending, in particular.

Penalties of disgrace ordinarily in practice are many, and more may be added.

Pillory, stocks, whipping, carting, stigmatizing, disablement to bear office, or testimony. Public recantation, standing under the gallows with a rope about the neck, at a public execution. Disfranchisement (if free-men), cashiering (if soldiers),[2] degrading (if persons of condition),[3] wearing some badge of infamy: condemnation to work either in mines, plantations, or houses of correction.

Under the head of pecuniary mulcts, are comprehended forfeitures, confiscations, loss of any beneficial office, or employment, incapacity to hold or enjoy any: and finally, all damages accruing, and imposed, as a punishment for some offence.

Touching the other penalties before-mentioned, it suffices only to have named them, and so to proceed to the application of them, with respect to the crime, and to the offender.

The penalty ought to bear proportion to the malice, and influence of the offence, but with respect to the offender too: for the same punishment (unless it be death itself) is not the same thing to several persons; and it may be proper enough to punish one man in his purse, another in his credit, a third in his body, and all for the same offence.

The grand delinquents are the authors or compilers (which I reckon as all one), the printers, and stationers.

For the authors, nothing can be too severe, that stands with humanity, and conscience. First, 'tis the way to cut off the fountain of our troubles. Secondly, there are not many of them in an age, and so the less work to do.

---

[1] pecuniary mulcts fines (OED).

[2] cashiering dismissal from military service (OED cashier v 2).

[3] degrading reducing from a higher to a lower social or other kind of rank (OED degrade v 2).

The printer and stationer come next, who beside the common penalties of money, loss of copies, or printing materials, may be subjected to these further punishments.

Let them forfeit the best copy they have,[1] at the choice of that surveyor of the press, under whose cognisance the offence lies; the profit whereof the said officer shall see thus distributed one third to the King, a second to the informer, reserving the remainder to himself.

In some cases, they may be condemned to wear some visible badge, or marque of ignominy, as a halter instead of a hat-band,[2] one stocking blue, and another red; a blue bonnet with a red T or S upon it, to denote the crime to be either treason, or sedition; and if at any time the person so condemned shall be found without the said badge or marque, during the time of his obligation to wear it, let him incur some further penalty, provided only, that if within the said time, he shall discover and seize, or cause to be seized any author, printer, or stationer, liable at the time of that discovery and seizure to be proceeded against, for the matter of treasonous, or seditious pamphlets, the offender aforesaid shall from the time of that discovery be discharged from wearing it any longer.

This proposal may seem fantastic at first sight; but certainly there are many men who had rather suffer any other punishment than be made publicly ridiculous.

It is not needful here to run through every particular, and to direct, in what manner, and to what degree, these and other offenders in the like kind shall be punished, so as to limit, and appropriate, the punishment: but it shall suffice, having specified the several sorts of offenders, and offences; to have laid down likewise the several species of penalties, sortable to every man's condition, and crime.

Concerning rewards, something is said already, and I shall only add for a conclusion, that they are every jot as necessary as punishments; and ought to be various, according to the several needs, tempers, and qualities of the persons upon whom they are to be conferred. Money is a reward for one; honour for another: and either of these misplaced, would appear rather a mockery, than a benefit.

—1663

---

[1] best copy the best-selling or most profitable book they own the right to publish.

[2] halter noose.

Richard Lovelace

1618–1656/7

Richard Lovelace came of an old Kentish family. His father, Sir William, who had been knighted by James I, was killed in battle in Holland, leaving a widow and a large family, the eldest child being the future Cavalier poet. Lovelace was educated at Oxford, and in his account of notable Oxford graduates Anthony à Wood described him as "being then accounted the most amiable and beautiful person that ever eye beheld," and also of "innate modesty, virtue and courtly deportment which made him... much admired by the female sex." He was created Master of Arts prematurely, "at the request of a great lady belonging to the queen," universities then being every bit as responsive to external pressures as they are now. During his residence at Oxford Lovelace wrote a play, The Scholar, a Comedy, and also began his career as a writer of lyric. Lovelace became active in the Royalist interest before the outbreak of civil war, taking part in the Scottish expedition of 1639. In 1642 he undertook to deliver to Parliament the famous Kentish petition on the King's behalf, though he knew of its similarity to a previous petition which Parliament had ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. As a result he was committed to the Gatehouse at Westminster, where he wrote "To Althea, from Prison," regarded by contemporaries as a masterpiece and frequently reprinted. There are good reasons to believe that "To Lucasta. From Prison," once thought to have been written during his second period of imprisonment, was also written at this time. He was released after about seven weeks, and, though constrained himself by the conditions of his release, provided money to his brothers for the King's cause.

Between 1642 and 1646 he spent a considerable time in the Low Countries, returning at least twice to England. His interest in painting (he was admitted to the Freedom of the Painters Company in 1647) was no doubt strengthened during that time. After his release he lived for a time in London, on good terms with many "wits" of the time, but was later with the King in Oxford. He left England after the fall of that city in 1646, and fought for the French against Spain. He was back in England by 1648, and was soon imprisoned again, probably because of fears aroused by the uprising in Kent at Christmas 1647, provoked by the county committee's attempt to prohibit celebration of that feast. His book of verse, Lucasta, was licensed in February 1648 but publication was not allowed until May 1649. Andrew Marvell, in one of the dedicatory poems prefaced to the volume, considers why it should have been subject to such censorship. Lovelace seems to have spent his fortune in personal extravagance and in serving the King, and may have died in poverty in Gunpowder Alley in London, a known resort of "indigent refugees, lurking papists and delinquents." He died sometime between the summer of 1656 and the autumn of 1657. A second volume, Lucasta. Posthume Poems, dated 1659 but actually published in 1660, was seen through the press by his brother Dudley, along with Elegies Sacred to the Memory of the Author: By several of his Friends. The second Lucasta is generally thought to have nothing equal to the best poems in the 1649 volume; however, there are some interesting poems in which such creatures as an ant, a snail, a falcon, and a fly are discussed as emblems of the human political world.

* * *

To Lucasta, Going to the Wars

I

Tell me not (sweet) I am unkind,
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast, and quiet mind,
To war and arms I fly. [1]

II

True; a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field;
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield. [2]

III

Yet this inconstancy is such,
As you too shall adore;
I could not love thee (dear) so much,
Lov'd I not honour more.
—1649

The Grasshopper

To my Noble Friend, Mr. Charles Cotton [3]

Ode

I

Oh thou that swing'st upon the waving hair
Of some well-filled oaten beard,
Drunk ev'ry night with a delicious tear
Dropt thee from Heav'n, where now th' art reared.

II

The joys of earth and air are thine entire,
That with thy feet and wings dost hop and fly;
And when thy poppy works thou dost retire
To thy carved acron-bed to lie. [4]

III

Up with the day, the sun thou welcomst then,
Sportst in the gilt-plats of his beams,
And all these merry days mak'st merry men,
Thy self, and melancholy streams.

IV

But ah the sickle! Golden ears are cropped;
Ceres and Bacchus bid good night;
Sharp frosty fingers all your flowers have topped,
And what scythes spared, winds shave off quite.

V

Poor verdant fool! And now green ice! thy joys
Large and as lasting, as thy perch of grass,
Bid us lay in 'gainst winter, rain, and poise
Their floods, with an o'erflowing glass.

VI

Thou best of men and friends! we will create
A genuine summer in each other's breast;
And spite of this cold time and frozen fate
Thaw us a warm seat to our rest.

VII

Our sacred hearths shall burn eternally
As vestal flames, the North-wind, he Shall strike his frost-stretched wings, dissolve and fly
This Ætna in epitome.

---

[1] the nunnery etc. This is a good example of Royalist coat-trailing, like similar apparently approving references to Roman Catholicism in Herrick and Vaughan.

[2] The poem evokes an earlier, "heroic" age, removed from the actualities of contemporary combat (the English cavalry did not carry shields, for example); this historical inaccuracy is suggestive of chivalrous attachment to the Royalist cause.

[3] Charles Cotton was a poet. In this poem, a translation of a Greek lyric attributed in the period to Anacreon, Lovelace expresses a common theme of the defeated Royalist, the retreat into private life, personal friendship, and the cup that cheers. The grasshopper is an extended metaphor of the impermanence of prosperity.

[4] when thy poppy works when you become sleepy, as if under the influence of opium; acron obsolete form of acorn (OED).

VIII

Dropping December shall come weeping in,
Bewail th' usurping of his reign;
But when in showers of old Greek we begin,
Shall cry, he hath his crown again!

IX

Night as clear Hesper shall our tapers whip
From the light casements where we play,
And the dark hag from her black mantle strip,
And stick there everlasting day.

X

Thus richer than untempted kings are we,
That asking nothing, nothing need:
Though Lord of all what seas embrace; yet he
That wants himself, is poor indeed.
—1649

To Lucasta. From Prison [1]

An Epode

I

Long in thy shackles, liberty,
I ask not from these walls, but thee;
Left for a while another's bride
To fancy all the world beside.

II

Yet ere I do begin to love,
See! How I all my objects prove;
Then my free soul to that confine,
'Twere possible I might call mine.

III

First I would be in love with Peace,
And her rich swelling breasts increase;
But how alas! how may that be,
Despising Earth, will she love me?

IV

Faine would I be in love with War,
As my dear just avenging star;
But War is loved so ev'ry where,
Ev'n he disdains a lodging here.

V

Thee and thy wounds I would bemoan
Fair thorough-shot Religion;
But he lives only that kills thee,
And who so binds thy hands, is free.

VI

I would love a Parliament
As a main prop from Heaven sent;
But ah! Who's he that would be wedded
To the fairest body that's beheaded? [2]

VII

Next would I court my Liberty,
And then my birth-right, Property;
But can that be, when it is known
There's nothing you can call your own?

VIII

A Reformation I would have,
As for our griefs a sovereign salve;
That is, a cleansing of each wheel
Of state, that yet some rust doth feel:

IX

But not a Reformation so,
As to reform were to o'erthrow;
Like watches by unskilful men
Disjointed, and set ill again.

---

[1] This poem was almost certainly composed during Lovelace's first imprisonment, in 1642. The poem asks for liberty from Lucasta in order to find other objects of love.

[2] the fairest body that's beheaded presumably in reference to Parliament's repudiation of the authority of the King.

X

The Public Faith I would adore,
But she is bankrupt of her store; [1]
Nor how to trust her can I see,
For she that cozens all, must me.

XI

Since then none of these can be
Fit objects for my Love and me;
What then remains, but th' only spring
Of all our loves and joys? The KING.

XII

He who being the whole Ball
Of Day on Earth, lends it to all; [2]
When seeking to eclipse his right,
Blinded, we stand in our own light.

XIII

And now an universal mist
Of error is spread o'er each breast,
With such a fury edged, as is
Not found in th' inwards of th' abyss.

XIV

Oh from thy glorious starry wain
Dispense on me one sacred beam
To light me where I soon may see
How to serve you, and you trust me. [3]
—1649

To my Worthy Friend Mr. Peter Lilly;
on that excellent Picture of his Majesty, and the Duke of York, drawn by him at Hampton-Court [4]

I

See! what a clouded Majesty! and eyes
Whose glory through their mist doth brighter rise!
See! what an humble bravery doth shine,
And grief triumphant breaking through each line;
How it commands the face! so sweet a scorn
Never did happy misery adorn!
So sacred a contempt! that others show
To this, (oth' height of all the wheel) below;
That mightiest monarchs by this shaded book
May copy out their proudest, richest look.

Whilst the true Eaglet this quick lustre spies,
And by his Sun's enlightens his own eyes; [5]
He cares his cares, his burthen feels, then straight
Joys that so lightly he can bear such weight;
Whilst either either's passion doth borrow,
And both do grieve the same victorious sorrow.

These my best Lilly with so bold a spirit
And soft a grace, as if thou didst inherit
For that time all their greatness, and didst draw
With those brave eyes your Royal Sitters saw.

Not as of old, when a rough hand did speak
A strong aspect, and a fair face, a weak;

---

[1] Public Faith "In order to finance the militia Parliament published 'proposals for the bringing in of money, or plate, to maintain horse, horsemen and arms.' 'And they further declared that whosoever brought in money or plate...should be repaid their money with interest of 8 per cent, for which they did engage the public faith'" (Clarendon, quoted by John Wilders, Samuel Butler: Hudibras, Oxford: Clarendon P, 1967, p. 352).

[2] He who... Of Day on Earth Lovelace is thinking in terms of the analogy between the sun in the heavens and the king on earth.

[3] It is possible that when he wrote this poem, Lovelace was already contemplating making his submission to Parliament with a view to obtaining his release from prison. The question of whether the King could thereafter trust him might well have been on his mind.

[4] The picture praised in this poem recorded one of the occasions when Charles, imprisoned at Hampton Court, was allowed to see his children. It is an interesting painting, regarded by art historians as marking a landmark in Lely's career. For an excellent, and complicating, discussion of both the painting and this poem, see Lois Potter, Secret Rites and Secret Writing: Royalist Literature 1641–1660 (Cambridge: Cambridge U P, 1989), 65–71.

[5] the true Eaglet Again Lovelace is playing on the Sun-King parallel, and on the perception that eagles could gaze directly at the sun. In this case the "eaglet" is the future James II.

When only a black beard cried Villain, and
By Hieroglyphicks we could understand;
When crystal typified in a white spot,
And the bright ruby was but one red blot;
Thou dost the things orientally the same,
Not only paintst its colour, but its flame:
Thou sorrow canst design without a tear, [1]
And with the Man his very Hope or Fear;
So that th' amazed world shall henceforth find
None but my Lilly ever drew a Mind.
—1649

To Althea, From Prison [2]

SONG

I

When Love with unconfined wings
Hovers within my gates;
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at the grates:
When I lie tangled in her hair,
And fettered to her eye;
The Gods that wanton in the air,
Know no such liberty. [3]

II

When flowing cups run swiftly round
With no allaying Thames,
Our careless heads with roses bound,
Our hearts with loyal flames;
When thirsty grief in wine we steep,
When healths and draughts go free,
Fishes that tipple in the deep,
Know no such liberty.

III

When (like committed linnets) I
With shriller throat shall sing
The sweetness, mercy, majesty,
And glories of my King;
When I shall voice aloud, how good
He is, how great should be;
Enlarged winds that curl the flood,
Know no such liberty.

IV

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage;
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free;
Angels alone that soar above,
Enjoy such liberty.
—1649

The Ant [4]

I

Forbear thou great good husband, little Ant;
A little respite from thy flood of sweat;
Thou, thine own horse and cart, under this plant
Thy spacious tent, fan thy prodigious heat;
Down with thy double load of that one grain;
It is a granary for all thy train.

2

Cease large example of wise thrift a while,
(For thy example is become our law) [5]
And teach thy frowns a seasonable smile:

---

[1] Thou sorrow canst design without a tear Lovelace is here suggesting Lely's independence of crudely emblematic pointers, that is, his skill in psychological portraiture.

[2] This poem circulated in manuscript for seven years before it was published; at least six manuscripts survive.

[3] Gods "birds" in some manuscripts.

[4] This poem does not merely flaunt Royalist liberality and love of pleasure, but suggests that Lovelace has given real thought to the opposition between two value systems.

[5] For thy example is become our law This line points to the ant's meaning as an emblem of Puritanism.

So Cato sometimes the nak'd Florals saw.[1]
And thou almighty foe, lay by thy sting,
Whilst thy unpaid musicians, crickets, sing.

3

Lucasta, She that holy makes the day,
And 'stils new life in fields of fueillemort:[2]
Hath back restor'd their verdure with one ray,
And with her eye bid all to play and sport.
Ant to work still; Age will thee truant call;
And to save now, th' art worse than prodigal.

4

Austere and Cynic! not one hour t'allow,
To lose with pleasure what thou gotst with pain:
But drive on sacred festivals, thy plow;
Tearing high-ways with thy o'er charged wain.
Not all thy life time one poor minute live,
And thy o'er laboured bulk with mirth relieve?

5

Look up then miserable ant, and spy
Thy fatal foes, for breaking of her law,
Hov'ring above thee, Madam, Margaret Pie,
And her fierce Servant, Meagre, Sir John Daw:
Thy self and storehouse now they do store up,
And thy whole harvest too within their crop.

6

Thus we unthrifty thrive within Earth's tomb,
For some more rav'nous and ambitious jaw:
The grain in th' ants, the ants in the pie's womb,
The pie in th' hawk's, the hawks ith' eagle's maw:
So scattering to hoard 'gainst a long day,
Thinking to save all, we cast all away.
—1660

To a Lady with Child that Asked an Old Shirt

And why an honoured ragged shirt, that shows,
Like tattered ensigns, all its body's blows?
Should it be swathed in a vest so dire,
It were enough to set the child on fire;
Dishevelled queens should strip them of their hair,
And in it mantle the new rising heir:
Nor do I know ought worth to wrap it in,
Except my parchment upper-coat of skin:
And then expect no end of its chaste tears,
That first was rolled in down, now furs of bears.
But since to Ladies 't hath a custom been Linen to send, that travail and lie in;
To the nine Sempstresses, my former friends,[3]
I sued, but they had nought but shreds and ends.
At last, the jolli'st of the three times three,
Rent th' apron from her smock, and gave it me,
'Twas soft and gentle, subtly spun no doubt;
Pardon my boldness, Madam; Here's the clout.
—1660

---

[1] Cato sometimes the nak'd Florals saw Lovelace understands Puritan objection to festivals as based upon their connection to pagan customs; this line is historically inaccurate but reflects the fact that "rather than prevent a popular custom, [Cato] left the theatre" (Poems of Richard Lovelace, ed. C.H. Wilkinson, Oxford: Clarendon P, 1930, p. 300).

[2] fueillemort of a faded colour (Poems, p. 300).

[3] the nine Sempstresses, my former friends that is, the nine Muses. He has no shirt to give her, so he offers her this poem.

Abraham Cowley

1618 – 1667

Abraham Cowley was the seventh child of Thomas Cowley, a London stationer. He was born after his father's death, and probably named after his godfather. When he was about ten he opened Spenser's Faerie Queene by chance, was "infinitely delighted" and resolved to be a poet himself. One of the most precocious of English poets, he was fifteen when Poetical Blossoms was published in 1633, but much of it may have been ready for the press two years earlier. Rumour of its impending publication may have been the occasion of the sonnet "How soon hath Time," by Milton, who was ten years older. 1633 was also notable as the year when the poems of John Donne and George Herbert first achieved print publication. Cowley has been thought of as the last of "the school of Donne." Cowley was educated at Westminster School and in 1636 went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a close friend of Richard Crashaw and of William Hervey, the first cousin of Henry Jermyn, who was to become Henrietta Maria's secretary and eventually Earl of St. Albans. This connection was later to become important to Cowley. As a young man, Cowley was ambitious for fame as a poet, imagining himself crossing the Alps of success as "the Muse's Hannibal." This ambition may explain his unwise attempt to write a religious epic, the Davideis, which was never completed. In 1642 he wrote a comedy, The Guardian, for a visit to Cambridge of the Prince of Wales; any hopes of becoming a professional dramatist were dashed by Parliament's banning of all stage performances shortly afterwards. In 1644 he was deprived of his position at Cambridge by the Earl of Manchester's commission, which required subscription to the Solemn League and Covenant. By then Cowley had already departed for Oxford, at that point in the hands of the Royalists; he became a member of the Great Tew circle which congregated around Lord Falkland, and was regarded as a leading Royalist poet. In the early summer of 1643 he began work on a long poem, The Civil War, which he abandoned after the first battle of Newbury (September 20, 1643) when it became apparent that history was providing the wrong plot.

Henrietta Maria left England in April 1644, never to see Charles I again. Some time before June 1646 Cowley was in Paris, in Jermyn's household. For several years he managed Henrietta Maria's correspondence (in cipher) with Charles, and, after Charles's death, with the Duke of York. Cowley may have been responsible for drawing Crashaw to the attention of Henrietta Maria. In Paris he is likely to have met Thomas Hobbes, whose philosophy, it has been argued, was important for the development of Cowley's poetic; he also met the diarist John Evelyn, who was to become a great friend, and Edmund Waller, his chief rival as a love poet. Having earlier declared his ambition to be "the Muse's Hannibal," he now decided that he would be "Love's Columbus." His poems in The Mistress (1647) provoked Dr. Johnson to say that they "might have been written for penance by a hermit, or for hire by a philosophical rhymer who had only heard of another sex."

In 1651 Cowley went to Scotland with letters for Charles II, and then to Jersey, still a Royalist stronghold, with a mission to sell Crown lands there to raise funds for the royal exiles. Hyde, later to be Lord Chancellor and the most powerful subject in the first years of the Restoration, suspected that Cowley had skimmed off a disproportionate commission. By the summer of 1654 he was back in England, with Cromwell's permission, studying medicine, perhaps as a cover, and now suspected by both sides. In April 1655 he was seized on suspicion of a plot against Cromwell, and only released when his friend, the doctor Charles Scarborough, put up a thousand pounds as warranty for his good behaviour. Like Lovelace, Cowley seems to have been profoundly affected by imprisonment, and the publication he prepared while incarcerated was to ensure that his years of work as a Royalist agent were not rewarded as he had hoped after the Restoration. The Poems of 1656, with its famous preface and the often enigmatic Pindaric Odes, have received a good deal of critical attention, in the hope that they might yield a sense of what Cowley's true political opinions were, and whether they were revealed or masked in the preface. His biographer, Bishop Sprat, wrote that he believed "that it would be a meritorious service to the King if any man who was known to have followed his interest could insinuate into the usurpers' minds that men of his principles were now willing to be quiet, and could persuade the poor oppressed Royalists to conceal their affections for better occasions." Unfortunately for Cowley, neither Hyde nor Charles saw it that way, Hyde being angered at the apparent desertion of the Royalist cause expressed in the preface and Charles perhaps concerned by the apparent endorsement of the assassination of a ruler in the "Brutus" ode. It is worth noting, though, that the Poems of 1656, like The Mistress of 1647, were published by Humphrey Moseley, the leading Royalist publisher of the period.

After his release from prison, Cowley lived in London under surveillance from both sides. He was admitted to the degree of "doctor of physick" at Oxford in December 1657, but there is no evidence that he ever practised. A more notable defector from the Royalist cause at that time was the Duke of Buckingham, who was an admirer of Cowley's work and became a consistent supporter. Another important friend made at this time was Thomas Sprat, still an undergraduate at Wadham College, Oxford, as was the future Earl of Rochester. When it finally became clear that Charles II would be restored to the throne, Cowley tried to rid himself of the suspicion caused by the Poems of 1656, writing a long letter to Ormonde at the royal headquarters in Brussels on December 26, 1659. He received no direct help from Charles, but the King did order Trinity College to reinstate him in his fellowship and Cowley was allowed to resume his service to Jermyn. His suit for the mastership of the Savoy, a lucrative sinecure which had been promised him by Charles I, was unsuccessful; his poem in response to this disappointment, "The Complaint," cannot be regarded as a model of stoic fortitude. However, Cowley was far from impoverished during the seven years that remained to him after the Restoration. He had the income from his Cambridge fellowship, a profitable association with Davenant in the newly revived London theatre, with two of his own plays quite popular, and, from 1662, a substantial grant of lands from Henrietta Maria. Moreover, he continued to lead an active intellectual life, with friends among those who founded the Royal Society. He was among those who floated a plan to regularize the English language, and he turned his retirement from affairs of state to good account by becoming a keen amateur gardener, with the help of his friend John Evelyn. His essays, among the most attractive of his writings, are the product of these retired years. He was regarded, by the time of his death, as the greatest poet of his age, and according to Evelyn "near one hundred coaches of noblemen and persons of quality" attended his funeral. He was buried in Westminster Abbey next to Chaucer and Spenser.

* * *

The Wish

1

Well then; I now do plainly see,
This busy world and I shall ne'r agree;
The very honey of all earthly joy
Does of all meats the soonest cloy,
And they (methinks) deserve my pity,
Who for it can endure the stings,
The crowd, and buzz, and murmurings
Of this great hive, the City.

2

Ah, yet ere I descend to th' grave
May I a small house, and large garden have!
And a few friends, and many books, both true,

Both wise, and both delightful too!
And since Love ne'r will from me flee,
A mistress moderately fair,
And good as guardian-angels are,
Only belov'd, and loving me!

3

Oh, fountains, when in you shall I
My self, eased of unpeaceful thoughts, espy?
Oh fields! Oh woods! when, when shall I be made
The happy tenant of your shade?
Here's the spring-head of pleasure's flood;
Here's wealthy Nature's Treasury,
Where all the riches lie, that she
Has coined and stamped for good.

4

Pride and Ambition here,
Only in far fetched metaphors appear;
Here nought but winds can hurtful murmurs scatter,
And nought but Echo flatter.
The gods, when they descended, hither
From heaven did always choose their way;
And therefore we may boldly say,
That 'tis the way too thither.

5

How happy here should I,
And one dear She, live, and embracing die?
She who is all the world, and can exclude
In deserts solitude.
I should have then this only fear,
Lest men, when they my pleasures see,
Should hither throng to live like me,
And so make a city here.
—1647

Extracts from the Preface to the Poems of 1656.

And if in quiet and flourishing times [poets] meet with so small encouragement, what are they to expect in rough and troubled ones? If Wit be such a Plant, that it scarce receives heat enough to preserve it alive even in the Summer of our cold Climate, how can it choose but wither in a long and sharp winter? A warlike, various and a tragical age is best to write of, but worst to write in.

. . . .

Neither is the present constitution of my Mind more proper than that of the Times for this exercise, or rather divertisement. There is nothing that requires so much serenity and cheerfulness of Spirit; it must not be either overwhelmed with the cares of Life, or overcast with the Clouds of Melancholy and Sorrow, or shaken and disturbed with the storms of injurious Fortune; it must like the Halcyon, have fair weather to breed in. The Soul must be filled with bright and delightful Ideas, when it undertakes to communicate delight to others; which is the main end of Poesie.

. . . .

I have cast away all such pieces as I wrote during the time of the late troubles, with any relation to the differences that caused them; as among others, three Books of the Civil War itself, reaching as far as the first Battle of Newbury, where the succeeding misfortunes of the party stopped the work, for it is so uncustomary, as to become almost ridiculous, to make Laurels for the Conquered. Now though in all Civil Dissentions, when they break into open hostilities, the War of the Pen is allowed to accompany that of the Sword, and everyone is in a manner obliged with his Tongue, as well as Hand, to serve and assist the side which he engages in; yet when the event of battle, and the unaccountable Will of God has determined the controversy, and that we have submitted to the conditions of the Conqueror, we must lay down our Pens as well as Arms, we must march out of our Cause itself, and dismantle that, as well as our Towns and Castles, of all the Works and Fortifications of Wit and Reason by which we defended it. We ought not sure, to begin ourselves to revive the remembrance of those times and actions for which we have received a General Amnesty, as a favor from the Victor. The truth is, neither We, nor They, ought by the Representation of Places and Images to make a kind of Artificial Memory of those things wherein we are all bound to desire like Themistocles, the Art of Oblivion.[1] The enmities of Fellow-Citizens should be, like that of Lovers, the Redintegration of their Amity.[2] The names of Party, and Titles of Division, which are sometimes in effect the whole quarrel, should be extinguished and forbidden in peace under the notion of Acts of Hostility. And I would have it accounted no less unlawful to rip up old wounds, than to give new ones; which has made me not only abstain from printing any things of this kind, but to burn the very copies, and inflict a severer punishment on them myself, than perhaps the most rigid Officer of State would have thought that they deserved.

—1656

The Grasshopper [3]

Happy insect, what can be
In happiness compared to thee?
Fed with nourishment divine,
The dewy morning's gentle wine!
Nature waits upon thee still,
And thy verdant cup does fill,
'Tis filled where ever thou dost tread,
Nature self's thy Ganymede. [4]
Thou dost drink, and dance, and sing;
Happier than the happiest King!
All the fields which thou dost see,
All the plants belong to thee,
All that summer hours produce,
Fertile made with early juice.
Man for thee does sow and plow;
Farmer he, and landlord thou!
Thou dost innocently joy;
Nor does thy luxury destroy;
The shepherd gladly heareth thee,
More harmonious than he.
Thee country hinds with gladness hear,
Prophet of the ripened year!
Thee Phoebus loves, and does inspire;
Phoebus in himself thy sire.
To thee of all things upon earth,
Life is no longer than thy mirth.
Happy insect, happy thou,
Dost neither age, nor winter know.
But when thou'st drunk, and danced, and sung,
Thy fill, the flowry leaves among (Voluptuous, and wise with all, Epicurean animal!)
Sated with thy summer feast,
Thou retir'st to endless rest.
—1656

The Innocent Ill

I

Though all thy gestures and discourses be
Coined and stamped by Modesty,
Though from thy tongue ne'er slipped away
One word which nuns at th' altar might not say,
Yet such a sweetness, such a grace

---

[1] Themistocles a celebrated Athenian statesman. Lives were written by Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos, and there is a famous sketch of his character in the first book of Thucydides (Oxford Companion to Classical Literature); Oblivion was a politically loaded word.

[2] Redintegration restoration, renewal (OED).

[3] Compare Lovelace's poem of the same title.

[4] Ganymede a Trojan youth, whom Zeus made his cupbearer.

In all thy speech appear,
That what to th' eye a beauteous face,
That thy tongue is to th' ear.
So cunningly it wounds the heart,
It strikes such heat through ev'ery part,
That thou a tempter worse then Satan art.

2

Though in thy thoughts scarce any tracks have been
So much as of Original Sin,
Such charms thy beauty wears as might
Desires in dying confessed Saints excite.
Thou with strange adultery
Dost in each breast a brothel keep;
Awake all men do lust for thee,
And some enjoy thee when they sleep.
Ne'er before did woman live,
Who to such multitudes did give
The root and cause of sin, but only Eve.

3

Though in thy breast so quick a pity be,
That a fly's death's a wound to thee.
Though savage, and rock-hearted those
Appear, that weep not even romances' woes.
Yet ne'er before was tyrant known,
Whose rage was of so large extent,
The ills thou dost are whole thine own,
Thou'rt principal and instrument;
In all the deaths that come from you,
You do the treble office do
Of judge, of torturer, and of weapon too.

4

Thou lovely instrument of angry Fate,
Which God did for our faults create!
Thou pleasant, universal ill,
Which sweet as health, yet like a plague dost kill!
Thou kind, well-natured tyranny!
Thou chaste committer of a rape!
Thou voluntary destiny,
Which no man can, or would escape!
So gentle, and so glad to spare,
So wondrous good, and wondrous fair,
(We know) even the destroying angels are.
—1656

On the Death of Mr. Crashaw

Poet and Saint! to thee alone are given
The two most sacred names of Earth and Heaven.
The hard and rarest union which can be
Next that of Godhead with Humanity. [1]
Long did the Muses banished slaves abide,
And built vain Pyramids to mortal pride;
Like Moses thou (though spells and charms withstand)
Hast brought them nobly home back to their Holy Land.
Ah wretched we, poets of Earth! but thou
Wert living the same poet which thou'rt now.
Whilst angels sing to thee their airs divine,
And joy in an applause so great as thine.
Equal society with them to hold,
Thou need'st not make new songs, but say the old.
And they (kind spirits!) shall all rejoice to see
How little less then they, exalted man may be.
Still the old heathen gods in numbers dwell,
The heavenliest thing on Earth still keeps up Hell.
Nor have we yet quite purged the Christian land;
Still idols here, like calves at Bethel stand.
And though Pan's death long since all oracles broke, [2]
Yet still in rhyme the fiend Apollo spoke:
Nay with the worst of heathen dotage we

---

[1] [the union] of Godhead with Humanity as in the traditional Christian understanding of Jesus.

[2] Pan's death…all oracles broke in reference to the tradition that idolatrous gods and oracles were destroyed by Christ; see Milton, On the Morning of Christ's Nativity.

(Vain men!) the monster woman deify;
Find stars, and tie our fates there in a face,
And Paradise in them by whom we lost it, place.
What different faults corrupt our Muses thus?
Wanton as girls, as old wives, fabulous!
Thy spotless Muse, like Mary, did contain
The boundless Godhead; she did well disdain
That her eternal verse employed should be
On a less subject than eternity;
And for a sacred mistress scorned to take,
But her whom God himself scorned not his spouse to make.
It (in a kind) her miracle did do;
A fruitful mother was, and virgin too.
How well (blest Swan) did fate contrive thy death;
And made thee render up thy tuneful breath
In thy great mistress' arms? thou most divine
And richest offering of Loretto's shrine!
Where like some holy sacrifice t'expire,
A fever burns thee, and love lights the fire.
Angels (they say) brought the famed chapel there,
And bore the sacred load in triumph through the air.
'Tis surer much they brought thee there, and they,
And thou, their charge, went singing all the way.
Pardon, my Mother Church, if I consent
That angels led him when from thee he went,
For even in error sure no danger is
When joined with so much piety as his.
Ah, mighty God, with shame I speak't, and grief,
Ah that our greatest faults were in belief!
And our weak reason were even weaker yet,
Rather than thus our wills too strong for it.
His faith perhaps in some nice tenents might
Be wrong; his life, I'm sure, was in the right. [1]
And I myself a Catholic will be,
So far at least, great Saint, to pray to thee. [2]
Hail, bard triumphant! and some care bestow
On us, the poets militant below! [3]
Opposed by our old enemy, adverse Chance,
Attacked by envy, and by ignorance,
Enchained by beauty, tortured by desires,
Exposed by tyrant-love to savage beasts and fires.
Thou from low earth in nobler flames didst rise,
And like Elijah, mount alive the skies. [4]
Elisha-like (but with a wish much less, [5]
More fit thy greatness, and my littleness)
Lo here I beg (I whom thou once didst prove
So humble to esteem, so good to love)
Not that thy spirit might on me doubled be,
I ask but half thy mighty spirit for me.
And when my Muse soars with so strong a wing,
'Twill learn of things divine, and first of thee to sing.
—1656

To Mr. Hobbes

I

Vast bodies of philosophy
I oft have seen, and read,
But all are bodies dead,
Or bodies by art fashioned;
I never yet the living soul could see,
But in thy books and thee.

---

[1] nice tenents fine points of theology. Cowley has to deal with the fact that Crashaw had converted to Roman Catholicism.

[2] to pray to thee Roman Catholics addressed intercessory prayers to the saints; the Reformed religions considered this an idolatrous practice.

[3] bard triumphant...poets militant in allusion to the Church Triumphant (the host of Christians who died in the faith and are considered to be in Heaven) and the Church Militant (the Church here on earth, still battling against evil).

[4] like Elijah, mount alive the skies "there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire...And Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (II Kings 2:11).

[5] Elisha-like Elisha asked for a "double portion" of Elijah's spirit (II Kings 2:9).

'Tis only God can know
Whether the fair Idea thou dost show
Agree entirely with his own or no.
This I dare boldly tell,
'Tis so like Truth, 'twill serve our turn as well.
Just, as in Nature, their proportions be,
As full of concord their variety,
As firm the parts upon their center rest,
And all so solid are, that they at least
As much as Nature, emptiness detest.

2

Long did the mighty Stagirite retain
The universal intellectual reign; [1]
Saw his own country's short-lived leopard slain;
The stronger Roman-eagle did outfly,
Oftner renewed his age, and saw that die.
Mecca itself, in spite of Mahumet, possessed,
And chased by a wild deluge from the east,
His monarchy new-planted in the west.
But as in time each great imperial race
Degenerates, and gives some new one place:
So did this noble Empire waste,
Sunk by degrees from glories past,
And in the school-men's hands it perished quite at last. [2]
Then nought but words it grew,
And those all barb'rous too, [3]
It perished, and it vanished there,
The life and soul breathed out became but empty air.

3

The fields which answered well the ancients' plow,
Spent and out-worn return no harvest now,
In barren age wild and unglorious lie,
And boast of past fertility,
The poor relief of present poverty.
Food and fruit we must now want:
Unless new lands we plant.
We break up tombs with sacrilegious hands,
Old rubbish we remove;
To walk in ruins, like vain ghosts, we love,
And with fond divining wands,
We search among the dead
For treasures buried;
Whilst still the liberal Earth does hold
So many virgin mines of undiscovered gold.

4

The Baltic, Euxin, and the Caspian,
And slender-limbed Mediterranean,
Seem narrow creeks to thee, and only fit.
For the poor wretched fisher-boats of Wit.
Thy nobler vessel the vast ocean tries,
And nothing sees but seas and skies,
'Till unknown regions it descries,
Thou great Columbus of the golden lands of new philosophies.
Thy task was harder much than his,
For thy learned America is
Not only found out first by thee,
And rudely left to future Industry,
But thy eloquence and thy wit
Has planted, peopled, built, and civilized it.

5

I little thought before,
(Nor, being my own self so poor,
Could comprehend so vast a store)
That all the wardrobe of rich eloquence
Could have afforded half enough,
Of bright, of new, and lasting stuff,
To clothe the mighty limbs of thy gigantic sense.
Thy solid reason like the shield from heaven

---

[1] the mighty Stagirite Aristotle, who was born at Stageira. He was a vastly influential philosopher for centuries, and an important aspect of early modern intellectual life was the attempt to dethrone his philosophy.

[2] the school-men the scholastic philosophers of the Middle Ages.

[3] barb'rous like the speech of barbarians. See the interesting entry under barbarous a (OED).

To the Trojan Hero given,[1]
Too strong to take a mark from any mortal dart,
Yet shines with gold and gems in every part,
And wonders on it graved by the learn'd hand of Art;
A shield that gives delight
Even to the enemies' sight,
Then, when they're sure to lose the combat by't.

6

Nor can the snow which now cold Age does shed
Upon thy reverend head,
Quench or allay the noble fires within,
But all which thou hast been,
And all that youth can be, thou'rt yet,
So fully still dost thou
Enjoy the manhood, and the bloom of wit,
And all the natural heat, but not the fever too.
So contraries on Ætna's top conspire,
Here hoary frosts, and by them breaks out fire;
A secure peace the faithful neighbours keep,
Th' embolden'd snow next to the flames does sleep.
And if we weigh, like thee,
Nature, and causes, we shall see
That thus it needs must be.
To things immortal Time can do no wrong,
And that which never is to die, for ever must be young.
—1656

Brutus

1

Excellent Brutus, of all human race
The best, 'till Nature was improved by Grace,[2]
'Till men above themselves faith raised more
Than reason above beasts before.
Virtue was thy life's center, and from thence
Did silently and constantly dispense
The gentle vigorous influence
To all the wide and fair circumference:
And all the parts upon it leaned so easily,
Obeyed the mighty force so willingly,
That none could discord or disorder see
In all their contrariety.
Each had his motion natural and free,
And the whole no more moved than the whole world could be.

2

From thy strict Rule some think that thou didst swerve (Mistaken honest men) in Cæsar's blood;[3]
What mercy could the tyrant's life deserve,
From him who killed himself rather than serve?[4]
Th' heroic exaltations of good
Are so far from understood,
We count them vice: Alas our sight's so ill,
That things which swiftest move seem to stand still.
We look not upon Virtue in her height,
On her supreme idea, brave and bright,
In the original light:
But as her beams reflected pass
Through our own nature or ill custom's glass.
And 'tis no wonder so,

---

[1] the shield from heaven / To the Trojan Hero given In Virgil's Aeneid, Book 8.615 ff., there is an elaborate description of the shield Vulcan makes for Aeneas, with its depiction of Roman history culminating in the Battle of Actium.

[2] 'till Nature was improved by Grace until the Christian dispensation. See the ending of the poem.

[3] Cæsar's blood For a vivid portrayal of the role of Brutus in the assassination, see Shakespeare's Julius Caesar.

[4] him who killed himself Brutus killed himself after being defeated by Octavian and Antony.

If with dejected eye
In standing pools we seek the sky,
That stars so high above should seem to us below.

3

Can we stand by and see
Our mother robbed, and bound, and ravished be,
Yet not to her assistance stir,
Pleas'd with the strength and beauty of the ravisher?
Or shall we fear to kill him, if before
The cancelled name of friend he bore?
Ingrateful Brutus do they call?
Ingrateful Cæsar who could Rome enthral!
An act more barbarous and unnatural
(In th' exact balance of true virtue tried)
Than his successor Nero's parricide! [1]
There's none but Brutus could deserve
That all men else should wish to serve,
And Cæsar's usurped place to him should proffer;
None can deserve 't but he who would refuse the offer.

4

Ill Fate assumed a body thee t' affright,
And wrapt itself i' th' terrors of the night;
I'll meet thee at Philippi, said the spright:
I'll meet thee there, saidst thou,
With such a voice, and such a brow,
As put the trembling ghost to sudden flight;
It vanished as a taper's light
Goes out when spirits appear in sight.
One would have thought t' had heard the morning crow,
Or seen her well-appointed star
Come marching up the eastern hill afar.
Nor durst it in Philippi's field appear,
But unseen attacked thee there.
Had it presum'd in any shape thee to oppose,
Thou wouldst have forced it back upon thy foes:
Or slain't like Cæsar, though it be
A Conqu'ror and a Monarch mightier far than he.

5

What joy can human things to us afford,
When we see perish thus by odd events,
Ill men, and wretched accidents,
The best cause and best man that ever drew a sword?
When we see
The false Octavius, and wild Antony,
God-like Brutus, conquer thee?
What can we say but thine own tragic word,
That Virtue, which had worshipped been by thee
As the most solid good, and greatest deity,
By this fatal proof became
An idol only, and a name.
Hold noble Brutus, and restrain
The bold voice of thy generous disdain:
These mighty gulfs are yet
Too deep for all thy judgment and thy wit.
The time's set forth already which shall quell
Stiff Reason, when it offers to rebel;
Which these great secrets shall unseal,
And new philosophies reveal.
A few years more, so soon hadst thou not died,
Would have confounded human virtue's pride,
And show'd thee a God crucified.
—1656

To the Royal Society

1

Philosophy the great and only heir
Of all that human knowledge which has been
Unforfeited by man's rebellious sin,
Though full of years he do appear,

---

[1] Nero's parricide! Agrippina, the wife of the Emperor Claudius, persuaded him to adopt her son Nero; four years later Claudius died; it was generally believed that Agrippina handed him a dish of poisonous mushrooms (see OCD articles on Nero and Claudius).

(Philosophy, I say, and call it, he,
For whatsoe'er the painter's fancy be,
It a male-virtue seems to me)
Has still been kept in nonage till of late,
Nor managed or enjoyed his vast estate:
Three or four thousand years one would have thought,
To ripeness and perfection might have brought
A science so well bred and nursed,
And of such hopeful parts too at the first.
But, oh, the guardians and the tutors then,
(Some negligent, and some ambitious men) Would ne'er consent to set him free,
Or his own natural powers to let him see,
Lest that should put an end to their authority.

2

That his own business he might quite forget,
They amused him with the sports of wanton wit,
With the desserts of poetry they fed him,
Instead of solid meats t' increase his force;
Instead of vigorous exercise they led him
Into the pleasant labyrinths of ever-fresh discourse:
Instead of carrying him to see
The riches which do hoarded for him lie
In Nature's endless treasury,
They chose his eye to entertain
(His curious but not covetous eye)
With painted scenes, and pageants of the brain.
Some few exalted spirits this latter age has shown,
That laboured to assert the liberty
(From guardians, who were now usurpers grown)
Of this old minor still, captived philosophy;
But 'twas rebellion called to fight
For such a long-oppressed right.
Bacon at last, a mighty man, arose
Whom a wise King and Nature chose
Lord Chancellor of both their laws, [1]
And boldly undertook the injured pupil's cause.

3

Authority, which did a body boast,
Though 'twas but air condensed, and stalked about,
Like some old giant's more gigantic ghost,
To terrify the learned rout
With the plain magic of true Reason's light,
He chased out of our sight,
Nor suffered living men to be misled
By the vain shadows of the dead:
To graves, from whence it rose, the conquered phantom fled;
He broke that monstrous god which stood
In midst of th' orchard, and the whole did claim,
Which with a useless scythe of wood, [2]
And something else not worth a name,
(Both vast for show, yet neither fit
Or to defend, or to beget;
Ridiculous and senseless terrors!) made
Children and superstitious men afraid.
The orchard's open now, and free;
Bacon has broke that scarecrow deity;
Come, enter, all that will,
Behold the ripened fruit, come gather now your fill.
Yet still, methinks, we fain would be
Catching at the forbidden tree,
We would be like the deity,
When truth and falsehood, good and evil, we
Without the senses' aid within ourselves would see;
For 'tis God only who can find
All Nature in his mind.

---

[1] Bacon Francis Bacon's philosophy was influential upon the group which founded the Royal Society, and for that reason he has been regarded as the father of English experimental science.

[2] scythe The form "sith" in early editions is closer to the etymologically correct "sithe." The scythe was an attribute of Time and of Death (OED scythe sb).

4

From words, which are but pictures of the thought,
(Though we our thoughts from them perversely drew)
To things, the mind's right object, he it brought,
Like foolish birds to painted grapes we flew;
He sought and gathered for our use the true;
And when on heaps the chosen bunches lay,
He pressed them wisely the mechanic way,
Till all their juice did in one vessel join,
Ferment into a nourishment divine,
The thirsty soul's refreshing wine.
Who to the life an exact piece would make,
Must not from other's work a copy take;
No, not from Rubens or van Dyke;[1]
Much less content himself to make it like
Th' ideas and the images which lie
In his own fancy, or his memory.
No, he before his sight must place
The natural and living face;
The real object must command
Each judgment of his eye, and motion of his hand.

5

From these and all long errors of the way,
In which our wandring predecessors went,
And like th' old Hebrews many years did stray
In deserts but of small extent,
Bacon, like Moses, led us forth at last,
The barren wilderness he past,
Did on the very border stand
Of the blessed promised land,
And from the mountain's top of his exalted wit,
Saw it himself, and showed us it.
But life did never to one man allow
Time to discover worlds, and conquer too;
Nor can so short a line sufficient be
To fathom the vast depths of Nature's sea:
The work he did we ought t' admire,
And were unjust if we should more require
From his few years, divided 'twixt th' excess
Of low affliction, and high happiness.
For who on things remote can fix his sight,
That's always in a triumph, or a fight?

6

From you, great champions, we expect to get
These spacious countries but discovered yet;
Countries where yet instead of Nature, we
Her images and idols worshipped see:
These large and wealthy regions to subdue,
Though Learning has whole armies at command,
Quartered about in every land,
A better troop she ne'er together drew.
Methinks, like Gideon's little band,
God with design has picked out you,
To do these noble wonders by a few:[2]
When the whole host he saw, they are (said he)
Too many to o'ercome for me;
And now he chooses out his men,
Much in the way that he did then:
Not those many whom he found
Idly extended on the ground,
To drink with their dejected head
The stream just so as by their mouths it fled:
No, but those few who took the waters up,
And made of their laborious hands the cup.

7

Thus you prepared; and in the glorious fight
Their wondrous pattern too you take:
Their old and empty pitchers first they brake,
And with their hands then lifted up the light.
Io! Sound too the trumpets here!
Already your victorious lights appear;
New scenes of Heaven already we espy,

---

[1] Rubens or van Dyke Sir Peter Paul Rubens (1588–1640) and Sir Anthony van Dyck (1599–1641), both very important in the history of English painting. See Margaret Whinney and Oliver Millar, English Art 1625–1714 (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1957).

[2] Gideon's little band See Judges 7.

And crowds of golden worlds on high;
Which from the spacious plains of earth and sea
Could never yet discovered be
By sailor's or Chaldean's watchful eye.[1]
Nature's great works no distance can obscure,
No smallness her near objects can secure
Y' have taught the curious sight to press
Into the privatest recess
Of her imperceptible littleness.
Y' have learn'd to read her smallest hand,
And well begun her deepest sense to understand.

8

Mischief and true dishonour fall on those
Who would to laughter or to scorn expose
So virtuous and so noble a design,[2]
So human for its use, for knowledge so divine.
The things which these proud men despise, and call
Impertinent, and vain, and small,
Those smallest things of Nature let me know,
Rather than all their greatest actions do.
Whoever would deposed truth advance
Into the throne usurped from it,
Must feel at first the blows of ignorance,
And the sharp points of envious wit.
So when by various turns of the celestial dance,
In many thousand years
A star, so long unknown, appears,
Though Heaven itself more beauteous by it grow,
It troubles and alarms the world below,
Does to the wise a star, to fools a meteor show.

9

With courage and success you the bold work begin;
Your cradle has not idle been:
None e'er but Hercules and you could be
At five years age worthy a history.[3]
And ne'er did fortune better yet
Th' historian to the story fit:
As you from all old errors free
And purge the body of philosophy;
So from all modern follies he
Has vindicated eloquence and wit.
His candid style like a clean stream does slide,
And his bright fancy all the way
Does like the sunshine in it play;
It does like Thames, the best of rivers, glide,
Where the god does not rudely overturn,
But gently pour the crystal urn,
And with judicious hand does the whole current guide.
T' has all the beauties Nature can impart,
And all the comely dress without the paint of art.
—1667

Sors Virgiliana

Aeneid Book 4, verse 615

By a bold people's stubborn arms oppressed,
Forced to forsake the land which he possessed,
Torn from his dearest son, let him in vain
Beg help, and see his friends unjustly slain:
Let him to bold unequal terms submit,
In hopes to save his Crown; but lose both it
And life at once: untimely let him die
And on an open stage unburied lie.
—1692

Of Solitude

Nunquam minus solus, quam cum solus, is now become a very vulgar saying.[4] Every man and almost every boy for these seventeen hundred years, has had it in his mouth. But it was at first spoken by the excellent Scipio, who was without question a most eloquent and witty person, as well as the most wise, most worthy, most happy, and the greatest of all mankind.[1] His meaning no doubt was this, that he found more satisfaction to his mind, and more improvement of it by solitude than by company, and to show that he spoke not this loosely or out of vanity, after he had made Rome, mistress of almost the whole world, he retired himself from it by a voluntary exile, and at a private house in the middle of a wood near Liternum, passed the remainder of his glorious life no less gloriously. This house Seneca went to see so long after with great veneration, and among other things describes his baths to have been of so mean a structure, that now, says he, the basest of the people would despise them, and cry out, poor Scipio understood not how to live. What an authority is here for the credit of retreat? and happy had it been for Hannibal, if adversity could have taught him as much wisdom as was learnt by Scipio from the highest prosperities.[2] This would be no wonder if it were as truly as it is colourably and wittily said by Monsieur de Montagne. That ambition itself might teach us to love solitude; there's nothing does so much hate to have companions. 'Tis true, it loves to have its elbows free, it detests to have company on either side, but it delights above all things in a train behind, aye, and ushers too before it. But the greatest part of men are so far from the opinion of that noble Roman, that if they chance at any time to be without company, they're like a becalmed ship, they never move but by the wind of other men's breath, and have no oars of their own to steer withal. It is very fantastical and contradictory in human nature, that men should love themselves above all the rest of the world, and yet never endure to be with themselves. When they are in love with a mistress, all other persons are importunate and burdensome to them. Tecum vivere amem, tecum obeam Lubens, They would live and die with her alone.

---

[1] Chaldean one skilled in occult learning; an astrologer (OED Chaldean B sb).

[2] to laughter or to scorn The experiments conducted by members of the Royal Society were satirized from its earliest days and well into the eighteenth century.

[3] a history Thomas Sprat's History of the Royal Society was published in 1667.

[4] "Never less alone, than when alone."

Sic ego secretis possum bené vivere silvis
Quà nulla humano sit via trita pedé,
Tu mihi curarum requies, tu nocte vel atrâ
Lumen, & in solis tu mihi turba locis.

With thee forever I in woods could rest,
Where never human foot the ground has pressed,
Thou from all shades the darkness canst exclude,
And from a desert banish solitude.

And yet our dear self is so wearisome to us, that we can scarcely support its conversation for an hour together. This is such an odd temper of mind as Catullus expresses towards one of his mistresses, whom we may suppose to have been of a very unsociable humour.

Odi & Amo, quanám id faciam ratione requiris?
Nescio, sed fieri sentio, & excrucior. [3]

I hate, and yet I love thee too;
How can that be? I know not how;
Only that so it is I know,
And feel with torment that 'tis so.

---

[1] the excellent Scipio Scipio Africanus Major, ca. 236–ca. 183 B.C.E. After a successful military career, he retired to his private estate at Liternum in Campania.

[2] Hannibal the Carthaginian leader who was defeated by Scipio at the battle of Zama in Africa, 202 B.C.E. His father had pledged him, when he was still a boy, to undying hatred of Rome, and Hannibal continued to stir up trouble after his defeat, with the result that the Romans hunted him down until he took his own life (OCCL).

[3] A modern text reads: Odi et amo, quare id faciam, fortasse requiris?/ nescio, sed fieri sentio et excrucior. For this reading, accompanied by a lively translation, see The Poems of Catullus, translated by James Michie, Bristol Classical P, 1989, pages 198–9.

It is a deplorable condition, this, and drives a man sometimes to pitiful shifts in seeking how to avoid himself.

The truth of the matter is, that neither he who is a fop in the world, is a fit man to be alone; nor he who has set his heart much upon the world, though he have never so much understanding; so that solitude can be well fitted and set right, but upon a very few persons. They must have enough knowledge of the world to see the vanity of it, and enough virtue to despise all vanity; if the mind be possessed with any lust or passions, a man had better be in a fair, than in a wood alone. They may like petty thieves cheat us perhaps, and pick our pockets in the midst of company, but like robbers they use to strip and bind, or murder us when they catch us alone. This is but to retreat from men, and fall into the hands of devils. 'Tis like the punishment of parricides among the Romans, to be sewed into a bag with an ape, a dog, and a serpent. The first work therefore that a man must do to make himself capable of the good of solitude, is, the very eradication of all lusts, for how is it possible for a man to enjoy himself while his affections are tied to things without himself? In the second place, he must learn the art and get the habit of thinking; for this too, no less than well speaking, depends upon much practice, and cogitation is the thing which distinguishes the solitude of a god from a wild beast. Now because the soul of man is not by its own nature or observation furnished with sufficient materials to work upon; it is necessary for it to have continual recourse to learning and books for fresh supplies, so that the solitary life will grow indigent, and be ready to starve without them; but if once we be thoroughly engaged in the love of letters, instead of being wearied with the length of any day, we shall only complain of the shortness of our whole life.

O vita, stulto longa, sapienti brevis!
O life, long to the fool, short to the wise!

The first Minister of State has not so much business in public, as a wise man has in private; if the one have little leisure to be alone, the other has less leisure to be in company; the one has but part of the affairs of one nation, the other all the works of God and Nature under his consideration. There is no saying shocks me so much as that which I hear very often, that a man does not know how to pass his time. 'Twould have been but ill spoken by Methusalem in the nine hundred sixty-ninth year of his life,[1] so far it is from us, who have not time enough to attain to the utmost perfection of any part of any science, to have cause to complain that we are forced to be idle for want of work. But this you'll say is work only for the learned, others are not capable either of the employments or divertissements that arrive from letters. I know they are not; and therefore cannot much recommend solitude to a man totally illiterate. But if any man be so unlearned as to want entertainment of the little intervals of accidental solitude, which frequently occur in almost all conditions (except the very meanest of the people, who have business enough in the necessary provisions for life) it is truly a great shame both to his parents and himself, for a very small portion of any ingenious art will stop up all those gaps of our time, either music, or painting, or designing, or chemistry, or history, or gardening, or twenty other things will do it usefully and pleasantly; and if he happen to set his affections upon poetry (which I do not advise him too immoderately) that will over do it; no wood will be thick enough to hide him from the importunities of company or business, which would abstract him from his beloved.

---

[1] Methusalem in the nine hundred sixty-ninth year of his life Genesis 6:27.

—O quis me gelidis sub montibus Æmi
Sistat, & ingenti ramorum protegat umbra!—[1]
Virg. Georg.

1

Hail, old patrician trees, so great and good!
Hail ye plebeian under wood!
Where the poetic birds rejoice,
And for their quiet nests and plenteous food,
Pay with their grateful voice.

2

Hail, the poor Muses' richest manor seat!
Ye country houses and retreat,
Which all the happy gods so love,
That for you oft they quit their bright and great Metropolis above.

3

Here Nature does a house for me erect,
Nature the wisest architect,
Who those fond artists does despise
That can the fair and living trees neglect;
Yet the dead timber prize.

4

Here let me careless and unthoughtful lying,
Hear the soft winds above me flying,
With all their wanton boughs dispute,
And the more tuneful birds to both replying,
Nor be myself too mute.

5

A silver stream shall rule his waters near,
Gilt with the sun-beams here and there
On whose enamelled bank I'll walk,
And see how prettily they smile, and hear
How prettily they talk.

6

Ah wretched, and too solitary he
Who loves not his own company!
He'll feel the weight of't many a day
Unless he call in sin or vanity
To help to bear't away.

7

Oh Solitude, first state of human-kind!
Which blest remained till man did find
Even his own helper's company.
As soon as two (alas!) together joined,
The serpent made up three.

8

Though God himself, through countless ages thee
His sole companion chose to be,
Thee, sacred Solitude alone,
Before the branchy head of number's tree
Sprang from the trunk of one. [2]

9

Thou (though men think thine an unactive part)
Dost break and tame th'unruly heart,
Which else would know no settled pace,
Making it move, well managed by thy art,
With swiftness and with grace.

10

Thou the faint beams of reason's scattered light,
Dost like a burning-glass unite,
Dost multiply the feeble heat,
And fortify the strength, till thou dost bright
And noble fires beget.

11

Whilst this hard truth I teach, methinks, I see
The monster London laugh at me,

---

[1] "O for one to set me under the cool mountains of Haemus, and shield me under the branches' mighty shade" (Virgil, Georgics, Book 2, lines 488–9). Modern texts differ slightly from the one quoted by Cowley.

[2] Before the branchy head of number's tree / Sprang from the trunk of one before the unity of God brought forth the multiplicity of the phenomenal world.

I should at thee too, foolish city,
If it were fit to laugh at misery,
But thy estate I pity.

12

Let but thy wicked men from out thee go,
And all the fools that crowd the so,
Even thou who dost thy millions boast,
A village less then Islington wilt grow,
A solitude almost.
—1668

Of Obscurity

Nam neque divitibus contingunt gaudia solis,
Nec vixit male, qui natus moriensque fefellit.
—Hor. Epist. l. 1.17.

God made not pleasures only for the rich,
Nor have those men without their share too liv'd,
Who both in life and death the world deceiv'd.

This seems a strange sentence thus literally translated, and looks as if it were in vindication of the men of business (for who else can deceive the world?) whereas it is in commendation of those who live and die so obscurely, that the world takes no notice of them. This Horace calls deceiving the world, and in another place uses the same phrase.

Secretum iter & fallentis semita vitæ.— Ep. 18. [1]
The secret tracks of the deceiving life.

It is very elegant in Latin, but our English word will hardly bear up to that sense, and therefore Mr. Broom translates it very well,[2]

Or from a life, led as it were by stealth.

Yet we say in our language, a thing deceives our sight, when it passes before us unperceived, and we may say well enough out of the same author,

Sometimes with sleep, sometimes with wine we strive,
The cares of life and troubles to deceive.

But that is not to deceive the world, but to deceive ourselves, as Quintilian says, Vitam fallere, To draw on still, and amuse, and deceive our life, till it be advanced insensibly to the fatal period, and fall into that pit which nature hath prepared for it.[3] The meaning of all this is no more than that most vulgar saying, Bene qui latuit, bene vixit, He has lived well, who has lain well hidden. Which if it be a truth, the world (I'll swear) is sufficiently deceived: For my part, I think it is, and that the pleasantest condition of life, is in Incognito. What a brave privilege is it to be free from all contentions, from all envying or being envied, from receiving and from paying all kind of ceremonies? It is in my mind, a very delightful pastime, for two good and agreeable friends to travel up and down together, in places where they are by nobody known, nor know anybody. It was the case of Æneas and his Achates, when they walked invisibly about the fields and streets of Carthage, Venus herself

A veil of thickened air around them cast,
That none might know, or see them as they passed.

The common story of Demosthenes's confession that he had taken great pleasure in hearing of a tanker-woman say as he passed;[1] This is that Demosthenes, is wonderful ridiculous from so solid an orator.[2] I myself have often met with that temptation to vanity (if it were any) but am so far from finding it any pleasure, that it only makes me run faster from the place, till I get, as it were out of sight-shot. Democritus relates, and in such a manner, as if he gloried in the good fortune and commodity of it, that when he came to Athens nobody there did so much as take notice of him;[3] and Epicurus lived there very well, that is, lay hid many years in his gardens, so famous since that time, with his friend Metrodorus:[4] after whose death, making in one of his letters a kind commemoration of the happiness which they two had enjoyed together, he adds at last, that he thought it no disparagement to those great felicities of their life, that in the midst of the most talked-of and talking country in the world, they had lived so long, not only without fame, but almost without being heard of. And yet within a very few years afterward, there were no two names of men more known or more generally celebrated. If we engage into a large acquaintance and various familiarities, we set open our gates to the invaders of most of our time: we expose our life to a quotidian ague of frigid impertinencies, which would make a wise man tremble to think of. Now, as for being known much by sight, and pointed at, I cannot comprehend the honour that lies in that: Whatsoever it be, every mountebank has it more than the best doctor, and the hangman more than the Lord Chief Justice of a city. Every creature has it both of nature and art if it be any ways extraordinary. It was as often said, This is that Bucephalus, or, This is that Incitatus,[5] when they were led prancing through the streets, as, this is that Alexander, or this is that Domitian; and truly for the latter, I take Incitatus to have been a much more honourable beast then his master, and more deserving the consulship, then he the Empire. I love and commend a true good fame, because it is the shadow of virtue, not that it doth any good to the body which it accompanies, but 'tis an efficacious shadow, and like that of St. Peter cures the diseases of others.[6] The best kind of glory, no doubt, is that which is reflected from honesty, such as was the glory of Cato and Aristides,[7] but it was harmful to them both, and is seldom beneficial to any man whilst he lives, what it is to him after his death, I cannot say, because, I love not philosophy merely notional and conjectural, and no man who has made the experiment has been so kind as to come back to inform us. Upon the whole matter, I account a person who has a moderate mind and fortune, and lives in the conversation of two or three agreeable friends, with little commerce in the world besides, who is esteemed well enough by his few neighbours that know him, and is truly irreproachable by anybody, and so after a healthful quiet life, before the great inconveniences of old age, goes more silently out of it than he came in (for I would not have him so much as cry in the exit), this innocent deceiver of the world, as Horace calls him, this Muta persona, I take to have been more happy in his part, than the greatest actors that fill the stage with show and noise, nay, even than Augustus himself, who asked with his last breath, Whether he had not played his farce very well.

---

[1] This is also from Book I of Horace's Epistles.

[2] Mr. Broom unidentified. Alexander Brome is perhaps the likeliest candidate; another possibility is the playwright Richard Brome.

[3] Quintilian Marcus Fabius Quintilianus (ca. 36–ca. 95 C.E.) was the first person to receive an official salary as a teacher of oratory at Rome. He became wealthy and famous, and after twenty years retired to write his great work, Institutio Oratoria (The Education of an Orator). This work was influential in the Renaissance, as Quintilian's conception of the purpose of education, to produce a man of high character and general culture, was in harmony with that of the humanists (OCCL).

---

[1] tanker-woman a female tankard-bearer; see OED tanker and tankard 4.

[2] Demosthenes (383–322 B.C.E.), a great Athenian orator and statesman, generally considered to be the greatest of Greek orators.

[3] Democritus Democritus of Abdera, born ca. 460 B.C.E., sometimes known as "the laughing philosopher."

[4] Epicurus Epicurus (341-270 B.C.E.), founder of the Epicurean school of philosophy. His school was known as the "Gardens," from the gardens in which he taught (OCCL).

[5] Bucephalus the horse of Alexander the Great (OCCL); Incitatus Cowley's memory is perhaps at fault here; it was Caligula, not Domitian, who proposed to make his favourite horse, Incitatus, a consul.

[6] an efficacious shadow, and like that of St. Peter cures the diseases of others Acts 5:15.

[7] Cato Cato of Utica (95–46 B.C.E.). He was the chief political antagonist of Caesar and the triumvirate and was described by the Roman historian Livy as "the conscience of Rome." When he saw that his cause was lost, he took his own life; Aristides (born 520 B.C.E.), an Athenian statesman and soldier. "His reputation for honesty went back to his contemporaries, and later became proverbial" (OCD).

Seneca, ex Thyeste,
Act. 2. Chor.

Stet quicunque volet, potens
Aulæ culmine lubrico, &c.

Upon the slippery tops of human state,
The gilded pinnacles of fate,
Let others proudly stand, and for a while
    The giddy danger to beguile,
With joy, and with disdain look down on all,
Till their heads turn, and down they fall.
Me, O ye Gods, on Earth, or else so near
    That I no fall to Earth may fear,
And, O ye gods, at a good distance seat
    From the long ruins of the great.
Here wrapped in th' arms of quiet let me lie;
Quiet, companion of obscurity.
Here let my life, with as much silence slide,
    As time that measures it does glide.
Nor let the breath of infamy or fame,
From town to town echo about my name.
Nor let my homely death embroidered be
    With scutcheon or with elegy.
    An old plebeian let me die,
Alas, all then are such as well as I.
    To him, alas, to him, I fear,
The face of death will terrible appear:
Who in his life flattering his senseless pride
By being known to all the world beside,
Does not himself, when he is dying, know
Nor what he is, nor whither he's to go.
—1668

Of My Self

It is a hard and nice subject for a man to write of himself, it grates his own heart to say anything of disparagement, and the reader's ears to hear anything of praise from him. There is no danger from me of offending him in this kind; neither my mind, nor my body, nor my fortune, allow me any materials for that vanity. It is sufficient, for my own contentment, that they have preserved me from being scandalous, or remarkable on the defective side. But besides that, I shall here speak of myself, only in relation to the subject of these precedent discourses, and shall be likelier thereby to fall into the contempt, than rise up to the estimation of most people. As far as my memory can return back into my past life, before I knew, or was capable of guessing what the world, or glories, or business of it were, the natural affections of my soul gave me a secret bent of aversion from them, as some plants are said to turn away from others, by an antipathy imperceptible to themselves, and inscrutable to man's understanding. Even when I was a very young boy at school, instead of running about on holy days and playing with my fellows; I was wont to steal from them, and walk into the fields, either alone with a book, or with some one companion, if I could find any of the same temper. I was then too, so much an enemy to all constraint, that my masters could never prevail on me, by any persuasions or encouragements, to learn without book the common rules of grammar, in which they dispensed with me alone, because they found I made a shift to do the usual exercise out of my own reading and observation. That I was then of the same mind as I am now (which I confess, I wonder at myself) may appear by the latter end of an ode, which I made when I was but thirteen years old, and which was then printed with many other verses. The beginning of it is boyish, but of this part which I here set down (if a very little were corrected) I should hardly now be much ashamed.

9

This only grant me, that my means may lie
Too low for envy, for contempt too high.
Some honor I would have
Not from great deeds, but good alone.
The unknown are better than ill known.
Rumour can ope' the grave,
Acquaintance I would have, but when 't depends
Not on the number, but the choice of friends.

10

Books should, not business entertain the light,
And sleep, as undisturbed as death, the night.
My house a cottage, more
Than palace, and should fitting be
For all my use, no luxury.
My garden painted o'er
With Nature's hand, not art's; and pleasures yield,
Horace might envy in his Sabine field.

11

Thus would I double my life's fading space,
For he that runs it well, twice runs his race.
And in this true delight,
These unbought sports, this happy state,
I would not fear nor wish my fate,
But boldly say each night,
Tomorrow let my sun his beams display,
Or in clouds hide them; I have lived today.

You may see by it, I was even then acquainted with the poets (for the conclusion is taken out of Horace); and perhaps it was the immature and immoderate love of them which stamped first, or rather engraved these characters in me: They were like letters cut into the bark of a young tree, which with the tree still grow proportionably. But, how this love came to be produced in me so early, is a hard question: I believe I can tell the particular little chance that filled my head first with such chimes of verse, as have never since left ringing there: For I remember when I began to read, and to take some pleasure in it, there was wont to lie in my Mother's parlour (I know not by what accident, for she herself never in her life read any book but of devotion) but there was wont to lie Spenser's Works; this I happened to fall upon, and was infinitely delighted with the stories of the knights, and giants, and monsters, and brave houses, which I found everywhere there (though my understanding had little to do with all this): and by degrees with the tinkling of the rhyme and dance of the numbers, so that I think I had read him all over before I was twelve years old, and was thus made a poet as irremediably as a child is made an eunuch. With these affections of mind, and my heart wholly set upon letters, I went to the university; but was soon torn from thence by that violent public storm which would suffer nothing to stand where it did, but rooted up every plant, even from the princely cedars to me, the hyssop. Yet I had as good fortune as could have befallen me in such a tempest; for I was cast by it into the family of one of the best persons, and into the court of one of the best princesses of the world. Now though I was here engaged in ways most contrary to the original design of my life, that is, into much company, and no small business, and into a daily sight of greatness, both militant and triumphant (for that was the state then of the English and French courts) yet all this was so far from altering my opinion, that it only added the confirmation of reason to that which was before but natural inclination. I saw plainly all the paint of that kind of life, the nearer I came to it; and that beauty which I did not fall in love with, when, for ought I knew, it was real, was not like to bewitch, or entice me, when I saw that it was adulterate. I met with several great persons, whom I liked very well, but could not perceive that any part of their greatness was to be liked or desired, no more then I would be glad, or content to be in a storm, though I saw many ships which rid safely and bravely in it: A storm would not agree with my stomach, if it did with my courage. Though I was in a crowd of as good company as could be found anywhere, though I was in business of great and honourable trust, though I eat at the best table, and enjoyed the best conveniences for present subsistence that ought to be desired by a man of my condition in banishment and public distresses; yet I could not abstain from renewing my old schoolboy's wish in a copy of verses to the same effect.

> Well then; I now do plainly see
> This busy world and I shall ne'er agree, &c.

And I never then proposed to myself any other advantage from his Majesty's happy restoration, but the getting into some moderately convenient retreat in the country, which I thought in that case I might easily have compassed, as well as some others, with no greater probabilities or pretences have arrived to extraordinary fortunes: But I had before written a shrewd prophesy against my self, and I think Apollo inspired me in the truth, though not in the elegance of it.

> Thou, neither great at court nor in the war,
> Nor at th' exchange shal't be, nor at the > wrangling bar;
> Content thyself with the small barren praise
> Which neglected verse does raise, &c.

However by the failing of the forces which I had expected, I did not quit the design which I had resolved on, I cast myself into it A Corps Perdu, without making capitulations, or taking counsel of fortune. But God laughs at a man, who says to his soul, "Take thy ease": I met presently not only with many little encumbrances and impediments, but with so much sickness (a new misfortune to me) as would have spoiled the happiness of an emperor as well as mine: Yet I do neither repent nor alter my course. Non ego perfidum Dixi Sacramentum; Nothing shall separate me from a mistress, which I have loved so long, and have now at last married; though she neither has brought me a rich portion, nor lived yet so quietly with me as I hoped from her.

> _____ Nec vos, dulcissima mundi
> Nomina, vos Musæ, Libertas, Otia, Libri,
> Hortique Syluæq; anima remanente relinquam.

> Nor by me ere shall you,
> You of all names the sweetest, and the best,
> You Muses, books, and liberty and rest;
> You gardens, fields, and woods forsaken be,
> As long as life itself forsakes not me.

But this is a very petty ejaculation; because I have concluded all the other chapters with a copy of verses, I will maintain the humour to the last.
—1668

Abiezer Coppe

1619 – 1672

Born in Warwick, and educated at the grammar school there, Coppe entered All Souls College, Oxford in 1636, transferring later to Merton College. He left without taking a degree, and his subsequent spiritual journey resembles Lawrence Clarkson's progression through increasingly radical religious beliefs. Coppe became a Presbyterian, then a Baptist, and claimed to have preached throughout Warwickshire during the 1640s. His earliest writings, dating from 1649, are pointedly antinomian, arguing that true belief freed Christians from the need to observe any moral law. In the same year Coppe was imprisoned in Warwick, where he had a vision ordering him to go to London and proclaim the judgement of God against the "great ones of the earth." The message he delivered in sermons on the streets of London and in the two parts of A Fiery Flying Roll combined radical religious and political ideas. Coppe adopts a prophetic voice and a mystical, millennial antinomianism, but at the same time denounces economic and social privilege in terms that align him with writers such as John Lilburne and Gerrard Winstanley (Coppe describes God as "the mighty Leveller" throughout A Fiery Flying Roll). Coppe's distinctive style of writing reflects his effort to render mystical experience into words—an attempt he admits is impossible. His lack of faith in language's ability to name and describe inner experience was shared by several writers usually grouped together as Ranters; their belief that language was a code, that words as well as actions were only shadows or signs of an ineffable spiritual reality, represents the culmination of one tradition of seventeenth-century religious writing.

A Fiery Flying Roll (the two parts were issued together) was immediately controversial, and in February 1650 it was ordered burned as blasphemous. Coppe was imprisoned and in 1651 recanted, but appears to have continued to preach. After the Restoration he changed his name to Higham and combined preaching with a medical practice in Surrey, where he died in 1672. For more on the Ranters, see the notes to Clarkson's The Lost Sheep Found, which mentions Coppe at several points. Coppe is sometimes described as a Ranter leader, but it is important to remember that most of what is known of the Ranters comes from hostile opponents. Seeking to define what was most threatening in a period of rapid social and political change, their accounts possibly overstated the extent to which the Ranters were an organized group.

* * *

A Fiery Flying Roll and A Second Fiery Flying Roll

(excerpts)

The Preface

An inlet into the Land of Promise, the New Jerusalem, and a gate into the ensuing discourse, worthy of serious consideration.

My dear one.
All or none.
Everyone under the sun.
Mine own.

My most Excellent Majesty (in me) hath strangely and variously transformed this form.

And behold, by mine own almightiness (in me) I have been changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the sound of the trump.[1]

---

[1] See I Corinthians 15:52. Coppe's text is densely interwoven with biblical language; only a few specific references have been annotated.

And now the Lord is descended from Heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God.

And the sea, the earth, yea all things are now giving up their dead. And all things that ever were, are, or shall be visible—are the grave wherein the King of Glory (the eternal, invisible almightiness, hath lain as it were) dead and buried.

But behold, behold, he is now risen with a witness, to save Zion with vengeance, or to confound and plague all things into himself; who by his mighty angel is proclaiming (with a loud voice) that sin and transgression is finished and ended; and everlasting righteousness brought in; and the everlasting Gospel preaching; which everlasting Gospel is brought in with most terrible earthquakes, and heaven-quakes, and with signs and wonders following.

Amen

And it hath pleased my most Excellent Majesty (who is universal love, and whose service is perfect freedom), to set this form (the writer of this roll) as no small sign and wonder in fleshly Israel; as you may partly see in the ensuing discourse.

And now (my dear ones!) everyone under the sun, I will only point at the gate; through which I was led into that new city, new Jerusalem, and to the spirits of just men, made perfect, and to God the judge of all.

First, all my strength, my forces were utterly routed, my house I dwelt in fired; my father and mother forsook me, the wife of my bosom loathed me, mine old name was rotted, perished; and I was utterly plagued, consumed, damned, rammed, and sunk into nothing, into the bowels of the still eternity (my mother's womb) out of which I came naked, and whetherto I returned again naked. And lying a while there, rapt up in silence, at length (the body or outward form being awake all this while) I heard with my outward ear (to my apprehension) a most terrible thunder-clap, and after that a second. And upon the second thunder-clap, which was exceeding terrible, I saw a great body of light, like the light of the sun, and red as fire, in the form of a drum (as it were) whereupon with exceeding trembling and amazement on the flesh, and with joy unspeakable in the spirit, I clapped my hands, and cried out, Amen, Hallelujah, Hallelujah, Amen. And so lay trembling, sweating and smoking (for the space of half an hour) at length with a loud voice (I inwardly) cried out, Lord, what wilt thou do with me; my most excellent majesty and eternal glory (in me) answered and said, Fear not, I will take thee up into mine everlasting Kingdom. But thou shalt (first) drink a bitter cup, a bitter cup, a bitter cup; whereupon (being filled with exceeding amazement) I was thrown into the belly of hell (and take what you can of it in these expressions, though the matter is beyond expression) I was among all the Devils in hell, even in their most hideous hue.

And under all this terror, and amazement, there was a little spark of transcendent, transplendent, unspeakable glory, which survived, and sustained itself, triumphing, exulting, and exalting itself above all the fiends. And confounding the very blackness of darkness (you must take it in these terms, for it is infinitely beyond expression). Upon this the life was taken out of the body (for a season) and it was thus resembled, as if a man with a great brush dipped in whiting, should with one stroke wipe out, or sweep off a picture upon a wall, &c. after a while, breath and life was returned into the form again; whereupon I saw various streams of light (in the night) which appeared to the outward eye; and immediately I saw three hearts (or three appearances in the form of hearts), of exceeding brightness; and immediately an innumerable company of hearts, filling each corner of the room where I was. And methoughts there was variety and distinction, as if there had been several hearts, and yet most strangely and inexpressibly complicated or folded up in unity. I clearly saw distinction, diversity, variety, and as clearly saw all swallowed up into unity. And it hath been my song many times since, within and without, unity, universality, universality, unity, Eternal Majesty, &c. And at this vision, a most strong, glorious voice uttered these words, The spirits of just men made perfect.[1] The spirits &c, with whom I had as absolute, clear, full communion, and in a twofold more familiar way, than ever I had outwardly with my dearest friends, and nearest relations. The visions and revelations of God, and the strong hand of eternal invisible almightiness, was stretched out upon me, within me, for the space of four days and nights, without intermission.

The time would fail if I would tell you all, but it is not the good will and pleasure of my most excellent Majesty in me, to declare any more (as yet) than thus such further: That amongst those various voices that were then uttered within, these were some, Blood, blood, where, where? upon the hypocritical holy heart, &c. Another thus, Vengeance, vengeance, vengeance, plagues, plagues, upon the inhabitants of the earth; fire, fire, fire, sword, sword, &c. upon all that bow now down to eternal Majesty, universal love; I'll recover, recover, my wool, my flax, my money. Declare, declare, fear thou not the faces of any; I am (in thee) a munition of rocks, &c.[2]

Go up to London, to London,[3] that great city, write, write, write. And behold I writ, and lo a hand was sent to me, and a roll of a book was therein, which this fleshly hand would have put wings to, before the time. Whereupon it was snatched out of my hand, and the roll thrust into my mouth; and I eat it up, and filled my bowels with it (Eze. 2:8 &c. cha. 3:1, 2, 3), where it was as bitter as worm-wood; and it lay broiling, and burning in my stomach, till I brought it forth in this form.

And now I send it flying to thee, with my heart,
And all

Per AUXILIUM PATRIS בד [4]

A Second Fiery Flying Roll

CHAPTER III

A strange, yet most true story: under which is couched that lion, whose roaring shall make all the beasts of the field tremble, and all the kingdoms of the earth quake. Wherein also (in part) the subtlety of the well-favoured harlot is discovered, and her flesh burning with that fire, which shall burn down all churches, except that of the first born, &c.

Follow me, who, last Lord's day September 30, 1649, met him in open field, a most strange deformed man, clad with patched clouts: who looking wishly on me, mine eye pitied him; and my heart, or the day of the Lord, which burned as an oven in me, set my tongue on flame to speak to him, as followeth.

How now friend, art thou poor?

He answered, yea Master very poor.

Whereupon my bowels trembled within me, and quivering fell upon the worm-eaten chest (my corpse I mean), that I could not hold a joint still.

And my great love within me (who is the great God within that chest, or corpse), was burning hot toward him; and made the lock-hole of the chest, to wit, the mouth of the corpse, again to open: Thus.

Art poor?

Yea, very poor, said he.

---

[1] Hebrews 12:23.

[2] Hosea 2:9.

[3] It not being shown to me, what I should do, more than preach and print something, &c. very little expecting I should be so strangely acted, as to (my exceeding joy and delight) I have been, though to the utter cracking of my credit, and to the rotting of my old name which is damned, and cast out (as a toad to the dunghill) that I might have a new name, with me, upon me, within me, which is, I am— [marginal note by Coppe].

[4] by the help of the father, A C [his initials in Hebrew].

Whereupon the strange woman who flattereth with her lips,[1] and is subtle of heart, said within me.

It's a poor wretch, give him two-pence.

But my excellency and majesty (in me) scorned her words, confounded her language; and kicked her out of his presence.

But immediately the well-favoured harlot (whom I carried not upon my horse behind me) but who rose up in me, said:

It's a poor wretch give him 6*d* and that's enough for a squire or knight, to give to one poor body.

Besides (saith the holy scripturian whore) he's worse than an infidel that provides not for his own family.

True love begins at home, &c.

Thou, and thy family, are fed as the young ravens, strangely, though thou hast been a constant preacher, yet thou hast abhorred both tithes and hire; and thou knowest not aforehand, who will give thee the worth of a penny.

Have a care of the main chance.

And thus she flattereth with her lips, and her words being smoother than oil; and her lips dropping as the honey comb, I was fired to hasten my hand into my pocket; and pulling out a shilling, said to the poor wretch, give me six pence, here's a shilling for thee.[2]

He answered, I cannot, I have never a penny.

Whereupon I said, I would fain have given thee something if thou couldst have changed my money.

Then saith he, God bless you.

Whereupon with much reluctancy, with much love, and with amazement (of the right stamp) I turned my horse head from him, riding away. But a while after I was turned back (being advised by my Demilance)[3] to wish him call for six pence, which I would leave at the next town at one's house, which I thought he might know, (Sapphira like) keeping back part.[4]

But (as God judged me) I, as she, was struck down dead.

And behold the plague of God fell into my pocket; and the rust of my silver rose up in judgment against me, and consumed my flesh as with fire: so that I, and my money perished with me.

I being cast into that lake of fire and brimstone.

And all the money I had about me to a penny (though I thought through the instigation of my quondam mistress to have reserved some, having rode about 8 miles, not eating one mouth-full of bread that day, and had drunk but one small draught of drink; and had between 8 or 9 miles more to ride, ere I came to my journey's end: my horse being lame, the ways dirty, it raining all the way, and I not knowing what extraordinary occasion I might have for money). Yet (I say) the rust of my silver did so rise up in judgment against me, and burnt my flesh like fire: and the 5th of James thundered such an alarm in mine ears,[5] that I was fain to call all I had into the hands of him, whose visage was more marred than any man's that ever I saw.

This is a true story, most true in the history.

It's true also in the mystery.

And there are deep ones couched under it, for it's a shadow of various, glorious (though strange), good things to come.

---

[1] here and subsequently, a gendered personification of the adulterous heart, of the instincts that justify self-interest over doing what is right.

[2] A shilling was worth twelve pence; he is asking for six pence change.

[3] Demilance here, a horseman armed with a short lance (OED demilance 2), another personification of the speaker's self-interested instincts. The term was becoming obsolete in the seventeenth century, and was often used in humorous or satiric contexts, like "cavalier."

[4] Acts 5; Sapphira and her husband Ananias kept back some money when they gave the Apostles a donation; both died when confronted with their unwillingness to give everything they had.

[5] a chapter condemning the wealthy; it begins "Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten."

Well! to return—after I had thrown my rusty cankered money into the poor wretch's hands, I rode away from him, being filled with trembling, joy, and amazement, feeling the sparkles of a great glory arising up from under these ashes.

After this, I was made (by that divine power which dwelleth in this ark, or chest) to turn my horse's head—whereupon I beheld this poor deformed wretch, looking earnestly after me: and upon that, was made to put off my hat, and bow to him seven times, and was (at that strange posture) filled with trembling and amazement, some sparkles of glory arising up also from under this; as also from under these ashes, yet I rode back once more to the poor wretch, saying, because I am a King, I have done this, but you need not tell anyone.

The day's our own.

This was done on the last Lord's day, September 30 in the year 1649, which is the year of the Lord's recompenses for Zion, and the day of his vengeance, the dreadful day of Judgment. But I have done (for the present) with this story, for it is the latter end of the year 1649.

—1649

Alexander Brome

1620 – 1666

Brome was an attorney by profession, but during the civil wars became notable for his polemical pieces, written from an ardently Royalist perspective, against the Rump Parliament. To compare his work, with its Cavalier addiction to drinking songs, with that of Henry Vaughan, is to realize that Royalists came in more than one shape. During the Interregnum Brome edited the work of the dramatist Richard Brome, to whom he was not related, and wrote a play of his own, The Cunning Lovers. He also contributed commendatory poems to one of the major Royalist publishing events of the period, the 1647 edition of Beaumont and Fletcher's works. However, his Songs and Poems were not collected until after the Restoration, in 1661.

* * *

The Levellers Rant[1]

1

To the Hall, to the hall,
For justice we call,
On the King and his pow'rful adherents and friends,
Who still have endeavoured, but we work their ends.
'Tis we will pull down what e're is above us,
And make them to fear us, that never did love us,
We'll level the proud and make every degree.
To our Royalty bow the knee,
'Tis no less then treason,
'Gainst freedom and reason
For our brethren to be higher then we.

2

First the thing, call'd a King,
To judgement we bring,
And the spawn of the court, that were prouder than he,
And next the two Houses united shall be,[2]
It does to the Romish religion enveigle,[3]
For the state to be two-headed like the spread-eagle.[4]
We'll purge the superfluous members away,
They are too many Kings to sway,
And as we all teach,
'Tis our Liberties' breach,
For the Freeborn Saints to obey.

3

Not a Claw, in the Law,
Shall keep us in awe;
We'll have no cushion-cuffers to tell us of hell,[5]
For we are all gifted to do it as well,[6]
'Tis freedom that we do hold forth to the Nation
To enjoy our fellow-creatures as at the creation;
The carnal men's wives are for men of the spirit,
Their wealth is our own by merit,
For we that have right,
By the Law called Might,
Are the Saints that must judge and inherit.

—1661

---

[1] The Levellers The Levellers sought reforms which reflected their belief in the equality of all men.

[2] the two Houses the House of Lords and the House of Commons.

[3] enveigle i.e. inveigle, to entice, allure, seduce (OED inveigle *v*2).

[4] two-headed like the spread-eagle The double-headed eagle was the traditional emblem of Imperial power; the speaker wants to reduce government to one "head," the Commons.

[5] cushion-cuffer a preacher who indulges in violent actions (OED cushion 11).

[6] The Levellers believed that all men should have the right to preach.

The New-Courtier

1

Since it must be so,
Then so let it go,
Let the giddy-brain'd times turn round,
Since we have no King, let the goblet be crown'd,
Our Monarchy thus we'll recover;
While the pottles are weeping, [1]
We'll drench our sad souls
In big-bellied bowls,
Our sorrows in sack shall lie steeping,
And we'll drink till our eyes do run over.
And prove it by reason
That it can be no Treason
To drink and to sing
A mournival of healths to our new-crown'd King. [2]

2

Let us all stand bare,
In the presence we are,
Let our noses like bonfires shine,
Instead of the conduits, let the pottles run wine,
To perfect this new Coronation,
And we that are loyal,
In drink, shall be peers.
While that face, that wears
Pure Claret, looks like the blood-royal
And out-stares the Bores of the Nation.
In sign of obedience,
Our oaths of allegiance
Beer-glasses shall be,
And he that tipples ten 's of the Nobility.

3

But if in this reign,
The halberted train [3]
Or the Constable should rebel,
And should make their twibill'd militia to swell, [4]
And against the King's party raise arms,
Then the Drawers like Yeomen
Of the Guard, with quart-pots,
Shall fuddle the sots,
While we make 'um both cuckolds and freemen,
And on their wives beat up alarums. [5]
Thus as each health passes,
We'll triple the glasses,
And hold it no sin,
To be loyal and drink in defence of our King.
—1661

The Saints' Encouragement [6]

1

Fight on brave soldiers for the cause,
Fear not the Cavaliers;
Their threatnings are as senseless, as
Our jealousies and fears.
'Tis you must perfect this great work,
And all Malignants slay, [7]
You must bring back the King again
The clean contrary way.

---

[1] pottles measures of capacity for liquids, equal to two quarts or half a gallon (OED pottle 1 b).

[2] mournival a set of four (OED mournival 2).

[3] halberted train a train of soldiers armed with halberts, weapons which were a combination of a spear and a battle-ax (OED halbert sb 1).

[4] twibill'd militia a militia armed with double-edged battle-axes (OED twibil 3).

[5] alarums a variant spelling of alarms (OED).

[6] It was part of the Puritans' rhetoric to style themselves "saints"; Royalists like Vaughan expressed indignation, those like Brome amusement.

[7] Malignants applied between 1641 and 1660 by the supporters of the Parliament and the Commonwealth to the supporters of Charles I (OED malignant sb 1b).

2

'Tis for Religion that you fight,
And for the Kingdom's good,
By robbing Churches, plundering men,
And shedding guiltless blood. [1]
Down with the Orthodoxal train, [2]
All Loyal Subjects slay;
When these are gone we shall be blessed
The clean contrary way.

3

When Charles we've bankrupt made like us,
Of Crown and power bereft him;
And all his loyal subjects slain,
And none but Rebels left him.
When we've beggar'd all the Land,
And sent our trunks away,
We'll make him then a glorious Prince,
The clean contrary way.

4

'Tis to preserve his Majesty,
That we against him fight,
Nor are we ever beaten back,
Because our cause is right,
If any make a scruple on't,
Our Declarations say
Who fight for us, fight for the King,
The clean contrary way.

5

At Keynton, Branford, Plymouth, York, [3]
And diverse places more;
What victories we Saints obtained,
The like ne're seen before.
How often we Prince Rupert killed, [4]
And bravely won the day,
The wicked Cavaliers did run
The clean contrary way.

6

The true Religion we maintain,
The Kingdom's peace, and plenty;
The privilege of Parliament
Not known to one of twenty:
The ancient Fundamental Laws; [5]
And teach men to obey
Their lawful sovereign, and all these,
The clean contrary way.

7

We subjects' Liberties preserve,
By prisonment and plunder,
And do enrich our selves and state
By keeping the wicked under.
We must preserve Mechanics now [6]

---

[1] And for the Kingdom's good...shedding guiltless blood The visible symbols of ritual worship, seen as popish by those who rejected Laudian Anglicanism, were removed from churches, sometimes violently, during the turbulence before the Civil War and during the interregnum.

[2] Orthodoxal train the church hierarchy. Some sectarians supported the concept of equality within the church.

[3] At Keynton, Branford, Plymouth, York Keynton is a reference to the battle of Edgehill, which was fought in October 1642. Brentford [Branford] was occupied by the King in November 1642. At the beginning of 1643 York was held by the Royalists and Plymouth was held by Parliament.

[4] How often we Prince Rupert killed Charles I's nephew, Prince Rupert, successfully led the King's cavalry in a series of battles until his defeat in July 1644 at Marston Moor. In November 1644 Rupert was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the King's armies, but was dismissed after he surrendered Bristol to the Parliamentarians in the following September. He was sent into exile after the Parliamentary victory.

[5] The ancient Fundamental Laws Brome is alluding to Parliament's frequent references to the monarchy's transgression of a "fundamental law" which was never specifically explained.

[6] Mechanics those involved in manual labour or skill (OED mechanic sb 1). Radical sectaries allowed uneducated laymen to preach to their congregations.

To lecturize and pray;
By them the Gospel is advanced,
The clean contrary way.

8

And though the King be much misled
By that malignant crew; [1]
He'll find us honest, and at last,
Give all of us our due.
For we do wisely plot, and plot
Rebellion to destroy,
He sees we stand for peace and truth,
The clean contrary way.

9

The public faith shall save our souls,
And good out-works together, [2]
And ships shall save our lives that stay,
Only for wind and weather.
But when our faith and works fall down,
And all our hopes decay,
Our Acts will bear us up to heaven,
The clean contrary way.
—1661

A Satire on the Rebellion

Urge me no more to sing. I am not able
To raise a note, songs are abominable.
Yea David's psalms do now begin to be
Turn'd out of Church, by hymns extempore. [3]
No accents are so pleasant now as those
That are caesura'd through the pastor's nose. [4]
I'll only weep our misery and ruth,
I am no Poet, for I speak the truth.
Behold a self against it self doth fight,
And the left hand prevails above the right.
The grumbling guts, i'th' belly of the State,
Unthankful for the wholesome food they ate,
Belch at their head, and do begin to slight
The Cates, to which they had an appetite. [5]
They long for kickshaws, and new fangled dishes, [6]
Not which all love, but which each fancy wishes.
Behold a glorious Phoebus tumbling down, [7]
While the rebellious bears usurp the Crown.
Behold a team of Phaetons aspire [8]
To guide the Sun, and set the World on fire.
All goes to wrack, and it must needs be so,
When those would run, that know not how to go.
Behold a lawful Sovereign to whose mind
Dishonesty's a stranger, now confined
To the anarchic pow'r of those whose reason
Is flat rebellion, and their truth is Treason.
Behold the loyal Subjects pill'd and poll'd, [9]
And from Algere to Tunis bought and sold.
Their goods sequestred by a legal stealth,
The private robb'd t'uphold the Commonwealth, [10]
And those the only plunderers are grown
Of others' states, that had none of their own. [11]

---

[1] malignant crew that is the King's advisors, often considered responsible for his actions.

[2] out-works outer defences or outposts (OED outwork sb 1).

[3] Turn'd out of Church, by hymns extempore The psalms were part of the Anglican liturgy of the Book of Common Prayer. In 1644 the use of the liturgy was discontinued in the two Houses in favor of extempore prayer.

[4] caesura'd nonce-word, from the noun (OED caesura v 3).

[5] Cates bought provisions or victuals, usually more delicate or dainty than those of home production (OED cate *sb*¹ 1).

[6] kickshaws a fancy dish in cookery (OED kickshaw 1).

[7] Phoebus a name of Apollo as the Sun god; the sun personified.

[8] Phaetons The son of Helios the Sun god, Phaeton persuaded his father to let him guide the solar chariot for one day. Phaeton was too weak to control the horses that pulled the chariot, and in order to minimize damage to the world, Zeus killed him with a thunderbolt.

[9] pill'd and poll'd pillaged and robbed (OED pill v ¹ III. 9).

[10] The private robb'd t'uphold the Commonwealth The Sequestration Ordinance of March, 1643, enabled Parliament to seize the estates of the King's supporters. The profits were forwarded to the treasury at Guildhall. It was widely suspected that some members of the Commons used this opportunity to increase their personal wealth.

[11] states property, possessions; one's private means; linked to estate (OED state sb 36).

Robbers no more by night in secret go,
They have a License now for what they do.
If any to the rulers do complain,
They know no other godliness but gain.
Nor give us any plaster for the sore
Of paying much, but only paying more.
What ere we do or speak, how ere we live,
All is acquitted if we will but give;
They sit in bulwarks, and do make the laws
But fair pretences to a fouler cause,
And horse-leech-like cry give, what ere they say, [1]
Or sing, the burden of their song is Pay.
How wretched is that State! how full of woe,
When those that should preserve, do overthrow!
When they rule us, and ore them money reigns,
Who still cry Give, and always gape for gains!
But on those Judges lies a heavy curse,
That measure crimes by the delinquent's purse.
The time will come when they do cease to live,
Some will cry Take, as fast as they cri'd Give.
—1661

---

[1] horse-leech a rapacious, insatiable person (OED horse-leech sb 3).

John Evelyn

1620 – 1706

Evelyn was born into a wealthy commercial family and educated at Balliol College, Oxford. After inheriting a large fortune on his father's death in 1640, he travelled extensively in Europe for most of the 1640s. Though absent from England during the civil wars, he was a steadfast Royalist, acting several times as a messenger in France for the royal family. He returned to England in 1652, and after the Restoration held a number of public offices. A founding member and secretary of The Royal Society, Evelyn was a Restoration virtuoso, interested in all branches of the arts and sciences and a recognised authority on numismatics, antiquities, painting, architecture, engraving, landscape gardening, and arboriculture. His publications ranged from works on education to urban planning, from horticulture to the arrangement of libraries; his translations from French brought into England the latest continental ideas in his many areas of interest.

Evelyn's diary, first published in the nineteenth century, covers his life from the early 1640s to his death, making it along with Pepys's diary one of the most substantial personal records of the period. Evelyn is less spontaneous and confessional than Pepys. But he knew and described many of the most distinguished men and women of the era, and his diary provides an invaluable record of Restoration intellectual, artistic, and scientific life. For other accounts of the Restoration, see the selections from Burnet, Clarendon, Wood, and the Declaration of Breda; for other accounts of the Great Fire, see the selections from Clarendon and Pepys.

* * *

The Diary of John Evelyn

(selections)

The Restoration

1660

Feb. 3 General Monck came now to London out of Scotland, but no man knew what he would do, or declare, yet was he met on all his way by the Gentlemen of all the counties which he passed, with petitions that he would recall the old long interrupted Parliament, and settle the Nation in some order, being at this time in a most prodigious confusion, and under no government, every body expecting what would be next, and what he would do.[1]

Feb. 10 Now were the gates of the city broken down by General Monck, which exceedingly exasperated the city; the soldiers marching up and down as triumphing over it, and all the old army of the fanatics put out of their posts, and sent out of town.

Feb. 11 A signal day: Monck perceiving how infamous and wretched a pack of knaves would have still usurped the supreme power, and having intelligence that they intended to take away his commission, repenting of what he had done to the city, and where he and his forces quartered; marches to Whitehall, dissipates that nest of robbers, and convenes the old Parliament, the "rump-parliament" (so called as retaining some few rotten members of the other) being dissolved; and for joy whereof, were many thousands of rumps roasted publicly in the streets at the bonfires this night, with ringing of bells, and universal jubilee: this was the first good omen.

---

[1] Monck George Monck, Duke of Albemarle (1608–1670). Monck fought for Charles I during the first two years of the Civil War, but afterward for Cromwell and the Commonwealth; in 1659–60 he used the army under his command in Scotland to force the recall of the "Rump" Parliament and then to have the restored Parliament make the political changes that led to the Restoration.

May 3 Came the most happy tidings of his Majesty's gracious Declaration,[1] and applications to the Parliament, General, and people &c and their dutiful acceptance and acknowledgment, after a most bloody and unreasonable rebellion of near 20 years. Praised be forever the Lord of heaven, who only dost wondrous things, because thy mercies endure forever.

May 8 . . . This day was his Majesty proclaimed in London: &c.

May 9 I was desired and designed to accompany my Lord Berkeley with the public address of the Parliament,[2] General &c: and invite him to come over, and assume his kingly government, he being now at Breda; but being yet so weak and convalescent, I could not make that journey by sea, which was not a little to my detriment &c: so I went to London to excuse my self, returning the 10th, having yet received a gracious message from his Majesty, by Major Scot & Colonel Tuke.

May 24 Came to me Colonel Morley about procuring his pardon, and now too late saw his horrible error and neglect of the counsel I gave him, by which he had certainly done the great work, with the same ease that Monck did it.[3] Who was then in Scotland, and Morley in a post to have done what he pleased, by which he made himself the greatest person in England next the King: but his jealousy and fear kept him from that blessing, and honor. I addressed him to my Lord Mordaunt, then in great favour, for his pardon, which he obtained at the cost of 1000 pounds, as I heard: O the sottish omission of this gentleman: What did I not undergo of danger in this negotiation, to have brought him over to his Majesty's interest when it was entirely in his hands.

May 29 This day came in his Majesty Charles the 2d to London after a sad, and long exile, and calamitous suffering both of the King and Church: being 17 years: This was also his birthday, and with a triumph of above 20,000 horse and foot, brandishing their swords and shouting with unexpressible joy: The ways strewed with flowers, the bells ringing, the streets hung with tapestry, fountains running with wine: The Mayor, Aldermen, all the Companies in their liveries, chains of gold, banners; Lords and nobles, cloth of silver, gold and velvet everybody clad in, the windows and balconies all set with Ladies, trumpets, music, and myriads of people flocking the streets and was as far as Rochester, so as they were seven hours in passing the city, even from two in the afternoon 'til nine at night: I stood in the strand, and beheld it, and blessed God: And all this without one drop of blood, and by that very army, which rebelled against him: but it was the Lord's doing, et mirabile in oculis nostri:[4] for such a Restoration was never seen in the mention of any history, ancient or modern, since the return of the Babylonian captivity, nor so joyful a day, and so bright, ever seen in this nation: this happening when to expect or effect it, was past all humane policy.

---

[1] The Declaration of Breda (April 4, 1660), in which Charles promised the concessions that paved the way to the Restoration.

[2] Berkeley John Berkeley, first Baron Berkeley of Stratton (d. 1678), soldier and ambassador.

[3] Herbert Morley (1616–1667); a colonel in the Parliamentary army, Morley refused to act as a judge in the King's trial, opposed Cromwell as long as possible, and withdrew into private life during the Commonwealth. In 1659 he raised troops and helped restore Parliament. Evelyn's estimate of the options available to Morley at the time is inaccurate.

[4] "It is marvellous in our eyes" (Psalm 118:23; Matthew 21:42; Mark 12:11).

THE FIRE OF LONDON

1666

Sept. 2 This fatal night about ten, began that deplorable fire, near Fish Street in London: I had public prayers at home:[1] after dinner the fire continuing, with my wife and son took coach and went to the bank side in Southwark, where we beheld that dismal spectacle, the whole city in dreadful flames near the water side, and had now consumed all the houses from the bridge all Thames Street and upwards towards Cheapside, down to the Three Cranes, and so returned exceedingly astonished, what would become of the rest.

Sept. 3 The fire having continued all this night (if I may call that night, which was as light as day for 10 miles round about after a dreadful manner) when conspiring with a fierce eastern wind, in a very dry season, I went on foot to the same place, when I saw the whole south part of the city burning from Cheapside to the Thames, and all along Cornhill (for it likewise kindled back against the wind, as well as forward), Tower Street, Fenchurch Street, Gracious Street, and so along to Baynard's Castle, and was now taking hold of St. Paul's Church, to which the scaffolds contributed exceedingly;[2] the conflagration was so universal, and the people so astonished, that from the beginning (I know not by what desponding or fate), they hardly stirred to quench it, so as there was nothing heard or seen but crying out and lamentation, and running about like distracted creatures, without at all attempting to save even their goods; such a strange consternation there was upon them, so as it burned both in breadth and length, the churches, public halls, Exchange, hospitals, monuments, and ornaments, leaping after a prodigious manner from house to house and street to street, at great distance one from the other, for the heat (with a long set of fair and warm weather) had even ignited the air, and prepared the materials to conceive the fire, which devoured after an incredible manner, houses, furniture and everything: Here we saw the Thames covered with goods floating, all the barges and boats laden with what some had time and courage to save, as on the other, the carts &c carrying out to the fields, which for many miles were strewed with movables of all sorts, and tents erecting to shelter both people and what goods they could get away: O the miserable and calamitous spectacle, such as haply the whole world had not seen the like since the foundation of it, nor to be out done, 'til the universal conflagration of it, all the sky were of a fiery aspect, like the top of a burning oven, and the light seen above 40 miles round about for many nights: God grant mine eyes may never behold the like, who now saw above ten thousand houses all in one flame, the noise and crackling and thunder of the impetuous flames, the shrieking of women and children, the hurry of people, the fall of towers, houses and churches was like an hideous storm, and the air all about so hot and inflamed that at the last one was not able to approach it, so as they were forced to stand still, and let the flames consume on which they did for near two whole miles in length and one in breadth: The clouds also of smoke were dismal, and reached upon computation near 50 miles in length: Thus I left it this afternoon burning, a resemblance of Sodom, or the last day: It called to mind that of 4 Heb: non enim hic habemus stabilem Civitatem:[3] the ruins resembling the picture of Troy: London was, but is no more: Thus I returned.

---

[1] public prayers at home that is, prayers attended by all members of the household (family and servants) and led by Evelyn.

[2] scaffolds wooden construction scaffolds erected before the fire for repairs to the church.

[3] Actually Hebrews 13:14, "For here we have no continuing city." Evelyn is citing from the Latin translation by Theodore Beza.

Sept. 4 The burning still rages; I went now on horseback, and it was now gotten as far as the Inner Temple; all Fleet Street, Old Bailey, Ludgate hill, Warwick Lane, Newgate, Paul's Chain, Wattling Street now flaming and most of it reduced to ashes, the stones of Paul's flew like grenades, the lead melting down the streets in a stream, and the very pavements of them glowing with fiery redness, so as nor horse nor man was able to tread on them, and the demolitions had stopped all the passages, so as no help could be applied; the eastern wind still more impetuously driving the flames forwards: Nothing but the almighty power of God was able to stop them, for vain was the help of man: on the fifth it crossed towards Whitehall, but O the confusion was then at that Court: It pleased his Majesty to command me among the rest to look after the quenching of Fetter-lane end, to preserve (if possible) that part of Holborn, whilst the rest of the Gentlemen took their several posts, some at one part, some at another, for now they began to bestir themselves, and not 'til now, who 'til now had stood as men interdict, with their hands a cross, and began to consider that nothing was like to put a stop, but the blowing up of so many houses, as might make a (wider) gap, than any had yet been made by the ordinary method of pulling them down with engines; This some stout seamen proposed early enough to have saved the whole city; but some tenacious and avaricious men, aldermen &c. would not permit, because their houses must have been of the first: It was therefore now commanded to be practised, and my concern being particularly for the Hospital of St. Bartholomew's near Smithfield, where I had many wounded and sick men, made me the more diligent to promote it; nor was my care for the Savoy less: So as it pleased Almighty God by abating of the wind, and the industry of people, now when all was lost, infusing a new spirit into them (and such as had if exerted in time undoubtedly preserved the whole) that the fury of it began sensibly to abate, about noon, so as it came no farther than the Temple westward, nor than the entrance of Smithfield north; but continued all this day and night so impetuous toward Cripplegate, and the Tower, as made us even all despair; It also brake out again in the Temple: but the courage of the multitude persisting, and innumerable houses blown up with gunpowder, such gaps and desolations were soon made, as also by the former three day's consumption, as the back fire did not so vehemently urge upon the rest, as formerly: There was yet no standing near the burning and glowing ruins near a furlong's space; The coal and wood wharfs and magazines of oil, rosin, chandler &c:[1] did infinite mischief; so as the invective I but a little before dedicated to his Majesty and published, giving warning what might probably be the issue of suffering those shops to be in the city,[2] was looked on as prophetic: but there I left this smoking and sultry heap, which mounted up in dismal clouds night and day, the poor inhabitants dispersed all about St. George's, Moorfields, as far as Highgate, and several miles in circle, some under tents, others under miserable huts and hovels, without a rag, or any necessary utensils, bed or board, who from delicateness, riches and easy accommodations in stately and well furnished houses, were now reduced to extremest misery and poverty: In this calamitous condition I returned with a sad heart to my house, blessing and adoring the distinguishing mercy of God, to me and mine, who in the midst of all this ruin, was like Lot, in my little Zoar, safe and sound.[3] [1] chandler This word is an interlinear addition to Evelyn's text, and does not make sense syntactically. The reference is probably to the highly combustible stores of the ship's chandlers on the river bank, stocked with cordage, canvas and tar.

---

[2] the invective I…published referring to Fumifugium: or The Inconveniencie of the Aer and Smoak of London Dissipated (1661), in which Evelyn had warned of the danger of fires from factories and warehouses (hence "invective," here meaning a polemical work).

[3] See Genesis 19:20–22.

Sept. 6 It is not indeed imaginable how extraordinary the vigilance and activity of the King and Duke was, even labouring in person, and being present, to command, order, reward, and encourage workmen; by which he showed his affection to his people, and gained theirs.[1]

Sept. 7 I went this morning on foot from Whitehall as far as London Bridge, through the late Fleet Street, Ludgate hill, by St. Paul's, Cheapside, Exchange, Bishopsgate, Aldersgate, and out to Moorfields, thence through Cornhill, &c with extraordinary difficulty, clambering over mountains of yet smoking rubbish, and frequently mistaking where I was, the ground under my feet so hot, as made me not only sweat, but even burnt the soles of my shoes, and put me all over in sweat: In the mean time his Majesty got to the Tower by water, to demolish the houses about the Graft, which being built entirely about it, had they taken fire, and attacked the white Tower, where the magazines of powder lay, would undoubtedly have not only beaten down and destroyed all the bridge, but sunk and torn all the vessels in the river, and rendered the demolition beyond all expression for several miles even about the country at many miles distance: At my return I was infinitely concerned to find that goodly church St. Paul's now a sad ruin, and that beautiful portico (for structure comparable to any in Europe, as not long before repaired by the late King) now rent in pieces, flakes of vast stone split in sunder, and nothing remaining entire but the inscription in the architrave which showing by whom it was built, had not one letter of it defaced: which I could not but take notice of: It was astonishing to see what immense stones the heat had in a manner calcined, so as all the ornaments, columns, friezes, capitals and projectures of massy Portland stone flew off, even to the very roof, where a sheet of lead covering no less than six acres by measure, being totally melted, the ruins of the vaulted roof falling, broke into St. Faith's, which being filled with the magazines of books, belonging to the Stationers, and carried thither for safety, they were all consumed burning for a week following:[2] It is also observable, that the lead over the altar at the east end was untouched; and among the divers monuments, the body of one bishop remained entire. Thus lay in ashes that most venerable church, one of the ancientest pieces of early piety in the Christian world, beside near 100 more; the lead, ironwork, bells, plate &c melted; the exquisitely wrought Mercer's Chapel, the sumptuous Exchange, the august fabric of Christ Church, all the rest of the companies' halls, sumptuous buildings, arches, entries, all in dust. The fountains dried up and ruined, whilst the very waters remained boiling; the voragos of subterranean cellars, wells and dungeons,[3] formerly warehouses, still burning in stench and dark clouds of smoke like hell, so as in five or six miles traversing about, I did not see one load of timber unconsumed, nor many stones but what were calcined white as snow, so as the people who now walked about the ruins, appeared like men in some dismal desert, or rather in some great city, laid waste by an impetuous and cruel enemy, to which was added the stench that came from some poor creatures' bodies, beds, and other combustible goods: Sir Thomas Gresham's statue,[4] though fallen to the ground from its niche in the Royal Exchange, remained entire, when all those of the kings since the conquest were broken to pieces: also the Standard in Cornhill, and Queen Elizabeth's effigies, with some arms on Ludgate continued with but little detriment, whilst the vast iron chains of the city streets, vast hinges, bars and gates of prisons were many of them melted, and reduced to cinders by the vehement heats: nor was I yet able to pass through any of the narrower streets, but kept the widest, the ground and air, smoke and fiery vapour, continued so intense, my hair being almost singed, and my feet insufferably surbated:[1] The by-lanes and narrower streets were quite filled up with rubbish, nor could one have possibly known where he was, but by the ruins of some church, or hall, that had some remarkable tower or pinnacle remaining: I then went towards Islington, and Highgate, where one might have seen two hundred thousand people of all ranks and degrees dispersed, and laying along by their heaps of what they could save from the Incendium, deploring their loss, and though ready to perish for hunger and destitution, yet not asking one penny for relief, which to me appeared a stranger sight, than any I had yet beheld: His Majesty and Council indeed took all imaginable care for their relief, by Proclamation, for the country to come in and refresh them with provisions: when in the midst of all this calamity and confusion, there was (I know not how) an alarm begun, that the French and Dutch (with whom we were now in hostility) were not only landed, but even entering the city; there being in truth, great suspicion some days before, of those two nations joining, and even now, that they had been the occasion of firing the town: This report did so terrify, that on a sudden there was such an uproar and tumult, that they ran from their goods, and taking what weapons they could come at, they could not be stopped from falling on some of those nations whom they casually met, without sense or reason, the clamor and peril growing so excessive, as made the whole Court amazed at it, and they did with infinite pains, and great difficulty reduce and appease the people,[2] sending guards and troops of soldiers, to cause them to retire into the fields again, where they were watched all this night when I left them pretty quiet, and came home to my house, sufficiently weary and broken: Their spirits thus a little sedated, and the affright abated, they now began to repair into the suburbs about the city, where such as had friends or opportunity got shelter and harbour for the present: to which his Majesty's Proclamation also invited them. Still the plague, continuing in our parish, I could not without danger adventure to our church.

---

[1] Duke James, Duke of York, the King's brother and later James II.

[2] Stationers Stationers included booksellers and printers; many had shops in the yard around St. Paul's, and had put their stock in the crypt beneath the church for safekeeping. The loss to the book trade was considerable.

[3] voragos A vorago is an abyss or chasm (OED).

[4] Gresham (1519?–1579) founded the Royal Exchange as a meeting place for merchants and bankers.

Sept. 10 I went again to the ruins, for it was now no longer a city.

Sept. 13 …on the 13, I presented his Majesty with a survey of the ruins, and a plot for a new city, with a discourse on it, whereupon, after dinner his Majesty sent for me into the Queen's bed chamber, her Majesty and the Duke only present, where they examined each particular, and discoursed upon them for near a full hour, seeming to be extremely pleased with what I had so early thought on.

Oct. 10 This day was indicted a general fast through the nation, to humble us, upon the late dreadful conflagration, added to the plague and war, the most dismal judgments could be inflicted, and indeed but what we highly deserved for our prodigious ingratitude, burning lusts, dissolute court, profane and abominable lives, under such dispensations of God's continued favour, in restoring Church, Prince, and people from our late intestine calamities,[3] of which we were altogether unmindful even to astonishment.

---

[1] surbated bruised or sore with much walking (OED).

[2] reduce subdue, calm.

[3] intestine calamities internal calamities, that is, the Civil War.

Oct. 18 To London: Star-Chamber: thence to court, it being the first time of his Majesty's putting himself solemnly into the eastern fashion of vest, changing doublet, stiff collar, bands and cloak &c: into a comely vest, after the Persian mode with girdle or sash, and shoe strings and garters, into buckles, of which some were set with precious stones, resolving never to alter it, and to leave the French mode, which had hitherto obtained to our great expense and reproach: upon which divers courtiers and gentlemen gave his Majesty gold, by way of wager, that he would not persist in this resolution: I had some time before indeed presented an Invectique against that inconstancy, and our so much affecting the French fashion, to his Majesty in which I took occasion to describe the comeliness and usefulness of the Persian clothing in the very same manner his Majesty clad himself; this pamphlet I entitled Tyrannus or the mode,[1] and give it his Majesty to read; I do not impute the change which soon happened to this discourse, but it was an identity, that I could not but take notice of: This night was acted my Lord Brahal's tragedy called Mustapha before their Majesties &c: at Court:[2] at which I was present, very seldom at any time, going to the public theaters, for many reasons, now as they were abused, to an atheistical liberty, foul and indecent; women now (and never 'till now) permitted to appear and act, which inflaming several young noblemen and gallants, became their whores, and to some their wives, witness the Earl of Oxford, Sir R. Howard, Prince Rupert, the Earl of Dorset, and another greater person than any of these,[3] who fell into their snares, to the reproach of their noble families, and ruin both of body and soul: I was invited to see this tragedy, exceedingly well writ, by my Lord Chamberlain, though in my mind, I did not approve of any such pastime, in a season of such judgements and calamity.

—(1660, 1666)

---

[1] Tyrannus or the Mode: in a Discourse of Sumptuary Lawes (1661); Invectique a form of "invective," meaning a polemical work.

[2] Lord Brahal's tragedy a play by Roger Boyle, Baron Broghill and first Earl of Orrery (1621–1679), statesman, soldier, and dramatist.

[3] another greater person than any of these King Charles II.

Lucy Hutchinson

1620 – ca. 1675

Lucy Apsley Hutchinson was born in the Tower of London, the daughter of Lucy St. John and Sir Allen Apsley, Lieutenant of the Tower. While pregnant with Lucy, her mother dreamt of a star settling in her hand as she walked in the garden. Lucy's father interpreted this to mean that she would bear "a daughter of some extraordinary eminency." In an autobiographical fragment, Lucy paints herself as a particularly bright child, eagerly reading and listening to sermons by the age of four. At seven, she was instructed by eight tutors in language, music, dancing, writing and needlework, yet was continually drawn into the world of texts, eventually displaying competence in French, Latin, Greek and Hebrew. It was her pleasure in writing "witty songs and amorous sonnets" that drew the attentions of her future husband, John Hutchinson, who was compelled to make her acquaintance after detecting a "rationality in the sonnet, beyond the customary reach of a she-wit." Though struck down with smallpox in 1638, later that year she wed Hutchinson, by whom she had eight children. In 1640, Lucy moved to Owthorpe, the Hutchinson family home, where she soon turned her attention to the translation of the six books of Lucretius. Although this translation, written in the schoolroom of her children, was not published, it enjoyed circulation amongst friends. Such tranquillity was soon interrupted by the turbulence of the civil wars. Hutchinson, a Parliamentarian, was governor of the castle in Nottingham, and in 1646 assumed a seat in the Long Parliament. Appointed one of the judges at the trial of the King, he was to sign Charles I's death sentence, an act which led to his imprisonment in the Tower after the Restoration. When he was removed to Sandown Castle in Kent in 1663, the unhealthy conditions weakened his health and, despite Lucy's daily visits and medical efforts, he died the following year. To console herself, Lucy became her husband's biographer. In the Memoirs of Colonel Hutchinson, Hutchinson emerges as virtuous and valorous, suffering saint and noble warrior. The Memoirs do not, however, merely eulogize but offer a compelling and detailed, if partisan, account of the Civil War. Prefaced to the Memoirs is a fragment of "The Life of Mrs. Hutchinson," strangely more forthcoming on the history of Britain than it is on the childhood of Lucy or the workings of her mind. In later life, Lucy Hutchinson wrote two religious treatises, On the Principles of Christian Religion and On Theology, for the benefit of her children, yet never ventured to publish any of her work. She had once declared that silence was the most becoming virtue in women, which may well explain her distaste for publication. The date of Lucy Hutchinson's death is unknown.

* * *

"All Sorts of Men"[1]

All sorts of men through various labours press
To the same end, contented quietness;
Great princes vex their labouring thoughts to be
Possessed of an unbounded sovereignty;
The hardy soldier doth all toils sustain
That he may conquer first, and after reign;
Th'industrious merchant ploughs the angry seas
That he may bring home wealth, and live at ease.

---

[1] Hutchinson's editor, the Reverend Julius Hutchinson, writes that this poem was found: "in the small book containing her own life, and most probably composed by her during her husband's retirement from public business to his seat at Owthorpe." The classical source for the genre of the retirement poem is Horace's Epode II, Beatus ille ("The Happy Man"), a lyric which contrasts the peace and contentment of country living with the vexations of urban life. Ben Jonson's translation of this epode, "The Praises of a Country Life," and Katherine Philips's "A Country Life" are among the many early modern versions of the Horatian retirement poem.

These none of them attain; for sweet repose
But seldom to the splendid palace goes;
A troop of restless passions wander there,
And only private lives are free from care.
Sleep to the cottage bringeth happy nights,
But to the court hung round with flaring lights,
Which th' office of the vanished day supply,
His image only comes to close the eye,
But gives the troubled mind no ease of care,
While country slumbers undisturbed are;
Where, if the active fancy dreams present,
They bring no horrors to the innocent.
Ambition doth incessantly aspire,
And each advance leads on to new desire;
Nor yet can riches av'rice satisfy,
For want and wealth together multiply:
Nor can voluptuous men more fulness find,
For enjoyed pleasures leave their stings behind.
He's only rich who knows no want; he reigns
Whose will no severe tyranny constrains;
And he alone possesseth true delight
Whose spotless soul no guilty fears affright.
This freedom in the country life is found,
Where innocence and safe delights abound.
Here man's a prince; his subjects ne'er repine
When on his back their wealthy fleeces shine:
If for his appetite the fattest die,
Those who survive will raise no mutiny:
His table is with home-got dainties crowned,
With friends, not flatterers, encompassed round;
No spies nor traitors on his trencher wait,[1]
Nor is his mirth confined to rules of state;
An armed guard he neither hath nor needs,
Nor fears a poisoned morsel when he feeds;
Bright constellations hang above his head,
Beneath his feet are flow'ry carpets spread;
The merry birds delight him with their songs,
And healthful air his happy life prolongs;
At harvest merrily his flocks he shears,
And in cold weather their warm fleeces wears;
Unto his ease he fashions all his clothes;
His cup with uninfected liquor flows:
The vulgar breath doth not his thoughts elate,
Nor can he be o'erwhelmed by their hate.
Yet, if ambitiously he seeks for fame,
One village feast shall gain a greater name
Than his who wears the imperial diadem,
Whom the rude multitude do still condemn.
Sweet peace and joy his blest companions are;
Fear, sorrow, envy, lust, revenge, and care,
And all that troop which breeds the world's offence,
With pomp and majesty, are banished thence.
What court then can such liberty afford?
Or where is man so uncontrolled a lord?
—1806

The Life of Mrs. Lucy Hutchinson Written by Herself, A Fragment

The almighty author of all beings, in his various providences, whereby he conducts the lives of men from the cradle to the tomb, exercises no less wisdom and goodness than he manifests power and greatness, in their creation; but such is the stupidity of blind mortals, that instead of employing their studies in these admirable books of providence, wherein God daily exhibits to us glorious characters of his love, kindness, wisdom, and justice, they ungratefully regard them not, and call the most wonderful operations of the great God the common accidents of human life, especially if they be such as are usual, and exercised towards them in ages wherein they are not very capable of observation, and whereon they seldom employ any reflection; for in things great and extraordinary, some, perhaps, will take notice of God's working, who either forget or believe not that he takes as well a care and account of their smallest concernments, even the hairs of their heads.

---

[1] trencher a serving plate and that food which it bears (OED trencher[1] II.2,4).

Finding myself in some kind guilty of this general neglect, I thought it might be a means to stir up my thankfulness for things past, and to encourage my faith for the future, if I recollected as much as I have heard or can remember of the passages of my youth, and the general and particular providences exercised to me, both in the entrance and progress of my life. Herein I meet with so many special indulgences as require a distinct consideration, they being all of them to be regarded as talents intrusted to my improvement for God's glory. The parents by whom I received my life, the places where I began and continued it, the time when I was brought forth to be a witness of God's wonderful workings in the earth, the rank that was given me in my generation, and the advantages I received in my person, each of them carries along with it many mercies which are above my utterance, and as they give me infinite cause of glorifying God's goodness, so I cannot reflect on them without deep humiliation for the small improvement I have made of so rich a stock; which, that I may yet by God's grace better employ, I shall recall and seriously ponder: and, first, as far as I have since learnt, set down the condition of things in the place of my nativity, at that time when I was sent into the world. It was on the 29th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1619–20, that in the Tower of London, the principal city of the English isle, I was, about four of the clock in the morning, brought forth to behold the ensuing light. My father was Sir Allen Apsley, lieutenant of the Tower of London; my mother, his third wife, was Lucy, the youngest daughter of Sir John St. John, of Lidiard Tregooze, in Wiltshire, by his second wife. My father had then living a son and a daughter by his former wives, and by my mother three sons, I being her eldest daughter. The land was then at peace (it being towards the latter end of the reign of King James),[1] if that quietness may be called a peace, which was rather like the calm and smooth surface of the sea, whose dark womb is already impregnated with a horrid tempest.

Whoever considers England will find it no small favour of God to have been made one of its natives, both upon spiritual and outward accounts. The happiness of the soil and air contribute all things that are necessary to the use or delight of man's life. The celebrated glory of this isle's inhabitants, ever since they received a mention in history, confers some honour upon every one of her children, and with it an obligation to continue in that magnanimity and virtue, which hath famed this island, and raised her head in glory higher than the great kingdoms of the neighbouring continent. Britain hath been as a garden enclosed, wherein all things that man can wish, to make a pleasant life, are planted and grow in her own soil, and whatsoever foreign countries yield, to increase admiration and delight, are brought in by her fleets.[2] The people, by the plenty of their country, not being forced to toil for bread, have ever addicted themselves to more generous employments, and been reckoned, almost in all ages, as valiant warriors as any part of the world sent forth: insomuch, that the greatest Roman captains thought it not unworthy of their expeditions, and took great glory in triumphs for imperfect conquests. Lucan upbraids Julius Caesar for returning hence with a repulse, and it was two hundred years before the land could be reduced into a Roman province, which at length was done, and such of the nation, then called Picts, as scorned servitude, were driven into the barren country of Scotland, where they have ever since remained a perpetual trouble to the successive inhabitants of this place.[1] The Britons, that thought it better to work for their conquerors in a good land, than to have the freedom to starve in a cold or barren quarter, were by degrees fetched away, and wasted in the civil broils of these Roman lords, till the land, almost depopulated, lay open to the incursions of every borderer, and were forced to call a stout warlike people, the Saxons, out of Germany, to their assistance.[2] These willingly came at their call, but were not so easily sent out again, nor persuaded to let their hosts inhabit with them, for they drove the Britons into the mountains of Wales, and seated themselves in those pleasant countries which from the new masters received a new name, and ever since retained it, being called England; and on which the warlike Dane made many attempts, with various success, but after about two or three hundred years' vain contest, they were for ever driven out, with shame and loss, and the Saxon Heptarchy melted into a monarchy, which continued till the superstitious prince, who was sainted for his ungodly chastity, left an empty throne to him that could seize it. He who first set up his standard in it, could not hold it, but with his life left it again for the Norman usurper, who partly by violence, partly by falsehood, laid here the foundation of his monarchy, in the people's blood, in which it hath swam about five hundred years, till the flood that bore it was ploughed into such deep furrows as had almost sunk the proud vessel.[3] Of those Saxons that remained subjects to the Norman conqueror, my father's family descended; of those Normans that came in with him, my mother's was derived; both of them, as all the rest in England, contracting such affinity, by mutual marriages, that the distinction remained but a short space; Normans and Saxons becoming one people, who by their valour grew terrible to all the neighbouring princes, and have not only bravely acquitted themselves in their own defence, but have showed abroad how easily they could subdue the world, if they did not prefer the quiet enjoyment of their own part above the conquest of the whole.

---

[1] latter end of the reign James I reigned until 1625.

[2] Britain has been as a garden enclosed Wilderness, garden and hedge metaphors are commonplace in works published during the civil wars and interregnum.

Better laws and a happier constitution of government no nation ever enjoyed, it being a mixture of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, with sufficient fences against the pest of every one of those forms—tyranny, faction, and confusion; yet is it not possible for man to devise such just and excellent bounds, as will keep in wild ambition, when princes' flatterers encourage that beast to break his fence, which it hath often done, with miserable consequences both to the prince and people; but could never in any age so tread down popular liberty, but that it arose again with renewed vigour, till at length it trod on those that trampled it before. And in the just bounds, wherein our kings were so well hedged in, the surrounding princes have with terror seen the reproof of their usurpations over their free brethren, whom they rule rather as slaves than subjects, and are only served for fear, but not for love; whereas this people have ever been as affectionate to good, as unpliable to bad sovereigns.

---

[1] Lucan upbraids...with a repulse Marcus Annaeus Lucanus (39–65 C.E.), the poet and historian, notes Caesar's failure in his epic poem Bellum Civile ("The Civil War"), also known as Pharsalia. Lucan's text became an important cultural touchstone in the period because he wrote from a Republican point of view.

[2] and were forced...to their assistance The Anglo-Saxons, led by Hengist, came to Britain in 449 C.E. at the invitation of King Vortigern and were granted lands in the eastern part of the island in exchange for military service.

[3] warlike Dane...Norman usurper Under attack by the Danes, the Wessex forces joined under the leadership of King Alfred the Great (849–899 C.E.), who ruled England from 871 until his death. Battles between the Dane Canute (ca. 994–1035) and the Wessex kings in the eleventh century resulted in a pact in which Edmund Ironside held Wessex and Canute Mercia. On Edmund's death (1017), Canute succeeded to the whole realm of England. Hutchinson follows the line of King Alfred the Great to Edward the Confessor, whose monastic chastity left him childless. When he died without an heir, there were two claimants to the throne: the Anglo-Saxon Harold, son of Godwin, and William of Normandy. Harold ruled for forty weeks and a day before William invaded England and killed Harold at the Battle of Hastings (1066).

Nor is it only valour and generosity that renown this nation; in arts we have advanced equal to our neighbours, and in those that are most excellent, exceeded them. The world hath not yielded men more famous in navigation, nor ships better built or furnished. Agriculture is as ingeniously practised; the English archers were the terror of Christendom, and their clothes the ornament; but these low things bounded not their great spirits, in all ages it hath yielded men as famous in all kinds of learning, as Greece or Italy can boast of.

And to complete the crown of all their glory, reflected from the lustre of their ingenuity, valour, wit, learning, justice, wealth, and bounty, their piety and devotion to God, and his worship, hath made them one of the most truly noble nations in the Christian world, God having as it were enclosed a people here, out of the waste common of the world, to serve him with a pure and undefiled worship. Lucius the British king was one of the first monarchs of the earth that received the faith of Christ into his heart and kingdom;[1] Henry the Eighth, the first prince that broke the antichristian yoke off from his own and his subjects' necks.[2] Here it was that the first Christian emperor received his crown; here began the early dawn of gospel light, by Wycliffe and other faithful witnesses, whom God raised up after the black and horrid midnight of antichristianism; and a more plentiful harvest of devout confessors, constant martyrs, and holy worshippers of God, hath not grown in any field of the church, throughout all ages, than those whom God hath here glorified his name and gospel by.[3] Yet hath not this wheat been without its tares;[4] God in comparison with other countries hath made this as a paradise, so, to complete the parallel, the serpent hath in all times been busy to seduce, and not unsuccessful; ever stirring up opposers to the infant truths of Christ.[5]

No sooner was the faith of Christ embraced in this nation, but the neighbouring heathens invaded the innocent Christians, and slaughtered multitudes of them; and when, by the mercy of God, the conquering pagans were afterwards converted, and there were none left to oppose the name of Christ with open hostility, then the subtle serpent put off his own horrid appearance, and comes out in a Christian dress, to persecute Christ in his poor prophets, that bore witness against the corruption of the times.[6] This intestine quarrel hath been more successful to the devil, and more afflictive to the church, than all open wars; and, I fear, will never happily be decided, till the Prince of Peace come to conclude the controversy, which at the time of my birth was working up into that tempest, wherein I have shared many perils, many fears, and many sorrows; and many more mercies, consolations, and preservations, which I shall have occasion to mention in other places.[7]

---

[1] Lucius Lucius wrote to Pope Eleutherius some time between 177 and 180 C.E. asking to be made a Christian by his direction. This request was granted and the Britons converted (Bede, I.4)

[2] Henry the Eighth…subjects' necks When Pope Clement VII refused to consent to Henry VIII's divorce from Catherine of Aragon, Henry broke from papal allegiance, arranged for Parliament to make him Supreme Head of the Church of England, and married Anne Boleyn in 1533.

[3] Wycliffe John Wycliffe (ca. 1330–1384), founder of the Lollards, a movement for religious reform often seen by English Protestants as anticipating the Protestant Reformation.

[4] Yet hath not…its tares A reference to the parable of the wheat and tares (Matthew 13:24–30).

[5] the serpent "that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan" (Revelation 20:2).

[6] the neighbouring heathens…afterwards converted The pagan Angles, Saxons and Jutes infiltrated England and achieved power in the fifth and sixth centuries. Sent by Pope Gregory to England in 596 C.E., Augustine converted the peoples to Christianity and was consecrated Archbishop of the English nation (Bede, I.23–27).

[7] that tempest Hutchinson presents the civil wars largely as a battle between religious opponents, proponents of Papistry and Arminianism ("children of darkness") and proponents of Calvinism ("children of

From the place of my birth I shall only desire to remember the goodness of the Lord, who hath caused my lot to fall in a good ground; who hath fed me in a pleasant pasture, where the well-springs of life flow to all that desire to drink of them. And this is no small favour, if I consider how many poor people perish among the heathen, where they never hear the name of Christ; how many poor Christians spring up in countries enslaved by Turkish and antichristian tyrants, whose souls and bodies languish under miserable slavery. None know what mercy it is to live under a good and wholesome law, that have not considered the sad condition of being subject to the will of an unlimited man; and surely it is too universal a sin in this nation, that the common mercies of God to the whole land are so slightly regarded, and so inconsiderately passed over; certainly these are circumstances which much magnify God's loving-kindness and his special favour to all that are of English birth, and call for a greater return of duty from us than from all other people of the world.

Nor is the place only, but the time of my coming into the world, a considerable mercy to me. It was not in the midnight of popery, nor in the dawn of the gospel's restored day, when light and shades were blended and almost undistinguished, but when the Sun of truth was exalted in his progress, and hastening towards a meridian glory. It was, indeed, early in the morning, God being pleased to allow me the privilege of beholding the admirable growth of gospel light in my days: and oh! that my soul may never forget to bless and praise his name for the wonders of power and goodness, wisdom and truth, which have been manifested in this my time.

The next blessing I have to consider in my nativity is my parents, both of them pious and virtuous in their own conversation, and careful instructors of my youth, not only by precept but example; which, if I had leisure and ability, I should have transmitted to my posterity, both to give them the honour due from me in such a grateful memorial, and to increase my children's improvement of the patterns they set them; but since I shall detract from those I would celebrate, by my imperfect commemorations, I shall content myself to sum up some few things for my own use, and let the rest alone, which I either knew not, or have forgotten, or cannot worthily express.

My grandfather by the father's side was a gentleman of a competent estate, about £700 or £800 a year, in Sussex. He being descended of a younger house, had his residence at a place called Pulborough; the family out of which he came was an Apsley of Apsley, a town where they had been seated before the Conquest, and ever since continued, till of late the last heir male of that eldest house, being the son of Sir Edward Apsley, died without issue, and his estate went with his sister's daughters into other families. Particularities concerning my father's kindred or country I never knew much of, by reason of my youth at the time of his death, and my education in far distant places; only in general I have heard, that my grandfather was a man well reputed and beloved in his country, and that it had been such a continued custom for my ancestors to take wives at home, that there was scarce a family of any note in Sussex to which they were not by intermarriages nearly related; but I was myself a stranger to them all, except my Lord Goring, who living at court, I have seen with my father, and heard of him, because he was appointed one of my father's executors, though he declined the trouble.[1] My grandfather had seven sons, of which light"). She describes the latter faction, of which she is a member, as those who "zealous for God's glory or worship, could not endure blasphemous oaths, ribald conversation, profane scoffs, sabbath breaking, derision of the word of God."

---

[1] Lord Goring perhaps George Goring, Receiver-General of the Court of Wards from 1584 to 1594. He owned several Sussex manors. He died owing the Crown £19,777 and court gossip had it that he had engaged in fraudulent financial practices.

my father was the youngest; to the eldest he gave his whole estate, and to the rest, according to the custom of those times, slight annuities.[1] The eldest brother married to a gentlewoman of a good family, and by her had only one son, whose mother dying, my uncle married himself again to one of his own maids, and by her had three more sons, whom, with their mother, my cousin William Apsley, the son of the first wife, held in such contempt, that a great while after, dying without children, he gave his estate of inheritance to my father, and two of my brothers, except about £100 a year to the eldest of his half brothers, and annuities of £30 a piece to the three for their lives. He died before I was born, but I have heard very honourable mention of him in our family. The rest of my father's brothers went into the wars in Ireland and the Low Countries, and there remained none of them, nor their issues, when I was born, but only three daughters who bestowed themselves meanly, and their generations are worn out, except two or three unregarded children.[2] My father, at the death of my grandfather, being but a youth at school, had not patience to stay the perfecting of his studies, but put himself into present action, sold his annuity, bought himself good clothes, put some money in his purse, and came to London; and by means of a relation at court, got a place in the household of Queen Elizabeth, where he behaved himself so that he won the love of many of the court; but being young, took an affection to gaming, and spent most of the money he had in his purse. About that time, the Earl of Essex was setting forth on a voyage to Cadiz, and my father, that had a mind to quit his idle court life, procured an employment from the victualler of the navy, to go along with that fleet.[3] In which voyage he demeaned himself with so much courage and prudence, that after his return he was honoured with a very noble and profitable employment in Ireland. There a rich widow, that had many children, cast her affections upon him, and he married her; but she not living many years with him, and having no children by him, after her death he distributed all her estate among her children, for whom he ever preserved a fatherly kindness, and some of her grandchildren were brought up in his house after I was born. He, by God's blessing, and his fidelity and industry, growing in estate and honour, received a knighthood from King James soon after his coming to the crown,[4] for some eminent service done to him in Ireland, which, having only heard in my childhood, I cannot perfectly set down. After that, growing into a familiarity with Sir George Carew, made now by the king Earl of Totness, a niece of this earl's, the daughter of Sir Peter Carew, who lived a young widow in her uncle's house, fell in love with him, which her uncle perceiving, procured a marriage between them.[5] She had diverse children by my father, but only two of them, a son and daughter, survived her, who died whilst my father was absent from her in Ireland. He led, all the time of his widowhood, a very disconsolate life, careful for nothing in the world but to educate and advance the son and daughter, the dear pledges she had left him, for whose sake he quitted himself of his employments abroad, and procured himself the office of Victualler of the Navy, a place then both of credit and great revenue. His friends, considering his solitude, had procured him a match of a very rich widow, who was a lady of as much discretion as wealth; but while he was upon this design he chanced to see my mother, at the house of Sir William St. John, who had married her eldest sister; and though he went on his journey, yet something in her person and behaviour, which he carried along with him, would not let him accomplish it, but brought him back to my mother. She was of a noble family, being the youngest daughter of Sir John St. John, of Liddiard Tregooze in the county of Wilts; her father and mother died when she was not above five years of age, and yet at her nurse's, from whence she was carried to be brought up in the house of the Lord Grandison, her father's younger brother; an honourable and excellent person, but married to a lady so jealous of him, and so ill-natured in her jealous fits, to anything that was related to him, that her cruelties to my mother exceeded the stories of stepmothers. The rest of my aunts, my mother's sisters, were dispersed to several places, where they grew up till my uncle, Sir John St. John, being married to the daughter of Sir Thomas Laten, they were all again brought home to their brother's house. There were not in those days so many beautiful women found in any family as these, but my mother was by the most judgments preferred before all her elder sisters, who, something envious at it, used her unkindly. Yet all the suitors that came to them still turned their addresses to her, which she in her youthful innocency neglected, till one of greater name, estate, and reputation than the rest, happened to fall deeply in love with her, and to manage it so discreetly, that my mother could not but entertain him. My uncle's wife, who had a mother's kindness for her, persuaded her to remove herself from her sisters' envy, by going along with her to the Isle of Jersey, where her father was governor; which she did, and there went into the town, and boarded in a French minister's house, to learn the language, that minister having been, by the persecution in France, driven to seek his shelter there. Contracting a dear friendship with this holy man and his wife, she was instructed in their Geneva discipline, which she liked so much better than our more superstitious service, that she could have been contented to have lived there, had not a powerful passion in her heart drawn her back.[1] But at her return she met with many afflictions; the gentleman who had professed so much love to her, in her absence had been, by most vile practices and treacheries, drawn out of his senses, and into the marriage of a person, whom, when he recovered his reason, he hated. But that served only to augment his misfortune, and the circumstances of that story not being necessary to be here inserted, I shall only add that my mother lived in my uncle's house, secretly discontented at this accident, but was comforted by the kindness of my uncle's wife, who had contracted such an intimate friendship with her, that they seemed to have but one soul. And in this kindness she had some time a great solace, till some malicious persons had wrought some jealousies, which were very groundless, in my uncle concerning his wife; but his nature being inclinable to that passion, which was fomented in him by subtle wicked persons, and my mother endeavouring to vindicate injured innocence, she was herself not well treated by my uncle, whereupon she left his house, with a resolution to withdraw herself into the island, where the good minister was, and there to wear out her life in the service of God. While she was deliberating, and had fixed upon it in her own thoughts, resolving to impart it to none, she was with Sir William St. John, who had married my aunt, when my father accidentally came in there, and fell so heartily in love with her, that he persuaded her to marry him, which she did, and her melancholy made her conform cheerfully to that gravity of habit and conversation, which was becoming the wife of such a person, who was then forty-eight years of age, and she not above sixteen. The first year of their marriage was crowned with a son, called after my father's name, and born at East Smithfield, in that house of the king's which belonged to my father's employment in the navy. The next year they removed to the Tower of London, whereof my father was made lieutenant, and there had two sons more before me, and four daughters, and two sons after; of all which only three sons and two daughters survived him at the time of his death, which was in the sixty-third year of his age, after he had three years before languished of a consumption, that succeeded a fever which he got in the unfortunate voyage to the Isle of Rhee.[1]

---

[1] the custom of those times The right of primogeniture was the feudal rule of inheritance by which the property and title of an intestate, excluding only the widow's dower or jointure, passed to the eldest son. The remaining children were granted an annual sum of money for a term of years, for life, or in perpetuity.

[2] wars in Ireland During the reign of Elizabeth I, English troops were intermittently deployed to quell uprisings against England's colonial rule; Low Countries Beginning in the 1580s, English soldiers assisted the Dutch in their revolt against Spanish rule.

[3] Earl of Essex…to Cadiz During England's war with Spain, Robert Devereux (1576–1601), second Earl of Essex, led an expedition against Cadiz in June 1596; victualler one who supplies an army or armed force with necessary provisions (OED victualler 2a).

[4] received a knighthood…to the crown In her Diary (Knole Diary), Anne Clifford described King James's propensity to bestow knighthoods immediately after he ascended the throne in 1603: "Likewise he created many barons among which my Uncle Russell was made Lord Russell of Thorney, and for knights, they were innumerable."

[5] Sir George Carew…Earl of Totness George, first and only Lord Carew of Clopton. He was appointed President of Munster in February 1600.

---

[1] Geneva discipline Presbyterianism, contrasted with the "superstitious" (that is, Catholicizing) Church of England.

He died in the month of May, 1630, sadly bewailed by not only all his dependants and relations, but by all that were acquainted with him; for he never conversed with any to whom he was not at some time or in some way beneficial; and his nature was so delighted in doing good, that it won him the love of all men, even his enemies, whose envy and malice it was his custom to overcome with obligations. He had great natural parts, but was too active in his youth to stay the heightening of them by study of dead writings; but in the living books of men's conversations he soon became so skilful that he was never mistaken, but where his own good would not let him give credit to the evil he discerned in others. He was a most indulgent husband, and no less kind to his children; a most noble master, who thought it not enough to maintain his servants honourably while they were with him, but, for all that deserved it, provided offices or settlements, as for children. He was a father to all his prisoners, sweetening with such compassionate kindness their restraint, that the affliction of a prison was not felt in his days. He had a singular kindness for all persons that were eminent either in learning or arms, and when, through the ingratitude and vice of that age, many of the wives and children of Queen Elizabeth's glorious captains were reduced to poverty, his purse was their common treasury, and they knew not the inconvenience of decayed fortunes till he was dead: many of those valiant seamen he maintained in prison, many he redeemed out of prison, and cherished with an extraordinary bounty. If among his excellencies one outshined the rest, it was the generous liberality of his mind, wherein goodness and greatness were so equally distributed that they mutually embellished each other. Pride and covetousness had not the least place in his breast. As he was in love with true honour, so he contemned vain titles; and though in his youth he accepted an addition to his birth, in his riper years he refused a baronetcy, which the king offered him. He was severe in the regulating of his family, especially would not endure the least immodest behaviour or dress in any woman under his roof. There was nothing he hated more than an insignificant gallant, that could only make his legs and prune himself, and court a lady, but had not brains to employ himself in things more suitable to man's nobler sex.[2] Fidelity in his trust, love and loyalty to his prince, were not the least of his virtues, but those wherein he was not excelled by any of his own or succeeding times. The large estate he reaped by his happy industry, he did many times over as freely resign again to the king's service, till he left the greatest part of it at his death in the king's hands. All his virtues wanted not the crown of all virtue, piety and true devotion to God. As his life was a continued exercise of faith and charity, it concluded with prayers and blessings, which were the only consolations his desolate family could receive in his death. Never did any two better agree in magnanimity and bounty than he and my mother, who seemed to be actuated by the same soul, so little did she grudge any of his liberalities to strangers, or he contradict any of her kindness to all her relations;[1] her house being a common home to all of them, and a nursery to their children. He gave her a noble allowance of £300 a year for her own private expense, and had given her all her own portion to dispose of how she pleased, as soon as she was married; which she suffered to increase in her friend's hands; and what my father allowed her she spent not in vanities, although she had what was rich and requisite upon occasions, but she laid most of it out in pious and charitable uses. Sir Walter Raleigh and Mr. Ruthin being prisoners in the Tower, and addicting themselves to chemistry, she suffered them to make their rare experiments at her cost, partly to comfort and divert the poor prisoners, and partly to gain the knowledge of their experiments, and the medicines to help such poor people as were not able to seek physicians.[2] By these means she acquired a great deal of skill, which was very profitable to many all her life. She was not only to these, but to all the other prisoners that came into the Tower, as a mother. All the time she dwelt in the Tower, if any were sick she made them broths and restoratives with her own hands, visited and took care of them, and provided them all necessaries; if any were afflicted she comforted them, so that they felt not the inconvenience of a prison who were in that place. She was not less bountiful to many poor widows and orphans, whom officers of higher and lower rank had left behind them as objects of charity. Her own house was filled with distressed families of her relations, whom she supplied and maintained in a noble way. The worship and service of God, both in her soul and her house, and the education of her children, were her principal care. She was a constant frequenter of week-day lectures, and a great lover and encourager of good ministers, and most diligent in her private reading and devotions.[3]

---

[1] Isle of Rhee In the Memoirs, Hutchinson writes of the ill-fated expedition to the Isle of Rhé to assist the Huguenots: "The protestants abroad were all looked upon as puritans, and their interests, instead of being protected sadly betrayed; ships were let out to the French king to serve against them; and all the flower of the English gentry were lost in an ill-managed expedition to the Isle of Rhee, under pretence of helping them, but so ordered that it proved the loss of Rochelle, the strong fort and best defence of all the protestants in France."

[2] make his legs bow: "an obeisance made by drawing back one leg and bending the other" (OED leg v 2; leg sb 4); prune himself to trim, dress up with minute nicety (OED prune v^1 B.2)

When my father was sick she was not satisfied with the attendance of all that were about him, but made herself his nurse, and cook, and physician, and, through the blessing of God, and her indefatigable labours and watching, preserved him a great while longer than the physicians thought it possible for his nature to hold out. At length, when the Lord took him to rest, she showed as much humility and patience, under that great change, as moderation and bounty in her more plentiful and prosperous condition, and died in my house at Owthorpe, in the county of Nottingham, in the year 1659. The privilege of being born of, and educated by, such excellent parents, I have often revolved with great thankfulness for the mercy, and humiliation that I did no more improve it.[4] After my mother had had three sons, she was very desirous of a daughter, and when the women at my birth told her I was one, she received me with a great deal of joy; and the nurses fancying, because I had more complexion and favour than is usual in so young children, that I should not live, my mother became fonder of me, and more endeavoured to nurse me. As soon as I was weaned a French woman was taken to be my dry-nurse, and I was taught to speak French and English together.[1] My mother, while she was with child of me, dreamed that she was walking in the garden with my father, and that a star came down into her hand, with other circumstances, which, though I have often heard, I minded not enough to remember perfectly; only my father told her, her dream signified she should have a daughter of some extraordinary eminency; which thing, like such vain prophecies, wrought as far as it could its own accomplishment: for my father and mother fancying me then beautiful, and more than ordinarily apprehensive, applied all their cares, and spared no cost to improve me in my education, which procured me the admiration of those that flattered my parents.[2] By the time I was four years old I read English perfectly, and having a great memory, I was carried to sermons; and while I was very young could remember and repeat them exactly, and being caressed, the love of praise tickled me, and made me attend more heedfully. When I was about seven years of age, I remember I had at one time eight tutors in several qualities, languages, music, dancing, writing, and needlework; but my genius was quite averse from all but my book, and that I was so eager of, that my mother thinking it prejudiced my health, would moderate me in it; yet this rather animated me than kept me back, and every moment I could steal from my play I would employ in any book I could find, when my own were locked up from me. After dinner and supper I still had an hour allowed me to play, and then I would steal into some hole or other to read. My father would have me learn Latin, and I was so apt that I outstripped my brothers who were at school, although my father's chaplain, that was my tutor, was a pitiful dull fellow. My brothers, who had a great deal of wit, had some emulation at the progress I made in my learning, which very well pleased my father; though my mother would have been contented if I had not so wholly addicted myself to that as to neglect my other qualities. As for music and dancing, I profited very little in them, and would never practise my lute or harpsichords but when my masters were with me; and for my needle I absolutely hated it. Play among other children I despised, and when I was forced to entertain such as came to visit me, I tired them with more grave instructions than their mothers, and plucked all their babies to pieces, and kept the children in such awe, that they were glad when I entertained myself with elder company; to whom I was very acceptable, and living in the house with many persons that had a great deal of wit, and very profitable serious discourses being frequent at my father's table and in my mother's drawing-room, I was very attentive to all, and gathered up things that I would utter again, to great admiration of many that took my memory and imitation for wit. It pleased God that, through the good instructions of my mother, and the sermons she carried me to, I was convinced that the knowledge of God was the most excellent study, and accordingly applied myself to it, and to practise as I was taught. I used to exhort my mother's maids much, and to turn their idle discourses to good subjects; but I thought, when I had done this on the Lord's day, and every day performed my due tasks of reading and praying, that then I was free to anything that was not sin; for I was not at that time convinced of the vanity of conversation which was not scandalously wicked. I thought it no sin to learn or hear witty songs and amorous sonnets or poems,

---

[1] actuated rendered actual or active (OED actuated ppl.a).

[2] Sir Walter Raleigh After his secret marriage to Elizabeth Throckmorton, Sir Walter Raleigh (ca. 1552–1618) was imprisoned in the Tower in 1592, condemned to death and then reprieved. He was imprisoned in 1603 for allegedly conspiring to assassinate James I and crown Arabella Stuart. He was freed in 1616 to undertake an expedition to Guiana in search of gold, during the course of which a Spanish settlement was burnt. On the failure of the expedition and at the insistence of the Spanish ambassador, Raleigh was arrested, and executed on October 29, 1618.

[3] lectures sermons.

[4] revolved meditated upon (OED revolve v II.10).

---

[1] dry-nurse a woman who takes care and attends a child but does not suckle it (OED dry-nurse sb 1).

[2] my education Compare the education of Lucy Hutchinson described here to that prescribed in An Essay to Revive the Ancient Education of Gentlewomen (1673).

and twenty things of that kind, wherein I was so apt that I became the confidant in all the loves that were managed among my mother's young women; and there was none of them but had many lovers, and some particular friends beloved above the rest. Among these I have....[1] Five years after me my mother had a daughter that she nursed at her own breast, and was infinitely fond of above all the rest; and I being of too serious a temper was not so pleasing to my...[2]
—1806

Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson
(excerpts)

The court of this king was a nursery of lust and intemperance;[3] he had brought in with him a company of poor Scots, who, coming into this plentiful kingdom, were surfeited with riot and debaucheries, and got all the riches of the land only to cast away. The honour, wealth, and glory of the nation, wherein Queen Elizabeth left it, were soon prodigally wasted by this thriftless heir; and the nobility of the land was utterly debased by setting honours to public sale, and conferring them on persons that had neither blood nor merit fit to wear, nor estates to bear up their titles, but were fain to invent projects to pill the people, and pick their purses for the maintenance of vice and lewdness.[4] The generality of the gentry of the land soon learned the court fashion, and every great house in the country became a sty of uncleanness. To keep the people in their deplorable security, till vengeance overtook them, they were entertained with masks, stage plays, and various sorts of ruder sports. Then began murder, incest, adultery, drunkenness, swearing, fornication, and all sort of ribaldry, to be no concealed but countenanced vices, because they held such conformity with the court example. Next to this, a great cause of these abominations was the mixed marriages of papist and protestant families, which, no question, was a design of the popish party to compass and procure; and so successful, that I have observed that there was not one house in ten, where such a marriage was made, but the better party was corrupted, the children's souls were sacrificed to devils, the worship of God was laid aside in that family, for fear of distasting the idolater; the kindred, tenants, and neighbours, either quite turned from it, or cooled in their zeal for religion. As the fire is most fervent in a frosty season, so the general apostacy from holiness, if I may so call it, and defection to lewdness, stirred up sorrow, indignation, and fear, in all that retained any love of God in the land, whether ministers or people; the ministers warned the people of the approaching judgments of God, which could not be expected but to follow such high provocations; God in his mercy sent his prophets into all corners of the land, to preach repentance, and cry out against the ingratitude of England, who thus requited so many rich mercies that no nation could ever boast of more;[5] and by these a few were everywhere converted and established in faith and holiness; but at court they were hated, disgraced, and reviled, and in scorn had the name of Puritan fixed upon them. And now the ready way to preferment there was to declare an opposition to the power of godliness, under that name; so that their pulpits might justly be called the scorner's chair, those sermons only pleasing that flattered them in their vices, and told the poor king that he was Solomon, and that his sloth and cowardice, by which he betrayed the cause of God and honour of the nation, was gospel meekness and peaceableness; for which they raised him up above the heavens, while he lay wallowing like a swine in the mire of his lust.[1] He had a little learning, and this they called the spirit of wisdom, and so magnified him, so falsely flattered him, that he could not endure the words of truth and soundness, but rewarded these base, wicked, unfaithful fawners with rich preferments, attended with pomps and titles, which heaped them up above a human height. With their pride, their envy swelled against the people of God, whom they began to project how they might root out of the land; and when they had once given them a name, whatever was odious or dreadful to the king, they fixed upon the puritan, who, according to their character, was nothing but a factious hypocrite.

---

[1] Many pages have been torn out, apparently by Hutchinson herself.

[2] Hutchinson's narrative ends here rather abruptly.

[3] this king James I (1566–1625), who reigned from 1603–1625.

[4] pill plunder, pillage (OED pill v^1 I.1a).

[5] God in his mercy...of the land Hutchinson echoes the apocalyptic rhetoric of Ezekiel: "Also, thou son of man, thus saith the Lord GOD unto the land of Israel; An end, the end is come upon the four corners of the land" (7:2).

The king had upon his heart the dealings both of England and Scotland with his mother, and harboured a secret desire of revenge upon the godly in both nations, yet had not courage enough to assert his resentment like a prince, but employed a wicked cunning he was master of, and called kingcraft, to undermine what he durst not openly oppose,—the true religion;[2] this was fenced with the liberty of the people, and so linked together, that it was impossible to make them slaves, till they were brought to be idolaters of royalty and glorious lust;[3] and as impossible to make them adore these gods, while they continued loyal to the government of Jesus Christ. The payment of civil obedience to the king and the laws of the land satisfied not; if any durst dispute his impositions in the worship of God, he was presently reckoned among the seditious and disturbers of the public peace, and accordingly persecuted; if any were grieved at the dishonour of the kingdom, or the griping of the poor, or the unjust oppressions of the subject, by a thousand ways, invented to maintain the riots of the courtiers, and the swarms of needy Scots the king had brought in to devour like locusts the plenty of this land, he was a puritan; if any, out of mere morality and civil honesty, discountenanced the abominations of those days, he was a puritan, however he conformed to their superstitious worship; if any showed favour to any godly honest persons, kept them company, relieved them in want, or protected them against violent or unjust oppression, he was a puritan; if any gentleman in his country maintained the good laws of the land, or stood up for any public interest, for good order or government, he was a puritan: in short, all that crossed the views of the needy courtiers, the proud encroaching priests, the thievish projectors, the lewd nobility and gentry—whoever was zealous for God's glory or worship, could not endure blasphemous oaths, ribald conversation, profane scoffs, sabbath breaking, derision of the word of God, and the like—whoever could endure a sermon, modest habit or conversation, or anything good,—all these were puritans;[4] and if puritans, then enemies to the king and his government, seditious, factious, hypocrites, ambitious disturbers of the public peace, and finally, the pest of the kingdom. Such false logic did the children of darkness use to argue with against the hated children of light, whom they branded besides as an illiterate, morose, melancholy, discontented, crazed sort of men, not fit for human conversation; as such they made them not only the sport of the pulpit, which was become but a more solemn sort of stage, but every stage, and every table, and every puppet-play, belched forth profane scoffs upon them, the drunkards made them their songs, and all fiddlers and mimics learned to abuse them, as finding it the most gameful way of fooling.[1] Thus the two factions in those days grew up to great heights and enmities one against the other; while the papist wanted not industry and subtlety to blow the coals between them, and was so successful that, unless the mercy of God confound them by their own imaginations, we may justly fear they will at last obtain their full wish.

---

[1] while he lay…his lust "For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness.… But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire" (II Peter 2:18,22); there is much in II Peter 2 that is relevant to Hutchinson's description of James I.

[2] his mother Mary Queen of Scots (1542–1587), who was imprisoned by the Scots for complicity in the murder of her husband, Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley. She was later imprisoned for more than twenty years by the English, who eventually convicted her of treason and executed her.

[3] fenced…people fortified by association with the idea of popular liberty (OED fence v 6).

[4] projectors schemers (OED projector 1b).

. . . .

The face of the court was much changed in the change of the king, for King Charles was temperate, chaste, and serious; so that the fools and bawds, mimics and catamites,[2] of the former court, grew out of fashion; and the nobility and courtiers, who did not quite abandon their debaucheries, yet so reverenced the king as to retire into corners to practise them. Men of learning and ingenuity in all arts were in esteem, and received encouragement from the king, who was a most excellent judge and great lover of paintings, carvings, gravings, and many other ingenuities, less offensive than the bawdry and profane abusive wit which was the only exercise of the other court.[3] But, as in the primitive times, it is observed that the best emperors were some of them stirred up by Satan to be the bitterest persecutors of the church, so this king was a worse encroacher upon the civil and spiritual liberties of his people by far than his father. He married a papist, a French lady, of a haughty spirit, and a great wit and beauty, to whom he became a most uxorious husband.[4] By this means the court was replenished with papists, and many who hoped to advance themselves by the change, turned to that religion. All the papists in the kingdom were favoured, and, by the king's example, matched into the best families; the puritans were more than ever discountenanced and persecuted, insomuch that many of them chose to abandon their native country, and leave their dearest relations, to retire into any foreign soil or plantation, where they might, amidst all outward inconveniences, enjoy the free exercise of God's worship. Such as could not flee were tormented in the bishops' court, fined, whipped, pilloried, imprisoned, and suffered to enjoy no rest, so that death was better than life to them; and notwithstanding their patient sufferance of all these things, yet was not the king satisfied till the whole land was reduced to perfect slavery. The example of the French king was propounded to him, and he thought himself no monarch so long as his will was confined to the bounds of any law; but knowing that the people of England were not pliable to an arbitrary rule, he plotted to subdue them to his yoke by a foreign force, and till he could effect it, made no conscience of granting anything to the people, which he resolved should not oblige him longer than it served his turn; for he was a prince that had nothing of faith or truth, justice or generosity, in him. He was the most obstinate person in his self-will that ever was, and so bent upon being an absolute, uncontrollable sovereign, that he was resolved either to be such a king or none. His firm adherence to prelacy was not for conscience of one religion more than another, for it was his principle that an honest man might be saved in any profession;[5] but he had a mistaken principle that kingly government in the state could not stand without episcopal government in the church; and, therefore, as the bishops flattered him with preaching up his sovereign prerogative, and inveighing against the puritans as factious and disloyal, so he protected them in their pomp and pride, and insolent practices against all the godly and sober people of the land.

---

[1] every stage See, for example, Ben Jonson's characters Zeal-of-the-Land Busy and Tribulation Wholesome in Bartholomew Fair and The Alchemist respectively.

[2] catamites boys "kept for unnatural purposes" (OED catamite).

[3] bawdry lewd, obscene (OED bawdry 3).

[4] uxorious dotingly or submissively fond (OED uxorious a 1a).

[5] prelacy the system of church government by prelates or bishops of lordly rank (OED prelacy 4).

. . . .

But there were two above all the rest, who led the van of the king's evil counsellors, and these were Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, a fellow of mean extraction and arrogant pride, and the Earl of Strafford, who as much outstripped all the rest in favour as he did in abilities, being a man of deep policy, stern resolution, and ambitious zeal to keep up the glory of his own greatness.[1] In the beginning of this king's reign, this man had been a strong asserter of the liberties of the people, among whom he had gained himself an honourable reputation, and was dreadful to the court party; who thereupon strewed snares in his way, and when they found a breach at his ambition, his soul was that way entered and captivated. He was advanced first to be lord president of the council in the north, to be a baron, afterwards an earl, and then deputy of Ireland; he was the nearest to a favourite of any man since the death of the Duke of Buckingham, who was raised by his first master, and kept up by the second, upon no account of personal worth or any deserving abilities in him, but only from the violent and private inclinations of the princes.[2] But the Earl of Strafford wanted not any accomplishment that could be desired in the most serviceable minister of state: besides, he having made himself odious to the people by his revolt from their interest to that of the oppressive court, he was now obliged to keep up his own interest with his new party, by all the malicious practices that pride and revenge could inspire him with. But above all these the king had another instigator of his own violent purpose, more powerful than all the rest, and that was the queen, who, grown out of her childhood, began to turn her mind from those vain extravagancies she lived in at first, to that which did less become her, and was more fatal to the kingdom; which is never in any place happy where the hands which were made only for distaffs affect the management of sceptres.[3]—If any one object the fresh example of Queen Elizabeth, let them remember that the felicity of her reign was the effect of her submission to her masculine and wise counsellors; but wherever male princes are so effeminate as to suffer women of foreign birth and different religions to intermeddle with the affairs of state, it is always found to produce sad desolations; and it hath been observed that a French queen never brought any happiness to England. Some kind of fatality, too, the English imagined to be in her name of Marie, which, it is said, the king rather chose to have her called by than her other, Henrietta, because the land should find a blessing in that name, which had been more unfortunate;[4] but it was not in his power, though a great prince, to control destiny. This lady being by her priests affected with the meritoriousness of advancing her own religion, whose principle it is to subvert all other, applied that way her great wit and parts, and the power her haughty spirit kept over her husband, who was enslaved in his affection only to her, though she had no more passion for him than what served to promote her designs. Those brought her into a very good correspondence with the archbishop and his prelatical crew, both joining in the cruel design of rooting the godly out of the land. The foolish protestants were meditating reconciliations with the church of Rome, who embraced them as far as they would go, carrying them in hand, as if there had been a possibility of bringing such a thing to pass; meanwhile they carried on their design by them, and had so ripened it, that nothing but the mercy of God prevented the utter subversion of protestantism in the three kingdoms.—But how much soever their designs were framed in the dark, God revealed them to his servants, and most miraculously ordered providences for their preservation.

---

[1] there were two...own greatness William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury (1572–1645), and Sir Thomas Wentworth, first Earl of Strafford (1593–1641). Puritans adamantly opposed the Arminian theology and "Anglican" ecclesiology of Laud, the son of a Reading clothier. He was imprisoned in 1641 and executed in 1645. Strafford, Lord President of the Council of the North and Deputy of Ireland, was the chief advisor of Charles I from 1639 onwards. In 1640, he was impeached by the Commons and imprisoned in the Tower of London, and in 1641 was executed for treason; deep grave (OED deep a II.7a).

[2] Duke of Buckingham George Villiers, first Duke of Buckingham (1592–1628), was a favorite of both James I and Charles I. See the selection of poems on the Duke of Buckingham.

[3] distaffs the staff of a hand spinning-wheel; used symbolically for female authority (OED distaff 2,3b).

[4] her name of Marie...unfortunate probably a reference to the execution of Mary Queen of Scots, though possibly an allusion to Mary Tudor (1516–1558), the Catholic queen dubbed "Bloody Mary" by Protestants.

. . . .

[Jan. 1644]

...The enemy being entered, possessed themselves of St. Peter's church and certain houses near the castle, from whence they shot into the castle-yard and wounded one man and killed another, which was all the hurt that was done our men that day.[1]

The governor was very angry with the horse for coming up so suddenly, and stirred them up to such a generous shame, that they dismounted, and all took muskets to serve as foot, with which they did such very good service, that they exceedingly well regained their reputations.[2] Having taken foot arms, the governor sent one of his own companies with part of them, and they beat the cavaliers out of the nearest lanes and houses, which they had possessed, and so made a safe way for the rest to sally out and retreat, as there should be occasion.

When this was done, which was about noon, the governor sent out all the rest of the horse and foot, to beat the enemy out of the town. Sir Charles Lucas, who was the chief commander of all the forces there, had prepared a letter to send up to the governor to demand of him the castle; or if he would not deliver it, that then he should send down the mayor and aldermen, threatening, that if they came not immediately, he would sack and burn the town.[3] There were, at that time, above a thousand cavaliers in the town, and as many in a body without the town, to have beaten off the Derby and Leicester forces, if they should have made any attempt to come in, to the assistance of their friends in Nottingham. On the other side of the Trent were all the forces Mr. Hastings could bring out from his own garrison and Belvoir and Wiverton to force the bridges. All the cavalier forces that were about the town, were about three thousand. When Sir Charles Lucas had written his letter, he could find none that would undertake to carry it to the castle, whereupon they took the mayor's wife, and with threats, compelled her to undertake it; but just as she went out of the house from them, she heard an outcry, that "the roundheads were sallying forth," whereupon she flung down their letter and ran away; and they ran as fast, from four hundred soldiers, who came furiously upon them out of the castle, and surprised them;[4] while they were secure the castle would not have made so bold an attempt. But the governor's men chased them from street to street, till they had cleared the town of them, who ran away confusedly: the first that went out shot their pistols into the thatched houses to have fired them, but by the mercy of God neither that, nor other endeavours they showed to have fired the town, as they were commanded, took effect. Between thirty and forty of them were killed in the streets, fourscore were taken prisoners, and abundance of arms were gathered up, which the men flung away in haste, as they ran; but they put some fire into a hay barn and hay mows, and all other combustible things they could discern in their haste, but by God's mercy, the town, notwithstanding, was preserved from burning. While their foot marched away, their horse faced the town in a valley where their reserve stood, till towards evening, and then they all drew off. Many of them died on their return, and were found dead in the woods and in the towns they passed through. Many of them, discouraged by this service, ran away, and many of their horses were quite spoiled: for two miles they left a great track of blood, which froze as it fell upon the snow, for it was such bitter weather that the foot had waded almost to the middle in snow as they came, and were so numbed with cold when they came into the town, that they were fain to be rubbed to get life into them, and in that condition were more eager for fires and warm meat than for plunder; which, together with their feeling of security, saved many men's goods; as they did not believe that an enemy, who had unhandsomely, to speak truth, suffered them to enter the town without any dispute, would have dared, at such great odds, to have set upon driving them out. Indeed, no one can believe, but those that saw that day, what a strange ebb and flow of courage and cowardice there was in both parties on that day. The cavaliers marched in with such terror to the garrison, and such gallantry, that they startled not when one of their leading files fell before them all at once, but marched boldly over the dead bodies of their friends, under their enemies' cannon, and carried such valiant dreadfulness about them, as made very courageous stout men recoil. Our horse, who ran away frighted at the sight of their foes, when they had breastworks before them, and the advantage of freshness to beat back assailants already vanquished with the sharpness of the cold and a killing march, within three or four hours, as men that thought nothing too great for them, returned fiercely upon the same men, after their refreshment, when they were entered into defensible houses. If it were a romance, one should say, after the success, that the heroes did it out of excess of gallantry, that they might the better signalise their valour upon a foe who was not vanquished to their hands by the inclemency of the season: but we are relating wonders of Providence, and must record this as one not to be conceived of, but by those who saw and shared in it. It was indeed a great instruction, that the best and highest courages are but the beams of the Almighty; and when He withholds His influence, the brave turn cowards, fear unnerves the most mighty, makes the most generous base, and great men to do those things they blush to think on; when God again inspires, the fearful and the feeble see no dangers, believe no difficulties, and carry on attempts whose very thoughts would, at another time, shiver their joints like agues. The events of this day humbled the pride of many of our stout men, and made them afterwards more carefully seek God, as well to inspire as prosper their valour; and the governor's handsome reproaches of their faults, with showing them the way to repair them, retrieved their strag-

---

[1] The enemy Royalist forces (Cavaliers); the castle Nottingham Castle.

[2] governor Colonel Hutchinson was appointed governor of Nottingham Castle and the town by order of Parliament November 20, 1643.

[3] Charles Lucas the brother of Margaret Lucas, afterwards Margaret Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle. William Cavendish, then Marquis of Newcastle, had secured the north of England for the King at the inception of the first civil war (1642–46).

[4] roundheads Elsewhere in the Memoirs Hutchinson explains the genesis of the label "roundheads": "This name of roundhead coming so importunely in, I shall make a little digression to tell you how it came up. When puritanism grew into a faction, the zealots distinguished themselves, both men and women, by several affectations of habit, look and words....Among other affected habits, few of the puritans, what degree soever they were of, wore their hair long enough to cover their ears, and the ministers and many others cut it close round their heads, with so many little peaks, as was something ridiculous to behold.…From this custom of wearing their hair, that name of roundhead became the scornful term given to the whole parliament party, whose army indeed marched out as if they had been only sent out till their hair was grown.…It was very ill applied to Mr. Hutchinson, who, having naturally a very fine thickset head of hair, kept it clean and handsome, so that it was a great ornament to him."

---

gling spirits, and animated them to very wonderful and commendable actions.

. . . .

[January, 1649]

In January 1649, the court sat, the king was brought to his trial, and a charge drawn up against him for levying war against the parliament and people of England, for betraying the public trust reposed in him, and for being an implacable enemy to the commonwealth. But the king refused to plead, disowning the authority of the court, and after three several days persisting in contempt thereof, he was sentenced to suffer death. One thing was remarked in him by many of the court, that when the blood spilt in many of the battles where he was in his own person, and had caused it to be shed by his own command, was laid to his charge, he heard it with disdainful smiles, and looks and gestures which rather expressed sorrow that all the opposite party to him were not cut off, than that any were: and he stuck not to declare in words, that no man's blood spilt in this quarrel troubled him except one, meaning the Earl of Strafford. The gentlemen that were appointed his judges, and divers others, saw in him a disposition so bent on the ruin of all that opposed him, and of all the righteous and just things they had contended for, that it was upon the consciences of many of them, that if they did not execute justice upon him, God would require at their hands all of the blood and desolation which should ensue by their suffering him to escape, when God had brought him into their hands. Although the malice of the malignant party and their apostate brethren seemed to threaten them, yet they thought they ought to cast themselves upon God, while they acted with a good conscience for him and for their country. Some of them afterwards, for excuse, belied themselves, and said they were under the awe of the army, and overpersuaded by Cromwell, and the like;[1] but it is certain that all men herein were left to their free liberty of acting, neither persuaded nor compelled; and as there were some nominated in the commission who never sat, and others who sat at first, but durst not hold on, so all the rest might have declined it if they would, when it is apparent they would have suffered nothing by so doing. For those who then declined were afterwards, when they offered themselves, received in again, and had places of more trust and benefit than those who ran the utmost hazard; which they deserved not, for I know upon certain knowledge that many, yea the most of them, retreated, not for conscience, but from fear and worldly prudence, foreseeing that the insolency of the army might grow to that height as to ruin the cause, and reduce the kingdom into the hands of the enemy; and then those who had been most courageous in their country's cause would be given up as victims. These poor men did privately animate those who appeared most publicly, and I know several of them in whom I lived to see that saying of Christ fulfilled, "He that will save his life shall lose it, and he that for my sake will lose his life shall save it";[2] when afterwards it fell out that all their prudent declensions saved not the lives of some nor the estates of others. As for Mr. Hutchinson, although he was very much confirmed in his judgment concerning the cause, yet herein being called to an extraordinary action, whereof many were of several minds, he addressed himself to God by prayer; desiring the Lord that, if through any human frailty he were led into any error or false opinion in these great transactions, he would open his eyes, and not suffer him to proceed, but that he would confirm his spirit in the truth, and lead him by a right enlightened conscience; and finding no check, but a confirmation in his conscience that it was his duty to act as he did, he, upon serious debate, both privately and in his addresses to God, and in conferences with conscientious, upright, unbiased persons, proceeded to sign the sentence against the king. Although he did not then believe but that it might one day come to be again disputed among men, yet both he and others thought they could not refuse it without giving up the people of God, whom they had led forth and engaged themselves unto by the oath of God, into the hands of God's and their own enemies; and therefore he cast himself upon God's protection, acting according to the dictates of a conscience which he had sought the Lord to guide, and accordingly the Lord did signalize his favour afterwards to him.

---

[1] Cromwell Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector (1599–1658).

[2] He that…save it Matthew 16:25.

After the death of the king it was debated and resolved to change the form of government from a monarchy into a commonwealth, and the house of lords was voted dangerous and useless thereunto, and dissolved. A council of state was to be annually chosen for the management of affairs, accountable to the parliament, out of which, consisting of forty councillors and a president, twenty were every year to go off by lot, and twenty new ones to be supplied. It is true, that at that time almost every man was fancying a form of government, and angry, when this came forth, that his invention took not place; and among these John Lilburne, a turbulent-spirited man, who ever was quiet in anything, published libels;[1] and the Levellers made a disturbance with a kind of insurrection, which Cromwell soon appeased, they indeed being betrayed by their own leaders.

But how the public business went on...I shall leave to the stories that were then written; and only in general say that the hand of God was mightily seen in prospering and preserving the parliament till Cromwell's ambition unhappily interrupted them.

. . . . . .

[April, 1660]

The colonel and Mr. Stanhope went up to the parliament, which began on the 25th day of April, 1660; to whom the king sending a declaration from Breda, which promised, or at least intimated, liberty of conscience, remission of all offences, enjoyment of liberties and estates;[2] they voted to send commissioners to invite him. And almost all the gentry of all parties went, some to fetch him over, some to meet him at the sea side, some to fetch him into London, into which he entered on the 29th day of May, with a universal joy and triumph, even to his own amazement; who, when he saw all the nobility and gentry of the land flowing in to him, asked where were his enemies. For he saw nothing but prostrates, expressing all the love that could make a prince happy. Indeed it was a wonder in that day to see the mutability of some, and the hypocrisy of others, and the servile flattery of all. Monk, like his better genius, conducted him, and was adored like one that had brought all the glory and felicity of mankind home with this prince.[3]

The officers of the army had made themselves as fine as the courtiers, and all hoped in this change to change their condition, and disowned all things they before had advised. Every ballad singer sang up and down the streets ribald rhymes, made in reproach of the late commonwealth, and of all those worthies that therein endeavoured the people's freedom and happiness.

The presbyterians were now the white boys,[4] and according to their nature fell a thirsting, and then hunting after blood, urging that God's blessing could not be upon the land, till justice had cleansed it from the late king's blood. First that fact was disowned, then all the acts made after it rendered void, then an inquisition made after those that were guilty thereof, but only seven were nominated of those that sat in judgement on that prince, for exemplary justice, and a proclamation sent for the rest to come in, upon penalty of losing their estates.

---

[1] John Lilburne Lilburne (1615–1657), political radical and leader of the Leveller movement; their Agreement of the People offered a kind of constitutional blueprint.

[2] the king Charles II; declaration from Breda a conciliatory Declaration issued by Charles II at Breda in April 1660, which ushered in the Restoration; it is included in this anthology.

[3] Monk George Monck, first Duke of Albemarle (1608–1670). Before he was captured by Fairfax in 1644, Monck fought for Charles I. He later became a trusted friend of Cromwell. In 1659, Monck resolved to restore Charles II to the throne and was created Baron Monck, Earl of Torrington, and Duke of Albemarle.

[4] white boys favorites.

While these things were debating in the house, at the first, divers persons concerned in that business sat there, and when the business came into question, every one of them spoke of it according to their present sense. But Mr. Lenthall, son to the late Speaker of that parliament, when the presbyterians first called that business into question, though not at all concerned in it himself, stood up and made such a handsome and honourable speech in defence of them all, as deserves eternal honour.[1] But the presbyterians called him to the bar for it, where, though he mitigated some expressions, which might be ill taken of the house, yet he spoke so generously, that it will never be forgotten of him. Herein he behaved himself with so much courage and honour as was not matched at that time in England, for which he was looked on with an evil eye, and, upon a pretence of treason, put in prison; from whence his father's money, and the lieutenant of the tower's jealousy, delivered him. When it came to Ingoldsby's turn, he, with many tears, professed his repentance for that murder, and told a false tale, how Cromwell held his hand, and forced him to subscribe the sentence, and made a most whining recantation, after which he retired;[2] and another had almost ended, when Colonel Hutchinson, who was not there at the beginning, came in, and was told what they were about, and that it would be expected he should say something. He was surprised with a thing he expected not, yet neither then, nor in any like occasion, did he ever fail himself, but told them, "That for his actings in those days, if he had erred, it was the inexperience of his age, and the defect of his judgement, and not the malice of his heart, which had ever prompted him to pursue the general advantage of his country more than his own; and if the sacrifice of him might conduce to the public peace and settlement, he should freely submit his life and fortunes to their disposal; that the vain expense of his age, and the great debts his public employments had run him into, as they were testimonies that neither avarice nor any other interest had carried him on, so they yielded him just cause to repent that he ever forsook his own blessed quiet, to embark in such a troubled sea, where he had made shipwreck of all things but a good conscience; and as to that particular action of the king, he desired them to believe he had that sense of it that befitted an Englishman, a Christian, and a gentleman." What he expressed was to this effect, but so very handsomely delivered, that it took generally the whole house; only one gentleman stood up and said, he had expressed himself as one that was much more sorry for the events and consequences than the actions; but another replied, that when a man's words might admit of two interpretations, it befitted gentlemen always to receive that which might be most favourable. As soon as the colonel had spoken, he retired into a room where Ingoldsby was with his eyes yet red, who had called up a little spite to succeed his whinings, and embracing Colonel Hutchinson, "O colonel," said he, "did I ever imagine we could be brought to this?

---

[1] Mr. Lenthall Sir John Lenthall (1625–1681), son of William Lenthall, was knighted by Cromwell in 1658, and served as a colonel in the Parliamentary army in 1659. Expelled from the House May 12, 1660, he was eventually knighted by Charles II (1677).

[2] Ingoldsby Sir Richard Ingoldsby (d. 1685) was appointed colonel of a regiment of foot in the New Model Army in 1645. He was one of the King's judges and signed his death warrant. With the fall of Richard Cromwell in 1659, he met with the agents of Charles II, whom he helped to restore to the throne. He was therefore spared the punishment of the other regicides and was created a Knight of the Bath at Charles II's coronation.

Could I have suspected it, when I brought them Lambert in the other day, this sword should have redeemed us from being dealt with as criminals, by that people for whom we had so gloriously exposed ourselves."[1] The colonel told him he had foreseen, ever since those usurpers thrust out the lawful authority of the land to enthrone themselves, it could end in nothing else; but the integrity of his heart, in all he had done, made him as cheerfully ready to suffer as to triumph in a good cause. The result of the house that day was to suspend Colonel Hutchinson and the rest from sitting in the house. Monk, after all his great professions, now sat still, and had not one word to interpose for any person, but was as forward to set vengeance on foot as any man.

Mrs. Hutchinson, whom to keep quiet, her husband had hitherto persuaded that no man would lose or suffer by this change, at this beginning was awakened, and saw that he was ambitious of being a public sacrifice, and therefore, herein only in her whole life, resolved to disobey him, and to improve all the affection he had to her for his safety, and prevailed with him to retire; for she said, she would not live to see him a prisoner. With her unquietness, she drove him out of her own lodgings into a custody of a friend, in order to his further retreat, if occasion should be, and then made it her business to solicit all her friends for his safety. Meanwhile, it was first resolved in the house, that mercy should be shown to some, and exemplary justice to others; then the number was defined, and voted it should not exceed seven; then upon the king's own solicitation, that his subjects should be put out of their fears, those seven were named, and after that a proclamation was sent for the rest to come in. Colonel Hutchinson not being of the number of those seven, was advised by all his friends to surrender himself, in order to secure his estate, and he was very earnest to do it, when Mrs. Hutchinson would by no means hear of it: but being exceedingly urged by his friends, that she would hereby obstinately lose all their estate, she would not yet consent that the colonel should give himself into custody, and she had wrought him to a strong engagement, that he would not dispose of himself without her. At length, being accused of obstinacy, in not giving him up, she devised a way to try the house, and wrote a letter in his name to the Speaker, to urge what might be in his favour, and to let him know, that by reason of some inconveniency it might be to him, he desired not to come under custody, and yet should be ready to appear at their call; and if they intended any mercy to him, he begged they would begin it in permitting him his liberty upon his parole, till they should finally determine of him. This letter she conceived would try the temper of the house; if they granted this, she had her end, for he was still free; if they denied it, she might be satisfied in keeping him from surrendering himself.

Having contrived and written this letter, before she carried it to the colonel, a friend came to her out of the house, near which her lodgings then were, and told her that if they had but any ground to begin, the house was that day in a most excellent temper towards her husband; whereupon she wrote her husband's name to the letter, and ventured to send it in, being used sometimes to write the letters he dictated, and her character not much differing from his. These gentlemen who were moved to try this opportunity, were not the friends she relied on; but God, to show that it was he, not they, sent two common friends, who had such good success that the letter was very well received; and upon that occasion all of all parties spoke so kindly and effectually for him, that he had not only what he desired, but was voted to be free without any engagement; and his punishment was only that he should be discharged from the present parliament, and from all offices, military or civil, in the state for ever; and upon his petition of thanks for this, his estate also was voted to be free from all mulcts and confiscations. Many providential circumstances concurred in this thing. That which put the house into so good a humour towards the colonel that day, was, that having taken the business of the king's trial into consideration, certain committees were found to be appointed to order the preparation of the court, the chairs and cushions, and other formalities, wherein Colonel Hutchinson had nothing to do; but when they had passed their votes for his absolute discharge and came to the sitting of the court, he was found not to have been one day away.[1] A rogue that had been one of their clerks had brought in all these informations; and above all, poor Mrs. Hacker, thinking to save her husband, had brought up the warrant for execution, with all their hands and seals.

---

[1] Lambert Major-General John Lambert (1619–1683) took up arms for the Parliament when the civil war began. In a dispute between the army and Parliament in 1647, he presented the army's grievances. As he did not take part in the trial of Charles I, he was imprisoned rather than executed when the monarchy was restored.

—1806

---

[1] but when they passed...one day away According to Nelson's Trial of Charles I, Colonel Hutchinson was absent on Friday, January 12, when a committee was appointed for ordering and managing the King's trial. However, he attended most days and signed the sentence and the warrant for execution. Colonel Hutchinson was ultimately imprisoned in Sandown Castle in Kent, where he died on September 11, 1664.

Andrew Marvell

1621 – 1678

Marvell was the son of a Yorkshire clergyman, who was appointed Lecturer in Holy Trinity Church, Hull, in 1624. He was educated at Hull Grammar School and in 1633 went up to Trinity College, Cambridge. His first published verse was in a congratulatory volume of poems in Latin and Greek on the birth of a child to Charles I and Henrietta Maria. In 1639 he became B.A. and converted briefly to Catholicism. His father, finding him in London, sent him back to Cambridge, which he left in 1641, the year of his father's death. Between 1642 and 1647 he travelled in Holland, France, Italy, and Spain. During part of the period 1650–1652 he was tutor to Lord Fairfax's daughter Mary; in 1653 he was recommended by Milton for the post of Assistant Latin Secretary to the Council of State, but was not appointed. In 1653 he became tutor to William Dutton, who was later a ward of Cromwell's; in 1656 he was in France with Dutton, and was there described as "a notable English Italo-Macchiavellian." In 1657 he was appointed Latin Secretary to the Council of State, where he received the same stipend as Milton. In 1659 he was elected Member of Parliament for Hull, a position he held for almost twenty years. In 1662–63 he was in Holland for eleven months; in July 1663 he went as secretary to the Earl of Carlisle on an embassy to Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, returning in January of 1665. Much of Marvell's writing was published anonymously or pseudonymously; a reward was offered for information as to the author or printer of his An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government, 1677. Marvell died suddenly in 1678. Aubrey wrote, "Some suspected that he was poisoned by the Jesuits, but I cannot be positive." In 1681 Miscellaneous Poems "By Andrew Marvell Esq; Late Member of the Honourable House of Commons" was published.[1]

For Marvell see also Aubrey, Brief Lives.

* * *

Flecknoe, an English Priest at Rome [2]

Obliged by frequent visits of this man,
Whom as priest, poet, and musician,
I for some branch of Melchizédek took [3]
(Though he derives himself from my Lord Brooke); [4]
I sought his lodging, which is at the sign
Of The Sad Pelican; subject divine
For poetry.[5] There, three staircases high,
Which signifies his triple property,
I found at last a chamber, as 'twas said,
But seemed a coffin set on the stairs' head
Not higher than seven, nor larger than three feet;
Only there was nor ceiling, nor a sheet, [6]
Save that the ingenious door did, as you come,
Turn in, and show to wainscot half the room.
Yet of his state no man could have complained,
There being no bed where he entertained:
And though within one cell so narrow pent,

---

[1] In preparing this selection, the following printed editions were consulted: The Poems of Andrew Marvell, ed. H.M. Margoliouth, second edition (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1952), and Andrew Marvell: The Complete Poems, ed. Elizabeth Story Donno (Harmondsworth: Penguin Classics, 1985).

[2] Richard Flecknoe (d. 1678?) was in Rome during Lent of 1645 and 1646. He was a priest, and his notoriety as a bad poet explains the title of John Dryden's Mac Flecknoe.

[3] Melchizédek as a type of one who holds multiple offices; he was both king and priest (Genesis 14:18).

[4] Lord Brooke Fulke Greville, first Lord Brooke (d. 1628), about whose work Flecknoe wrote commendatory verses.

[5] Pelican thought to feed its young with its own flesh and blood, and hence an emblem of Christ.

[6] ceiling wainscoting.

He'd stanzas for a whole apartément. [1]
Straight without further information,
In hideous verse, he, in a dismal tone,
Begins to exorcise, as if I were
Possessed; and sure the Devil brought me there.
But I, who now imagined myself brought
To my last trial, in a serious thought
Calmed the disorders of my youthful breast,
And to my martyrdom preparèd rest.
Only this frail ambition did remain,
The last distemper of the sober brain,
That there had been some present to assure
The future ages how I did endure:
And how I, silent, turned my burning ear
Towards the verse; and when that could not hear,
Held him the other; and unchangèd yet,
Asked still for more, and prayed him to repeat:
Till the tyrant, weary to persecute,
Left off, and tried t'allure me with his lute.
Now as two instruments, to the same key
Being tuned by art, if the one touchèd be
The other opposite as soon replies,
Moved by the air and hidden sympathies;
So while he with his gouty fingers crawls
Over the lute, his murm'ring belly calls,
Whose hungry guts to the same straitness twined
In echo to the trembling strings repined.
I, that perceived now what his music meant,
Asked civilly if he had eat this Lent.
He answered yes, with such and such an one.
For he has this of generous, that alone
He never feeds, save only when he tries
With gristly tongue to dart the passing flies.
I asked if he eat flesh. And he, that was
So hungry that, though ready to say Mass,
Would break his fast before, said he was sick,
And the ordinance was only politic.
Nor was I longer to invite him scant,
Happy at once to make him Protestant,
And silent. Nothing now our dinner stayed
But till he had himself a body made—
I mean till he were dressed; for else so thin
He stands, as if he only fed had been
With consecrated wafers: and the Host
Hath sure more flesh and blood than he can boast.
This basso relievo of a man, [2]
Who as a camel tall, yet easily can
The needle's eye thread without any stitch,
(His only impossible is to be rich),
Lest his too subtle body, growing rare,
Should leave his soul to wander in the air,
He therefore circumscribes himself in rimes;
And swaddled in's own papers seven times,
Wears a close jacket of poetic buff,
With which he doth his third dimension stuff.
Thus armèd underneath, he over all
Does make a primitive sottana fall; [3]
And above that yet casts an antique cloak,
Worn at the first Council of Antioch, [4]
Which by the Jews long hid, and disesteemed,
He heard of by tradition, and redeemed.
But were he not in this black habit decked,
This half-transparent man would soon reflect
Each colour that he passed by, and be seen,
As the chameleon, yellow, blue, or green.
He dressed, and ready to disfurnish now
His chamber, whose compactness did allow
No empty place for complimenting doubt,
But who came last is forced first to go out;
I meet one on the stairs who made me stand,
Stopping the passage, and did him demand.
I answered, "He is here, Sir; but you see
You cannot pass to him but thorough me."
He thought himself affronted, and replied,
"I whom the palace never has denied

---

[1] stanzas In Italian, "stanza" means both poetic stanza and room.

[2] basso relievo bas or low relief sculpture, in which the forms have shape but little depth.

[3] sottana cassock (Italian).

[4] Council of Antioch held in the year 321.

Will make the way here;" I said, "Sir, you'll do
Me a great favour, for I seek to go."
He gathering fury still made sign to draw;
But himself there closed in a scabbard saw
As narrow as his sword's; and I, that was Delightful, said, "There can no body pass
Except by penetration hither, where
Two make a crowd; nor can three persons here
Consist but in one substance." Then, to fit
Our peace, the priest said I too had some wit.
To prov't, I said, "The place doth us invite
By its own narrowness, Sir, to unite."
He asked me pardon; and to make me way
Went down, as I him followed to obey.
But the propitiatory priest had straight
Obliged us, when below, to celebrate
Together our atonement: so increased
Betwixt us two the dinner to a feast.
Let it suffice that we could eat in peace;
And that both poems did and quarrels cease
During the table; though my new-made friend
Did, as he threatened, ere 'twere long intend
To be both witty and valiant: I, loath,
Said 'twas too late, he was already both.
But now, alas, my first tormentor came,
Who satisfied with eating, but not tame,
Turns to recite; though judges most severe
After the assize's dinner mild appear,
And on full stomach do condemn but few,
Yet he more strict my sentence doth renew,
And draws out of the black box of his breast
Ten quire of paper in which he was dressed.
Yet that which was a greater cruelty
Than Nero's poem, he calls charity: [1]
And so the pelican at his door hung
Picks out the tender bosom to its young.
Of all his poems there he stands ungirt
Save only two foul copies for his shirt: [2]
Yet these he promises as soon as clean.
But how I loathed to see my neighbour glean
Those papers which he peelèd from within
Like white flakes rising from a leper's skin!
More odious than those rags which the French youth
At ordinaries after dinner show'th
When they compare their chancres and poulains. [3]
Yet he first kissed them, and after takes pains
To read; and then, because he understood
Not one word, thought and swore that they were good.
But all his praises could not now appease
The provoked author, whom it did displease
To hear his verses, by so just a curse,
That were ill made, condemned to be read, worse:
And how (impossible) he made yet more
Absurdities in them than were before.
For he his untuned voice did fall or raise
As a deaf man upon a viol plays,
Making the half points and the periods run
Confuseder than the atoms in the sun.
Thereat the poet swelled, with anger full,
And roared out, like Perillus in's own bull: [4]
"Sir, you read false." "That, any one but you, Should know the contrary." Whereat, I, now
Made mediator, in my room, said, "Why,
To say that you read false, Sir, is no lie."
Thereat the waxen youth relented straight;
But saw with sad despair that 'twas too late.
For the disdainful poet was retired
Home, his most furious satire to have fired
Against the rebel, who, at this struck dead,

---

[1] a greater cruelty / Than Nero's poem "While [Nero] was singing no one was allowed to leave the theatre even for the most urgent reasons. And so it is said that some women gave birth to children there, while many who were worn out with listening and applauding, secretly leaped from the wall, since the gates at the entrance were closed, or feigned death and were carried out as for burial" (Suetonius, Lives of the Caesars, 6.23.2).

[2] foul copies the contemporary term for an author's manuscript drafts, but here with an implication of more literal foulness.

[3] poulains sores, from venereal disease.

[4] Perillus the inventor, and first victim, of a brazen bull in which the tyrant Phalaris (ruled Sicily ca. 570–564 B.C.E.) roasted his victims.

Wept bitterly as disinherited.
Who should commend his mistress now? Or who Praise him? Both difficult indeed to do
With truth. I counselled him to go in time,
Ere the fierce poet's anger turned to rime.
He hasted; and I, finding myself free,
As one 'scaped strangely from captivity,
Have made the chance be painted; and go now
To hang it in Saint Peter's for a vow.
—1681 (MID-1640S?)

The Coronet

When for the thorns with which I long, too long, A B
With many a piercing wound, C
My Saviour's head have crowned, D
I seek with garlands to redress that wrong: B
Through every garden, every mead, E
I gather flowers (my fruits are only flowers), F
Dismantling all the fragrant towers F
That once adorned my shepherdess's head. E?
And now when I have summed up all my store, G
Thinking (so I myself deceive) H
So rich a chaplet thence to weave H
As never yet the King of Glory wore: G
Alas, I find the serpent old I
That, twining in his speckled breast, J
About the flowers disguised does fold, I
With wreaths of fame and interest. J
Ah, foolish man, that wouldst debase with them, K
And mortal glory, Heaven's diadem! K
But Thou who only couldst the serpent tame, L
Either his slippery knots at once untie, M
And disentangle all his winding snare; N
Or shatter too with him my curious frame,[1] L
And let these wither, so that he may die, O
Though set with skill and chosen out with care: P
That they, while Thou on both their spoils dost tread, Q R
May crown thy feet, that could not crown thy head. R
—1681

The Gallery

1

Clora, come view my soul, and tell
Whether I have contrived it well.
Now all its several lodgings lie
Composed into one Gallery;
And the great arras-hangings, made
Of various faces, by are laid;[2]
That, for all furniture, you'll find
Only your picture in my mind.

2

Here thou are painted in the dress
Of an inhuman murderess;
Examining upon our hearts
Thy fertile shop of cruel arts:[3]
Engines more keen than ever yet
Adorned a tyrant's cabinet;
Of which the most tormenting are
Black eyes, red lips, and curlèd hair.

3

But, on the other side, th'art drawn
Like to Aurora in the dawn;
When in the East she slumbering lies,
And stretches out her milky thighs;
While all the morning choir does sing,
And manna falls, and roses spring;

---

[1] my curious frame the "coronet" that is the poem itself, a devotional garland formed of flowers (poetic tropes) rescued from his secular love poetry (the "fragrant towers" of line 7), but which, like the secular verse, is wound up with the snake of self-interest and desire for fame; curious clever, skillful, ingenious (OED curious a 4).

[2] arras a rich tapestry fabric, in which figures and scenes are woven in colours (OED arras 1).

[3] Examining testing.

And, at thy feet, the wooing doves
Sit pérfecting their harmless loves.

4

Like an enchantress here thou show'st,
Vexing thy restless lover's ghost;
And, by a light obscure, dost rave
Over his entrails, in the cave;
Divining thence, with horrid care,
How long thou shalt continue fair;
And (when informed) them throw'st away,
To be the greedy vulture's prey.

5

But, against that, thou sit'st afloat
Like Venus in her pearly boat.
The halcyons, calming all that's nigh,
Betwixt the air and water fly;[1]
Or, if some rolling wave appears,
A mass of ambergris it bears.
Nor blows more wind than what may well
Convoy the perfume to the smell.[2]

6

These pictures and a thousand more
Of thee my gallery do store
In all the forms thou canst invent
Either to please me, or torment:
For thou alone to people me,
Art grown a numerous colony;
And a collection choicer far
Than or Whitehall's or Mantua's were.[3]

7

But, of these pictures and the rest,
That at the entrance likes me best:
Where the same posture, and the look
Remains, with which I first was took:
A tender shepherdess, whose hair
Hangs loosely playing in the air,
Transplanting flowers from the green hill,
To crown her head, and bosom fill.
—1681

The Definition of Love

1

My love is of a birth as rare
As 'tis for object strange and high:
It was begotten by Despair
Upon Impossibility.

2

Magnanimous Despair alone
Could show me so divine a thing,
Where feeble Hope could ne'er have flown
But vainly flapped its tinsel wing.

3

And yet I quickly might arrive
Where my extended soul is fixed,[4]
But Fate does iron wedges drive,
And always crowds itself betwixt.

4

For Fate with jealous eye does see
Two perfect loves, nor lets them close:[5]
Their union would her ruin be,
And her tyrannic power depose.

---

[1] halcyons birds which were fabled to charm the wind and waves so that the sea was specially calm during the time of the winter solstice (OED halcyon sb A).

[2] Convoy convey (OED convoy v. trans. II 5).

[3] Whitehall's or Mantua's Charles I had bought the paintings of Vincenzo Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, adding them to his own fine art collection at Whitehall.

[4] extended soul an oxymoron, since extension is a quality of matter. Donne employed a similar conceit in "A Valediction, forbidding mourning," lines 21–24.

[5] close conjoin; unite (OED close v III 10 trans.).

5

And therefore her decrees of steel
Us as the distant Poles have placed,
(Though Love's whole world on us doth wheel)
Not by themselves to be embraced,

6

Unless the giddy heaven fall,
And earth some new convulsion tear;
And, us to join, the world should all
Be cramped into a planisphere. [1]

7

As lines (so loves) oblique may well
Themselves in every angle greet:
But ours so truly parallel,
Though infinite, can never meet.

8

Therefore the love which us doth bind,
But Fate so enviously debars,
Is the conjunction of the mind,
And opposition of the stars. [2]
—1681

To His Coy Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness Lady were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
Shouldst rubies find: I by the tide
Of Humber would complain. I would [3]
Love you ten years before the Flood:
And you should, if you please, refuse
Till the conversion of the Jews. [4]
My vegetable love should grow
Vaster than empires, and more slow. [5]
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze.
Two hundred to adore each breast:
But thirty thousand to the rest.
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart:
For, Lady, you deserve this state;
Nor would I love at lower rate.
  But at my back I always hear
Time's wingèd chariot hurrying near:
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast Eternity.
Thy beauty shall no more be found;
Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
My echoing song: then worms shall try
That long-preserved virginity:
And your quaint honour turn to dust;
And into ashes all my lust. [6]
The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.

---

[1] planisphere a chart formed by the projection of a sphere onto a plane (OED planisphere).

[2] conjunction union, connection; in astrology and astronomy, an apparent proximity of two planets or other heavenly bodies (OED conjunction 1,3); opposition in astrology and astronomy, the relative position of two heavenly bodies when exactly opposite to each other as seen from the earth's surface (OED opposition 1,3).

[3] Humber in allusion to Marvell's residence in Hull; see any map of England.

[4] conversion of the Jews which was expected to take place shortly before the Day of Judgement.

[5] vegetable love The soul was thought to have three parts: the vegetative, the animal or sensitive, and the rational. The vegetative soul controlled growth. In this conceit, the poet's love would not be capable of physical sensation.

[6] quaint OED remarks that in many examples from this period the exact meaning is difficult to determine. It might suggest "unusual," "old-fashioned," or "affected." See the various adjectival senses. It is also possible that Marvell had in mind the medieval sense, referring to the vagina, used by Chaucer in The Miller's Tale; honour chastity (OED honour sb 3).

Now, therefore, while the youthful hue [1]
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,
And while thy willing soul transpires
At every pore with instant fires,
Now let us sport us while we may;
And now, like amorous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour,
Than languish in his slow-chapped power. [2]
Let us roll all our strength, and all
Our sweetness, up into one ball:
And tear our pleasures with rough strife,
Thorough the iron gates of life. [3]
Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still, yet we will make him run. [4]
—1681

An Horatian Ode Upon Cromwell's Return From Ireland [5]

The forward youth that would appear [6]
Must now forsake his Muses dear,
Nor in the shadows sing
His numbers languishing. [7]
'Tis time to leave the books in dust,
And oil th' unusèd armour's rust:
Removing from the wall
The corslet of the hall.
So restless Cromwell could not cease [8]
In the inglorious arts of peace,
But through adventrous war
Urgèd his active star.
And, like the three-forked lightning, first
Breaking the clouds where it was nursed,
Did thorough his own side [9]
His fiery way divide.
(For 'tis all one to courage high
The emulous or enemy:
And with such to inclose
Is more than to oppose.)
Then burning through the air he went,
And palaces and temples rent:
And Caesar's head at last
Did through his laurels blast. [10]
'Tis madness to resist or blame
The force of angry heaven's flame:
And, if we would speak true,
Much to the man is due,
Who, from his private gardens, where
He lived reservèd and austere,
As if his highest plot
To plant the bergamot, [11]
Could by industrious valour climb

---

[1] hue Some editors prefer "glue" here; Margoliouth argues that the word already had its modern meaning and would be inadmissible in this context (The Poems and Letters of Andrew Marvell. 2 vols., Oxford: Clarendon P, 1927, 3rd edn. 1971).

[2] slow-chapped slowly devouring (OED chapped ppl.a^{2}).

[3] gates the traditional reading. Elizabeth Donno considers that "grates" is correct (Andrew Marvell. The Complete Poems, ed. Elizabeth Story Donno, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1972 [1987 reprint], p. 235).

[4] we cannot make our sun / Stand still The source of this may be Joshua 10:12, but the context is in Ovid, Amores I:13 and in poems closer to Marvell's time, such as Donne's The Sun Rising. The point is that lovers want time to pass slowly.

[5] Cromwell returned from Ireland in May 1650, and entered Scotland on July 22. The fact that lines 105–108 look forward to an invasion of Scotland suggests that the poem was composed in June and/or July of that year. It was cancelled from most copies of the 1681 Folio, presumably because of its political stance.

[6] forward prompt, eager, ardent (OED forward a 6,6c,7); appear emerge into public life (OED appear v 1,5).

[7] numbers metrical periods or feet; hence, lines, verses (OED numbers sb. IV 18); languishing suggestive of love poetry.

[8] cease remain at rest (OED cease v I,2).

[9] thorough his own side referring to the fact that Cromwell succeeded against rival Parliamentary leaders.

[10] Caesar's head at last / Did through his laurels blast Every Caesar was entitled to wear a laurel wreath. Traditionally, lightning did not strike laurel; but Cromwell (represented here as a natural force, like lightning) has struck down Charles I.

[11] bergamot an especially fine kind of pear, known as "prince's pear" (OED bergamot).

To ruin the great work of time,
And cast the kingdoms old
Into another mould.
Though Justice against Fate complain,
And plead the ancient Rights in vain:
But those do hold or break
As men are strong or weak.
Nature, that hateth emptiness,
Allows of penetration less: [1]
And therefore must make room
Where greater spirits come,
What field of all the Civil Wars,
Where his were not the deepest scars? [2]
And Hampton shows what part
He had of wiser art,
Where, twining subtle fears with hope,
He wove a net of such a scope,
That Charles himself might chase
To Carisbrooke's narrow case: [3]
That thence the Royal Actor born
The Tragic Scaffold might adorn:
While round the armèd bands
Did clap their bloody hands.
He nothing common did or mean
Upon that memorable scene: [4]
But with his keener eye
The axe's edge did try: [5]
Nor called the gods with vulgar spite
To vindicate his helpless right,
But bowed his comely head,
Down, as upon a bed.
This was that memorable hour
Which first assured the forcèd power. [6]
So when they did design
The Capitol's first line,
A bleeding head where they begun,
Did fright the architects to run;
And yet in that the State
Foresaw its happy fate. [7]
And now the Irish are ashamed
To see themselves in one year tamed: [8]
So much one man can do,
That does both act and know.
They can affirm his praises best,
And have, though overcome, confessed
How good he is, how just,
And fit for highest trust: [9]
Nor yet grown stiffer with command,
But still in the Republic's hand:
How fit he is to sway
That can so well obey.
He to the Commons' feet presents
A kingdom, for his first year's rents:
And, what he may, forbears
His fame, to make it theirs:
And has his sword and spoils ungirt,
To lay them at the public's skirt.

---

[1] Nature…of penetration less "Nature abhors a vacuum"; and is even more hostile to two bodies occupying the same space at the same time.

[2] the deepest scars Cromwell received no serious injury on the battlefield; presumably the reference is to the scars he inflicted. There is classical precedent for this idiom.

[3] Hampton…Carisbrooke's narrow case Charles fled from his confinement at Hampton Court to Carisbrooke Castle on the Isle of Wight. The Governor was afraid to give him sanctuary, and so he fell once more into the hands of his enemies. At the time people thought that Cromwell had plotted Charles's flight and recapture, but there is no evidence that he did.

[4] The words "scaffold" and "scene" were both used to denote a stage; Marvell's description has been understood both as a description of a stage tragedy enacted in "real life" and as an allusion to the popularity of acting at Charles's court, which was strongly criticized by some Puritans.

[5] try test (OED try v 7).

[6] assured secured (OED assured ppl.a. A1).

[7] So when…happy Fate Livy and other classical authors tell that when the foundations of the temple of Jupiter Capitolium were being dug, an undecayed man's head was found, which was taken as an omen of the success of Rome; "bleeding" and "fright" are Marvell's additions, relating to his contemporary situation.

[8] one year Cromwell landed in Dublin on August 15, 1649.

[9] How good he is, how just It seems unlikely that the Irish would have lavished any such praise upon Cromwell.

So when the falcon high
Falls heavy from the sky,
She, having killed, no more does search
But on the next green bough to perch,
Where, when he first does lure,
The falc'ner has her sure.
What may not then our isle presume
While Victory his crest does plume?
What may not others fear
If thus he crowns each year?
A Caesar, he, ere long to Gaul,
To Italy an Hannibal, [1]
And to all states not free
Shall climactéric be. [2]
The Pict no shelter now shall find
Within his parti-coloured mind, [3]
But from this valour sad [4]
Shrink underneath the plaid:
Happy, if in the tufted brake
The English hunter him mistake, [5]
Nor lay his hounds in near
The Caledonian deer.
But thou, the Wars' and Fortune's son,
March indefatigably on,
And for the last effect
Still keep thy sword erect:
Besides the force it has to fright
The spirits of the shady night, [6]
The same arts that did gain
A power, must it maintain. [7]
—1681

The Picture of Little T.C. in a Prospect of Flowers

1

See with what simplicity
This nymph begins her golden days!
In the green grass she loves to lie,
And there with her fair aspect tames
The wilder flowers, and gives them names:
But only with the roses plays;
And them does tell
What colour best becomes them, and what smell.

2

Who can foretell for what high cause
This Darling of the Gods was born!
Yet this is she whose chaster laws
The wanton Love shall one day fear,
And, under her command severe,
See his bow broke and ensigns torn.
Happy, who can
Appease this virtuous enemy of man!

3

O, then let me in time compound, [8]
And parley with those conquering eyes;
Ere they have tried their force to wound,
Ere, with their glancing wheels, they drive
In triumph over hearts that strive,
And them that yield but more despise.

---

[1] Caesar, Hannibal invaders of Gaul and Italy. The reference is probably to an expectation that Cromwell would take action against Roman Catholic powers in Europe.

[2] climacteric marking an epoch (OED climacteric A 1b, this place cited).

[3] The Pict...parti-coloured mind Referring to the Scots as Picts, Marvell is punning (in "parti-coloured" and "plaid") on the supposed derivation of Pict from the Latin pingere, to represent, paint or embroider.

[4] sad steadfast; valiant (OED sad a 2,3).

[5] mistake because of the plaid, thought of as camouflage.

[6] to fright / The spirits of the shady night The cross-hilt of the sword was thought to ward off evil spirits.

[7] The ending of the poem, with its reminder that Cromwell came to power by unconstitutional means, may be seen as realistic or pessimistic about England's future..

[8] compound come to terms with, but also with a political resonance in the period: Royalists compounded by paying a fine to avoid confiscation of their estates.

Let me be laid,
Where I may see thy glories from some shade.

4

Meantime, whilst every verdant thing
Itself does at thy beauty charm,
Reform the errors of the spring;
Make that the tulips may have share
Of sweetness, seeing they are fair;
And roses of their thorns disarm:
But most procure
That violets may a longer age endure.

→ Roses got thorns bc of the fall

5

But, O young beauty of the woods,
Whom Nature courts with fruits and flowers,
Gather the flowers, but spare the buds;
Lest Flora angry at thy crime,[1]
To kill her infants in their prime,
Do quickly make th'example yours;
And, ere we see,
Nip in the blossom all our hopes and thee.
—1681 (WRITTEN EARLY 1650S?)

* The Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn

= Christ? stricken Anglican christ maybe not //

The wanton troopers riding by[2]
Have shot my fawn, and it will die.
Ungentle men! They cannot thrive
To kill thee. Thou ne'er didst alive
Them any harm: alas, nor could
Thy death yet do them any good.
I'm sure I never wished them ill;
Nor do I for all this; nor will:
But if my simple prayers may yet
Prevail with heaven to forget
Thy murder, I will join my tears
Rather than fail. But, O my fears!
It cannot die so. Heaven's King
Keeps register of every thing:
And nothing may we use in vain.
E'en beasts must be with justice slain,
Else men are made their deodands.[3]
Though they should wash their guilty hands
In this warm life-blood, which doth part
From thine, and wound me to the heart,
Yet could they not be clean: their stain
Is dyed in such a purple grain,
There is not such another in
The world, to offer for their sin.
Unconstant Sylvio, when yet
I had not found him counterfeit,
One morning (I remember well),
Tied in this silver chain and bell
Gave it to me: nay, and I know
What he said then; I'm sure I do.
Said he, "Look how your huntsman here
Hath taught a fawn to hunt his dear."
But Sylvio soon had me beguiled.
This waxèd tame, while he grew wild,
And quite regardless of my smart,
Left me his fawn, but took his heart.
Thenceforth I set myself to play
My solitary time away
With this: and very well content,
Could so mine idle life have spent.
For it was full of sport; and light
Of foot, and heart; and did invite
Me to its game; it seemed to bless
Itself in me. How could I less
Than love it? O I cannot be
Unkind, t'a beast that loveth me.
Had it lived long, I do not know
Whether it too might have done so

Silvio tied in silver chain the fawn pun – her

pun
↓
fawn = heart or heart

---

[1] Flora Roman goddess of flowers.

[2] troopers first used of soldiers in the Scottish army that invaded England in 1640 (OED trooper).

[3] deodands literally, things given to God; in English law, personal possessions forfeited in expiation because they caused a person's death (OED deodand).

As Sylvio did: his gifts might be
Perhaps as false or more than he.
But I am sure, for ought that I
Could in so short a time espy,
Thy love was far more better than
The love of false and cruel men.
With sweetest milk, and sugar, first
I it at mine own fingers nursed.
And as it grew, so every day
It waxed more white and sweet than they.
It had so sweet a breath! And oft
I blushed to see its foot more soft,
And white (shall I say than my hand?)
Nay, any lady's of the land.
It is a wondrous thing, how fleet
'Twas on those little silver feet.
With what a pretty skipping grace,
It oft would challenge me the race:
And when 't had left me far away,
'Twould stay, and run again, and stay.
For it was nimbler much than hinds;
And trod, as on the foúr winds. [1]
I have a garden of my own
But so with roses overgrown,
And lilies, that you would it guess
To be a little wilderness.
And all the springtime of the year
It only lovèd to be there.
Among the beds of lilies, I
Have sought it oft, where it should lie;
Yet could not, till itself would rise,
Find it, although before mine eyes.
For, in the flaxen lilies' shade,
It like a bank of lilies laid.
Upon the roses it would feed,
Until its lips e'en seemed to bleed:
And then to me 'twould boldly trip,
And print those roses on my lip.
But all its chief delight was still
On roses thus itself to fill:
And its pure virgin limbs to fold
In whitest sheets of lilies cold.
Had it lived long, it would have been — Lilies without, roses within. —
O help! O help! I see it faint:
And die as calmly as a saint.
See how it weeps. The tears do come
Sad, slowly dropping like a gum.
So weeps the wounded balsam: so
The holy frankincense doth flow.
The brotherless Heliades [2]
Melt in such amber tears as these.
I in a golden vial will
Keep these two crystal tears; and fill
It till it do o'erflow with mine;
Then place it in Diana's shrine. [3]
Now my sweet fawn is vanished to
Whither the swans and turtles go:
In fair Elysium to endure,
With milk-white lambs, and ermines pure.
O do not run too fast: for I
Will but bespeak thy grave, and die.
First my unhappy statue shall
Be cut in marble; and withal,
Let it be weeping too: but there
Th'engraver sure his art may spare,
For I so truly thee bemoan,
That I shall weep though I be stone: [4]
Until my tears, still dropping, wear
My breast, themselves engraving there.
There at my feet shalt thou be laid,
Of purest alabaster made:

{ art
[illegible] in a differ
wa

---

[1] four disyllabic, as elsewhere in Marvell, and as in the north of England to this day.

[2] Heliades the daughters of Helios (the sun); their grief over the death of their brother Phaethon led to their transformation into poplar trees and their tears into amber.

[3] Diana's shrine Diana was the Roman goddess of chastity and hunting.

[4] though I be stone like Niobe, whose pride in the number of her children caused their deaths; her grief led Zeus to transform Niobe into a weeping stone.

For I would have thine image be White as I can, though not as thee.
—1681 (WRITTEN EARLY 1650S?)

[illegible] real thing

Upon the Hill and Grove at Bilbrough

To the Lord Fairfax

1

See how the archèd earth does here
Rise in a perfect hemisphere!
The stiffest compass could not strike
A line more circular and like;
Nor softest pencil draw a brow
So equal as this hill does bow.
It seems as for a model laid,
And that the world by it was made.

2

Here learn, ye mountains more unjust,
Which to abrupter greatness thrust,[1]
That do with your hook-shouldered height
The earth deform and heaven fright,
For whose excrescence, ill-designed,
Nature must a new centre find,[2]
Learn here those humble steps to tread,
Which to securer glory lead.

3

See what a soft access and wide
Lies open to its grassy side;
Nor with the rugged path deters
The feet of breathless travellers.
See then how courteous it ascends,
And all the way it rises bends;
Nor for itself the height does gain,
But only strives to raise the plain.

4

Yet thus it all the field commands,
And in unenvied greatness stands,
Discerning further than the cliff
Of heaven-daring Tenerife.[3]
How glad the weary seamen haste
When they salute it from the mast![4]
By night the Northern Star their way
Directs, and this no less by day.

5

Upon its crest this mountain grave
A plump of agèd trees does wave.[5]
No hostile hand durst ere invade
With impious steel the sacred shade.
For something always did appear
Of the great Master's terror there:[6]
And men could hear his armour still
Rattling through all the grove and hill.

6

Fear of the Master, and respect
Of the great Nymph, did it protect,
Vera the Nymph that him inspired,[7]
To whom he often here retired,
And on these oaks engraved her name;
Such wounds alone these woods became:
But ere he well the barks could part
'Twas writ already in their heart.

7

For they ('tis credible) have sense
As we, of love and reverence,

---

[1] unjust irregular (OED unjust a 4 Obs.). The ethical sense is also intended.

[2] excrescence abnormal, morbid or disfiguring outgrowth (OED excrescence 3).

[3] Tenerife a mountain peak in the Canaries, over 12,000 feet.

[4] How glad…mast! Grosart cites Markham's Life of the Great Lord Fairfax: "On Bilbrough hill, 145 feet above the sea, there was then a great clump of trees, which was a landmark for ships going up the Humber…".

[5] plump clump or bunch (OED plump sb^{1} c).

[6] in allusion to Fairfax's military prowess.

[7] Vera the Nymph that him inspired Fairfax's wife was the daughter of Sir Horace Vere.

And underneath the coarser rind
The genius of the house do bind.[1]
Hence they successes seem to know,
And in their Lord's advancement grow;
But in no memory were seen,
As under this, so straight and green;

8

Yet now no further strive to shoot,
Contented if they fix their root.
Nor to the wind's uncertain gust,
Their prudent heads too far intrust.
Only sometimes a fluttering breeze
Discourses with the breathing trees,
Which in their modest whispers name
Those acts that swelled the cheek of fame.

9

"Much other groves," say they, "than these
And other hills him once did please.
Through groves of pikes he thundered then,
And mountains raised of dying men.
For all the civic garlands due
To him, our branches are but few.
Nor are our trunks enow to bear
The trophies of one fertile year."

10

'Tis true, ye trees, nor ever spoke
More certain oracles in oak.[2]
But peace, (if you his favour prize):
That courage its own praises flies.
Therefore to your obscurer seats
From his own brightness he retreats:
Nor he the hills without the groves,
Nor height, but with retirement, loves.
—1681

Upon Appleton House

To my Lord Fairfax

house?
— stanzaic form?
Marvell himself?

1

Within this sober frame expect
Work of no foreign architect,
That unto caves the quarries drew,
And forests did to pastures hew,
Who of his great design in pain
Did for a model vault his brain,
Whose columns should so high be raised
To arch the brows that on them gazed.

2

Why should of all things Man unruled
Such unproportioned dwellings build?
The Beasts are by their Dens expressed:
And Birds contrive an equal Nest;
The low-roofed tortoises do dwell
In cases fit of tortoise shell:
No creature loves an empty space;
Their bodies measure out their place.

3

But He, superfluously spread,
Demands more room alive than dead;
And in his hollow palace goes
Where winds (as he) themselves may lose;
What need of all this marble crust
T'impark the wanton mote of dust,
That thinks by breadth the world t'unite
Though the first builders failed in height?[3]

4

But all things are composèd here
Like Nature, orderly and near:
In which we the dimensions find
Of that more sober age and mind,
When larger-sizèd men did stoop

---

[1] genius of the house its controlling spirit (OED genius 1).

[2] oracles in oak in allusion to the grove of oaks at Dodona.

[3] Genesis 11:1–9 (the Tower of Babel).

To enter at a narrow loop;
As practising, in doors so strait
To strain themselves through Heaven's Gate. [1]

5

And surely when the after age
Shall hither come in pilgrimage,
These sacred places to adore,
By Vere and Fairfax trod before, [2]
Men will dispute how their extent
Within such dwarfish confines went:
And some will smile at this, as well
As Romulus his bee-like cell. [3]

6

Humility alone designs
Those short but admirable lines,
By which, ungirt and unconstrained,
Things greater are in less contained.
Let others vainly strive t'immure
The circle in the quadrature! [4]
These holy Mathematics can
In every figure equal man.

7

Yet thus the laden house does sweat,
And scarce endures the Master great:
But where he comes the swelling hall
Stirs, and the square grows spherical,
More by his Magnitude distressed,
Then he is by its straitness pressed:
And too officiously it slights
That in itself which him delights.

8

So Honour better Lowness bears,
Than that unwonted greatness wears:
Height with a certain grace does bend,
But low things clownishly ascend.
And yet what needs there here excuse,
Where everything does answer use?
Where neatness nothing can condemn,
Nor Pride invent what to contemn?

9

A stately Frontispiece of Poor [5]
Adorns without the open door:
Nor less the rooms within commends
Daily new furniture of friends.
The house was built upon the place
Only as for a mark of grace;
And for an Inn to entertain
Its Lord a while, but not remain.

10

Him Bishop's Hill or Denton may, [6]
Or Bilbrough, better hold than they:
But Nature here hath been so free
As if she said, "Leave this to me."
Art would more neatly have defaced
What she had laid so sweetly waste,
In fragrant gardens, shady woods,
Deep meadows, and transparent floods.

11

While with slow eyes we these survey,
And on each pleasant footstep stay,
We opportunely may relate
The progress of this house's fate.

---

[1] As practising...Heaven's Gate Matthew 7:13–14.

[2] Vere and Fairfax Lord Fairfax and his wife Anne, daughter of Sir Horace Vere.

[3] his bee-like cell an ellipsis for beehive-like. A thatched hut, the traditional dwelling of Romulus, was preserved on the Palatine Hill at Rome.

[4] Let others...quadrature! "Squaring the circle" was a proverbially difficult problem in mathematics.

[5] Frontispiece literally, the facade of a building; more usually applied to the decorated entrance (OED frontispiece sb 1). As in "To Penshurst," the charity of the house's owner is stressed.

[6] Bishop's Hill or Denton other houses belonging to the family.

anti-catholic - can't uphold vows of chastity

A Nunnery first gave it birth [1]
(For Virgin Buildings oft brought forth); [2]
And all that neighbour-ruin shows
The quarries whence this dwelling rose.

12

Near to this gloomy cloister's gates
There dwelt the blooming virgin Thwaites,
Fair beyond measure, and an heir
Which might deformity make fair.
And oft she spent the summer suns
Discoursing with the subtle nuns.
Whence in these words one to her weaved, [3]
(As 'twere by chance) thoughts long conceived.

13

"Within this holy leisure we
Live innocently, as you see.
These walls restrain the world without,
But hedge our liberty about.
These bars inclose that wider den
Of those wild Creatures callèd Men.
The cloister outward shuts its gates,
And, from us, locks on them the grates.

14

"Here we, in shining armour white,
Like Virgin Amazons do fight.
And our chaste Lamps we hourly trim,
Lest the great Bridegroom find them dim. [4]
Our orient breaths perfumèd are
With incense of incessant prayer.
And holy-water of our tears
Most strangely our complexion clears.

superficial values

15

"Not tears of grief; but such as those
With which calm pleasure overflows;
Or pity, when we look on you
That live without this happy Vow.
How should we grieve that must be seen
Each one a Spouse, and each a Queen, [5]
And can in Heaven hence behold
Our brighter robes and crowns of gold?

caught up in the trappings

16

"When we have prayèd all our beads, [6]
Someone the holy Legend reads; [7]
While all the rest with needles paint
The face and graces of the Saint.
But what the linen can't receive
They in their lives do interweave.
This work the saints best represents;
That serves for altar's ornaments.

17

"But much it to our work would add
If here your hand, your Face we had:
By it we would Our Lady touch;
Yet thus She you resembles much.
Some of your features, as we sewed,
Through every Shrine should be bestowed.
And in one beauty we would take Enough a thousand Saints to make.

18

"And (for I dare not quench the fire
That me does for your good inspire)
'Twere sacrilege a man t'admit

---

[1] A nunnery…birth The house came into the Fairfax family at the dissolution of the monasteries in 1542.

[2] Virgin Buildings oft brought forth Commissions enquiring into the state of religious houses before the Dissolution of the Monasteries naturally found that vows of chastity had not always been kept.

[3] subtle, weaved a good example of Marvell's verbal wit. The word "subtle" derives from the Latin for "finely woven" (OED subtle a 1).

[4] Bridegroom Matthew 25:1–13.

[5] Each one a spouse Nuns are regarded as being married to Christ.

[6] prayèd all our beads recited the Rosary in its entirety.

[7] legend the life of a saint, as in Donne's "The Canonization." It was customary for a nun or monk to read aloud at meal-times or while others were occupied in the kind of work described here.

To holy things, for heaven fit.
I see the Angels in a Crown
On you the lilies showering down: [1]
And around about you glory breaks,
That something more than human speaks.

19

"All beauty, when at such a height,
Is so already consecrate.
Fairfax I know; and long ere this
Have marked the youth, and what he is.
But can he such a Rival seem
For whom you Heav'n should disesteem?
Ah, no! and 'twould more honour prove
He your Devoto were, than love. [2]

20

"Here live belovèd, and obeyed:
Each one your Sister, each your Maid.
And, if our rule seem strictly penned,
The Rule itself to you shall bend.
Our Abbess too, now far in age,
Doth your succession near presage.
How soft the yoke on us would lie,
Might such fair hands as yours it tie!

21

"Your voice, the sweetest of the choir,
Shall draw Heav'n nearer, raise us higher.
And your example, if our Head,
Will soon us to perfection lead.
Those virtues to us all so dear,
Will straight grow sanctity when here:
And that, once sprung, increase so fast
Till miracles it work at last.

22

"Nor is our Order yet so nice, [3]
Delight to banish as a vice.
Here pleasure piety doth meet;
One pérfecting the other sweet.
So through the mortal fruit we boil
The sugar's uncorrupting oil: [4]
And that which perished while we pull,
Is thus preservèd clear and full 23

"For such indeed are all our arts,
Still handling Nature's finest parts.
Flowers dress the altars; for the clothes,
The sea-born amber we compose;
Balms for the grieved we draw; and pastes
We mold, as baits for curious tastes. [5]
What need is here of Man? unless
These as sweet sins we should confess.

24

"Each Night among us to your side
Appoint a fresh and Virgin Bride;
Whom if our Lord at midnight find,
Yet neither should be left behind.
Where you may lie as chaste in bed,
As pearls together billeted,
All night embracing arm in arm
Like crystal pure with cotton warm.

25

"But what is this to all the store
Of joys you see, and may make more!
Try but a while, if you be wise:
The trial neither costs, nor ties."
Now, Fairfax, seek her promised faith:
Religion that dispensèd hath,

---

[1] lilies emblematic of chastity.

[2] Devoto devotee, in a religious sense; see OED devoto sb A.

[3] nice "strict…in conduct" (OED nice a 7d).

[4] uncorrupting preserving.

[5] curious "difficult to satisfy…fastidious" (OED curious a 2).

Which she henceforward does begin; [1]
The nun's smooth tongue has sucked her in.

26
Oft, though he knew it was in vain,
Yet would he valiantly complain.
"Is this that Sanctity so great,
An Art by which you finelier cheat?
Hypocrite witches, hence avaunt,
Who though in prison yet enchant!
Death only can such thieves make fast,
As rob though in the dungeon cast.

27
"Were there but, when this House was made,
One stone that a just hand had laid,
It must have fall'n upon her head
Who first thee from thy faith misled.
And yet, how well soever meant,
With them 'twould soon grow fraudulent:
For like themselves they alter all,
And vice infects the very wall.

28
"But sure those buildings last not long,
Founded by folly, kept by wrong.
I know what fruit their gardens yield,
When they it think by night concealed.
Fly from their vices. 'Tis thy state, [2]
Not thee, that they would consecrate.
Fly from their ruin. How I fear,
Though guiltless, lest thou perish there."

29
What should he do? He would respect
Religion, but not Right neglect:
For first Religion taught him right,
And dazzled not but cleared his sight.
Sometimes resolved, his Sword he draws,
But reverenceth then the Laws:
For justice still that courage led;
First from a Judge, then Soldier bred.

30
Small honour would be in the storm.
The court him grants the lawful form;
Which licensed either peace or force,
To hinder the unjust divorce.
Yet still the Nuns his right debarred,
Standing upon their holy guard.
Ill-counselled women, do you know
Whom you resist, or what you do?

31
Is not this he whose offspring fierce
Shall fight through all the universe;
And with successive valour try
France, Poland, either Germany;
Till one, as long since prophesied,
His horse through conquered Britain ride?
Yet, against Fate, his Spouse they kept,
And the great race would intercept. [3]

32
Some to the breach against their foes
Their Wooden Saints in vain oppose.
Another bolder stands at push
With their old Holy-Water Brush.
While the disjointed Abbess threads
The jingling chain-shot of her Beads.
But their loud'st cannon were their lungs;
And sharpest weapons were their tongues. [4]

---

[1] Now, Fairfax, seek…does begin seek her promised word, from which religion, which she now begins, has dispensed her. (This does not mean that she has been converted to Christianity, but that she has begun the life of a "religious.")

[2] state estate.

[3] the great race would intercept They would prevent William Fairfax and Isabel Thwaites from founding a family.

[4] Marvell, firmly Protestant and anti-Catholic, clearly enjoyed writing this section on the house's history.

33
But, waving these aside like flies,
Young Fairfax through the wall does rise.
Then th' unfrequented vault appeared,
And superstitions vainly feared.
The Relics false were set to view;
Only the Jewels there were true—
But truly bright and holy Thwaites
That weeping at the Altar waits.

34
But the glad youth away her bears,
And to the Nuns bequeaths her tears:
Who guiltily their Prize bemoan,
Like gypsies that a child had stolen.
Thenceforth (as when the Enchantment ends,
The Castle vanishes or rends)
The wasting Cloister with the rest
Was in one instant dispossessed.

35
At the demolishing, this seat
To Fairfax fell as by escheat. [1]
And what both Nuns and Founders willed
'Tis likely better thus fulfilled.
For if the Virgin proved not theirs,
The Cloister yet remainèd hers.
Though many a Nun there made her vow,
'Twas no Religious House till now.

36
From that blest bed the Hero came,
Whom France and Poland yet does fame: [2]
Who, when retirèd here to peace,
His warlike Studies could not cease;
But laid these gardens out in sport
In the just figure of a fort;
And with five bastions it did fence,
As aiming one for every sense.

37
When in the East the morning ray
Hangs out the Colours of the Day,
The Bee through these known Allies hums, [3]
Beating the Dian with its drums. [4]
Then flowers their drowsy eyelids raise,
Their silken ensigns each displays,
And dries its pan yet dank with dew,
And fills its flask with odours new. [5]

38
These, as their Governor goes by,
In fragrant volleys they let fly;
And to salute their Governess
Again as great a charge they press:
None for the Virgin Nymph; for she [6]
Seems with the flowers a flower to be.
And think so still! though not compare [7]
With breath so sweet, or cheek so fair.

39
Well shot, ye firemen! Oh how sweet,
And round your equal fires do meet,
Whose shrill report no ear can tell,
But echoes to the eye and smell.
See how the flowers, as at Parade,

---

[1] as by escheat This legal term is a polite way of saying that the land was given to Fairfax at the Dissolution.

[2] the Hero The reference seems naturally to apply to the son of William and Isabella, Sir Thomas Fairfax; arguments have been made for it referring to his son or to his grandson, who was Marvell's patron.

[3] Allies The primary meaning is probably "alleys," but the old spelling allows for an appropriate military pun.

[4] Dian "a trumpet-call or drum-roll in the early morning" (OED).

[5] pan the part of the musket-lock which contains the priming; flask powder-flask.

[6] Governor Lord Fairfax; Governess Lady Fairfax; Virgin Nymph their daughter Mary, between twelve and fourteen when Marvell was employed as her tutor.

[7] not compare Elizabeth Donno reads this as an imperative, telling the flowers not to vie with Mary; alternatively, it may be read as an elliptical indicative (they do not compare with her, for she is superior).

Under their Colours stand displayed:
Each Regiment in order grows,
That of the tulip, pink, and rose.

40

But when the vigilant Patrol
Of stars walks round about the Pole,
Their leaves, that to the stalks are curled,
Seem to their staves the ensigns furled.
Then in some flower's belovèd hut
Each bee as sentinel is shut,
And sleeps so too: but, if once stirred,
She runs you through, nor asks the Word.[1]

41

Oh thou, that dear and happy isle
The garden of the world ere while,
Thou Paradise of foúr seas,
Which Heaven planted us to please,
But, to exclude the world, did guard
With watery if not flaming sword;
What luckless Apple did we taste,
To make us mortal, and thee waste?

42

Unhappy! shall we never more
That sweet Militía restore,
When gardens only had their towers,
And all the garrisons were flowers,
When roses only arms might bear,
And men did rosy garlands wear?
Tulips, in several colours barred,
Were then the Switzers of our Guard.[2]

natural war interesting
longing 4 peace.

43

The Gardener had the Soldier's place,
And his more gentle Forts did trace.
The nursery of all things green
Was then the only Magazine.
The winter quarters were the stoves,
Where he the tender plants removes.
But war all this doth overgrow;
We ordnance plant and powder sow.

44

And yet there walks one on the sod
Who, had it pleasèd him and God,
Might once have made our gardens spring
Fresh as his own and flourishing.
But he preferred to the Cinque Ports
These five imaginary forts,
And, in those half-dry trenches, spanned
Power which the ocean might command.[3]

maybe he should have stuck in the real ones.

45

For he did, with his utmost skill,
Ambition weed, but Conscience till—
Conscience, that heaven-nursèd plant,
Which most our earthly gardens want.
A prickling leaf it bears, and such
As that which shrinks at every touch;[4]
But flowers eternal, and divine,
That in the Crowns of Saints do shine.

46

The sight does from these Bastions ply,
Th' invisible Artillery;
And at proud Cawood Castle seems[5]
To point the battery of its beams.
As if it quarrelled in the seat

---

[1] nor an alternative reading, giving an opposite sense, is or; the Word the password.

[2] Switzers of our Guard in reference to the black, yellow and red stripes of the uniform of the Swiss guards at the Vatican.

[3] In this section Marvell is reflecting on the part played by Fairfax in the Civil War and its aftermath. Fairfax, who had been Commander-in-Chief of the Parliamentary forces, resigned and retired to his estates in Yorkshire in June 1650.

[4] shrinks at every touch in reference to the so-called "sensitive plant."

[5] Cawood Castle seat of the Archbishop of York, two miles from Nun Appleton.

1-368

Rescue x escape x convent from horrors of civil war

Th' ambition of its Prelate great.[1]
But o'er the meads below it plays,
Or innocently seems to graze.

47
And now to the Abyss I pass
Of that unfathomable Grass,
Where Men like Grasshoppers appear,
But Grasshoppers are Giants there:
They, in their squeaking laugh, contemn
Us as we walk more low than them:
And, from the precipices tall
Of the green spires, to us do call.

48
To see men through this meadow dive,
We wonder how they rise alive,
As, under water, none does know
Whether he fall through it or go.
But, as the mariners that sound,
And show upon their lead the ground,
They bring up flow'rs so to be seen,
And prove they've at the bottom been.

49
No Scene that turns with Engines strange
Does oftener than these meadows change.[2]
For when the sun the grass hath vexed,
The tawny mowers enter next;
Who seem like Israelites to be,
Walking on foot through a green sea.
To them the grassy deeps divide,
And crowd a lane to either side.[3]

50
With whistling scythe, and elbow strong,
These massacre the grass along:
While one, unknowing, carves the rail,[4]
Whose yet unfeathered quills her fail.
The edge all bloody from its breast
He draws, and does his stroke detest,
Fearing the flesh untimely mowed
To him a fate as black forebode.

51
But bloody Thestylis, that waits
To bring the mowing camp their cates,[5]
Greedy as kites has trussed it up,[6]
And forthwith means on it to sup:
When on another quick she lights,
And cries, "He called us Israelites;
But now, to make his saying true,
Rails rain for quails, for manna, dew."[7]

52
Unhappy birds! what does it boot
To build below the grass's root;
When lowness is unsafe as height,
And chance o'ertakes what 'scapeth spite?
And now your orphan parents' call
Sounds your untimely Funeral.
Death-trumpets creak in such a note,
And 'tis the Sourdine in their throat.[8]

53
Or sooner hatch or higher build:
The Mower now commands the Field,
In whose new traverse seemeth wrought
A camp of battle newly fought:
Where, as the meads with hay, the plain
Lies quilted o'er with bodies slain:

---

[1] quarrelled found fault with (transitive).

[2] Scene...Engines strange in reference to the elaborate stage effects of Court masques.

[3] Israelites...sea Exodus 14. Some Parliamentarians saw the victory over Charles I in terms of the Israelites' escape from Pharaoh.

[4] rail land-rail or corncrake (OED rail sb ³).

[5] cates provisions. Compare "caterer."

[6] kites The kite is a bird of prey; the word was used figuratively of rapacious persons.

[7] for instead of; manna Exodus 16:10–15.

[8] Sourdine a muted trumpet (OED).

The women that with forks it fling,
Do represent the pillaging.

54

And now the careless victors play,
Dancing the triumphs of the hay;[1]
Where every mower's wholesome heat
Smells like an Alexander's sweat.
Their females fragrant as the mead
Which they in Fairy Circles tread:
When at their dance's end they kiss,
Their new-made hay not sweeter is.

55

When after this 'tis piled in cocks,
Like a calm sea it shows the rocks,
We wondering in the river near
How boats among them safely steer.
Or, like the desert Memphis sand,
Short Pyramids of hay do stand.
And such the Roman Camps do rise
In hills for soldiers' obsequies.[2]

56

This Scene again withdrawing brings
A new and empty face of things,
A levelled space, as smooth and plain
As cloths for Lilly stretched to stain.[3]
The world when first created sure
Was such a table rase and pure.[4]
Or rather such is the Toril
Ere the bulls enter at Madril.[5]

57

For to this naked equal flat,
Which Levellers take pattern at,
The villagers in common chase
Their cattle, which it closer rase;
And what below the scythe increased
Is pinched yet nearer by the beast.
Such, in the painted world, appeared
Davenant with th' universal herd.[6]

58

They seem within the polished grass
A landskip drawn in looking-glass,
And shrunk in the huge pasture show
As spots, so shaped, on faces do—
Such fleas, ere they approach the eye,
In multiplying glasses lie.[7]
They feed so wide, so slowly move,
As Constellations do above.

59

Then, to conclude these pleasant acts,
Denton sets ope its cataracts,[8]
And makes the Meadow truly be (What it but seemed before) a Sea.
For, jealous of its Lord's long stay,
It tries t'invite him thus away.
The river in itself is drowned,
And isles the astonished cattle round.

60

Let others tell the Paradox,
How eels now bellow in the ox;
How horses at their tails do kick,

---

[1] hay a pun, since the hay is also a country dance.

[2] Roman Camps...obsequies These burial mounds are actually British in origin.

[3] Lilly the famous painter Sir Peter Lely. Pepys spells his name in the same way.

[4] rase blank tablet (tabula rasa).

[5] Toril bull-ring; Madril Madrid.

[6] Davenant...herd in reference to Gondibert 2:6; Davenant describes a painting of the Six Days of Creation in which a "universal herd" appears on the Sixth Day.

[7] Such fleas...lie Fleas on the glass look like mere dots until they are viewed through the microscope.

[8] Denton an estate on the River Wharfe thirty miles from Nun Appleton. Margoliouth remarks that the meadows are still liable to flood.

Turned as they hang to leeches quick;
How boats can over bridges sail;
And fishes do the stables scale.
How salmons trespassing are found;
And pikes are taken in the pound. [1]

61

But I, retiring from the flood,
Take sanctuary in the wood,
And, while it lasts, myself embark
In this yet green, yet growing ark,
Where the first carpenter might best
Fit timber for his keel have pressed. [2]
And where all creatures might have shares,
Although in armies, not in pairs.

62

The double wood of ancient stocks,
Linked in so thick, an union locks,
It like two pedigrees appears,
On th' one hand Fairfax, th' other Vere's: [3]
Of whom though many fell in war,
Yet more to heaven shooting are:
And, as they Nature's cradle decked,
Will in green age her hearse expect.

63

When first the eye this forest sees
It seems indeed as Wood not Trees:
As if their neighbourhood so old
To one great trunk them all did mould.
There the huge bulk takes place, as meant
To thrust up a fifth element,
And stretches still so closely wedged
As if the night within were hedged.

64

Dark all without it knits; within
It opens passable and thin;
And in as loose an order grows,
As the Corinthean Porticoes.
The arching boughs unite between
The columns of the temple green;
And underneath the wingèd choirs
Echo about their tunèd fires.

65

The Nightingale does here make choice
To sing the trials of her voice.
Low shrubs she sits in, and adorns
With music high the squatted thorns.
But highest oaks stoop down to hear,
And listening elders prick the ear.
The thorn, lest it should hurt her, draws
Within the skin its shrunken claws.

66

But I have for my music found
A sadder, yet more pleasing sound:
The stock-doves, whose fair necks are graced
With nuptial rings, their ensigns chaste;
Yet always, for some cause unknown,
Sad pair unto the elms they moan.
O why should such a couple mourn,
That in so equal flames do burn!

67

Then as I careless on the bed
Of gelid strawberries do tread,
And through the hazels thick espy
The hatching throstle's shining eye,
The heron from the ash's top,
The eldest of its young lets drop,
As if it stork-like did pretend
That Tribute to its Lord to send.

---

[1] pound an enclosure for stray cattle (OED).

[2] the first carpenter See the story of Noah's Ark in Genesis 6–7.

[3] like two pedigrees The two woods are joined, like the Fairfax and Vere families.

68

But most the Hewel's wonders are,
Who here has the Holtfelster's care. [1]
He walks still upright from the root,
Measuring the timber with his foot,
And all the way, to keep it clean,
Doth from the bark the woodmoths glean.
He, with his beak, examines well
Which fit to stand and which to fell.

69

The good he numbers up, and hacks,
As if he marked them with the axe.
But where he, tinkling with his beak,
Does find the hollow oak to speak,
That for his building he designs,
And through the tainted side he mines.
Who could have thought the tallest Oak
Should fall by such a feeble stroke! [2]

70

Nor would it, had the Tree not fed
A Traitor-worm, within it bred,
(As first our Flesh corrupt within Tempts impotent and bashful Sin).
And yet that Worm triumphs not long,
But serves to feed the hewel's young,
While the oak seems to fall content,
Viewing the treason's punishment.

71

Thus I, easy Philosopher,
Among the Birds and Trees confer.
And little now to make me wants
Or of the fowls, or of the plants:
Give me but wings as they, and I
Straight floating on the air shall fly:
Or turn me but, and you shall see
I was but an inverted tree.

72

Already I begin to call
In their most learn'd original:
And where I language want, my signs
The bird upon the bough divines;
And more attentive there doth sit
Than if she were with lime-twigs knit.
No leaf does tremble in the wind
Which I, returning, cannot find.

73

Out of these scattered Sibyl's leaves
Strange Prophecies my fancy weaves: [3]
And in one history consumes,
Like Mexique paintings, all the Plumes. [4]
What Rome, Greece, Palestine, ere said
I in this light Mosaic read. [5]
Thrice happy he who, not mistook,
Hath read in Nature's mystic book. [6]

74

And see how chance's better wit
Could with a mask my studies hit! [7]
The oak leaves me embroider all,
Between which caterpillars crawl:
And Ivy, with familiar trails,

---

[1] Hewel the green woodpecker; Holtfelster i.e. holt-feller, woodcutter. This is the only use of the word recorded in OED.

[2] tallest Oak…feeble stroke! This, in combination with the following stanza, has been seen as a reflection on the fate of Charles I.

[3] Sibyl "one or other of certain women of antiquity…reputed to possess powers of prophecy" (OED).

[4] Mexique paintings pictures made with feathers, described in Thomas Powell's Humane Industry (1661).

[5] Mosaic that is, in this mosaic formed by the light shining through the leaves, with a pun: the first five books of the Bible were attributed to Moses.

[6] Nature's mystic book Nature was regarded as "God's second book"; Thrice happy he perhaps in compliment to Fairfax, who was interested in the hermetic books. Attributed to "Hermes the thrice-great," they had much to say about Nature's mystic book.

[7] with a mask my studies hit! fit me up with a disguise or clothing suitable to my studies.

Me licks, and clasps, and curls, and hales.
Under this antic Cope I move
Like some great Prelate of the Grove. [1]

75

Then, languishing with ease, I toss
On pallets swoll'n of velvet moss,
While the wind, cooling through the boughs,
Flatters with air my panting brows.
Thanks for my rest, ye Mossy Banks;
And unto you cool Zephyrs thanks,
Who, as my hair, my thoughts too shed,
And winnow from the chaff my head.

76

How safe, methinks, and strong, behind
These trees have I encamped my mind:
Where Beauty, aiming at the Heart,
Bends in some tree its useless dart;
And where the World no certain shot
Can make, or me it toucheth not.
But I on it securely play,
And gall its horsemen all the day.

77

Bind me, ye woodbines, in your twines,
Curl me about, ye gadding vines, [2]
And, oh, so close your circles lace,
That I may never leave this place:
But lest your fetters prove too weak,
Ere I your silken bondage break,
Do you, O brambles, chain me too,
And, courteous briars, nail me through.

78

Here in the morning tie my chain,
Where the two woods have made a lane,
While, like a guard on either side,
The trees before their Lord divide;
This, like a long and equal thread,
Betwixt two labyrinths does lead.
But where the floods did lately drown,
There at the evening stake me down.

79

For now the waves are fall'n and dried,
And now the meadows fresher dyed,
Whose grass, with moister colour dashed,
Seems as green silks but newly washed.
No serpent new nor crocodile
Remains behind our little Nile,
Unless itself you will mistake,
Among these meads the only snake. [3]

80

See in what wanton harmless folds
It everywhere the meadow holds;
And its yet muddy back doth lick,
Till as a crystal mirror slick,
Where all things gaze themselves, and doubt
If they be in it or without.
And for his shade which therein shines,
Narcissus-like, the Sun too pines.

81

Oh what a pleasure 'tis to hedge
My temples here with heavy sedge,
Abandoning my lazy side,
Stretched as a bank unto the tide,
Or to suspend my sliding foot
On th' osier's underminèd root,
And in its branches tough to hang,
While at my lines the fishes twang!

---

[1] antic Cope "antic" and "antique" were interchangeable spellings; the former could mean "grotesque"; "cope" could refer to a variety of church-men's garments; Marvell would have known that Milton had used the same phrase in Apology for Smectymnuus, 1642.

[2] gadding vines Milton's phrase in "Lycidas," published in 1637 at Cambridge, when Marvell was there.

[3] itself "our little Nile." The river's course is "serpentine."

82

But now away my hooks, my quills,
And angles—idle utensíls. [1]
The young Maria walks tonight:
Hide, trifling youth, thy pleasures slight.
'Twere shame that such judicious eyes
Should with such toys a man surprise;
She, that already is the law
Of all her sex, her age's awe.

83

See how loose Nature, in respect
To her, itself doth recollect;
And everything so whisht and fine,
Starts forthwith to its bonne mine. [2]
The Sun himself, of Her aware,
Seems to descend with greater care;
And lest she see him go to bed,
In blushing clouds conceals his head.

84

So when the shadows laid asleep
From underneath these banks do creep,
And on the river as it flows
With eben shuts begin to close;
The modest halcyon comes in sight, [3]
Flying betwixt the day and night;
And such an horror calm and dumb,
Admiring Nature does benumb.

85

The viscous air, wheres'e'er She fly,
Follows and sucks her azure dye;
The jellying stream compacts below,
If it might fix her shadow so;
The stupid fishes hang, as plain [4]
As flies in crystal overta'en;
And men the silent Scene assist, [5]
Charmed with the Sapphire-wingèd Mist.

86

Maria such, and so doth hush
The world, and through the ev'ning rush.
No new-born Comet such a train
Draws through the sky, nor star new-slain.
For straight those giddy rockets fail,
Which from the putrid earth exhale,
But by her flames, in Heaven tried,
Nature is wholly vitrified. [6]

87

'Tis She that to these gardens gave
That wondrous beauty which they have;
She straightness on the woods bestows;
To Her the Meadow sweetness owes;
Nothing could make the river be
So crystal pure but only She;
She yet more pure, sweet, straight, and fair,
Than gardens, woods, meads, rivers are.

88

Therefore what first She on them spent,
They gratefully again present:
The meadow carpets where to tread;
The garden flow'rs to crown Her head;
And for a glass the limpid brook,
Where She may all her beauties look;
But, since She would not have them seen,
The wood about her draws a screen.

---

[1] quills floats; angles fishing tackle.

[2] bonne mine good appearance; bonne is disyllabic.

[3] eben shuts black shutters; halcyon kingfisher.

[4] stupid stupified.

[5] assist stand by (OED assist v I).

[6] vitrified perfected by being turned into glass; a "sea of glass" occurs several times in Revelation (e.g. 4:6); see also Henry Vaughan ("L'Envoy," line 12), for the image of all Nature being vitrified. As Elizabeth Donno points out, a lady's power over a landscape was a standard topos.

89

For She, to higher beauties raised,
Disdains to be for lesser praised.
She counts her beauty to converse
In all the languages as hers; [1]
Nor yet in those herself employs
But for that wisdom, not the noise;
Nor yet that wisdom would affect,
But as 'tis Heaven's dialect.

90

Blest Nymph! that couldst so soon prevent
Those Trains by Youth against thee meant:
Tears (wat'ry shot that pierce the mind);
And sighs (Love's cannon charged with wind);
True Praise (that breaks through all defence);
And feigned complying Innocence;
But knowing where this Ambush lay,
She 'scaped the safe, but roughest way.

91

This 'tis to have been from the first
In a Domestic Heaven nursed,
Under the Discipline severe
Of Fairfax, and the starry Vere;
Where not one object can come nigh
But pure, and spotless as the eye;
And Goodness doth itself entail
On Females, if there want a Male.

92

Go now, fond Sex, that on your Face
Do all your useless Study place,
Nor once at Vice your Brows dare knit
Lest the smooth Forehead wrinkled sit:
Yet your own Face shall at you grin,
Thorough the black-bag of your skin, [2]
When knowledge only could have filled
And Virtue all those furrows tilled.

93

Hence She with graces more divine
Supplies beyond her sex the line;
And like a sprig of mistletoe
On the Fairfacian Oak does grow;
Whence, for some universal good,
The Priest shall cut the sacred bud,
While her glad Parents most rejoice,
And make their Destiny their Choice. [3]

94

Meantime, ye fields, springs, bushes, flowers,
Where yet She leads her studious hours,
(Till Fate her worthily translates,
And find a Fairfax for our Thwaites),
Employ the means you have by Her,
And in your kind yourselves prefer;
That, as all Virgins she precedes,
So you all woods, streams, gardens, meads.

95

For you, Thessalian Tempe's Seat
Shall now be scorned as obsolete;
Aranjuez, as less, disdained;
The Bel-Retiro as constrained; [4]
But name not the Idalian Grove—
For 'twas the seat of wanton love— [5]
Much less the Dead's Elysian Fields,
Yet nor to them your Beauty yields.

---

[1] all the languages In a 1651 poem to his friend Robert Witty, Marvell writes that "Celia whose English doth more richly flow / Than Tagus ...Now learns the tongues of France and Italy." "Celia" seems likely to refer to Mary Fairfax.

[2] black-bag mask. The meaning is that knowledge and virtue make a woman more attractive than do cosmetics.

[3] glad Parents...Destiny their Choice In 1657 Mary married the second Duke of Buckingham, son of the disastrous favourite of James I and Charles I, and himself described by David Ogg as setting "a standard of ducal independence and vagary never since approached." He was the Zimri of Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel.

[4] Thessalian Tempe's Seat celebrated as a locus amoenus (delightful place) by classical poets; Aranjuez and Bel-Retiro both royal residences in Spain.

[5] Idalian Grove in Cyprus, haunt of Venus.

369 - 776

poet who retreats

96

'Tis not, what once it was, the World,
But a rude heap together hurled,
All negligently overthrown,
Gulfs, deserts, precipices, stone.[1]
Your lesser World contains the same,
But in more decent order tame;
You Heaven's Centre, Nature's lap,
And Paradise's only Map.[2]

97

But now the Salmon-Fishers moist
Their leathern boats begin to hoist,
And, like Antipodes in shoes,
Have shod their heads in their canoes.[3]
How Tortoise-like, but not so slow,
These rational Amphibii go![4]
Let's in: for the dark Hemisphere
Does now like one of them appear.
—1681

The Garden

1

How vainly men themselves amaze
To win the palm, the oak, or bays,[5]
And their uncessant labours see
Crowned from some single herb or tree,
Whose short and narrow vergèd shade
Does prudently their toils upbraid,
While all flow'rs and all trees do close
To weave the garlands of repose.

2

Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
And Innocence, thy sister dear!
Mistaken long, I sought you then
In busy companies of men.
Your sacred plants, if here below, - other places
Only among the plants will grow.
Society is all but rude,
To this delicious solitude.
sensuous?

3

No white nor red was ever seen[6]
So am'rous as this lovely green.
Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
Cut in these trees their mistress' name.
Little, alas, they know, or heed,
How far these beauties hers exceed!
Fair trees! wheres'e'er your barks I wound,
No name shall but your own be found.

4

When we have run our passion's heat,
Love hither makes his best retreat.
The gods, that mortal beauty chase,
Still in a tree did end their race.
Apollo hunted Daphne so,
Only that she might laurel grow.
And Pan did after Syrinx speed,
Not as a nymph, but for a reed.[7]

sexual metamorphosis

---

[1] Margoliouth considered that this means that since Nun Appleton set a new standard, the world had become by comparison a rude heap; perhaps, but an allusion to "the world turned upside down" by civil strife is also likely.

[2] lesser World the "microcosm" of Nun Appleton.

[3] Antipodes in shoes "The Antipodes wear their shoes on their heads" (Cleveland, Square Cap, line 19). Antipodes: literally, "having the feet opposite" (OED).

[4] rational Amphibii The salmon-fishers are creatures of both land and water. Sir Thomas Browne had described man as "that great and true amphibium."

[5] the palm, the oak, or bays wreaths; the traditional awards for military, political, or poetic achievement; the "bays" are laurel bays.

[6] white nor red emblematic of female beauty.

[7] two myths about the pursuit of fame and the metamorphosis of desire into art. Chased by Apollo, god of poetry, Daphne turned into the laurel tree that became his sacred emblem. Chased by Pan, the god of flocks and shepherds, Syrinx turned into a reed, the basis of the pan pipe, emblem of pastoral poetry.

5
What wondrous life is this I lead!
Ripe apples drop about my head;
The luscious clusters of the vine
Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
The nectarine, and curious peach,
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

6
Meanwhile the mind, from pleasures less,
Withdraws into its happiness:
The mind, that ocean where each kind
Does straight its own resemblance find, [1]
Yet it creates, transcending these,
Far other worlds, and other seas,
Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade.

7
Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
Or at some fruit-tree's mossy root,
Casting the body's vest aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide:
There like a bird it sits, and sings,
Then whets, and combs its silver wings; [2]
And, till prepared for longer flight,
Waves in its plumes the various light.

8
Such was that happy garden-state,
While man there walked without a mate:
After a place so pure, and sweet,
What other help could yet be meet!
But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
To wander solitary there:
Two paradises 'twere in one
To live in paradise alone.

9
How well the skilful gardener drew
Of flowers and herbs this dial new, [3]
Where from above the milder sun
Does through a fragrant zodiac run;
And, as it works, the industrious bee
Computes its time as well as we.
How could such sweet and wholesome hours
Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers!
—1681 (EARLY 1650S?)

Christianity? Relationship w/ God. The body? mortality?

On a Drop of Dew

See how the orient dew, A
Shed from the bosom of the morn B
Into the blowing roses, C
Yet careless of its mansion new, A
For the clear region where 'twas born B
Round in itself incloses: C
And in its little globe's extent, D
Frames as it can its native element. D
How it the purple flow'r does slight, E
Scarce touching where it lies, F
But gazing back upon the skies, F
Shines with a mournful light, E
Like its own tear, G
Because so long divided from the sphere. G
Restless it rolls and unsecure, H
Trembling lest it grow impure, H
Till the warm sun pity its pain, I
And to the skies exhale it back again. I
So the soul, that drop, that ray J
Of the clear fountain of eternal day, J
Could it within the human flow'r be seen, K
Remembering still its former height, L
Shuns the sweet leaves and blossoms green, K

---

[1] alluding to the belief that the sea contained a counterpart for every plant and animal on land.

[2] whets preens.

[3] dial sundial; the garden itself is an hourly and seasonal clock.

And recollecting its own light, L
Does, in its pure and circling thoughts, express M
The greater heaven in an heaven less. M
In how coy a figure wound, N
Every way it turns away: O N
So the world excluding round, O
Yet receiving in the day, P
Dark beneath, but bright above, P
Here disdaining, there is love.
How loose and easy hence to go, Q
How girt and ready to ascend, R
Moving but on a point below, Q
It all about does upwards bend. R
Such did the manna's sacred dew distill, S
White and entire, though congealed and chill, S
Congealed on earth: but does, dissolving, run, T
Into the glories of th'almighty sun. T
—1681

A Dialogue between the Soul and Body

Soul

O, who shall from this dungeon raise
A soul, enslaved so many ways?
With bolts of bones, that fettered stands
In feet, and manacled in hands.
Here blinded with an eye; and there
Deaf with the drumming of an ear.
A soul hung up, as 'twere, in chains
Of nerves, and arteries, and veins,
Tortured, besides each other part,
In a vain head, and double heart.

Body

O, who shall me deliver whole,
From bonds of this tyrannic soul?
Which, stretched upright, impales me so,
That mine own precipice I go;[1]
And warms and moves this needless frame[2]
(A fever could but do the same),
And, wanting where its spite to try,
Has made me live to let me die,
A body that could never rest,
Since this ill spirit it possessed.

Soul

What magic could me thus confine
Within another's grief to pine?
Where, whatsoever it complain,
I feel, that cannot feel, the pain,
And all my care itself employs,
That to preserve, which me destroys:
Constrained not only to endure
Diseases, but, what's worse, the cure:
And ready oft the port to gain,
Am shipwrecked into health again.

Body

But physic yet could never teach
The maladies thou me dost reach:
Whom first the cramp of hope does tear,
And then the palsy shakes of fear;
The pestilence of love does heat,
Or hatred's hidden ulcer eat;
Joy's cheerful madness does perplex,
Or sorrow's other madness vex;
Which knowledge forces me to know,
And memory will not forgo.
What but a soul could have the wit
To build me up for sin so fit?
So architects do square and hew,
Green trees that in the forest grew.
—1681 (WRITTEN LATE 1640S-EARLY 1650S?)

---

[1] mine own precipice I go explained by Marvell's use of the same image in his Rehearsal Transpros'd: "After he was stretch'd to such an height in his own fancy, that he could not look down from top to toe but his Eyes dazzled at the precipice of his stature" (1,64).

[2] needless having no need.

The Mower against Gardens

Luxurious man, to bring his vice in use,
Did after him the world seduce,
And from the fields the flowers and plants allure,
Where nature was most plain and pure.
He first enclosed within the gardens square
A dead and standing pool of air,
And a more luscious earth for them did knead,
Which stupified them while it fed.
The pink grew then as double as his mind;
The nutriment did change the kind.
With strange perfumes he did the roses taint,
And flowers themselves were taught to paint.
The tulip, white, did for complexion seek,
And learned to interline its cheek:
Its onion root they then so high did hold,
That one was for a meadow sold. [1]
Another world was searched, through oceans new,
To find the Marvel of Peru. [2]
And yet these rarities might be allowed
To man, that sovereign thing and proud,
Had he not dealt between the bark and tree, [3]
Forbidden mixtures there to see.
No plant now knew the stock from which it came;
He grafts upon the wild the tame:
That th' uncertain and adulterate fruit
Might put the palate in dispute.
His green seraglio has its eunuchs too,
Lest any tyrant him outdo.
And in the cherry he does nature vex,
To procreate without a sex.
'Tis all enforced, the fountain and the grot,
While the sweet fields do lie forgot:
Where willing Nature does to all dispense
A wild and fragrant innocence:
And fauns and fairies do the meadows till,
More by their presence than their skill.
Their statues, polished by some ancient hand,
May to adorn the gardens stand:
But howsoe'er the figures do excel,
The gods themselves with us do dwell.
—1681

ambiguities

Damon the Mower

1

Hark how the Mower Damon sung,
With love of Juliana stung!
While everything did seem to paint
The scene more fit for his complaint.
Like her fair eyes the day was fair,
But scorching like his am'rous care.
Sharp like his scythe his sorrow was,
And withered like his hopes the grass.

2

"Oh what unusual heats are here,
Which thus our sunburned meadows sear!
The grasshopper its pipe gives o'er;
And hamstringed frogs can dance no more.
But in the brook the green frog wades;
And grasshoppers seek out the shades.
Only the snake, that kept within,
Now glitters in its second skin.

3

"This heat the sun could never raise,
Nor Dog Star so inflame the days.
It from an higher beauty grow'th,
Which burns the fields and mower both:
Which mads the dog, and makes the sun
Hotter than his own Phaëton. [4]

---

[1] For a meadow sold referring to the "tulip mania" in Holland in the 1630s, during which spectacular prices were paid for some bulbs.

[2] Marvel of Peru a multi-coloured tropical flower.

[3] between the bark and tree proverbial expression for interfering activity, here made literal through the reference to grafting.

[4] Phaëton He set the world on fire when driving the chariot of his father, the sun god.

Not July causeth these extremes,
But Juliana's scorching beams. [1]

4

"Tell me where I may pass the fires
Of the hot day, or hot desires.
To what cool cave shall I descend,
Or to what gelid fountain bend?
Alas! I look for ease in vain,
When remedies themselves complain.
No moisture but my tears do rest,
Nor cold but in her icy breast.

5

"How long wilt thou, fair shepherdess,
Esteem me, and my presents less?
To thee the harmless snake I bring,
Disarmèd of its teeth and sting;
To thee chameleons, changing hue,
And oak leaves tipped with honey dew.
Yet thou, ungrateful, hast not sought
Nor what they are, nor who them brought.

6

"I am the Mower Damon, known
Through all the meadows I have mown.
On me the morn her dew distills
Before her darling daffodils.
And, if at noon my toil me heat,
The sun himself licks off my sweat.
While, going home, the evening sweet
In cowslip-water bathes my feet.

7

"What, though the piping shepherd stock
The plains with an unnumbered flock,
This scythe of mine discovers wide
More ground than all his sheep do hide.
With this the golden fleece I shear
Of all these closes every year.
And though in wool more poor than they,
Yet am I richer far in hay.

8

"Nor am I so deformed to sight,
If in my scythe I lookèd right;
In which I see my picture done,
As in a crescent moon the sun.
The deathless fairies takes me oft
To lead them in their dances soft:
And, when I tune myself to sing,
About me they contract their ring.

9

"How happy might I still have mowed,
Had not Love here his thistles sowed!
But now I all the day complain,
Joining my labour to my pain;
And with my scythe cut down the grass,
Yet still my grief is where it was:
But, when the iron blunter grows,
Sighing, I whet my scythe and woes."

10

While thus he threw his elbow round,
Depopulating all the ground,
And, with his whistling scythe, does cut
Each stroke between the earth and root,
The edgèd steel by careless chance
Did into his own ankle glance;
And there among the grass fell down,
By his own scythe, the Mower mown.

11

"Alas!" said he, "these hurts are slight
To those that die by love's despite.
With shepherd's-purse, and clown's-all-heal, [2]
The blood I staunch, and wound I seal.
Only for him no cure is found,

---

[1] July accented on the first syllable; the modern English pronunciation is abnormal and unexplained (OED).

[2] shepherd's-purse, and clown's-all-heal herbs traditionally used to stanch bleeding and to heal wounds.

Whom Juliana's eyes do wound.
'Tis death alone that this must do:
For Death thou art a Mower too." —1681

The Mower to the Glow-worms

1

Ye living lamps, by whose dear light
The nightingale does sit so late,
And studying all the summer night,
Her matchless songs does meditate;

2

Ye country comets, that portend
No war, nor prince's funeral,
Shining unto no higher end
Than to presage the grass's fall;

3

Ye glow-worms, whose officious flame
To wandering mowers shows the way,
That in the night have lost their aim,
And after foolish fires do stray; [1]

4

Your courteous lights in vain you waste,
Since Juliana here is come,
For she my mind hath so displaced
That I shall never find my home.
—1681

The Mower's Song

1

My mind was once the true survey
Of all these meadows fresh and gay,
And in the greenness of the grass
Did see its hopes as in a glass;
When Juliana came, and she
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.

2

But these, while I with sorrow pine,
Grew more luxuriant still and fine,
That not one blade of grass you spied,
But had a flower on either side;
When Juliana came, and she
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.

3

Unthankful meadows, could you so
A fellowship so true forgo,
And in your gaudy May-games meet,
While I lay trodden under feet?
When Juliana came, and she
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.

4

But what you in compassion ought,
Shall now by my revenge be wrought:
And flow'rs, and grass, and I and all,
Will in one common ruin fall.
For Juliana comes, and she
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.

5

And thus, ye meadows, which have been
Companions of my thoughts more green,
Shall now the heraldry become
With which I will adorn my tomb;
For Juliana comes, and she
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.
—1681

The Character of Holland

Holland, that scarce deserves the name of land,
As but the off-scouring of the British sand;
And so much earth as was contributed

---

[1] foolish fires a literal translation of ignes fatui (will-o'-the-wisps), but also, figuratively, the fires of passion.

By English pilots when they heaved the lead;
Or what by th' ocean's slow alluvion fell [1]
Of shipwrecked cockle and the mussel shell;
This indigested vomit of the sea
Fell to the Dutch by just propriety. [2]
Glad then, as miners that have found the ore,
That with mad labour fished the land to shore,
And dived as desperately for each piece
Of earth, as if't had been of ambergris,
Collecting anxiously small loads of clay,
Less than what building swallows bear away,
Or than those pills which sordid beetles roll,
Transfusing into them their dunghill soul.
How did they rivet, with gigantic piles,
Thorough the centre their new-catchèd miles,
And to the stake a struggling country bound,
Where barking waves still bait the forcèd ground,
Building their wat'ry Babel far more high
To reach the sea, than those to scale the sky.
Yet still his claim the injured ocean laid,
And oft at leap-frog o'er their steeples played:
As if on purpose it on land had come
To show them what's their Mare Liberum. [3]
A daily deluge over them does boil;
The earth and water play at level-coil; [4]
The fish oftimes the burger dispossessed,
And sat not as a meat but as a guest.
And oft the tritons and the sea nymphs saw
Whole shoals of Dutch served up by cabillau; [5]
Or as they over the new level ranged
For pickled herring, pickled Heeren changed.
Nature, it seemed, ashamed of her mistake,
Would throw their land away at duck and drake. [6]
Therefore necessity, that first made kings,
Something like government among them brings.
For as with pygmies, who best kills the crane,
Among the hungry, he that treasures grain,
Among the blind, the one-eyed blinkard reigns,
So rules among the drownèd, he that drains.
Not who first sees the rising sun commands,
But who could first discern the rising lands.
Who best could know to pump an earth so leak
Him they their Lord and country's Father speak.
To make a bank was a great plot of state;
Invent a shovel, and be magistrate.
Hence some small dyke-grave unperceived invades [7]
The power, and grows, as 'twere, a King of Spades.
But for less envy some joint states endures,
Who look like a Commission of the Sewers.
For these Half-anders, half wet, and half dry,
Nor bear strict service, nor pure liberty. [8]
'Tis probable Religion after this
Came next in order, which they could not miss.
How could the Dutch but be converted, when
Th'Apostles were so many fishermen?
Besides, the waters of themselves did rise,
And, as their land, so them did re-baptize,
Though herring for their god few voices missed,
And Poor-John to have been th' Evangelist. [9]
Faith, that could never twins conceive before,
Never so fertile, spawned upon this shore,
More pregnant than their Marg'ret, that laid down
For Hans-in-Kelder of a whole Hans-town. [10]
Sure when Religion did itself embark,
And from the East would Westward steer its ark,

---

[1] alluvion alluvium; the gradual build-up of land deposited as sediment (OED alluvion 1, 3–5).

[2] just propriety appropriately (because of their drinking habits).

[3] Mare Liberum the freedom of the seas; the title of a book (1609) by the Dutch jurist Hugo Grotius.

[4] level-coil a game in which "each player is in turn driven from his seat and supplanted by another" (OED level-coil).

[5] cabillau codfish (French).

[6] duck and drake a game of skipping stones; figuratively, to squander (OED duck and drake 1–2).

[7] dyke-grave Dutch official responsible for inspecting the dykes.

[8] Half-anders as opposed to Holl (whole)-anders.

[9] Poor-John dried salt fish (OED Poor John 1).

[10] A Dutch woman reputedly gave birth to 365 children at one time; Hans-in-kelder "Hans-in-the-cellar," an unborn child (Dutch).

It struck, and splitting on this unknown ground,
Each one thence pillaged the first piece he found:
Hence Amsterdam, Turk-Christian-Pagan-Jew,
Staple of sects and mint of schism grew,
That bank of conscience, where not one so strange
Opinion but finds credit, and exchange.
In vain for Catholics ourselves we bear;
The Universal Church is only there. [1]
  Nor can civility there want for tillage,
Where wisely for their court they chose a village. [2]
How fit a title clothes their governors,
Themselves the Hogs, as all their subjects Bores! [3]
  Let it suffice to give their country fame
That it had one Civilis called by name,
Some fifteen hundred and more years ago; [4]
But surely never any that was so.
  See but their mermaids with their tails of fish,
Reeking at church over the chafing-dish: [5]
A vestal turf enshrined in earthen ware
Fumes through the loopholes of a wooden square.
Each to the temple with these altars tend
(But still does place it at her western end),
While the fat steam of female sacrifice
Fills the priest's nostrils and puts out his eyes.
  Or what a spectacle the skipper gross,
A water-Hercules butter-coloss,
Tunned up with all their several towns of Beer; [6]
When staggering upon some land, snick and sneer,
They try, like statuaries, if they can
Cut out each other's Athos to a man: [7]
And carve in their large bodies, where they please,
The arms of the United Provinces.
  But when such amity at home is showed,
What then are their confederacies abroad?
Let this one court'sy witness all the rest:
When their whole navy they together pressed—
Not Christian captives to redeem from bands,
Or intercept the Western golden sands—
No, but all ancient rights and leagues must vail, [8]
Rather than to the English strike their sail;
To whom their weather-beaten province owes
Itself—when as some greater vessel tows
A cockboat tossed with the same wind and fate—
We buoyed so often up their sinking state.
  Was this Jus Belli & Pacis? Could this be [9]
Cause why their burgomaster of the sea [10]
Rammed with gun powder, flaming with brand wine,
Should raging hold his linstock to the mine,
While, with feigned treaties, they invade by stealth
Our sore new circumcisèd Commonwealth?
  Yet of his vain attempt no more he sees
Than of case-butter shot and bullet-cheese.
And the torn navy staggered with him home, [11]
While the sea laughed itself into a foam.
'Tis true since that (as fortune kindly sports),
A wholesome danger drove us to our ports, [12]
While half their banished keels the tempest tossed,

---

[1] Catholics... Universal Church The English church, which retained bishops, and hence the "apostolic succession," regarded itself as Catholic. Dutch cities offered a rare degree of religious toleration, hence their popularity as refuges for religious exiles.

[2] a village The Hague.

[3] Hogs... Bores punning on "hoog" (high), part of the title used by the ruling Dutch States-General, and Boers.

[4] Civilis Gaius Julius Civilis, a noble Batavian who led a revolt against the Romans in 69–70 C.E.

[5] chafing-dish referring to the small stoves used in Dutch churches.

[6] Beer punning on the common Dutch town prefix "Bier."

[7] cut each other's Athos An ancient sculptor proposed to carve Mount Athos into the shape of Alexander; Dutch skippers, by implication, were large as well as belligerent.

[8] vail salute or show respect to by lowering the flag (OED vail v^2 I).

[9] Jus Belli & Pacis the law of war and peace, the title of another work (1625) by Hugo Grotius.

[10] their burgomaster of the sea the Dutch Admiral Martin Harpertzoon Van Tromp (1597–1653).

[11] staggered with him home in an engagement with the English in May 1652, the Dutch lost two ships.

[12] In November 1652, the Dutch inflicted severe damage on the English fleet; Marvell puts the loss in the best possible light.

Half, bound at home in prison to the frost:
That ours meantime at leisure might careen,
In a calm winter, under skies serene,
As the obsequious air and waters rest,
Till the dear halcyon hatch out all its nest.
The Commonwealth doth by its losses grow;
And, like its own seas, only ebbs to flow.
Besides, that very agitation laves,
And purges out the corruptible waves.
And now again our armèd Bucentore [1]
Doth yearly their sea nuptials restore.
And now their hydra of seven provinces
Is strangled by our infant Hercules. [2]
Their tortoise wants its vainly stretchèd neck;
Their navy all our conquest or our wreck;
Or, what is left, their Carthage overcome
Would render fain unto our better Rome,
Unless our Senate, lest their youth disuse
The war, (but who would?) peace, if begged, refuse.
For now of nothing may our state despair,
Darling of heaven, and of men the care;
Provided that they be what they have been,
Watchful abroad, and honest still within.
For while our Neptune doth a trident shake,
Steeled with those piercing heads—Deane,
Monck, and Blake— [3]
And while Jove governs in the highest sphere,
Vainly in Hell let Pluto domineer.
—1665 AND 1672 (LINES 1-100), 1681 (1653)

Bermudas

Where the remote Bermudas ride
In th' Ocean's bosom unespied
From a small boat, that rowed along,
The listening Winds received this song.
"What should we do but sing his praise
That led us through the watery maze,
Unto an isle so long unknown, [4]
And yet far kinder than our own?
Where he the huge sea-monsters wracks,
That lift the deep upon their backs,
He lands us on a grassy stage,
Safe from the storms, and prelate's rage.
He gave us this eternal spring,
Which here enamels everything,
And sends the fowl to us in care,
On daily visits through the air.
He hangs in shades the orange bright,
Like golden lamps in a green night,
And does in the pom'granates close
Jewels more rich than Ormus shows. [5]
He makes the figs our mouths to meet,
And throws the melons at our feet,
But apples plants of such a price,[6]
No tree could ever bear them twice.
With cedars, chosen by his hand,
From Lebanon, he stores the land,
And makes the hollow seas, that roar,
Proclaim the ambergris on shore. [7]
He cast (of which we rather boast)
The gospel's pearl upon our coast, [8]

every thing a human could want

---

[1] Bucentore the ceremonial galley used to celebrate the annual marriage of Venice to the sea.

[2] infant Hercules "infant" because the Commonwealth was but "new circumcised" (l. 118); killing the multi-headed hydra was Hercules' second labour.

[3] The three British Generals-at-Sea, Richard Deane (1610–1653), Robert Blake (1599–1657), and George Monck (1608–1670).

[4] an isle…unknown The group of islands in the North Atlantic was discovered by Juan Bermudez in 1515.

[5] Ormus Compare Milton's "the wealth of Ormus and of Ind" (PL 2.2). Ormus, in the Persian Gulf, was famous as a jewel market.

[6] apples pineapples.

[7] Proclaim make known (OED proclaim v. 4 fig.); ambergris a wax-like substance found floating in tropical seas, used in perfumery (OED ambergris).

[8] The gospel's pearl See Matthew 13:45–46.

And in these rocks for us did frame
A temple, where to sound his name.
Oh let our voice his praise exalt,
Till it arrive at heaven's vault:
Which thence (perhaps) rebounding, may
Echo beyond the Mexique Bay."
Thus sung they, in the English boat,
An holy and a cheerful note,
And all the way, to guide their chime,
With falling oars they kept the time.[1]
—1681

Place x time come in

The First Anniversary of the Government under His Highness the Lord Protector[2]

Like the vain curlings of the wat'ry maze,
Which in smooth streams a sinking weight does raise,
So Man, declining always, disappears
In the weak circles of increasing years;
And his short tumults of themselves compose,
While flowing Time above his head does close.
Cromwell alone with greater vigour runs,
(Sun-like) the stages of succeeding suns:
And still the day which he doth next restore,
Is the just wonder of the day before.
Cromwell alone doth with new lustre spring,
And shines the jewel of the yearly ring.
'Tis he the force of scattered Time contracts,
And in one year the work of ages acts:
While heavy monarchs make a wide return,
Longer, and more malignant than Saturn:[3]
And though they all Plàtonic years should reign,[4]
In the same posture would be found again.
Their earthy projects under ground they lay,
More slow and brittle than the China clay:[5]
Well may they strive to leave them to their son,
For one thing never was by one king done.
Yet some more active for a frontier town,
Taken by proxy, beg a false renown;
Another triumphs at the public cost,
And will have won, if he no more have lost;
They fight by others, but in person wrong,
And only are against their subjects strong;
Their other wars seem but a feigned contést,
This common enemy is still oppressed;
If conquerors, on them they turn their might;
If conquered, on them they wreak their spite:
They neither build the Temple in their days,
Nor matter for succeeding founders raise;[6]
Nor sacred prophecies consult within,
Much less themself to pérfect them begin;
No other care they bear of things above,
But with astrologers divine of Jove
To know how long their planet yet reprieves
From the deservèd fate their guilty lives:
Thus (image-like) an useless time they tell,
And with vain sceptre, strike the hourly bell,
Nor more contribute to the state of things,
Than wooden heads unto the viol's strings.
While indefatigable Cromwell hies,
And cuts his way still nearer to the skies,
Learning a music in the region clear,
To tune this lower to that higher sphere.

---

[1] In the last two lines Marvell wittily reverses the usual relationship between sailors' shanties and their work. Here the work is subsidiary to the song of praise.

[2] Oliver Cromwell accepted the Instrument of Government, the constitution that made him Lord Protector, in December 1653.

[3] Saturn the planet with the longest orbit known at the time; traditionally considered astrologically unfavourable.

[4] Platonic years the period that would end when all heavenly bodies returned to their original positions, calculated between 26,000 and 36,000 years.

[5] China clay porcelain, the preparation of which was thought to involve burying the clay for an extended period.

[6] Contrasting modern monarchs with David and Solomon (I Chronicles 28–29).

So when Amphion did the lute command, [1]
Which the god gave him, with his gentle hand,
The rougher stones, unto his measures hewed,
Danced up in order from the quarries rude;
This took a lower, that an higher place,
As he the treble altered, or the bass:
No note he struck, but a new stone was laid,
And the great work ascended while he played.
The listening structures he with wonder eyed,
And still new stops to various time applied:
Now through the strings a martial rage he throws,
And joining straight the Theban tower arose;
Then as he strokes them with a touch more sweet,
The flocking marbles in a palace meet;
But, for he most the graver notes did try,
Therefore the temples reared their columns high:
Thus, ere he ceased, his sacred lute creates
Th' harmonious city of the seven gates.
Such was that wondrous order and consent,
When Cromwell tuned the ruling Instrument, [2]
While tedious statesmen many years did hack,
Framing a liberty that still went back,
Whose num'rous gorge could swallow in an hour
That island, which the sea cannot devour:
Then our Amphion issues out and sings,
And once he struck, and twice, the powerful strings.
The Commonwealth then first together came,
And each one entered in the willing frame;
All other matter yields, and may be ruled;
But who the minds of stubborn men can build?
No quarry bears a stone so hardly wrought,
Nor with such labour from its centre brought;
None to be sunk in the foundation bends,
Each in the house the highest place contends,
And each the hand that lays him will direct,
And some fall back upon the architect;
Yet all composed by his attractive song,
Into the animated city throng.
The Commonwealth does through their centres all
Draw the circumf'rence of the public wall;
The crossest spirits here do take their part,
Fast'ning the contignation which they thwart; [3]
And they, whose nature leads them to divide,
Uphold, this one, and that the other side;
But the most equal still sustain the height,
And they as pillars keep the work upright,
While the resistance of opposèd minds,
The fabric (as with arches) stronger binds,
Which on the basis of a senate free,
Knit by the roof's protecting weight, agree.
When for his foot he thus a place had found,
He hurls e'er since the world about him round, [4]
And in his several aspects, like a star,
Here shines in peace, and thither shoots in war,
While by his beams observing princes steer,
And wisely court the influence they fear.
O would they rather by his pattern won
Kiss the approaching, not yet angry Son; [5]
And in their numbered footsteps humbly tread
The path where holy oracles do lead;
How might they under such a captain raise
The great designs kept for the latter days!
But mad with reason (so miscalled) of state
They know them not, and what they know not, hate.
Hence still they sing hosanna to the whore,
And her, whom they should massacre, adore:

---

[1] Amphion In classical myth, Amphion built a wall around Thebes by playing his lyre (given him by the god Hermes) with such skill that the stones moved of their own accord.

[2] Instrument with a pun on the Instrument of Government, the constitution that established Cromwell as Lord Protector.

[3] contignation frame (OED contignation 2). This passage plays on architectural metaphors to suggest that the presence of opposing interests within a country paradoxically provides strength when the government is framed as a commonwealth.

[4] his foot The Greek mathematician Archimedes reportedly claimed that, given a place to stand and a lever long enough, he could move the world.

[5] See Psalm 2:10–12.

But Indians, whom they should convert, subdue;
Nor teach, but traffic with, or burn the Jew.[1]
Unhappy princes, ignorantly bred,
By malice some, by error more misled,
If gracious heaven to my life give length,
Leisure to time, and to my weakness strength,
Then shall I once with graver accents shake
Your regal sloth, and your long slumbers wake:
Like the shrill huntsman that prevents the east,
Winding his horn to kings that chase the beast.
Till then my muse shall hollo far behind
Angelic Cromwell who outwings the wind,
And in dark nights, and in cold days alone
Pursues the monster thorough every throne:[2]
Which shrinking to her Roman den impure,
Gnashes her gory teeth; nor there secure.
Hence oft I think if in some happy hour
High grace should meet in one with highest power,
And then a seasonable people still
Should bend to his, as he to heaven's will,
What we might hope, what wonderful effect
From such a wished conjuncture might reflect.
Sure, the mysterious work, where none withstand,
Would forthwith finish under such a hand:
Foreshortened time its useless course would stay,
And soon precipitate the latest day.
But a thick cloud about that morning lies,
And intercepts the beams of mortal eyes,
That 'tis the most which we determine can,
If these the times, then this must be the man.
And well he therefore does, and well has guessed,
Who in his age has always forward pressed;
And knowing not where heaven's choice may light,
Girds yet his sword, and ready stands to fight;
But men, alas, as if they nothing cared,
Look on, all unconcerned, or unprepared;
And stars still fall, and still the dragon's tail
Swinges the volumes of its horrid flail.
For the great justice that did first suspend
The world by sin, does by the same extend.
Hence that blest day still counterpoisèd wastes,
The ill delaying what th'elected hastes;
Hence landing nature to new seas is tossed,
And good designs still with their authors lost.
And thou, great Cromwell, for whose happy birth
A mould was chosen out of better earth;
Whose saint-like mother we did lately see
Live out an age, long as a pedigree;[3]
That she might seem (could we the Fall dispute),
T'have smelled the blossom, and not eat the fruit;
Though none does of more lasting parents grow,
Yet never any did them honour so,
Though thou thine heart from evil still unstained,
And always hast thy tongue from fraud refrained;
Thou, who so oft through storms of thundering lead
Hast born securely thine undaunted head,
Thy breast through poniarding conspiracies,
Drawn from the sheath of lying prophecies;
Thee proof beyond all other force or skill,
Our sins endanger, and shall one day kill.
How near they failed, and in thy sudden fall
At once assayed to overturn us all.[4]
Our brutish fury struggling to be free,
Hurried thy horses while they hurried thee,
When thou hadst almost quit thy mortal cares,
And soiled in dust thy crown of silver hairs.
Let this one sorrow interweave among

---

[1] The conversion of the Jews was thought to be a necessary prelude to the arrival of Judgement Day; with this in mind, Cromwell in 1655 formally readmitted Jews into England, from which they had been banned since 1290.

[2] monster the Whore of Babylon (Revelation 17:5), identified by Protestant commentators with the Roman Catholic church.

[3] Cromwell's mother Elizabeth died in November 1654, at the age of ninety-four.

[4] thy sudden fall In September 1654, Cromwell survived a potentially fatal accident when he overturned while driving a coach with six horses in Hyde Park.

The other glories of our yearly song.
Like skilful looms, which through the costly thread
Of purling ore, a shining wave do shed:
So shall the tears we on past grief employ,
Still as they trickle, glitter in our joy.
So with more modesty we may be true,
And speak, as of the dead, the praises due:
While impious men deceived with pleasure short,
On their own hopes shall find the fall retort.
But the poor beasts, wanting their noble guide,
(What could they more?) shrunk guiltily aside.
First wingèd Fear transports them far away,
And leaden Sorrow then their flight did stay.
See how they each his towering crest abate,
And the green grass, and their known mangers hate,
Nor through wide nostrils snuff the wanton air,
Nor their round hoofs, or curlèd manes compare;
With wand'ring eyes, and restless ears they stood,
And with shrill neighings asked him of the wood.
Thou, Cromwell, falling, not a stupid tree,
Or rock so savage, but it mourned for thee:
And all about was heard a panic groan,
As if that Nature's self were overthrown.
It seemed the earth did from the centre tear;
It seemed the sun was fall'n out of the sphere:
Justice obstructed lay, and reason fooled;
Courage disheartened, and religion cooled.
A dismal silence through the palace went,
And then loud shrieks the vaulted marbles rent,
Such as the dying chorus sings by turns,
And to deaf seas, and ruthless tempests mourns,
When now they sink, and now the plundering streams
Break up each deck, and rip the oaken seams.
But thee triumphant hence the fiery car,
And fiery steeds had borne out of the war,
From the low world, and thankless men above,
Unto the kingdom blest of peace and love:
We only mourned ourselves, in thine ascent,
Whom thou hadst left beneath with mantle rent.
For all delight of life thou then didst lose,
When to command, thou didst thyself depose;
Resigning up thy privacy so dear,
To turn the headstrong people's charioteer;
For to be Cromwell was a greater thing,
Than ought below, or yet above a king:
Therefore thou rather didst thyself depress,
Yielding to rule, because it made thee less.
For, neither didst thou from the first apply
Thy sober spirit unto things too high,
But in thine own fields exercised'st long,
An healthful mind within a body strong;
Till at the seventh time thou in the skies,
As a small cloud, like a man's hand, didst rise; [1]
Then did thick mists and winds the air deform,
And down at last thou poured'st the fertile storm,
Which to the thirsty land did plenty bring,
But, though forewarned, o'ertook and wet the King.
What since he did, an higher force him pushed
Still from behind, and yet before him rushed,
Though undiscerned among the tumult blind,
Who think those high decrees by man designed.
'Twas Heaven would not that his power should cease,
But walk still middle betwixt war and peace:
Choosing each stone, and poising every weight,
Trying the measures of the breadth and height;
Here pulling down, and there erecting new,
Founding a firm state by proportions true.
When Gideon so did from the war retreat, [2]
Yet by the conquest of two kings grown great,
He on the peace extends a warlike power,
And Isr'el silent saw him raze the tower;
And how he Succoth's Elders durst suppress,

---

[1] the seventh time…didst rise recalling Elijah, who obtained rain for a drought-stricken Israel (I Kings 18:44).

[2] Gideon see Judges 8:9.

With thorns and briars of the wilderness.
No king might ever such a force have done;
Yet would not he be Lord, nor yet his son.
Thou with the same strength, and an heart as plain,
Didst (like thine olive) still refuse to reign,[1]
Though why should others all thy labour spoil,
And brambles be anointed with thine oil,
Whose climbing flame, without a timely stop,
Had quickly levelled every cedar's top?
Therefore first growing to thyself a law,
Th' ambitious shrubs thou in just time didst awe.
So have I seen at sea, when whirling winds,
Hurry the bark, but more the seamen's minds,
Who with mistaken course salute the sand,
And threatening rocks misapprehend for land,
While baleful Tritons to the shipwreck guide,
And corposants along the tackling slide,[2]
The passengers all wearied out before,
Giddy, and wishing for the fatal shore,
Some lusty mate, who with more careful eye
Counted the hours, and every star did spy,
The helm does from the artless steersman strain,
And doubles back unto the safer main.
What though a while they grumble discontent,
Saving himself, he does their loss prevent.
'Tis not a freedom, that where all command;
Nor tyranny, where one does them withstand:
But who of both the bounders knows to lay
Him as their father must the state obey.
Thou, and thine house (like Noah's eight) did rest,[3]
Left by the wars' flood on the mountains' crest:
And the large vale lay subject to thy will,
Which thou but as an husbandman wouldst till:
And only didst for others plant the vine
Of liberty, not drunken with its wine.
That sober liberty which men may have,
That they enjoy, but more they vainly crave:
And such as to their parents' tents do press,
May show their own, not see his nakedness.
Yet such a Chammish issue still does rage,[4]
The shame and plague both of the land and age,
Who watched thy halting, and thy fall deride,
Rejoicing when thy foot had slipped aside,
That their new king might the fifth sceptre shake,[5]
And make the world, by his example, quake:[6]
Whose frantic army should they want for men
Might muster heresies, so one were ten.
What thy misfortune, they the spirit call,
And their religion only is to fall.
Oh Mahomet! now couldst thou rise again,
Thy falling-sickness should have made thee reign,[7]
While Feake and Simpson would in many a tome,
Have writ the comments of thy sacred foam:
For soon thou mightst have passed among their rant[8]
Were't but for thine unmovèd tulipant;[9]
As thou must needs have owned them of thy band
For prophecies fit to be Alcoraned.

---

[1] like thine olive referring to the parable in Judges 9:7–15, in which the olive, like Oliver Cromwell, refused the offer of kingship.

[2] corposants St. Elmo's fire.

[3] Noah's eight Cromwell's family, like Noah's (with his wife, three sons and their wives), consisted at the time of eight people (his wife, two sons, and four daughters).

[4] Chammish like Ham, Noah's second son, who was cursed for uncovering his father's nakedness (Genesis 9:20–25); his "issue" are the various radical groups conflated together in the lines following (Fifth Monarchists, Quakers, and Ranters) who show their "father" Cromwell similar disrespect.

[5] fifth sceptre referring to the Fifth Monarchy men, a radical religious sect who opposed Cromwell after the establishment of the Protectorate; Christopher Feake and John Simpson (see l. 305) were Fifth Monarchists imprisoned in 1654 for sedition.

[6] quake probably a glancing reference to the Quakers, founded by George Fox in the late 1640s.

[7] falling sickness epilepsy.

[8] rant probably a reference to the Ranters, a loosely (if at all) organized group of radical religious writers much demonized in the early 1650s for their antinomianism. For more information, see the selections from Abiezer Coppe and Lawrence Clarkson.

[9] tulipant turban.

Accursèd locusts, whom your king does spit
Out of the centre of th' unbottomed pit;
Wand'rers, adult'rers, liars, Munster's rest,[1]
Sorcerers, atheists, Jesuits possessed;
You who the scriptures and the laws deface
With the same liberty as points and lace;[2]
Oh race most hypocritically strict!
Bent to reduce us to the ancient Pict;
Well may you act the Adam and the Eve;[3]
Ay, and the serpent too that did deceive.
But the great captain, now the danger's o'er,
Makes you for his sake tremble one fit more;
And, to your spite, returning yet alive
Does with himself all that is good revive.
So when first man did through the morning new
See the bright sun his shining race pursue,
All day he followed with unwearied sight,
Pleased with that other world of moving light;
But thought him when he missed his setting beams,
Sunk in the hills, or plunged below the streams.
While dismal blacks hung round the universe,
And stars (like tapers) burned upon his hearse:
And owls and ravens with their screeching noise
Did make the fun'rals sadder by their joys.
His weeping eyes the doleful vigils keep,
Not knowing yet the night was made for sleep:
Still to the west, where he him lost, he turned,
And with such accents as despairing mourned:
"Why did mine eyes once see so bright a ray;
Or why day last no longer than a day?"
When straight the sun behind him he descried,
Smiling serenely from the further side.
So while our star that gives us light and heat,
Seemed now a long and gloomy night to threat,
Up from the other world his flame he darts,
And princes (shining through their windows) starts,
Who their suspected counsellors refuse,
And credulous ambassadors accuse.
"Is this", saith one, "the nation that we read
Spent with both wars, under a captain dead,[4]
Yet rig a navy while we dress us late,
And ere we dine, raze and rebuild their state?
What oaken forests, and what golden mines!
What mints of men, what union of designs!
(Unless their ships, do, as their fowl proceed
Of shedding leaves, that with their ocean breed).[5]
Theirs are not ships, but rather arks of war
And beakèd promontories sailed from far;
Of floating islands a new hatchèd nest;
A fleet of worlds, of other worlds in quest;
An hideous shoal of wood-leviathans,
Armed with three tier of brazen hurricanes,
That through the centre shoot their thundering side
And sink the earth that does at anchor ride.
What refuge to escape them can be found,
Whose wat'ry leaguers all the world surround?[6]
Needs must we all their tributaries be,
Whose navies hold the sluices of the sea.
The ocean is the fountain of command,
But that once took, we captives are on land.
And those that have the waters for their share,
Can quickly leave us neither earth nor air.
Yet if through these our fears could find a pass,
Through double oak, and lined with treble brass,
That one man still, although but named, alarms
More than all men, all navies, and all arms.

---

[1] Munster's rest the remainders or dregs of Munster, the German city taken over in the 1530s by a group of Anabaptists whose beliefs (including common ownership of property and polygamy) made them a byword for socially dangerous religious fanaticism.

[2] points and lace for fastening hose.

[3] act the Adam and the Eve by going naked.

[4] both wars the British civil wars and the first Anglo-Dutch War of 1652–54.

[5] as their fowl proceed / Of shedding leaves referring to the belief that Solan geese (gannets) were generated from certain kinds of leaves (in other versions, from barnacles) that fell in the water.

[6] watery leaguers sea-based beseigers.

Him, in the day, him, in late night I dread,
And still his sword seems hanging o'er my head.
The nation had been ours, but his one soul
Moves the great bulk, and animates the whole.
He secrecy with number hath enchased,
Courage with age, maturity with haste:
The valiant's terror, riddle of the wise,
And still his falchion all our knots unties.
Where did he learn those arts that cost us dear?
Where below earth, or where above the sphere?
He seems a king by long succession born,
And yet the same to be a king does scorn.
Abroad a king he seems, and something more,
At home a subject on the equal floor.
O could I once him with our title see,
So should I hope that he might die as we.
But let them write his praise that love him best,
It grieves me sore to have thus much confessed."
Pardon, great Prince, if thus their fear or spite
More than our love and duty do thee right.
I yield, nor further will the prize contend,
So that we both alike may miss our end:
While thou thy venerable head dost raise
As far above their malice as my praise,
And as the Angel of our commonweal,
Troubling the waters, yearly mak'st them heal.
—1655

On Mr. Milton's "Paradise Lost"[1]

When I beheld the poet blind, yet bold,
In slender book his vast design unfold,
Messiah crowned, God's reconciled decree,
Rebelling Angels, the Forbidden Tree,
Heaven, Hell, Earth, Chaos, all; the argument
Held me a while, misdoubting his intent
That he would ruin (for I saw him strong)
The sacred truths to fable and old song,
(So Sampson groped the temple's posts in spite)
The world o'erwhelming to revenge his sight.
Yet as I read, soon growing less severe,
I liked his project, the success did fear;
Through that wide field how he his way should find
O'er which lame faith leads understanding blind;
Lest he perplexed the things he would explain,
And what was easy he should render vain.
Or if a work so infinite he spanned,
Jealous I was that some less skilful hand
(Such as disquiet always what is well,
And by ill imitating would excel)
Might hence presume the whole Creation's day
To change in scenes, and show it in a play.[2]
Pardon me, mighty poet, nor despise
My causeless, yet not impious, surmise.
But I am now convinced that none will dare
Within thy labours to pretend a share.
Thou hast not missed one thought that could be fit,
And all that was improper dost omit:
So that no room is here for writers left,
But to detect their ignorance or theft.
That majesty which through thy work doth reign
Draws the devout, deterring the profane.
And things divine thou treatst of in such state
As them preserves, and thee, inviolate.
At once delight and horror on us seize,
Thou sing'st with so much gravity and ease;
And above human flight dost soar aloft,
With plume so strong, so equal, and so soft.
The bird named from that paradise you sing
So never flags, but always keeps on wing.[3]

---

[1] This poem was published in the second edition of Paradise Lost (1674).

[2] less skilful hand…show it in a play alluding to John Dryden, who published his heroic drama The State of Innocence in 1677, but had it licensed for publication in 1674. According to John Aubrey, when Dryden asked Milton for permission to put his epic into rhyme, Milton gave him leave "to tag" his verses (see ll. 49–50).

[3] The bird of paradise was popularly believed to be always in flight.

Where couldst thou words of such a compass find?
Whence furnish such a vast expanse of mind?
Just Heaven thee, like Tiresias, to requite,
Rewards with prophecy thy loss of sight.[1]
Well mightst thou scorn thy readers to allure
With tinkling rhyme, of thine own sense secure;
While the Town-Bayes writes all the while and spells,[2]
And like a pack-horse tires without his bells.
Their fancies like our bushy points appear,
The poets tag them; we for fashion wear.[3]
I too transported by the mode offend,
And while I meant to praise thee, must commend.[4]
Thy verse created like thy theme sublime,
In number, weight, and measure, needs not rhyme.

—1674

---

[1] Tiresias a legendary Theban prophet to whom Milton compares himself in Paradise Lost 3.33–34.

[2] Town-Bayes John Dryden.

[3] "Points" were the ribbons or cords that held up hose; "tags" were the bands of metal, often decorative (hence "bushy points") used to keep them from unraveling. Like tagged points, rhymes were fashionable, decorative, and came in pairs.

[4] That is, the exigencies of rhyme ("the mode") compel the use of one word rather than another.

Henry Vaughan

1621 – 1695

Henry Vaughan was the elder of two twins. His twin brother Thomas was to become the most notable "hermetic" author in England after Robert Fludd, and intellectually the two brothers had much in common. Though the family was well connected, their father was a younger son, and they were not wealthy, and became less so, in all likelihood, as a result of their intransigent Royalism during the Civil War. Henry and Thomas were educated by a clergyman, Matthew Herbert, a few miles from the family home, and then went to Oxford, though certain evidence of Vaughan's residence there is lacking. It has generally been assumed that the twins went to Oxford at the same time, but there is some reason to believe that Henry may have gone up a little later than his younger brother. Like many elder sons, Henry did not take a degree, but proceeded to London to study at the Inns of Court. The outbreak of the Civil War caused him to return to his native Wales, where he spent most of the rest of his life, making his living as a physician. His work reflects deep religious feeling and a strong engagement on the side of the Royalism and Anglicanism which were defeated in the Civil War. He was a bookish man who also took a strong and informed interest in natural history; one occupation of his later years was writing the common English names of plants in the margins of a book on herbal medicine.

* * *

(From Poems with the Tenth Satire of Juvenal Englished) extract from [1]

A Rhapsody

Should we go now a wandering, we should meet
With catchpoles, whores, & carts in every street: [2]
Now when each narrow lane, each nook & cave, [3]
Sign-posts, & shop-doors, pimp for every knave, [4]
When riotous sinful plush, and tell-tale spurs [5]
Walk Fleet street, & the Strand, when the soft stirs
Of bawdy, ruffled silks, turn night to day;
And the loud whip, and coach scolds all the way;
When lust of all sorts, and each itchy blood
From the Tower-wharf to Cymbeline, and Lud, [6]
Hunts for a mate, and the tired footman reels
'Twixt chair-men, torches, & the hackney wheels.
—1646

---

[1] Space forbids printing the whole poem; the extract given is a good example of a manner which Vaughan virtually abandoned in his major work, Silex Scintillans.

[2] catchpoles officers who arrested for debt; bum-bailiffs. OED notes that it has been a word of contempt since at least the sixteenth century.

[3] nook "an out-of-the-way corner in or among buildings" (OED nook sb 3b); cave probably used in the Latin sense of a hollow place, a den.

[4] Sign-posts…pimp for every knave The narrow lanes, shop doors and so on act as pimps on behalf of knaves, i.e. they are conducive to vice and bring profit to those who live by knavery.

[5] tell-tale because the spurs clank.

[6] From the Tower-wharf to Cymbeline, and Lud from east to west of the City of London. Statues of the "early kings" were placed on Ludgate in 1260, and renewed in 1586 when Ludgate was rebuilt.

(From Olor Iscanus)

Upon a Cloak Lent Him by Mr. J. Ridsley [1]

Here, take again thy sack-cloth! and thank heaven [2]
Thy courtship hath not killed me; is't not even [3]
Whether we die by piecemeal, or at once
Since both but ruin, why then for the nonce [4]
Didst husband my afflictions, and cast o'er
Me this forced hurdle to inflame the score? [5]
Had I near London in this rug been seen
Without doubt I had executed been
For some bold Irish spy, and cross a sledge [6]
Had lain messed up for their four gates and bridge. [7]
When first I bore it, my oppressed feet
Would needs persuade me, 'twas some leaden sheet; [8]
Such deep impressions, and such dangerous holes
Were made, that I began to doubt my soles,
And every step (so near necessity)
Devoutly wished some honest cobbler by,
Besides it was so short, the Jewish rag
Seemed circumcised, but had a Gentile shag. [9]
Hadst thou been with me on that day, when we Left craggy Beeston, and the fatal Dee, [10]
When beaten with fresh storms, and late mishap
It shared the office of a cloak, and cap,
To see how 'bout my clouded head it stood
Like a thick turband, or some lawyer's hood,
While the stiff, hollow pleats on every side
Like conduit-pipes rained from the bearded hide,
I know thou wouldst in spite of that day's fate
Let loose thy mirth at my new shape and state,
And with a shallow smile or two profess
Some Sarazin had lost the clouted dress. [11]
Didst ever see the good wife (as they say)
March in her short cloak on the Christening day,
With what soft motions she salutes the Church,
And leaves the bedrid mother in the lurch;
Just so jogged I, while my dull horse did trudge
Like a circuit-beast plagued with a gouty judge. [12]
    But this was civil. I have since known more
And worser pranks: one night (as heretofore
Th' hast known) for want of change (a thing which I
And Bias used before me) I did lie [13]
Pure Adamite, and simply for that end
Resolved, and made this for my bosom-friend.
O that thou hadst been there next morn, that I

---

[1] This poem indicates a sociability and sense of humour in Vaughan that is downplayed in Silex Scintillans. Ridsley has not been identified.

[2] sack-cloth the garb of Christian penitents, therefore a gibe at the discomfort of the cloak.

[3] courtship courtesy (OED courtship 1b).

[4] both that is, dying by piecemeal, or at once.

[5] forced hurdle sardonically: "a hurdle forced into service as a cloak."

[6] Irish because rugs were made in Ireland; cross a sledge across a sledge; see OED sledge sb [2] 2b: "formerly used for conveying condemned persons to execution."

[7] messed up chopped up (OED mess v 1); their four gates and bridge Parts of the dismembered bodies of executed criminals were often exhibited over the city gates and on London Bridge as a deterrent to law-breaking.

[8] leaden sheet in reference to the weight of the cloak; sheet carries on the connotations of sack-cloth in l. 1, since a sheet was also a penitential garment.

[9] but...a Gentile shag It was not short in respect of its nap; see OED shag sb [1] 1c.

[10] craggy Beeston, and the fatal Dee Beeston Castle surrendered to the Parliamentarians in November 1645; after they had surrendered, the Royalists were allowed to march out across the River Dee to Denbigh.

[11] Sarazin Muslim; clouted patched.

[12] circuit-beast the horse ridden by the judge as he travelled his circuit.

[13] a thing...Bias...before me The reference is to Adamite (naked) and to the saying attributed to Bias of Priene. When Priene was besieged, and everyone gathered together his possessions for flight, Bias made no such preparations, and when asked why, said, "I carry all my possessions with me."

Might teach thee new Micro-cosmo-graphy! [1]
Thou wouldst have ta'en me, as I naked stood,
For one of the seven pillars before the flood, [2]
Such characters and hieroglyphics were
In one night worn, that thou mightst justly swear
I'd slept in cere-cloth, or at Bedlam where [3]
The mad men lodge in straw, I'll not forbear
To tell thee all, his wild impress and tricks [4]
Like Speed's old Britons made me look, or Picts; [5]
His villainous, biting, wire-embraces
Had sealed in me more strange forms and faces [6]
Than children see in dreams, or thou hast read
In arras, puppet-plays, and ginger-bread, [7]
With angled schemes, and crosses that bred fear [8]
Of being handled by some conjurer,
And nearer thou wouldst think (such strokes were drawn)
I'd been some rough statue of Fetter-lane, [9]
Nay, I believe, had I that instant been
By surgeons or apothecaries seen,
They had condemned my razed skin to be
Some walking Herbal, or Anatomy. [10]
But (thanks to the day!) 'tis off. I'd now advise
Thee friends to put this piece to merchandize;
The pedlars of our age have business yet,
And gladly would against the Fair-day fit
Themselves with such a roof, that can secure
Their wares from dogs and cats rained in shower,
It shall perform; or if this will not do
'Twill take the ale-wives sure; 'twill make them two [11]
Fine rooms of one, and spread upon a stick
Is a partition without lime or brick.
Horned obstinacy! how my heart doth fret [12]
To think what mouths and elbows it would set
In a wet day! have you for two pence e'er [13]
Seen King Harry's Chapel at Westminster,
Where in their dusty gowns of brass and stone
The judges lie, and marked you how each one [14]
In sturdy marble-plets about the knee [15]
Bears up to show his legs and symmetry?
Just so would this; that I think't weaved upon
Some stiffnecked Brownist's exercising loom. [16]

---

[1] Micro-cosmo-graphy the description of the microcosm or man (OED). The coarseness of the cloak marked his body with as many lines as there are on a map of the macrocosm or "greater world."

[2] one of the seven pillars before the flood This appears to be an echo of Proverbs 9:1; but "before the flood" suggests rather the two inscribed pillars supposed to have survived the flood; see Josephus, Jewish Antiquities I.ii. 3.

[3] cere-cloth cloth impregnated with wax or a glutinous substance, used both in surgery and as a winding-sheet for corpses; Bedlam the hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem in London, used as a mental asylum.

[4] his its; also in l. 53. his as a neuter possessive was in use throughout the century.

[5] Speed's old Britons...or Picts In his History of Great Britain (1611), Speed mentions elaborate tattooing as characteristic of the ancient Britons and the Picts.

[6] sealed impressed.

[7] arras tapestry; ginger-bread often made in fantastic shapes and elaborately decorated.

[8] angled schemes, and crosses astronomical or magical diagrams used by "conjurors" or magicians.

[9] rough statue of Fetter-lane Edward Marshall, a stone-cutter, lived in Fetter Lane. His roughed-out statues may have been a feature of the street.

[10] Herbal, or Anatomy Books on botany and anatomy were often elaborately illustrated.

[11] take captivate (OED take v 10).

[12] Horned obstinacy probably exclaiming on the stiffness of the cloak, inflexible as horn.

[13] how my heart...wet day Probably Vaughan is thinking of the cloak as stiff enough to be used in setting broken bones and pretending to want it for that purpose on a wet day, when roads would be dangerously slippery.

[14] each one each gown.

[15] plets pleats. Modernization would probably distort Vaughan's pronunciation. See OED plait, pleat and plet.

[16] Some stiffnecked Brownist's exercising loom The Brownists were a Puritan sect, followers of Robert Browne. Weavers tended towards Puritanism; stiffnecked obstinate; as a Laudian Anglican Vaughan would have been unsympathetic to Puritans; exercising in ironic reference to the sense "preaching, or prophesying" (OED exercise v 10c).

O that thou hadst it when this juggling fate
Of soldiery first seized me! at what rate
Would I have bought it then, what was there but I would have given for the compendious hut?
I do not doubt but (if the weight could please,)
'Twould guard me better than a Lapland-lease,[1]
Or a German shirt with enchanted lint
Stuffed through, and the devil's beard and face
weaved in't.[2]
But I have done. And think not, friend, that I
This freedom took to jeer thy courtesy,
I thank thee for't, and I believe my muse
So known to thee, thou'lt not suspect abuse;
She did this, 'cause (perhaps) thy love paid thus Might with my thanks out-live thy cloak, and us.
—1651

From Silex Scintillans (1650)

Regeneration

1

A ward, and still in bonds, one day[3]
I stole abroad,
It was high-spring, and all the way
Primrosed, and hung with shade;[4]
Yet, was it frost within,
And surly winds
Blasted my infant buds, and sin
Like clouds eclipsed my mind.

2

Stormed thus, I straight perceived my spring
Mere stage, and show,
My walk a monstrous, mountained thing
Rough-cast with rocks, and snow;
And as a pilgrim's eye
Far from relief,
Measures the melancholy sky
Then drops, and rains for grief,

3

So sighed I upwards still; at last
'Twixt steps, and falls
I reached the pinnacle, where placed
I found a pair of scales,
I took them up and laid
In the one late pains,
The other smoke, and pleasures weighed
But proved the heavier grains;[5]

4

With that, some cried, Away; straight I
Obeyed, and led
Full east, a fair, fresh field could spy[6]
Come called it, Jacob's bed;[7]
A Virgin-soil, which no
Rude feet ere trod,
Where (since he stepped there,) only go
Prophets, and friends of God.[8]

---

[1] Lapland-lease Compare Habington's "Your Lordship then shall walk as safe, as if a Lapland witch…preserved you shot-free" (quoted OED Lapland); lease is probably a synecdoche for "woven garment." See OED lease sb ^{4} 2: "the crossing of the warp-threads in a loom."

[2] Or a German shirt…weaved in't Reginald Scot gives the method of making "a waistcoat of proof" in Discovery of Witchcraft, 1584, p. 231. Vaughan's devil's beard and face draws upon that description.

[3] A ward, and still in bonds The literal meaning is that the protagonist is not of legal age, and is bound to follow the commands of his guardian. In the metaphorical meaning, the guardian may be God, and the bondage may be to sin.

[4] Primrosed Compare Hamlet I.iii.50 ("primrose path of dalliance") and Macbeth II.iii.21 ("primrose way to the everlasting bonfire").

[5] This stanza may be regarded as the literary rendering of an emblem, probably a variation on Francis Quarles, Emblems (1639), Book I, Emblem iv, in which the pleasures and honours of the world are balanced against a bubble, and found to be "altogether lighter than vanity."

[6] Full east towards the place of rebirth. Vaughan draws upon the "Easter" connotations of "east" in half a dozen other poems.

[7] Jacob's bed Genesis 28:10-22.

[8] Prophets, and friends of God Wisdom of Solomon 7:27.

5

Here, I reposed; but scarce well set,
A grove descried
Of stately height, whose branches met
And mixed on every side;
I entered, and once in (Amazed to see't,)
Found all was changed, and a new spring
Did all my senses greet;

6

The unthrift Sun shot vital gold [1]
A thousand pieces,
And heaven its azure did unfold
Chequered with snowy fleeces,
The air was all in spice [2]
And every bush
A garland wore; thus fed my eyes
But all the ear lay hush.

7

Only a little fountain lent
Some use for ears,
And on the dumb shades language spent
The music of her tears;
I drew her near, and found
The cistern full
Of divers stones, some bright, and round
Others ill-shaped, and dull. [3]

8

The first (pray mark,) as quick as light
Danced through the flood,
But, the last more heavy than the night
Nailed to the centre stood;
I wondered much, but tired
At last with thought,
My restless eye that still desired
As strange an object brought;

9

It was a bank of flowers, where I descried
(Though 'twas mid-day,)
Some fast asleep, others broad-eyed
And taking in the ray, [4]
Here musing long, I heard
A rushing wind
Which still increased, but whence it stirred
No where I could not find; [5]

10

I turned me round, and to each shade
Dispatched an eye,
To see, if any leaf had made
Least motion, or reply,
But while I listening sought
My mind to ease
By knowing, where 'twas, or where not,
It whispered; Where I please.

Lord, then said I, On me one breath,
And let me die before my death!

Song of Solomon 4:16
Arise O north, and come thou south-wind, and blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out.
—1650

---

[1] vital gold The discovery of gold occurs in other early modern conversion narratives, for example those by Jacob Boehme and Vaughan's brother Thomas, who in Lumen de Lumine writes of "certain pieces of gold, which she had left behind her."

[2] all in spice Song of Solomon 4:16, a passage Vaughan recalls many times.

[3] stones emblematic of souls. The bright and round ones (roundness connoting perfection) are those which have "danced" in the cleansing baptismal waters; the others are nailed to the centre of the earth, where Hell was traditionally thought to be.

[4] the ray God, and Christ, were traditionally symbolized by the Sun.

[5] rushing wind See Acts 2:1-2 and John 3:8. It seems likely that Vaughan intended "Nor where" in accordance with John 3:8 to which the passage obviously refers.

The Retreat[1]

Happy those early days! when I
Shined in my Angel-infancy.
Before I understood this place
Appointed for my second race,[2]
Or taught my soul to fancy aught
But a white, celestial thought,
When yet I had not walked above
A mile, or two, from my first love,[3]
And looking back (at that short space,)
Could see a glimpse of his bright face;
When on some gilded cloud, or flower
My gazing soul would dwell an hour,
And in those weaker glories spy
Some shadows of eternity;
Before I taught my tongue to wound
My conscience with a sinful sound,
Or had the black art to dispense
A several sin to every sense,
But felt through all this fleshly dress
Bright shoots of everlastingness.[4]
O how I long to travel back
And tread again that ancient track!
That I might once more reach that plain,
Where first I left my glorious train,
From whence the enlightened spirit sees
That shady city of palm trees;[5]
But (ah!) my soul with too much stay
Is drunk, and staggers in the way.
Some men a forward motion love,
But I by backward steps would move,
And when this dust falls to the urn
In that state I came return.
—1650

"Joy of my life! while left me here"[6]

¶[7]

1

Joy of my life! while left me here,
And still my love!
How in thy absence thou dost steer
Me from above!
A life well led
This truth commends,
With quick, or dead
It never ends.

2

Stars are of mighty use: the night
Is dark, and long;
The road foul, and where one goes right,
Six may go wrong.
One twinkling ray
Shot o'er some cloud,
May clear much way
And guide a crowd.

3

God's saints are shining lights: who stays
Here long must pass

---

[1] The theme of the innocence of childhood had religio-political implications at the time, since it was opposed to Calvinist doctrine. See also Vaughan's poem "Child-hood," and Traherne.

[2] my second race In his Mount of Olives Vaughan wrote of comparing "my appointed time here with the portion preceding it, and the eternity to follow." The "pre-existence" of the soul, clearly implied in this poem, was another disputed doctrine.

[3] my first love See Revelation 2:4. Vaughan echoes this passage in several poems, referring sometimes to Christ, sometimes to the Holy Spirit.

[4] shoots of everlastingness The phrase, brilliantly transformed, is borrowed from Owen Felltham, Resolves (1634).

[5] That I might…palm trees Deuteronomy 34:1–4.

[6] This poem seems likely to refer to Vaughan's younger brother William, who died in 1648. The date of Vaughan's first wife's death is unknown, but she was probably alive when the 1650 Silex Scintillans was published.

[7] Poems of mourning in Silex Scintillans are headed with a pilcrow, or paragraph mark. Vaughan may have used this printer's device, common in Bibles of the period, to suggest that these poems had a special significance for him.

O'er dark hills, swift streams, and steep ways
As smooth as glass;
But these all night
Like candles, shed
Their beams, and light
Us into bed.

4

They are (indeed,) our pillar-fires [1]
Seen as we go,
They are that City's shining spires [2]
We travel to;
A swordlike gleam
Kept man for sin
First out; this beam [3]
Will guide him in.

—1650

The Morning-Watch [4]

O joys! Infinite sweetness! with what flowers, [5]
And shoots of glory, my soul breaks, and buds!
All the long hours
Of night, and rest
Through the still shrouds
Of sleep, and clouds,
This dew fell on my breast; [6]
O how it bloods,
And spirits all my earth! hark! In what rings,
And hymning circulations the quick world [7]
Awakes, and sings;
The rising winds,
And falling springs,
Birds, beasts, all things
Adore him in their kinds. [8]
Thus all is hurled [9]
In sacred hymns, and order, the great chime [10]
And symphony of nature. Prayer is [11]
The world in tune,
A spirit-voice,
And vocal joys
Whose echo is heaven's bliss. [12]
O let me climb [13]
When I lie down! The pious soul by night
Is like a clouded star, whose beams though said
To shed their light
Under some cloud
Yet are above,
And shine, and move
Beyond that misty shroud.

---

[1] pillar-fires Exodus 13:21.

[2] that City's shining spires See the description of the heavenly Jerusalem in Revelation 21.

[3] A swordlike…First out Genesis 3:24.

[4] For the title see Exodus 14:24. A marginal note in AV (1649) explains "about the last three hours of the night." This would be from 3:00 hrs to 6:00 hrs; watch also had the sense of a religious observance (OED watch sb 2). Given the theme of the harmony of creation, the fact that the poem falls into nine sections (regarding each set of long and each set of short lines as a section) seems significant; there were nine orders of angels and nine planetary spheres.

[5] O joys! Infinite sweetness! Herbert's "The Holy Scriptures I" begins "O book! infinite sweetness!" Vaughan may be implying that the Book of Nature, like the Scriptures, contains divine lessons.

[6] This dew fell on my breast In The Mount of Olives Vaughan writes "sanctify…my heart with the dew of thy divine Spirit."

[7] the quick world In Anthroposophia Theomagica Thomas Vaughan writes that "the world, which is God's building, is full of spirit, quick, and living."

[8] in their kinds according to their natures. His view that the "creatures" praise God on their own account sets Vaughan apart from Herbert.

[9] hurled Given the notion that the order of the world is exhibited in circular motion, this is probably to be understood as "whirled." For the association between the two words, see OED "whirl" and "hurl."

[10] chime "a system of which all the parts are in harmony" (OED chime sb ^{1}7 fig).

[11] symphony in the Latin sense, derived from the Greek, of concord, harmony.

[12] Whose echo is heaven's bliss Heaven's bliss is the answer to prayer.

[13] O let me climb that is, pray; compare "Isaac's Marriage" 44–45.

So in my bed
That curtained grave, though sleep, like ashes, hide
My lamp, and life, both shall in thee abide.
—1650

"And do they so?"

Romans 8:19
Etenim res creatae exerto capite observantes expectant revelationem Filiorum Dei [1]

1

And do they so? have they a sense
Of ought but influence? [2]
Can they their heads lift, and expect,
And groan too? why the elect [3]
Can do no more: my volumes said
They were all dull, and dead,
They judged them senseless, and their state
Wholly inanimate. [4]
Go, go; seal up thy looks,
And burn thy books.

2

I would I were a stone, or tree,
Or flower by pedigree,
Or some poor high-way herb, or spring
To flow, or bird to sing!
Then should I (tied to one sure state,)
All day expect my date; [5]
But I am sadly loose, and stray
A giddy blast each way;
O let me not thus range!
Thou canst not change.

3

Sometimes I sit with thee, and tarry
An hour, or so, then vary.
Thy other creatures in this scene
Thee only aim, and mean;
Some rise to seek thee, and with heads
Erect peep from their beds;
Others, whose birth is in the tomb,
And cannot quit the womb,
Sigh there, and groan for thee,
Their liberty.

moments of communicati

4

O let not me do less! shall they
Watch, while I sleep, or play?
Shall I thy mercies still abuse
With fancies, friends, or news?
O brook it not! thy blood is mine,
And my soul should be thine
O brook it not! why wilt thou stop
After whole showers one drop?
Sure, thou wilt joy to see
Thy sheep with thee.
—1650

meaning not sure

"I walked the other day"

¶

1

I walked the other day (to spend my hour) [6]
Into a field
Where I sometimes had seen the soil to yield
A gallant flower, [7]

---

[1] "For the creatures, watching with lifted head, wait for the revelation of the sons of God." The Latin of the epigraph is from Beza's translation of Romans; Vaughan probably chose the translation of an important Calvinist in a sardonic spirit, as the poem is opposed to Calvinist views on the "creatures" as expressed in a number of English biblical commentaries.

[2] influence that is, of the stars upon earthly things.

[3] elect In the Calvinist world-view, people were either "elect" or "reprobate," destined by God to heaven or to hell from the beginning of time.

[4] inanimate See n. 7 to "The Morning Watch."

[5] my date the day of my death.

[6] my hour probably, regular hour of meditation.

[7] A gallant flower Compare George Herbert, "Peace," 13–15.

But winter now had ruffled all the bower
And curious store
I knew there heretofore.

2
Yet I whose search loved not to peep and peer
I'the face of things [1]
Thought with my self, there might be other springs
Besides this here
Which, like cold friends, sees us but once a year,
And so the flower
Might have some other bower.

3
Then taking up what I could nearest spy
I digged about
That place where I had seen him to grow out,
And by and by
I saw the warm recluse alone to lie
Where fresh and green
He lived of us unseen.

4
Many a question intricate and rare
Did I there strow,
But all I could extort was, that he now
Did there repair
Such losses as befell him in this air
And would ere long
Come forth most fair and young.

5
This passed, I threw the clothes quite o'er his head, [2]
And stung with fear
Of my own frailty dropped down many a tear
Upon his bed,

flower as the dead body

flower bed/ bedclothes

Then sighing whispered, Happy are the dead! [3]
What peace doth now
Rock him asleep below!

ironic re-reading of the bible

6
And yet, how few believe such doctrine springs
From a poor root
Which all the winter sleeps here under foot
And hath no wings
To raise it to the truth and light of things,
But is still trod
By every wandering clod.

7
O thou! whose spirit did at first inflame
And warm the dead,
And by a sacred incubation fed
With life this frame
Which once had neither being, form, nor name,
Grant I may so
Thy steps track here below, [4]

8
That in these masques and shadows I may see [5]
Thy sacred way,
And by those hid ascents climb to that day
Which breaks from thee
Who art in all things, though invisibly;
Show me thy peace,
Thy mercy, love, and ease,

9
And from this care, where dreams and sorrows reign
Lead me above
Where light, joy, leisure, and true comforts move

---

[1] whose search…face of things who preferred not to be superficial.

[2] I threw…o'er his head that is, replaced the soil over the plant.

[3] Happy are the dead! "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord" (Revelation 14:13).

[4] Thy steps track here below that is, in observation of and meditation upon the creatures.

[5] masques and shadows perhaps a significant pun, involving the notion of mask: concealment and masque: stage representation. The idea is that the natural world both conceals and reveals God, who is, to quote another poem of Vaughan's, "in all things, though invisibly."

God is inaccessab

spills over

Without all pain,
There, hid in thee, show me his life again
At whose dumb urn
Thus all the year I mourn.
—1650

From Silex Scintillans (1655)

"They are all gone into the world of light!"

¶

They are all gone into the world of light!
And I alone sit ling'ring here;
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth clear.

It glows and glitters in my cloudy breast
Like stars upon some gloomy grove,
Or those faint beams in which this hill is dressed,
After the sun's remove.

I see them walking in an air of glory,
Whose light doth trample on my days:
My days, which are at best but dull and hoary,
Mere glimmering and decays.

O holy hope! and high humility,
High as the Heavens above!
These are your walks, and you have showed them me
To kindle my cold love,

Dear, beauteous death! the jewel of the just,
Shining nowhere, but in the dark;
What mysteries do lie beyond thy dust;
Could man outlook that mark!

He that hath found some fledged bird's nest, may know
At first sight, if the bird be flown;
But what fair well, or grove he sings in now,
That is to him unknown. [1]

And yet, as Angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul, when man doth sleep: [2]
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes,
And into glory peep.

If a star were confined into a tomb [3]
Her captive flames must needs burn there;
But when the hand that locked her up, gives room,
She'll shine through all the sphere.

O Father of eternal life, and all
Created glories under thee!
Resume thy spirit from this world of thrall
Into true liberty.

Either disperse these mists, which blot and fill
My perspective (still) as they pass, [4]
Or else remove me hence unto that hill,
Where I shall need no glass. [5]
—1655

---

[1] He that hath found…to him unknown The bird is a common symbol for the soul; fair well, or grove The well and the grove are two of Vaughan's favourite details from Old Testament landscape.

[2] And yet, as Angels…when man doth sleep Sir Thomas Browne wrote, "That there should be divine dreams seems unreasonably doubted by Aristotle" (Works, ed. Keynes, vol III, p. 230).

[3] tomb The tomb was one of Vaughan's metaphors for the body.

[4] perspective telescope.

[5] glass that is, of the telescope; see also "For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face" (I Corinthians 13:12).

Cock-Crowing

Father of lights! what sunny seed, [1]
What glance of day hast thou confined
Into this bird? To all the breed
This busy ray thou hast assigned;
Their magnetism works all night, [2]
And dreams of Paradise and light.

Their eyes watch for the morning hue,
Their little grain expelling night [3]
So shines and sings, as if it knew
The path unto the house of light.
It seems their candle, howe'r done,
Was tinned and lighted at the sun. [4]

If such a tincture, such a touch,
So firm a longing can impower
Shall thy own image think it much
To watch for thy appearing hour?
If a mere blast so fill the sail, [5]
Shall not the breath of God prevail? [6]

O thou immortal light and heat!
Whose hand so shines through all this frame,
That by the beauty of the seat,
We plainly see, who made the same. [7]
Seeing thy seed abides in me,
Dwell thou in it, and I in thee.

To sleep without thee, is to die;
Yea, 'tis a death partakes of hell:
For where thou dost not close the eye
It never opens, I can tell.
In such a dark, Egyptian border, [8]
The shades of death dwell and disorder.

If joys, and hopes, and earnest throes,
And hearts, whose pulse beats still for light
Are given to birds; who, but thee, knows
A love-sick soul's exalted flight?
Can souls be tracked by any eye
But his, who gave them wings to fly?

Only this veil which thou hast broke, [9]
And must be broken yet in me,
This veil, I say, is all the cloak
And cloud which shadows thee from me.
This veil thy full-eyed love denies,
And only gleams and fractions spies. [10]

O take it off! make no delay,
But brush me with thy light, that I
May shine unto a perfect day,
And warm me at thy glorious Eye!

---

[1] Father of lights "Every good gift…cometh down from the Father of lights" (James 1:17); sunny seed "For [the Soul] is guided by…a seed or glance of light, descending from the first Father of lights" (Thomas Vaughan, Anima Magica Abscondita). Cornelius Agrippa had asserted the "solary" nature of the cock in Three Books of Occult Philosophy I:23.

[2] magnetism the faculty implanted by God in the bird which makes light attractive to it. The word was "used of other attractive forces formerly confused with magnetism" (OED).

[3] expelling night In hermetic thought "influence" was two-directional, between microcosm and macrocosm.

[4] tinned kindled. Thomas Vaughan refers to "the secret candle of God, which he hath tinned in the elements" (Lumen de Lumine).

[5] a mere blast a mere puff of wind. See OED blast sb 2.

[6] the breath of God Genesis 2:7.

[7] Whose hand so shines…who made the same Romans 1:20: "For the invisible things [of God] are…understood by the things that are made."

[8] Egyptian border Exodus 10:21.

[9] veil Various biblical passages are relevant: II Corinthians 3:13–16; I Corinthians 11:24; Hebrews 10:20.

[10] This veil…only gleams and fractions spies "This veil denies God's full-eyed love, and only spies it in gleams and fractions." Compare I Corinthians 13:9–10.

O take it off! or till it flee,
Though with no lily, stay with me![1]
—1655

The Knot[2]

Bright Queen of Heaven! God's Virgin Spouse
The glad world's blessed maid!
Whose beauty tied life to thy house,
And brought us saving aid.

Thou art the true loves-knot; by thee
God is made our ally,[3]
And man's inferior essence he
With his did dignify.

For coalescent by that band
We are his body grown,[4]
Nourished with favours from his hand
Whom for our head we own.

And such a knot, what arm dares loose,
What life, what death can sever?
Which us in him, and him in us
United keeps for ever.[5]
—1655

The Night

John 3:2

christ's earthl
bod
+ nigh sk

Through that pure Virgin-shrine,[6]
That sacred veil drawn o'er thy glorious noon[7]
That men might look and live as glow-worms shine,
And face the moon:
Wise Nicodemus saw such light
As made him know his God by night.

Most blest believer he!
Who in that land of darkness and blind eyes
Thy long expected healing wings could see,[8]
When thou didst rise,
And what can never more be done,
Did at mid-night speak with the Sun!

O who will tell me, where
He found thee at that dead and silent hour!
What hallowed solitary ground did bear
So rare a flower,[9]
Within whose sacred leaves did lie
The fullness of the Deity.

No mercy-seat of gold,
No dead and dusty Cherub, nor carved stone,
But his own living works did my Lord hold
And lodge alone;

God + christ is in natur not man mad
Thin

---

[1] Though with no lily, stay with me! See Song of Solomon 2:16. "In this Song, Solomon…describeth the perfect love of Jesus Christ…and the faithful soul, for his church" (headnote in a Bible of 1649).

[2] The Virgin Mary is addressed as the knot of peace in one mediaeval hymn, and as the knot of love in another.

[3] ally combining two senses, "associated by treaty" and "kinsman" (OED ally sb 5). In view of the title it is relevant that the word is derived from Latin ad to and ligare to bind, fasten; and that "united" (l. 16) and "untied" are anagrams.

[4] coalescent…his body grown Christians regard the Church as the Body of Christ. See I Corinthians 10:17.

[5] Romans 8:35–39 is the background of this stanza, and reminds us of the political context of Vaughan's verse.

---

[6] Virgin-shrine This phrase refers both to the night sky and to Christ's earthly body. The night sky contains the moon, Diana; the application of the phrase to Christ in his earthly existence is more complex.

[7] That sacred veil See Hebrews 10:20 ("the veil, that is to say, his flesh"); thy glorious noon Implicit in the phrase is the traditional image of Christ as the Sun of Righteousness.

[8] healing wings See Malachi 4:2.

[9] So rare a flower In the imagery of the poem the stress is upon Christ's indwelling in natural phenomena, rather than upon a particular historical and personal manifestation.

Where trees and herbs did watch and peep [1]
And wonder, while the Jews did sleep.

Dear night! This world's defeat;
The stop to busy fools; care's check and curb;
The day of Spirits; my soul's calm retreat [2]
Which none disturb!
Christ's progress, and his prayer time; [3]
The hours to which high Heaven doth chime.

God's silent, searching flight:
When my Lord's head is filled with dew, and all [4] — blood too
His locks are wet with the clear drops of night;
His still, soft call;
His knocking time; the soul's dumb watch,
When Spirits their fair kindred catch.

Were all my loud, evil days
Calm and unhaunted as is thy dark Tent,
Whose peace but by some Angel's wing or voice
Is seldom rent;
Then I in Heaven all the long year
Would keep, and never wander here.

But living where the sun
Doth all things wake, and where all mix and tire
Themselves and others, I consent and run
To every mire,
And by this world's ill-guiding light,
Err more than I can do by night. — couplet

There is in God (some say) ✳
A deep, but dazzling darkness; as men here [5]
Say it is late and dusky, because they
See not all clear;
O for that night! where I in him
Might live invisible and dim.
—1655

he can't make out the outlines

The Book [6]

Eternal God! maker of all
That have lived here, since the man's fall;
The Rock of ages! in whose shade
They live unseen, when here they fade.

Thou knew'st this paper, when it was
Mere seed, and after that but grass; [7]
Before 'twas dressed or spun, and when
Made linen, who did wear it then:
What were their lives, their thoughts & deeds
Whether good corn, or fruitless weeds.

Thou knew'st this tree, when a green shade
Covered it, since a cover made, [8]
And where it flourished, grew and spread,
As if it never should be dead.

Thou knew'st this harmless beast, when he Did live and feed by thy decree
On each green thing; then slept (well fed)
Clothed with this skin, which now lies spread
A covering o'er this aged book,

---

[1] trees and herbs did watch and peep Compare "And do they so?" in which Vaughan attributes a conscious spiritual expectation to the non-human creation.

[2] The day of Spirits Into one of his translations Vaughan interpolates "Paracelsus writes,…that the night is the working time of Spirits" (see L.C. Martin, ed., Works, Oxford, 1957, 305 and note).

[3] Christ's…prayer time Vaughan refers to Mark 1:35.

[4] filled with dew Song of Solomon 5:2.

[5] A deep, but dazzling darkness Behind these lines lie such passages as I John 4:2 as elaborated by Dionysius the Areopagite.

[6] To see the world of Nature as a book was a commonplace; Vaughan's originality is to see it in a book.

[7] paper…grass Paper was made from linen, which was made from flax (Vaughan uses the word "grass" in its general sense, which was common enough).

[8] tree…a cover made The cover of the book was made of thin boards, covered with leather.

Which makes me wisely weep and look
On my own dust; mere dust it is,
But not so dry and clean as this.
Thou knew'st and saw'st them all and though
Now scattered thus, dost know them so.

O knowing, glorious spirit! when
Thou shalt restore trees, beasts and men,
When thou shalt make all new again,
Destroying only death and pain,[1]
Give him amongst thy works a place,
Who in them loved and sought thy face!
—1655

From Thalia Rediviva (1678)

To His Books

Bright books! the perspectives to our weak sights:[2]
The clear projections of discerning lights.
Burning and shining thoughts; man's posthume day:[3]
The track of fled souls, and their Milky-Way.
The dead alive and busy, the still voice
Of enlarged spirits, kind heaven's white decoys.[4]
Who lives with you, lives like those knowing flowers,
Which in commerce with light, spend all their hours:
Which shut to clouds, and shadows nicely shun;
But with glad haste unveil to kiss the sun.[5]
Beneath you all is dark and a dead night;
Which whoso lives in, wants both health and sight.
By sucking you, the wise (like bees) do grow
Healing and rich, though this they do most slow:
Because most choicely, for as great a store
Have we of books, as bees of herbs, or more.
And the great task to try, then know the good:
To discern weeds, and judge of wholesome food,
Is a rare, scant performance; for man dies
Oft ere 'tis done, while the bee feeds and flies.
But you were all choice flowers, all set and dressed
By old, sage florists, who well knew the best.
And I amidst you all am turned a weed!
Not wanting knowledge, but for want of heed.
Then thank thy self wild fool, that wouldst not be Content to know—what was too much for thee!
—1678

---

[1] O knowing...death and pain The belief, expressed here, in the restitution of all things at the last day was a popular element in Renaissance hermeticism. It was regarded as false and heretical by many in Vaughan's England, especially so by neo-Calvinist commentators on Romans 8:19–22. See relevant passages in Thomas Edwards, Gangraena.

[2] perspectives magnifying glasses.

[3] man's posthume day the idea being that authors live on in their books.

[4] Bright books...white decoys This device of piling up comparisons is a feature of Welsh poetry, known as dyfalu. Compare Herbert, "Prayer" (I).

[5] those knowing flowers...kiss the sun flowers such as the daisy and the marigold.

Margaret Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle

1623 – 1673

Margaret Cavendish was born in Colchester, Essex, the youngest of eight children of Sir Thomas Lucas, a wealthy landowner, and Elizabeth Leighton. In "A True Relation of my Birth, Breeding, and Life" Margaret recalls that she was raised by her mother after her father's death in accordance with "her birth and the nature of her sex" (Nature's Pictures, 1656). Her education, however, was limited to the traditional "feminine arts," a condition which Cavendish laments throughout her writings. When Queen Henrietta Maria appeared in Oxford in 1643, Margaret had a "great desire to be one of her maids of honour," and having obtained permission from her mother, she travelled to Oxford to become her attendant. Soon after her departure, Margaret's mother and brothers were sequestered from their estate and plundered of their goods. Elizabeth Lucas, however, managed to maintain Margaret in good condition to avoid her shameful exit from court. When the court went into exile in France (1644), Margaret met the exiled widower William Cavendish, Marquis (later Duke) of Newcastle, thirty years her senior (a selection from his writing is included in this anthology). Despite the difference in age, William successfully wooed Margaret, drawn, as she claims, to her "bashful fears which many condemned," for he would "choose such a wife as he might bring to his own humours; and not such a one as was wedded to self-conceit, or one that had been tempered to the humours of another." They were married in Paris in 1645. From Paris, they travelled to Rotterdam where they resided for six months until settling in Antwerp, where they remained until the Restoration. There were no children of the marriage.

In 1651, Margaret returned to England in an attempt to save William's estates. However, her application for funds from the sequestration committee was unsuccessful, and but for the assistance of Charles Cavendish, William's brother, they would have had little means of support. The same year, Margaret returned to Antwerp where she lived lavishly on credit. She published her first book of poetry, Poems and Fancies, in 1653. She followed this publication with collections of philosophical epistles and treatises, and short prose fictional works before returning to England in 1660. After her return, Margaret spent much of her time at the Newcastle estate writing closet drama, social and philosophical essays, poetry, prose fiction, and her husband's biography.

Viewed as an eccentric because of her unusual dress, her novel scientific notions, and her desire to write for publication, Margaret was criticized by many of her contemporaries including Samuel Pepys and Dorothy Osborne. However, her work was celebrated in some quarters. She was praised by such contemporary female authors as Katherine Philips and Bathsua Makin. Margaret's strengths as a writer lie in her refusal to operate within social and literary convention. She self-consciously engaged in generic innovation, adopted positions in the "masculine" discourses of natural philosophy and history, and challenged the philosophical conceptions of Descartes, Hobbes, More, and Van Helmont. Cavendish was a member of the political rearguard and the philosophical vanguard, and her writing exhibits a struggle between conservative and radical impulses, most notably in her treatment of women and of the non-human world. Margaret Cavendish died in London and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

◆

The Poetress's Hasty Resolution

Reading my verses, I liked them so well,
Self-love did make my judgement to rebel:
Thinking them so good, I thought more to write;
Considering not how others would them like.
I writ so fast, I thought, if I lived long,
A pyramid of fame to build thereon.
Reason observing which way I was bent,
Did stay my hand, and asked me what I meant;
Will you, said she, thus waste your time in vain;
On that which in the world small praise shall gain?
For shame leave off, said she, the printer spare,
He'll lose by your ill poetry, I fear;
Besides the world hath already such a weight
Of useless books, as it is over fraught.
Then pity take, do the world a good turn,
And all you write cast in the fire, and burn.
Angry I was, and Reason struck away,
When I did hear, what she to me did say.
Then all in haste I to the press it sent,
Fearing Persuasion might my book prevent:
But now 'tis done, with grief repent do I,
Hang down my head with shame, blush sigh, and cry.
Take pity, and my drooping spirits raise,
Wipe off my tears with handkerchiefs of praise.
—1653

A Discourse of Beasts

Who knows, but beasts, as they do lie,
In meadows low, or else on mountains high,
But that they do contemplate on the sun,
And how his daily, yearly circles run.
Whether the sun about the earth doth rove,
Or else the earth upon its own poles move.
And in the night, when twinkling stars we see,
Like man, imagines them all suns to be.
And may like man, stars, planets number well,
And could they speak, they might their motions tell.
And how the planets in each orb do move:
'Gainst their astrology no man can prove.
For they may know the stars and their aspects,
What influence they cast, and their effects.
—1653

The Hunting of the Hare [1]

Betwixt two ridges of plowed-land, lay Wat,
Pressing his body close to earth lay squat.
His nose upon his two forefeet close lies,
Glaring obliquely with his great grey eyes.
His head he always sets against the wind;
If turn his tail his hairs blow up behind:
Which he too cold will grow, but he is wise,
And keeps his coat still down, so warm he lies.
Thus resting all the day, till sun doth set,
Then riseth up, his relief for to get.
Walking about until the sun doth rise,
Then back returns, down in his form he lies.[2]
At last, poor Wat was found, as he there lay,
By huntsmen, with their dogs which came that way.
Seeing, gets up, and fast begins to run,
Hoping some ways the cruel dogs to shun.
But they by nature have so quick a scent,
That by their nose they trace what way he went.
And with their deep, wide mouths set forth a cry,
Which answered was by echoes in the sky.
Then Wat was struck with terror, and with fear,
Thinks every shadow still the dogs they were.
And running out some distance from the noise,
To hide himself, his thoughts he new employs.[3]
Under a clod of earth in sandpit wide,
Poor Wat sat close, hoping himself to hide.

---

[1] This poem is one of the most remarkable expressions of empathy for the non-human to be found in the period.

[2] form the nest or lair in which a hare crouches (OED form sb II.21a).

[3] This couplet was changed in the 1668 edition to: "And running out some distance from their cry,/ To hide himself, his thoughts he did employ."

There long he had not sat, but straight his ears
The winding horns, and crying dogs he hears:[1]
Starting with fear, up leaps, then doth he run,
And with such speed, the ground scarce treads upon.
Into a great thick wood he straight way gets,
Where underneath a broken bough he sits.
At every leaf that with the wind did shake,
Did bring such terror, made his heart to ache.
That place he left, to champian plains he went, [2]
Winding about, for to deceive their scent.
And while they snuffling were, to find his track,
Poor Wat, being weary, his swift pace did slack.
On his two hinder legs for ease did sit,
His forefeet rubbed his face from dust, and sweat.
Licking his feet, he wiped his ears so clean,
That none could tell that Wat had hunted been.
But casting round about his fair great eyes,
The hounds in full career he near him spies:
To Wat it was so terrible a sight,
Fear gave him wings, and made his body light.
Though weary was before, by running long,
Yet now his breath he never felt more strong.
Like those that dying are, think health returns,
When 'tis but a faint blast, which life out burns.
For spirits seek to guard the heart about,
Striving with death, but death doth quench them out.
Thus they so fast came on, with such loud cries,
That he no hopes hath left, nor help espies.
With that the winds did pity poor Wat's case,
And with their breath the scent blew from the place.
Then every nose is busily employed,
And every nostril is set open, wide:
And every head doth seek a several way,
To find what grass, or track, the scent on lay.
Thus quick industry, that is not slack,
Is like to witchery, brings lost things back.
For though the wind had tied the scent up close,
A busy dog thrust in his snuffling nose:
And drew it out, with it did foremost run,
Then horns blew loud, for th' rest to follow on.
The great slow hounds, their throats did set a base,
The fleet swift hounds, as tenors next in place;
The little beagles they a treble sing,
And through the air their voice a round did ring!
Which made a consort, as they ran along;[3]
If they but words could speak, might sing a song,
The horns kept time, the hunters shout for joy,
And valiant seem, poor Wat for to destroy:
Spurring their horses to a full career,
Swim rivers deep, leap ditches without fear;
Endanger life, and limbs, so fast will ride,
Only to see how patiently Wat died.
For why, the dogs so near his heels did get,
That they their sharp teeth in his breech did set.
Then tumbling down, did fall with weeping eyes,
Gives up his ghost, and thus poor Wat he dies.
Men whooping loud, such acclamations make,
As if the devil they did prisoner take.
When they do but a shiftless creature kill;
To hunt, there needs no valiant soldier's skill.
But man doth think that exercise, and toil,
To keep their health, is best, which makes most spoil.
Thinking that food, and nourishment so good,
And appetite, that feeds on flesh and blood.
When they do lions, wolves, bears, tigers see,
To kill poor sheep, straight say, they cruel be.
But for themselves all creatures think too few,
For luxury, wish God would make them new.
As if that God made creatures for man's meat,
To give them life, and sense, for man to eat;
Or else for sport, or recreation's sake,
Destroy those lives that God saw good to make:
Making their stomachs, graves, which full they fill
With murdered bodies, that in sport they kill.

---

[1] winding blowing (OED wind sb^{1} II.12a).

[2] champian plains plains unbroken by hills or wood; an expanse of level open country; possibly a field of battle as the chief scene of military operations (OED champian a A.1,5a).

[3] consort a harmonious combination of voices and instruments (OED consort sb^{2} II.3b).

Yet man doth think himself so gentle, mild,
When he of creatures is most cruel wild.
And is so proud, thinks only he shall live,
That God a god-like nature did him give.
And that all creatures for his sake alone,
Was made for him, to tyrannize upon.
—1653

The Pastime of the Queen of the Fairies, when she comes upon earth out of the center

This lovely sweet, and beauteous Fairy Queen,
Begins to rise, when vesper's star is seen.[1]
For she is kin unto the god of night,
So to Diana, and the stars so bright.[2]
And so to all the rest in some degrees,
Yet not so near relation as to these.
As for Apollo, she disclaims him quite,[3]
And swears she ne'er will come within his light.
For they fell out about some foolish toy,
Where ever since in him she takes no joy.
She saith, he always doth more harm than good,
If that his malice were true understood.
For he brings dearths by parching up the ground,
And sucks up waters, that none can be found.
He makes poor man in fev'rish plagues to lie,
His arrows hot, both man and beast do die.
So that to him she never will come near,
But hates to see, when that his beams appear.
This makes the cock her notice give, they say,
That when he rises, she may go her way.
And makes the owl her favourite to be,
Because Apollo's face she hates to see.
Owls sleep all day, yet hollow in the night,[4]
Make acclamations that they're out of sight.
So doth the glowworm all day hide her head,
But lights her taper-tail, when he's a bed,
To wait upon the fairest Fairy Queen,
Whilst she is sporting on the meady green.
Her pastime only is when she's on earth,
To pinch the sluts, which make Hobgoblin mirth:[5]
Or changes children while the nurses sleep,
Making the father rich, whose child they keep.
This hobgoblin is the Queen of Fairies' fool,
Turning himself to horse, cow, tree, or stool;
Or anything to cross by harmless play,
As leading travellers out of their way,
Or kick down pails of milk, cause cheese not turn,
Or hinder butter's coming in the churn:
Which makes the farmer's wife to scold, and fret,
That she the cheese, and butter cannot get.
Then holds he up the hens' rumps, as they say,
Because their eggs too soon they should not lay.
The good wife sad, squats down upon a chair,
Not at all thinking it was Hob the fair:
Where frowning sits; then Hob gives her the slip,
And down she falls, whereby she hurts her hip.
And many pranks, which Hob plays on our stage,
With his companion Tom Thumb, the Queen's page;
Who doth like piece of fat in pudding lie,
There almost chokes the eater, going awry.
And when he's down, the guts, their wind blows out,
Putting the standers by into a rout.
Thus shames the eater with a foul disgrace,
That never after dare he show his face.
Besides, in many places puts himself,

---

[1] vesper's star the evening star (OED vesper I.1).

[2] Diana the moon goddess, patroness of virginity and of hunting.

[3] Apollo the sun-god of the Greeks and Romans; the patron of music and poetry.

[4] hollow halloo; that is, cry out loud (OED halloo v 1a).

[5] Hobgoblin a mischievous tricksy imp or sprite, potentially a terrifying apparition (OED hobgoblin sb 1).

As bags, budgets, being a little elf,[1]
To make his bearers start away with fear,
To think that anything alive is there.
In this, the Queen of Fairies takes delight,
In summer's even, and in winter's night;
And when that she is weary of these plays,
She takes her coach, and goeth on her ways;
Unto her paradise, the center deep,
Which is the storehouse rich of nature sweet.
—1653

Her Descending Down

The stately palace in which the Queen dwells,
Whose fabric is built of hodmandod shells,[2]
The hangings thereof a rainbow that's thin,
Which seems wondrous fine, if one enter in;
The chambers are made of amber that's clear,
Which gives a sweet smell, if fire be near:
Her bed a cherry-stone, carved throughout,
And with butterfly's wing hung about:
Her sheets are made of a dove's eyes skin,
Her pillow a violet bud laid therein:
The large doors are cut of transparent glass,
Where the Queen may be seen, as she doth pass.
The doors are locked fast with silver pins,
The Queen's asleep, and now our day begins.
Her time in pleasure passes thus away,
And shall do so, until the world's last day.
—1653

"I Language want"

I language want, to dress my fancies in,
The hair's uncurled, the garments loose, and thin;
Had they but silver lace to make them gay,
Would be more courted than in poor array.
Or had they art, might make a better show;
But they are plain, yet cleanly do they go.
The world in bravery doth take delight,
And glittering shows do more attract the sight;
And everyone doth honour a rich hood,
As if the outside made the inside good.
And every one doth bow, and give the place,
Not for the man's sake, but the silver lace.
Let me entreat in my poor book's behalf,
That all may not adore the golden calf.
Consider pray, gold hath no life therein,
And life in nature is the richest thing.
So fancy is the soul in poetry,
And if not good, a poem ill must be.
Be just, let fancy have the upper place,
And then my verses may perchance find grace.
If flattering language all the passions rule,
Then sense, I fear, will be a mere dull fool.
—1653

The Philosophical and Physical Opinions[3]

To the Two Universities

Most famously learned,

I here present the sum of my works, not that I think wise schoolmen, and industrious, laborious students should value my book for any worth, but to receive it without a scorn, for the good encouragement of our sex, lest in time we should grow irrational as idiots, by the dejectedness of our spirits, through the careless neglects, and despisements of the masculine sex to the effeminate, thinking it impossible we should have either learning or understanding, wit or judgement, as if we had not rational souls as well as men, and we out of a custom of dejectedness think so too, which makes us quit all industry towards profitable knowledge being employed only in low, and petty employments, which takes away not only our abilities towards arts, but higher capacities in speculations, so as we are become like worms that only live in the dull earth of ignorance, winding ourselves sometimes out, by the help of some refreshing rain of good educations which seldom is given us; for we are kept like birds in cages to hop up and down in our houses, not suffered to fly abroad to see the several changes of fortune, and the various humors, ordained and created by nature; thus wanting the experiences of nature, we must needs want the understanding and knowledge and so consequently prudence, and invention of men: thus by an opinion, which I hope is but an erroneous one in men, we are shut out of all power, and authority by reason we are never employed either in civil nor martial affairs, our counsels are despised and laughed at, the best of our actions are trodden down with scorn, by the over-weaning conceit men have of themselves and through a despisement of us.

---

[1] budgets pouches, bags, wallets, usually of leather (OED budget sb 1a).

[2] hodmandod shells shells of snails (OED hodmandod a 1).

[3] The Philosophical and Physical Opinions which this letter prefaced was published in London in 1655.

But I considering with myself, that if a right judgement, and a true understanding, and a respectful civility live anywhere, it must be in learned universities, where nature is best known, where truth is oftenest found, where civility is most practised, and if I find not a resentment here, I am very confident I shall find it nowhere,[1] neither shall I think I deserve it, if you approve not of me, but if I deserve not praise, I am sure to receive so much courtship from this sage society, as to bury me in silence; thus I may have a quiet grave, since not worthy a famous memory; but to lie entombed under the dust of an university will be honour enough for me, and more than if I were worshipped by the vulgar as a deity. Wherefore if your wisdoms cannot give me the bays, let your charity strew me with cypress;[2] and who knows but after my honourable burial, I may have a glorious resurrection in following ages, since time brings strange and unusual things to pass, I mean unusual to men, though not in nature: and I hope this action of mine, is not unnatural, though unusual for a woman to present a book to the university, nor impudence, for the action is honest, although it seem vainglorious, but if it be, I am to be pardoned, since there is little difference between man and beast, but what ambition and glory makes.

—1655

Nature's Pictures Drawn by Fancy's Pencil to the Life[3]

The Loving Cuckold

There was a gentleman that had married a wife, beautiful, modest, chaste, and of a mild and sweet disposition; and after he had been married some time, he began to neglect her, and make courtship to other women; which she perceiving, grew very melancholy; and sitting one day very pensive alone, in comes one of her husband's acquaintance to see him; but this lady told him, her husband was abroad.

Said he, "I have been to visit him many times, and still he is gone abroad."

Said she, "my husband finds better company abroad than he hath at home, or at least thinks so, which makes him go so often forth."

---

[1] resentment appreciation or understanding (OED resentment 6).

[2] bays The leaves or sprigs of the bay laurel were woven into a wreath or garland to reward a conqueror or poet; hence, figuratively, the fame and repute attained by these (OED bay sb^{1} 3); cypress used for habiliments of mourning (OED cypress^3 Obs 1c). Compare Bradstreet's "If e'er you deign these lowly lines, your eyes / Give wholesome parsley wreath, I ask no bays" ("The Prologue" ll.44–45).

[3] In Nature's Pictures (London, 1656), Cavendish includes a collection of prose and verse fiction from a wide range of genres and a brief autobiography.

So he, discoursing with the lady, told her, he thought she was of a very melancholy disposition.

She said, she was not naturally so, but what her misfortunes caused.

Said he, "can fortune be cruel to a beautiful lady?"

"'Tis a sign," said she, "I am not beautiful, to match me to an unkind husband."

Said he, "to my thinking it is as impossible for your husband to be unkind, as fortune to be cruel."

Said she, "you shall be judge whether he be not so;" "for first," said she, "I have been an obedient wife, observed his humours, and obeyed his will in everything; next, I have been a thrifty, cleanly, patient and chaste wife; thirdly, I brought him a great portion; and lastly, my neighbours say I am handsome, and yet my husband doth neglect me, and despise me, making courtships to other women, and sometimes, to vex me the more, before my face."

Said he, "your husband is not worthy of you; therefore if I may advise you, I would cast aside the affection I had placed upon him, and bestow it upon a person that will worship you with an idolatrous zeal; and if you please to bestow it on me, I will offer my heart on the altar of your favours, and sacrifice my services thereon; and my love shall be as the vestal fire that never goeth out, but perpetually burn with a religious flame."[1]

Thus speaking and pleading, made courtship to her, but she at first did not receive it; but he having opportunity by reason her husband was much from home, and using importunity, at last corrupted her, and she making a friendship with this gentleman, began to neglect her husband as much as he had done her;[2] which he perceiving, began to pull in the bridle of his loose carriage: but when he perceived his acquaintance was her courtly admirer, he began to woo her anew to gain her from him; but it would not be; for she became from a meek, modest, obedient, and thrifty wife, to be a ranting, flaunting, bold, imperious wife.

But her husband grew so fond of her, that he sought all the ways he could to please her, and was the observants creature to her that might be, striving to please her in all things or ways he could devise;[3] insomuch as observing she was never pleased but when she had gallants to court her, he would invite gentlemen to his house, and make entertainments for them; and those she seemed most to favour, he would make dear friendships with; and would often be absent, to give them opportunities to be with his wife alone, hoping to get a favourable look, or a kiss for his good services, which she would craftily give him to encourage him.

But the other gentleman that made the first addresses to her, being a married man, his wife hearing her husband was so great a lover of that lady, and that that lady's husband was reformed from his incontinent life, and was become a doting fond wittal, loving and admiring her for being courted and made love to, esteeming that most that others seemed to like well of;[4] she began to imitate her; which her husband perceiving, gave her warning not to do so, but she would take no warning, but entertained those that would address themselves; whereupon her husband threatened her: but at last she was so delighted with variety that she regarded not his threats; whereupon he used her cruelly, but nothing would reclaim her, only she would make more secret meetings, wherewith she was better pleased; for secret meetings, as I have

---

[1] vestal fire sacred fire; originally the sacred fire in the temple of Vesta at Rome, over which the priestesses (the vestal virgins) had charge (OED vestal a A.2).

[2] importunity constancy of action or troublesome pertinacity in solicitation (OED importunity 3,4).

[3] observants presumably in the sense of "most observant."

[4] incontinent wanting in self-restraint, chiefly with reference to sexual appetites (OED incontinent a A.1); wittal a man who is aware of and complaisant about the infidelity of his wife (OED wittol sb 1a).

heard, give an edge to adultery; for it is the nature of mankind to be most delighted with that which is most unlawful. But her husband finding no reformation could be made, he parted with her, for he thought it a greater dishonour to be a wittal than a cuckold, although he was very much troubled to be either; for though he was willing to make a cuckold, yet he was not willing to be one himself. Thus you may see the different natures of men.
—1656

Orations of Diverse Sorts, Accommodated to Diverse Places[1]

An Oration for Liberty of Conscience

Fellow Citizens,

It is very probable, we shall fall into a civil war, through the diverse opinions in one and the same religion; for what hath been the cause of this hash in religion, but the suffering of theological disputations in schools, colleges, churches, and chambers, as also books of controversies? All which ought not to have been suffered, but prohibited, by making laws of restraint; but since that freedom hath been given, the inconveniency cannot be avoided, unless the magistrates will give, or at least not oppose a free liberty to all; for if the people of this nation is so foolish, or wilful, or factious, or irreligious, as not to agree in one opinion, and to unite in one religion, but will be of diverse opinions, if not of diverse religions, the governors must yield, or they will consume the civil government with the fire of their zeal; indeed they will consume themselves at last in their own confusion. Wherefore, the best remedy to prevent their own ruin, with the ruin of the commonwealth, is, to let them have liberty of conscience, conditionally, that they do not meddle with civil governments or governors; and for security that they shall not, there must be a law made and enacted, that, whosoever doth preach, dispute, or talk against the government or governors, not only in this, but of any other nation, shall be punished either with death, banishment, or fine; also for the quiet and peace of this kingdom, there ought to be a strict law, that no governor or magistrate shall in any kind infringe our just rights, our civil or common laws, nor our ancient customs; for if the one law should be made, and not the other, the people would be slaves, and the governors their tyrants.

An Oration against Liberty of Conscience

Fellow Citizens,

I am not of the former orator's opinion; for if you give liberty in the church, you must give liberty in the state, and so let everyone do what they will, which will be a strange government, or rather I may say, no government: for if there be no rules, there can be no laws, and if there be no laws, there can be no justice, and if no justice, no safety, and if no safety, no propriety, neither of goods, wives, children, nor lives, and if there be no propriety, there will be no husbandry, and the lands will lie unmanured, also there will be neither trade nor traffic, all which will cause famine, war, and ruin, and such a confusion, as the kingdom will be like a chaos, which the gods keep us from.

---

[1] In her address "To the Readers" prefacing Orations of Diverse Sorts (London, 1662), Cavendish explains the purpose of her text: "I have endeavoured in this book to express perfect orators, that speak perfect orations, as to cause their auditors to act, or believe, according to the orator's opinion, judgment, design, or desire."

An Oration proposing a Mean betwixt the two former Opinions

Fellow Citizens,

I am not of the two former orators' opinions, neither for an absolute liberty, nor a forced unity, but between both, as neither to give them such liberty, as for several opinions, to gather into several congregations, nor to force them to such ceremonies, as agree not with their consciences; and if those sects or separatists disturb not the canon, common, or civil laws, not to disturb their bodies, minds, or estates: for if they disturb not the public weal, why should you disturb their private devotions? Wherefore, give them leave to follow their several opinions, in their particular families, otherwise if you force them, you will make them furious, and if you give them an absolute liberty, you will make them factious.

—1662

CCXI Sociable Letters [1]

IX

MADAM,

In your last letter I perceive that the Lady N.P. is an actor in some state-design, or at least would be thought so, for our sex in this age, is ambitious to be state-ladies, that they may be thought to be wise women; but let us do what we can, we shall prove ourselves fools, for wisdom is an enemy to our sex, or rather our sex is an enemy to wisdom. 'Tis true, we are full of designs and plots, and ready to side into factions; but plotting, designing, factions, belong nothing to wisdom, for wisdom never intermeddles therein or therewith, but renounces them; it is only cheating craft and subtlety that are the managers thereof: and for deceiving craft, women are well practised therein, and most of them may be accounted politicians; for no question but women may, can, and oftentimes do make wars, especially civil wars; witness our late civil war, wherein women were great, although not good actors; for though women cannot fight with warring arms themselves, yet they can easily inflame men's minds against the governors and governments, unto which men are too apt even without the persuasion of women, as to make innovation through envy and emulation, in hopes of advancement in title, fortune, and power, of which women are as ambitious as men; but I wish for the honour of our sex, that women could as easily make peace as war, though it is easier to do evil than good, for every fool can make an uproar, and a tumultuous disorder, such as the wisest can hardly settle into order again. But women in state-affairs can do as they do with themselves, they can, and do often make themselves sick, but when they are sick, not well again: so they can disorder a state, as they do their bodies, but neither can give peace to th'one, nor health to th'other; but their restless minds, and unsatiable appetites, do many times bring ruin to the one, and death to the other; for temperance and quietness are strangers to our sex. But leaving the Lady N.P. to her petty designs, and weak plots, I rest,

Madam,

Your very faithful Fr. and S.

---

[1] Cavendish delineates the purpose of CCXI Sociable Letters (1664) in the Preface: "But, noble readers, I do not intend to present you here with long compliments in short letters, but with short descriptions in long letters; the truth is, they are rather scenes than letters, for I have endeavoured under the cover of letters to express the humors of mankind, and the actions of man's life by the correspondence of two ladies, living at some short distance from each other, which make it not only their chief delight and pastime, but their tie in friendship, to discourse by letters, as they would do if they were personally together, so that these letters are an imitation of a personal visitation and conversation, which I think is better (I am sure more profitable) than those conversations that are an imitation of romantical letters, which are but empty words, and vain compliments."

XVII

MADAM,

The pure lady, or Lady Puritan, is so godly, as to follow all those ministers she thinks are called and chosen by the Holy Spirit, to preach the Word of God, whereas those ministers preach more their own words, than God's, for they interpret the Scripture to their own sense, or rather to their factious humours and designs, and after their sermons, their female flocks gossip Scripture, visiting each other to confer notes, and make repetitions of the sermons, as also to explain and expound them; for first the minister expounds the Scripture, and then the women-hearers expound the sermon; so that there are expoundings upon expoundings, and preaching upon preaching, insomuch as they make such a medley or hash of the Scripture, as certainly the right and truth is so hidden and obscured, that none can find it; and surely the Holy Spirit, whom they talk so much of, knows not what they mean or preach, being so much and such nonsense in their sermons, as God himself cannot turn to sense; but howsoever, it works on some to a good effect and causes as much devotion amongst many, as if they preached learnedly, eloquently, and interpreted rightly, and to the true sense and meaning; for many sorrowful and penitent tears are shed, but whether they be bottled up in heaven, I know not:[1] certainly Mary Magdalene could not weep faster for the time, or fetch deeper sighs, or stronger groans for her sins, than they do, which shows that they have been grievous sinners; but whether their sins were of the same kind as hers were, I cannot tell, and I think they would not confess, for confession they account popish. But truly, and verily, the Lady Puritan who hath been to visit me this afternoon, hath so tired me with her preaching discourse, as I think I shall not recover my weary spirits and deafened ears, this two days, unless a quiet sleep cure me; nay, she hath so filled my head with words, as I doubt it will hinder my silent repose; howsoever I'll try: and so taking my leave as going to bed, I rest,

Madam,

Your faithful Fr. and S.

XXVI

MADAM,

We have no news here, unless to hear that the Lady C.R. did beat her husband, and because she would have witness enough, she beat him in a public assembly, nay, being a woman of none of the least sizes, but one of the largest, and having anger added to her strength, she did beat him soundly, and it is said, that he did not resist her, but endured patiently; whether he did it out of fear to show his own weakness, being not able to encounter her, or out of a noble nature, not to strike a woman, I know not; yet I believe the best: and surely, if he doth not, or cannot tame her spirits, or bind her hands, or for love will not leave her, if she beat him often, he will have but a sore life. Indeed I was sorry when I heard of it, not only for the sake of our sex, but because she and he are persons of dignity, it belonging rather to mean-born and bred women to do such unnatural actions, for certainly, for a wife to strike her husband, is as much, if not more, as for a child to strike his father; besides, it is a breach of matrimonial government, not to obey all their husbands' commands; but those women that strike or cuckold their husbands, are matrimonial traitors, for which they ought to be highly punished; as for blows, they ought to be banished from their husband's bed, house, family, and for adultery, they ought to suffer death, and their executioner ought to be their husband. 'Tis true, passion will cause great indiscretion, and women are subject to violent passions, which makes or causes them so often to err in words and actions, which, when their passion is over, they are sorry for; but unruly passions are only a cause of uncivil words and rude actions, whereas adultery is caused by unruly appetites; wherefore women should be instructed and taught more industriously, carefully, and prudently, to temper their passions, and govern their appetites, than men, because there comes more dishonour from their unruly passions and appetites, than from men's; but for the most part women are not educated as they should be, I mean those of quality, for their education is only to dance, sing, and fiddle, to write complimental letters, to read romances, to speak some language that is not their native, which education, is an education of the body, and not of the mind, and shows that their parents take more care of their feet than their head, more of their words than their reason, more of their music than their virtue, more of their beauty than their honesty,[1] which methinks is strange, as that their friends and parents should take more care, and be at greater charge to adorn their bodies, than to endue their minds, to teach their bodies arts, and not to instruct their minds with understanding; for this education is more for outward show, than inward worth, it makes the body a courtier, and the mind a clown, and oftentimes it makes their body a bawd, and their mind a courtesan, for though the body procures lovers, yet it is the mind that is the adulteress, for if the mind were honest and pure, they would never be guilty of that crime; wherefore those women are best bred, whose minds are civilest, as being well taught and governed, for the mind will be wild and barbarous, unless it be enclosed with study, instructed by learning, and governed by knowledge and understanding, for then the inhabitants of the mind will live peaceably, happily, honestly and honourably, by which they will rule and govern their associate appetites with ease and regularity, and their words, as their household servants, will be employed profitably. But leaving the Lady C.R. and her husband to passion and patience, I rest,

---

[1] bottled up in heaven "Thou tellest my wanderings: put thou my tears into thy bottle: are they not in thy book?" (Psalm 56:8).

Madam,

Your faithful Friend and Servant.

LV

MADAM,

You were pleased in your last letter to tell me, that you had been in the country, and that you did almost envy the peasants for living so merrily; it is a sign, Madam, they live happily, for mirth seldom dwells with troubles and discontents, neither doth riches nor grandeur live so easily, as that unconcerned freedom that is in low and mean fortunes and persons, for the ceremony of grandeur is constrained and bound with forms and rules, and a great estate and high fortune is not so easily managed as a less, a little is easily ordered, where much doth require time, care, wisdom and study as considerations; but poor, mean peasants that live by their labour, are for the most part happier and pleasanter than great rich persons, that live in luxury and idleness, for idle time is tedious, and luxury is unwholesome, whereas labour is healthful and recreative, and surely country housewives take more pleasure in milking their cows, making their butter and cheese, and feeding their poultry, than great ladies do in painting, curling, and adorning themselves, also they have more quiet and peaceable minds and thoughts, for they never, or seldom, look in a glass to view their faces, they regard not their complexions, nor observe their decays, they defy time's ruins of their beauties, they are not peevish and froward if they look not as well one day as another, a pimple or spot in their skin tortures not their minds, they fear not the sun's heat, but outface the sun's power, they break not their sleeps to think of fashions, but work hard to sleep soundly, they lie not in sweats to clear their complexions, but rise to sweat to get them food, their appetites are not queasy with surfeits,[1] but sharpened with fasting, they relish with more savour their ordinary coarse fare, than those who are pampered do their delicious rarities; and for their mirth and pastimes, they take more delight and true pleasure, and are more inwardly pleased and outwardly merry at their wakes, than the great ladies at their balls, and though they dance not with such art and measure, yet they dance with more pleasure and delight, they cast not envious, spiteful eyes at each other, but meet friendly and lovingly. But great ladies at public meetings take not such true pleasures, for their envy at each other's beauty and bravery disturbs their pastimes, and obstructs their mirth, they rather grow peevish and froward through envy, than loving and kind through society, so that whereas the country peasants meet with such kind hearts and unconcerned freedom as they unite in friendly jollity, and depart with neighbourly love, the greater sort of persons meet with constrained ceremony, converse with formality, and for the most part depart with enmity; and this is not only amongst women, but amongst men, for there is amongst the better sort a greater strife for bravery than for courtesy, for place than friendship, and in their societies there is more vainglory than pleasure, more pride than mirth, and more vanity than true content; yet in one thing the better sort of men, as the nobles and gentry, are to be commended, which is, that though they are oftener drunken and more debauched than peasants, having more means to maintain their debaucheries, yet at such times as at great assemblies, they keep themselves more sober and temperate than peasants do, which are for the most part drunk at their departing;[2] but to judge between the peasantry and nobles for happiness, I believe where there's one noble that is truly happy, there are a hundred peasants; not that there be more peasants than nobles, but that they are more happy, number for number, as having not the envy, ambition, pride, vainglory, to cross, trouble, [and] vex them, as nobles have; when I say nobles, I mean those that have been ennobled by time as well as title, as the gentry. But, Madam, I am not a fit judge for the several sorts or degrees, or courses of lives, or actions of mankind, as to judge which is happiest, for happiness lives not in outward show or concourse, but inwardly in the mind, and the minds of men are too obscure to be known, and too various and inconstant to fix a belief in them, and since we cannot know ourselves, how should we know others? Besides, pleasure and true delight lives in everyone's own delectation;[3] but let me tell you, my delectation is, to prove my self,

---

[1] honesty chastity.

Madam,

Your Faithful Fr. and S.
I, M.N.

CXXIII

MADAM,

I wonder how that person you mention in your letter, could either have the conscience, or confidence to dispraise Shakespeare's plays, as to say they were made up only with clowns, fools, watchmen, and the like; but to answer that person, though Shakespeare's wit will answer for himself, I say, that it seems by his judging, or censuring, he understands not plays, or wit; for to express properly, rightly, usually, and naturally, a clown's, or fool's humour, expressions, phrases, garbs, manners, actions, words, and course of life, is as witty, wise, judicious, ingenious, and observing, as to write and express the expressions, phrases, garbs, manners, actions, words, and course of life, of kings and princes; and to express naturally, to the life, a mean country wench, as a great lady, a courtesan, as a chaste woman, a mad man, as a man in his right reason and senses, a drunkard, as a sober man, a knave, as an honest man, and so a clown, as a well-bred man, and a fool, as a wise man; nay, it expresses and declares a greater wit, to express, and deliver to posterity, the extravagancies of madness, the subtlety of knaves, the ignorance of clowns, and the simplicity of naturals, or the craft of feigned fools, than to express regularities, plain honesty, courtly garbs, or sensible discourses, for 'tis harder to express nonsense than sense, and ordinary conversations, than that which is unusual; and 'tis harder, and requires more wit to express a jester, than a grave statesman; yet Shakespeare did not want wit, to express to the life all sorts of persons, of what quality, profession, degree, breeding, or birth soever; nor did he want wit to express the diverse, and different humours, or natures, or several passions in mankind; and so well he hath expressed in his plays all sorts of persons, as one would think he had been transformed into every one of those persons he hath described; and as sometimes one would think he was really himself the clown or jester he feigns, so one would think, he was also the king, and privy counsellor; also as one would think he were really the coward he feigns, so one would think he were the most valiant, and experienced soldier; who would not think he had been such a man as his Sir John Falstaff? and who would not think he had been Harry the Fifth? and certainly Julius Cæsar, Augustus Cæsar, and Antonius, did never really act their parts better, if so well, as he hath described them, and I believe that Antonius and Brutus did not speak better to the people, than he hath feigned them; nay, one would think that he had been metamorphosed from a man to a woman, for who could describe Cleopatra better than he hath done, and many other females of his own creating, as Nan Page, Mrs. Page, Mrs. Ford, the doctor's maid, Beatrice, Mrs. Quickly, Doll Tearsheet, and others, too many to relate?[1] and in his tragic vein, he presents passions so naturally, and misfortunes so probably, as he pierces the souls of his readers with such a true sense and feeling thereof, that it forces tears through their eyes, and almost persuades them, they are really actors, or at least present at those tragedies. Who would not swear he had been a noble lover, that could woo so well? and there is not any person he hath described in his book, but his readers might think they were well acquainted with them; indeed Shakespeare had a clear judgment, a quick wit, a spreading fancy, a subtle observation, a deep apprehension, and a most eloquent elocution; truly, he was a natural orator, as well as a natural poet, and he was not an orator to speak well only on some subjects, as lawyers, who can make eloquent orations at the bar, and plead subtly and wittily in law-cases, or divines, that can preach eloquent sermons, or dispute subtly and wittily in theology, but take them from that, and put them to other subjects, and they will be to seek; but Shakespeare's wit and eloquence was general, for, and upon all subjects, he rather wanted subjects for his wit and eloquence to work on, for which he was forced to take some of his plots out of history, where he only took the bare designs, the wit and language being all his own; and so much he had above others, that those, who writ after him, were forced to borrow of him, or rather to steal from him; I could mention diverse places, that others of our famous poets have borrowed, or stolen, but lest I should discover the persons, I will not mention the places, or parts, but leave it to those that read his plays, and others, to find them out. I should not have needed to write this to you, for his works would have declared the same truth: but I believe, those that dispraised his plays, dispraised them more out of envy, than simplicity or ignorance, for those that could read his plays, could not be so foolish to condemn them, only the excellency of them caused an envy to them. By this we may perceive, envy doth not leave a man in the grave, it follows him after death, unless a man be buried in oblivion, but if he leave any thing to be remembered, envy and malice will be still throwing aspersion upon it, or striving to pull it down by detraction. But leaving Shakespeare's works to their own defence, and his detractors to their envy, and you to your better employments, than reading my letter, I rest,

---

[1] surfeits excesses (OED surfeit sb 1).

[2] debauched seduced from duty or virtue; depraved in morals; given up to sensual pleasures or loose living (OED debauched ppl.a).

[3] delectation the action of delighting (OED delectation).

---

[1] ll. 34–43 Cavendish refers to characters in Henry IV (Falstaff, Henry V, Mistress Quickly, Doll Tearsheet), Henry V (Falstaff, Henry V, Hostess Quickly), Anthony and Cleopatra (Cleopatra), Much Ado About Nothing (Beatrice), Julius Cæsar (Julius Cæsar, Octavius Cæsar, Marcus Antonius, Marcus Brutus), The Merry Wives of Windsor (Mistress Ford, Mistress Page, Anne Page, Mistress Quickly-servant to Doctor Caius).

Madam,

Your faithful Friend
and humble Servant

—1664

Philosophical Letters: or, Modest Reflections[1]

XXXVI (sect. 1)

MADAM,

That all other animals, besides man, want reason, your author endeavours to prove in his Discourse of Method,[2] where his chief argument is, that other animals cannot express their mind, thoughts or conceptions, either by speech or any other signs, as man can do: For, says he, "it is not for want of the organs belonging to the framing of words, as we may observe in parrots and pies,[3] which are apt enough to express words they are taught, but understand nothing of them." My answer is, that one man expressing his mind by speech or words to another, doth not declare by it his excellency and supremacy above all other creatures, but for the most part more folly, for a talking man is not so wise as a contemplating man. But by reason other creatures cannot speak or discourse with each other as men, or make certain signs, whereby to express themselves as dumb and deaf men do, should we conclude they have neither knowledge, sense, reason, or intelligence? Certainly, this is a very weak argument; for one part of a man's body, as one hand, is not less sensible than the other, nor the heel less sensible than the heart, nor the leg less sensible than the head, but each part hath its sense and reason, and so consequently its sensitive and rational knowledge; and although they cannot talk or give intelligence to each other by speech, nevertheless each hath its own peculiar and particular knowledge, just as each particular man has his own particular knowledge, for one man's knowledge is not another man's knowledge; and if there be such a peculiar and particular knowledge in every several part of one animal creature, as man, well may there be such in creatures of different kinds and sorts: But this particular knowledge belonging to each creature, doth not prove that there is no intelligence at all betwixt them, no more than the want of human knowledge doth prove the want of reason; for reason is the rational part of matter, and makes perception, observation, and intelligence different in every creature, and every sort of creatures, according to their proper natures, but perception, observation and intelligence do not make reason, reason being the cause, and they the effects. Wherefore though other creatures have not the speech, nor mathematical rules and demonstrations, with other arts and sciences, as men; yet may their perceptions and observations be as wise as men's, and they may have as much intelligence and commerce betwixt each other, after their own manner and way, as men have after theirs: To which I leave them, and man to his conceited prerogative and excellence, resting,

---

[1] In the Preface to Philosophical Letters (1664), Cavendish describes the nature of her work, "I took the liberty to declare my own opinions as other philosophers do, and to that purpose I have here set down several famous and learned authors' opinions, and my answers to them in the form of letters, which was the easiest way for me to write." In particular, Cavendish formulates her theory of natural philosophy by addressing and judging the validity of the works by Descartes, Hobbes, More and Van Helmont.

[2] Discourse of Method published in 1637. In particular, Cavendish addresses Descartes's account of the irrational animal in Discourse 5.

[3] pies magpies.

Madam,

Your faithful Friend,
and Servant.

—1664

Mary Howgill
1623 – before 1681

Mary Howgill, a prophetic writer, is best known for her public defense of the non-conformist Society of Friends, commonly referred to as the Quakers. It is presumed that Howgill was the sister of the eminent Quaker preacher Francis Howgill of Grayrigg, Westmorland, as he was known to have a sister who engaged in "publishing truth." Both Mary and Francis Howgill addressed letters to Oliver Cromwell, amongst others, complaining of persecutions, and both suffered imprisonment as a result. It is believed she converted to Quakerism shortly after her brother's conversion in 1652, as she was imprisoned in Kendal in 1653 for her public assertion of Quaker doctrine, later enduring imprisonment in Exeter during 1656. Recent research has raised some questions about the identity of Howgill, as there were two Mary Howgills who prophesied. Contemporary records document that the Mary Howgill indicted at Lancaster Assizes in March 1654/5 for abusing Thomas Shaw, Rector of Aldingham, was of Overkellet, Lancashire, not Grayrigg, Westmorland. Only two pamphlets written by Howgill were published. Written within the context of religious persecution, A Remarkable Letter challenged political and religious authorities which responded to freedom of religious conscience with the confiscation of property, imprisonment and physical violence.

* * *

A Remarkable Letter of Mary Howgill to Oliver Cromwell, Called Protector

TO THEE
OLIVER CROMWELL

When thou wast a soldier for the Lord, thou wast low, and little in thine own eyes; then thou remembredst the Lord, and stood in his fear, and he was thy strength; but now thou art in thy own strength, and hast forgot that time: I say, thou hast denied the Lord God, and thy own law with the pride of thy own heart; and the pride of thy heart is now acting all manner of cruelty against them who are in the fear of the Lord.

When thou wast low, the Lord was thy strength, but now thou hast departed from him, and thy strength is in man; thou hast trusted in the arm of flesh and not in God;[1] thou hast chosen the glory of this world, and art as a stinking dunghill in the sight of God; thou hast shut thyself out of the kingdom, and them who are in the kingdom, all manner of evil is done and acted to them in thy name; and so thou hast strengthened all the wicked, and instead of serving the Lord, thou has served thy own glory, and thy own pleasures, and thou art going on in all thy power; but verily him whom thou once served, which thou now art turned from, he will overtake thee, for thou hast almost filled up thy measure;[2] many fair things hast thou promised to them whom the Lord is their strength, but they see thee and all thy subtlety: For verily, hast not thou suffered in thy name (whose name is Oliver Lord Protector) many bloody actions to be done in thy name? And he that protects thee now is unrighteous Mammon, and so him that is our Protector will rule thee, to him must thou bow, for verily the law of God shall overturn thee:[1] And when thou hast filled up thy measure in thy cruel bloody actions, who hast suffered the innocent to be persecuted, yea unto death, and some hath suffered stoning and sore bruising.

---

[1] arm of flesh "With him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God to help us, and to fight our battles" (II Chronicles 32:8).

[2] filled up thy measure Jesus said to the scribes and Pharisees: "Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your Fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell" (Matthew 23:32–33).

Therefore in the name of the Lord God, whom we serve, and whom once thou trusted in, verily, I say unto thee, thy condition above all men is most lamentable; for them who are born again,[2] and witness a new birth in him, whom we receive tribute from; we are all soldiers against all sin and deceit, and have overcome death, hell, and the grave; and being of them who partake of the resurrection of Christ, the second death hath no power over. And so in the power of God we all stand to follow the Lamb wherever he goes, and so we follow the Lord in the new generation.[3] But I say unto thee, thou hast forgot thy promise, and what the Lord did for thee when he gave thee victory over unreasonable men.

Woe is me for thee, that ever thou shouldest depart from that of God that was once in thee, and hast trusted in the arm of flesh, and so thou art one with them whom once thou foughtest against! For there is that in thy conscience will let thee see thou art one with a proud man, one with a drunken man, one with a covetous man, and one with all them that are in the evil, the light in thy conscience will let thee see all these things; for verily, that in thee which should have brought forth fruit unto God, hath brought forth nothing but wild grapes, brambles, briers, and thorns;[4] and thy crown which thou hast now is nothing but thorns.[5]

Oh! thou hadst better had the angels to have guarded thee, and the Lord to have protected thee, than to have trusted in the arm of flesh.

For verily his Son is brought forth in them who have believed in his name, and all the angels shall worship him: But thou hast crucified the Son of God, and hast chosen thy own way, and thy own strength, and thou art one with all them who are set against Christ; for verily I say unto thee, he will overtake thee when thou hast filled up thy measure; for he who is Lord of heaven and earth, is ready to deliver thee into the hands of thy enemies within and without; for I say unto thee, thy way is now darkness, and thou hast turned thy back on him who is all our strength and light, in whose strength, I tell thee, thou hast even owned him who is the god of this world, and the glory of the world is thy portion and delight, and that which is of another world is crucified by thee.[6]

Oh! my heart is sad for thee, that ever thou shouldest be found where thou art; many true messengers the Lord hath sent to thee for the good of thy soul; but thou wouldest not lend thy ears to them, and so thou must have no peace with them; for them who would have loved thy soul, thou wouldst not hear, and the soul is more worth than the glory of this world. But verily thou must have thy portion amongst them who are in their own glory; for we who know the Lord, and have found him whom our souls loved, our glory is not of this world, nor in our own glory, nor in our own strength, but in the Lord our God, who is our glory, and hath crowned us with his everlasting glory, and we stand in his glory, and in his power, and so we stand in the righteousness of God, who hath brought us into the innocency, and in that we know our being and our habitation with the Lord, and with him to reign for evermore; for them who suffer with him shall reign with him.[1] But thou, where thou standest, thy reign shall be but for a time, for misery and great condemnation shall be thy portion, and all them who have forgotten the Lord our God; for we have the Lord to be our strength, and thou who acts against him, the time is come that we are justified, and with him that justifies us shalt thou be condemned, and thou shalt know that thou hadst better that thy tongue had been cloven to the roof of thy mouth, ere these things had been acted in thy name (we are kept in perfect peace).[2] And them who have suffered to death in prison, their blood, yea the blood of the innocent shall be required of thee, whom the Lord set in the place, but thou hast departed from that place; and so thou dost not, nor canst not bear rule for God, but against him; but he is coming upon thee, whom thou hast acted against, which thou shalt know, and all thy gallant glory will he bring down; for no flesh shall glory in his presence, for dreadful will he be to thy glory, even him whom thou hast crucified, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world:[3] I say unto thee in the name of the Lord, whom we all know, and for whom we are a witness against thee, this shall witness for us; for thou must have condemnation with the light which thou hast turned from, which witness is in thy conscience, which thou once wast in, and heard speak, and breathed after the Lord, and many dear servants of God have warned thee of thy earthly glory; the Lord did send me once before now to thee, for the good of thy soul, and I could have done anything once for thee, for the seed's sake, that thou mightst have known the way of truth; but thou hast counted us all of small worth.

---

[1] Mammon the Aramaic word for "riches," occurring in the Greek text of Matthew 6:24 and Luke 16:9–13, and retained in the Vulgate. From the sixteenth century onwards it has been current in English usage as a term for opprobrium of wealth regarded as an idol or as an evil influence (OED).

[2] born again spiritual birth as distinct from physical birth: "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever" (I Peter 1:23). See also John 3:5–8.

[3] we all stand to follow the Lamb those redeemed from among men (Revelation 14:4).

[4] hath brought forth...briers, and thorns an allusion to the parable of the sower (Matthew 13:3–23; Mark 4:3–13).

[5] and thy Crown emended from "and Crown thy."

[6] thy way is now of darkness "The way of the wicked is as darkness: they know not at what they stumble" (Proverbs 4:19).

Woe is me for thee, that thou canst not see him whom thou hast pierced, nor canst lay it to heart what thou hast done.

Hold thee once before, that thou hadst crucified the Lamb of God, and trodden the blood of the new covenant under thy feet, and counted it a vain thing:[4] Thou askedst me once what it was; and I told thee the blood of Christ cleansed from all sin, and his water washed, and his Spirit made alive;[5] but thou couldest not receive these things, for all the cry that thou couldest hear which was in thee; for verily I say, thou couldest not hear, but hast hardened thy heart; for the righteous hath cried to thee for righteousness's sake but it could not be heard, neither in thyself, nor in others; and all that ever thou didst do for God is now in vain, for thou hast now chosen thy own way, and so the cry could never be heard, how the righteous hath cried for righteousness's sake, that they might have had justice in the land, that many a one might have worshipped God without any disturbance.

Thou hast suffered thy soldiers, which are in the abomination with thyself, to disturb peaceable meetings, and to hale men to prison: Thou hast many colours for thy deceit, but thou hast none for these men which were met peaceably together;[1] for violently they came amongst them with their horses, and acted violently, by treading amongst simple and harmless people.

---

[1] for them who suffer…reign with him "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him: if we deny him, he also will deny us" (II Timothy 2:12).

[2] we are kept in perfect peace "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee" (Isaiah 26:3).

[3] the Lamb slain from…the world "And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Revelation 13:8).

[4] new covenant The "old covenant," the contractual agreement between God and the Israelites established through the Mosaic covenant at Sinai, is one of obligations, subject to sanctions of blessings and curses. The "new covenant" promises peace for both Jew and Gentile through the sacrifice of Christ, the high priest (mediator) in covenant renewal. Paul describes the "old covenant" as the letter of the law which "killeth" and the new covenant as the "spirit" which gives "life" (II Corinthians 3).

[5] the blood of Christ…made alive "But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin" (I John 1:7).

Oh! what shameless things are done in thy name, and by thy authority! yea verily the righteous spirit of God is grieved with thee: And all these things shalt thou know; for all the cunning and subtleties of thy heart is seen and known by them who are come into the everlasting spirit: And when thou givest account for all those actions which have been acted by thee and in thy name and by thy power, oh what a day will it be with thee![2] For as my soul lives, these things shall be laid all to thy charge: And for us, whom the Lord hath redeemed from the vain-glory of the world, and hath graffed us into himself, he will plead our cause, yea the righteous cause of himself, and he will make thee an example to all great ones in the world;[3] and when that day comes upon thee, thou shalt me remember, that thou wast warned of all thy evil

By a lover of thy soul, whose name in the flesh is

MARY HOWGILL

This in one of its first copies was delivered to Oliver Cromwell's own hands by the author herself, at or about the eighth day of the fourth month 1656 about ten o'clock at night, with whom thereupon she had much discourse.
—1656

---

[1] colours fair pretenses to conceal or to cloak the truth (OED colour sb^{1} III.11a,12a).

[2] givest account "So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God" (Romans 14:12).

[3] graffed grafted.

Lady Anne Halkett

1623 – 1699

The autobiographer Lady Anne Halkett was born in London. Her parents were Thomas Murray, Provost of Eton College and former tutor of Charles I, and Jane Drummond, later governess of the Duke of Gloucester and the Princess Elizabeth. Her father died three months after her birth. Her mother employed tutors to teach her to write, speak French, play the lute and virginals, and dance. Halkett also studied medical science, which later proved useful when she tended soldiers wounded in the Battle of Dunbar. In 1644, she fell in love with Thomas Howard, the eldest son of Edward, first Lord Howard of Escrick, but her mother opposed the match because of Howard's small fortune. Halkett's autobiographical narrative of thwarted love and unexpected treachery in this and other liaisons has been compared to Richardson's Clarissa and Austen's Pride and Prejudice. Soon after her disappointment with Howard, Halkett helped Colonel Joseph Bampfield to effect the escape of James Stuart, the Duke of York, in April, 1648. Shortly afterwards, Bampfield, posing as a widower, successfully proposed marriage to Halkett. The relationship continued for several years before Bampfield's wife was proven to be alive. In 1656, Anne married Sir James Halkett, a widower with two sons and two daughters, and took up residence at his estate at Pitfirrane in Scotland. She bore four children, three of whom died in infancy, before her husband's death in 1670. Between 1677 and 1678, Halkett wrote her memoirs, a vivid and candid account of historical events, political intrigue and personal relationships. After 1683, Halkett supplemented her income by caring for and tutoring children. On his accession in 1685, James II granted her a pension of £100 a year for her service to him when he was Duke of York. Halkett died leaving more than twenty manuscript volumes of devotional prose, dating from 1649 onward. Though selections from several of her religious writings were published shortly after her death, her memoirs remained unpublished until 1875.

The Memoirs of Anne, Lady Halkett

In the year 1644 I confess I was guilty of an act of disobedience, for I gave way to the address of a person whom my mother, at the first time that ever he had occasion to be conversant with me, had absolutely discharged me ever to allow of:[1] and though before ever I saw him several did tell me that there would be something more than ordinary betwixt him and me (which I believe they fudged from the great friendship betwixt his sister and me, for we were seldom asunder at London, and she and I were bedfellows when she came to my sister's house at Charleton, where for the most part she stayed while we continued in the country), yet he was half a year in my company before I discovered anything of a particular inclination for me more than another, and as I was civil to him both for his own merit and his sister's sake, so any particular civility I received from him I looked upon it as flowing from the affection he had to his sister and her kindness to me.[2]

After that time it seems he was not so much master of himself as to conceal it any longer. And having never any opportunity of being alone with me to speak himself, he employed a young gentleman (whose confidante he was in an amour betwixt him and my Lady Anne, his cousin-german) to tell me how much he had endeavoured all this time to smother his passion which he said began the first time that ever he saw me, and now was come to that height that if I did not give him some hopes of favour he was resolved to go back again into France (from whence he had come when I first saw him) and turn Capuchin.[1]

---

[1] address courtship (OED address sb II.9); person Thomas Howard (1625–1678), son of Edward, first Lord Howard of Escrick.

[2] fudged to fudge is to fit in with what is anticipated (OED fudge v 2); his sister Anne Howard, daughter of Lord Howard of Escrick; my sister's house at Charleton Elizabeth Murray was married to Sir Henry Newton, who had an estate at Charlton in Kent.

Though this discourse disturbed me, yet I was a week or ten days before I would be persuaded so much as to hear him speak of this subject, and desired his friend to represent several disadvantages that it would be to him to pursue such a design. And knowing that his father had sent for him out of France with an intention to marry him to some rich match that might improve his fortune, it would be high ingratitude in me to do anything to hinder such a design, since his father had been so obliging to my mother and sister as to use his Lordship's interest with the Parliament to prevent the ruin of my brother's house and k[in].[2] But when all I could say to him by his friend could not prevail, but that he grew so ill and discontented that all the house took notice, I did yield so far to comply with his desire as to give him liberty one day when I was walking in the gallery to come there and speak to me. What he said was handsome and short, but much disordered, for he looked pale as death, and his hand trembled when he took mine to lead me, and with a great sigh said, "If I loved you less I could say more."

I told him I could not but think myself much obliged to him for his good opinion of me, but it would be a higher obligation to confirm his esteem of me by following my advice, which I should now give him myself, since he would not receive it by his friend. I used many arguments to dissuade him from pursuing what he proposed, and in conclusion told him I was 2 or 3 year[s] older than he, and were there no other objection, yet that was of such weight with me as would never let me allow his further address.

"Madam," said he, "what I love in you may well increase, but I am sure it can never decay."

I left arguing and told him I would advise him to consult with his own reason and that would let him see I had more respect to him in denying than in granting what with so much passion he desired.

After that, he sought, and I shunned, all opportunities of private discourse with him; but one day in the garden his friend took his sister by the hand and led her into another walk and left him and I together. And he with very much seriousness began to tell me that he had observed ever since he had discovered his affection to me that I was more reserved and avoided all converse with him, and therefore, since he had no hopes of my favour, he was resolved to leave England, since he could not be happy in it. And that whatever became of him that might make him displease either his father or his friends, I was the occasion of it, for if I would not give him hopes of marrying him, he was resolved to put himself out of a capacity of marrying any other and go immediately into a convent, and that he had taken order to have post horses ready against the next day.[3]

I confess this discourse disturbed me, for though I had had no respect for him, his sister, or his family, yet religion was a tie upon me to endeavour the prevention of the hazard of his soul.[1] I looked on this as a violent passion which would not last long and perhaps might grow the more by being resisted, when as a seeming complaisance might lesson it. I told him I was sorry to have him entertain such thoughts as could not but be a ruin to him and a great affliction to all his relations, which I would willingly prevent if it were in my power.

---

[1] Lady Anne Lady Ann Howard, daughter of the second Earl of Suffolk; cousin-german first cousin; Capuchin a friar of the order of St. Francis, of the new rule of 1528.

[2] since his father...and k[in] Edward Howard, first Lord Escrick, had interceded with Parliamentarians to reduce the fines levied on Sir Henry Newton, who had fought in King Charles's army.

[3] convent an institution which houses a body of monks or friars (OED convent sb 4).

He said it was absolutely in my power, for if I would promise to marry him he should esteem himself the most happy man living, and he would wait whatever time I thought most convenient for it. I replied I thought it was unreasonable to urge me to promise that which ere long he might repent the asking, but this I would promise to satisfy him, that I would not marry till I saw him first married. He kissed my hand upon that with as much joy as if I had confirmed to him his greatest happiness and said he could desire no more, for he was secure I should never see nor hear of that till it was to myself. Upon this we parted, both well pleased, for he thought he had gained much in what I promised, and I looked upon my promise as a cure to him, but no inconvenience to myself, since I had no inclination to marry any. And though I had, a delay in it was the least return I could make to so deserving a person.

But I deceived myself by thinking this was the way to moderate his passion, for now he gave way to it without any restraint and thought himself so secure of me as if there had been nothing to oppose it, though he managed it with that discretion that it was scarce visible to any within the house; not so much as either his sister or mine had the least suspicion of it, for I had enjoined him not to let them or any other know what his designs were because I would not have them accessory, whatever fault might be in the prosecution of it.

Thus it continued till towards winter that his sister was to go home to her father again, and then, knowing he would want much of the opportunity he had to converse with me, he was then very importunate to have me consent to marry him privately, which it seems he pleased himself so with the hopes of prevailing with me that he had provided a wedding ring and a minister to marry us.[2] I was much unsatisfied with his going that length, and in short, told him he need never expect I would marry him without his father's and my mother's consent.[3] If that could be obtained, I should willingly give him the satisfaction he desired, but without that I could not expect God's blessing neither upon him nor me, and I would do nothing that was so certain a way to bring ruin upon us both. He used many arguments from the examples of others who had practised the same and were happy both in their parents' favour and in one another, but finding me fixed beyond any persuasion, he resolved to acquaint my sister with it and to employ her to speak of it to his father and my mother.

She very unwillingly undertook it, because she knew it would be a surprise to them and very unwelcome. But his importunity prevailed, and she first acquainted my mother with it, who was so passionately offended with the proposal that, whereas his father might have been brought to have given his consent (having ever had a good opinion of me and very civil), she did so exasperate him against it that nothing could satisfy her, but presently to put it to Mr. H.'s choice either presently to marry a rich citizen's daughter that his father had designed for him, or else to leave England. The reason I believe that made my mother the more incensed was, first, that it was what in the beginning of our acquaintance she had absolutely discharged my having a thought of allowing such an address; and though in some respect his quality was above mine and therefore better than any she could expect for me, yet my Lord H.'s fortune was such as had need of a more considerable portion than my mother could give me, or else it must ruin his younger children.[1] And therefore my mother would not consent to it, though my Lord H. did offer to do the utmost his condition would allow him if she would let me take my hazard with his son. But my mother would not be persuaded to it upon no consideration, lest any should have thought it was began with her allowance; and to take away the suspicion of that, did, I believe, make her the more violent in opposing it and the more severe to me.

---

[1] though even if (OED though conj B.II.2a).

[2] want lack (OED want v 2).

[3] going that length going to such an extent or extremity (OED length sb I.5b).

My sister made choice of Sunday to speak of it; first, because she thought that day might put them both in a calmer frame to hear her, and confine their passion, since it would be the next day before they would determine anything. But finding both by my mother and my Lord H. that they intended nothing but to part us so as never to meet again, except it was as strangers, Mr. H. was very importunate to have an opportunity to speak with me that night, which I gave. My sister being only with me, we came down together to the room appointed to meet with him. I confess I never saw those two passions of love and regret more truly represented, nor could any person express greater affection and resolution of constancy, which with many solemn oaths he sealed of never loving or marrying any but myself. I was not satisfied with his swearing to future performances, since I said both he and I might find it most convenient to retract, but this I did assure him, as long as he was constant he should never find a change in me, for though duty did oblige me not to marry any without my mother's consent, yet it would not tie me to marry without my own.

My sister at this rises and said, "I did not think you would have engaged me to be a witness of both your resolutions to continue what I expected you would rather have laid aside, and therefore I will leave you."

"Oh, Madam," said he, "can you imagine I love at that rate as to have it shaken with any storm? No, were I secure your sister would not suffer in my absence by her mother's severity, I would not care what misery I were exposed to, but to think I should be the occasion of trouble to the person in the earth that I love most is unsupportable."

And with that he fell down in a chair that was behind him, but as one without all sense, which I must confess did so much move me that, laying aside all former distance I had kept him at, I sat down upon his knee, and laying my head near his I suffered him to kiss me, which was a liberty I never gave before; nor had not then had I not seen him so overcome with grief, which I endeavoured to suppress with all the encouragement I could, but still pressing him to be obedient to his father, either in going abroad or staying at home as he thought most convenient.

"No," says he, "since they will not allow me to converse with you, France will be more agreeable to me than England, nor will I go there except I have liberty to come here again and take my leave of you." To that I could not disagree if they thought fit to allow it, and so my sister and I left him, but she durst not own to my mother where she had been.

The next morning early my Lord H. went away, and took with him his son and daughter, and left me to the severities of my offended mother, who nothing could pacify. After she had called for me and said as many bitter things as passion could dictate upon such a subject, she discharged me to see him and did solemnly vow that if she should hear I did see Mr. H. she would turn me out of her doors and never own me again. All I said to that part was that it should be against my will if ever she heard of it.

---

[1] quality rank or position in society (OED quality sb 3a); Lord H.'s...younger children Lord Howard had five children; Thomas was his eldest son and heir. Halkett's mother believed that if Lord H.'s eldest son failed to marry an heiress with a substantial portion (dowry), his four younger children would not be provided for.

. . . .

At this time my Lord H. had a sister in France who gloried much of her wit and contrivance and used to say she never designed anything but she accomplished it.[1] My Lord H. thought she was the fittest person to divert his son from his amour, and to her he writes and recommends it to her management, who was not negligent of what she was entrusted with, as appeared in the conclusion; though her carriage was a great disappointment to Mr. H., for he expected by her mediation to have obtained what he desired, and that made him the more willing to comply with her, who designed her own advantage by this to oblige her brother, who might be the more useful to her in a projected marriage she had for her own son.

Upon Thursday the 13th of February, 1645/6, word was brought to my mother that the Countess of B. was come out of France and Mr. H. with her, which was a great surprise to her and all his relations. My mother examined me if I had sent for him or knew anything of his coming, which I assured her I had not, and she said not much more. But I was as much disturbed as any, sometimes thinking he was come with an assurance from his aunt that she would accomplish what he had so passionately desired, or else that he had laid all thoughts of me aside and was come with a resolution to comply with his father's desires. The last opinion I was a little confirmed in, having never received any word or letter from him in ten days after his return; and meeting him accidently where I was walking, he crossed the way, and another time was in the room where I came in to visit some young ladies, and neither of these times took any notice of me more than of one I had never seen. I confess I was a little disordered at it, but made no conclusions till I saw what time would produce.

Upon Tuesday the 4th of March, my Lady Anne W. his cousin came to my mother's, and having stayed a convenient time for a visit with my mother (for then it was not usual for mothers and daughters to be visited apart), I waited on her down, and taking me aside she told me she was desired by her cousin T.H. to present his most faithful service to me and to desire me not to take it ill that he did not speak to me when he met me.[2] For finding his aunt not his friend as he expected, he seemed to comply with her desire only to have the opportunity of coming home with her, and had resolved for a time to forbear all converse with me and to make love to all that came in his way; but assured me it was only to make his friends think he had forgot me, and then he might with the less suspicion prosecute his design, which was never to love or marry any but me. And this, she said, he confirmed with all the solemn oaths imaginable.

In pursuance of this he visited all the young ladies about the town. But an earl's daughter gave him the most particular welcome, whose mother not allowing him to come as a pretender, she made appointment with him and met him at her cousin's house frequently, which I knew and he made sport of. The summer being now advancing, my mother and her family went with my sister to her house in the country, which being not far from London we heard often how affairs went there, and amongst other discourse that it was reported Mr. H. was in love with my Lady E.M. and she with him; at which some smiled and said it might be her wit had taken him, but certainly not her beauty (for she had as little of that as myself).[1]

---

[1] my Lord H. had a sister Lord Howard's sister was Elizabeth Knollys Vaux, Countess of Banbury.

[2] Lady Anne W. Lady Ann Walsingham.

Though these reports put me upon my guard, yet I confess I did not believe he was real in his address there; neither did his sister, who was sometimes a witness of their converse and gave me account of it. But I approved not of his way, for I thought it could not but reflect upon himself and injure either that lady or me. But she took a way to secure herself; for upon the last Tuesday in July, 1646, a little before supper, I received a letter from Mrs. H., a particular friend of mine, who writ me word that upon the Tuesday before Mr. H. was privately married to my Lady E.M., and the relations of both sides was unsatisfied.[2]

I was alone in my sister's chamber when I read the letter, and flinging myself down upon her bed, I said, "Is this the man for whom I have suffered so much? Since he hath made himself unworthy my love, he is unworthy my anger or concern." And rising, immediately I went out into the next room to my supper as unconcernedly as if I had never had an interest in him, nor had never lost it.

. . . .

This gentleman came to see me sometimes in the company of ladies who had been my mother's neighbours in St. Martin's Lane, and sometimes alone.[3] But whenever he came, his discourse was serious, handsome, and tending to impress the advantages of piety, loyalty, and virtue;[4] and these subjects were so agreeable to my own inclination that I could not but give them a good reception, especially from one that seemed to be so much an owner of them himself. After I had been used to freedom of discourse with him, I told him I approved of his advice to others, but I thought his own practice contradicted much of his profession, for one of his acquaintance had told me he had not seen his wife in a twelvemonth; and it was impossible, in my opinion, for a good man to be an ill husband, and therefore he must defend himself from one before I could believe the other of him. He said it was not necessary to give everyone that might condemn him the reason of his being so long from her, yet to satisfy me he would tell me the truth, which was that, he being engaged in the king's service, he was obliged to be at London, where it was not convenient for her to be with him, his stay in any place being uncertain.[5] Besides, she lived amongst her friends, who though they were kind to her yet were not so to him, for most of that country had declared for the Parliament and were enemies to all that had, or did, serve the king; and therefore his wife, he was sure, would not condemn him for what he did by her own consent. This seeming reasonable, I did insist no more upon that subject.

At this time he had frequent letters from the king, who employed him in several affairs, but that of the greatest concern which he was employed in was to contrive the Duke of York's escape out of St. James' (where His Highness and the Duke of Gloucester and the Princess Elizabeth lived under the care of the Earl of Northumberland and his Lady).[6] The difficulties of it were represented by

---

[1] Lady E.M. Lady Elizabeth Mordaunt, daughter of John, first Earl of Peterborough (1599–1643).

[2] upon the Tuesday…my Lady E.M. Thomas Howard married Lady Elizabeth Mordaunt on July 21, 1646.

[3] This gentleman Colonel Joseph Bampfield, a soldier and secret agent for Charles I. Though Bampfield helped to effect the escape of the Duke of York from St. James's Palace in April 1648, he later served Oliver Cromwell's government.

[4] handsome appropriate; also clever (OED handsome a A.2a); impress imprint on the mind; urge (OED impress v^1I.3).

[5] engaged in the king's service Charles I was currently imprisoned at Carisbrooke Castle on the Isle of Wight.

[6] Duke of York James Stuart, the Duke of York (1633–1701), the second son of Charles I; St. James' St. James's Palace, in which the Duke of York had been born; Duke of Gloucester Henry Stuart (1639–1660), the third son of Charles I; Princess Elizabeth Elizabeth Stuart (1635–1650), the second daughter of Charles I; Earl of Northumberland Algernon Percy, tenth Earl of Northumberland

Colonel B., but His Majesty still pressed it, and I remember this expression was in one of the letters: I believe it will be difficult, and if he miscarry in the attempt it will be the greatest affliction that can arrive to me, but I look upon James' escape as Charles's preservation, and nothing can content me more.[1] Therefore be careful what you do.

This letter amongst others he showed me, and where the king approved of his choice of me to entrust with it, for to get the Duke's clothes made and to dress him in his disguise.[2] So now all C.B.'s business and care was how to manage this business of so important concern which could not be performed without several persons' concurrence in it. For he being generally known as one whose stay at London was in order to serve the king, few of those who were entrusted by the Parliament in public concerns durst own converse or hardly civility to him, lest they should have been suspect by their party, which made it difficult for him to get access to the Duke.[3] But (to be short) having communicated the design to a gentleman attending His Highness, who was full of honour and fidelity, by his means he had private access to the Duke, to whom he presented the king's letter and order to His Highness for consenting to act what C.B. should contrive for his escape;[4] which was so cheerfully entertained and so readily obeyed, that being once designed there was nothing more to do than to prepare all things for the execution.

I had desired him to take a ribbon with him and bring me the bigness of the Duke's waist and his length to have clothes made fit for him. In the meantime C.B. was to provide money for all necessary expense, which was furnished by an honest citizen. When I gave the measure to my tailor to enquire how much mohair would serve to make a petticoat and waistcoat to a young gentlewoman of that bigness and stature, he considered it a long time and said he had made many gowns and suits, but he had never made any to such a person in his life. I thought he was in the right; but his meaning was, he had never seen any women of so low a stature have so big a waist. However, he made it as exactly fit as if he had taken the measure himself. It was a mixed mohair of a light hair colour and black, and the under-petticoat was scarlet.

All things being now ready, upon the 20th of April, 1648, in the evening was the time resolved on for the Duke's escape. And in order to that, it was designed for a week before every night as soon as the Duke had supped, he and those servants that attended His Highness (till the Earl of Northumberland and the rest of the house had supped) went to a play called hide and seek, and sometimes he would hide himself so well that in half an hour's time they could not find him.[5] His Highness had so used them to this that when he went really away they thought he was but at the usual sport. A little before the Duke went to supper that night, he called for the gardener (who only had

---

(1602–1668), initially held military posts under Charles I before aligning himself with the Parliamentarians.

[1] I look upon… me more Charles I appears aware of the plan proposed by Cromwell and others to depose him, disinherit the Prince of Wales, and crown the Duke of York. With the Duke of York's escape, the royal succession would not be threatened and the motivation for disinheriting, even assassinating, the Prince of Wales would be removed.

[2] approved of his choice of me Though Charles I may not have known Halkett personally, her father had served as his tutor and secretary, her mother had been under-governess and later governess of the Duke of Gloucester and the Princess Elizabeth, and her brothers Henry and Charles had been Grooms of the King's Bedchamber.

[3] own converse admit conversation (OED own sb 1).

[4] a gentleman attending His Highness In his memoirs, James II mentions "the assistance of Mr. George Howard brother to the Earl of Suffolk who at that time was his Master of Horse."

[5] hide and seek As the Duke of York was a boy of fourteen at the time of his escape, his interest in playing hide and seek would not have caused suspicion.

a treble key, besides that which the Duke had) and bid him give him that key till his own was mended, which he did.[1] And after His Highness had supped, he immediately called to go to the play, and went down the privy stairs into the garden and opened the gate that goes into the park, treble locking all the doors behind him.[2] And at the garden gate C.B. waited for His Highness, and putting on a cloak and periwig, hurried him away to the park gate where a coach waited that carried them to the water side.[3] And taking the boat that was appointed for that service, they rode to the stairs next the bridge, where I and Miriam waited in a private house hard by that C.B. had prepared for dressing His Highness, where all things were in a readiness.[4]

But I had many fears, for C.B. had desired me, if they came not there precisely by ten o'clock, to shift for myself, for then I might conclude they were discovered, and so my stay there could do no good, but prejudice myself.[5] Yet this did not make me leave the house though ten o'clock did strike, and he that was entrusted, [who] often went to the landing-place and saw no boat coming, was much discouraged, and asked me what I would do. I told him I came there with a resolution to serve His Highness and I was fully determined not to leave that place till I was out of hopes of doing what I came there for, and would take my hazard.[6] He left me to go again to the water side, and while I was fortifying myself against what might arrive to me, I heard a great noise of many as I thought coming up stairs, which I expected to be soldiers to take me; but it was a pleasing disappointment, for the first that came in was the Duke, who with much joy I took in my arms and gave God thanks for his safe arrival. His Highness called, "Quickly, quickly, dress me," and putting off his clothes I dressed him in the women's habit that was prepared, which fitted His Highness very well and was very pretty in it. After he had eaten something I made ready while I was idle, lest His Highness should be hungry, and having sent for a Woodstreet cake (which I knew he loved) to take in the barge,[7] with as much haste as could be His Highness went cross the bridge to the stairs where the barge lay, C.B. leading him, and immediately the boatmen plied the oar so well that they were soon out of sight, having both wind and tide with them. But I afterwards heard the wind changed and was so contrary that C.B. told me he was terribly afraid they should have been blown back again. And the Duke said, "Do anything with me rather than let me go back again," which put C.B. to seek help where it was only to be had, and after he had most fervently supplicated assistance from God, presently the wind blew fair and they came safely to their intended landing place. But I heard there was some difficulty before they got to the ship at Graves-End, which had like to have discovered them had not Colonel Washington's lady assisted them.[8]

After the Duke's barge was out of sight of the bridge, I and Miriam went where I appointed the coach to stay for me and made drive as fast as the coachman could to my brother's house, where I stayed.[9] I met none in the way that gave me any apprehension that the design was discovered, nor was it noised abroad till the next day. For (as I related before) the Duke having used to play at hide and seek, and to conceal himself a long time when they missed him at the same play, thought he would have discovered himself as formerly when they had given over seeking him.[1] But a much longer time being passed than usually was spent in that divertisement,[2] some began to apprehend that His Highness was gone in earnest past their finding, which made the Earl of Northumberland (to whose care he was committed), after strict search made in the house of St. James and all thereabouts to no purpose, to send and acquaint the Speaker of the House of Commons that the Duke was gone, but how or by what means he knew not; but desired that there might be orders sent to the Cinque Ports for stopping all ships going out till the passengers were examined and search made in all suspected places where His Highness might be concealed.[3]

---

[1] treble key a key used to open a treble lock, which operates by three turns of the key (OED treble a A.3).

[2] privy private; possibly concealed (OED privy a A.II.5).

[3] periwig an artificial imitation of a head of hair worn by women (OED periwig sb 1).

[4] next the bridge...private house on the north bank of the Thames; Miriam Halkett's personal maid; hard by close by (OED hard by prep A).

[5] to shift for to make provision for (OED shift v I.4a).

[6] hazard chances (OED hazard sb 2).

[7] Woodstreet cake probably so named after Wood Street in the Cheapside market.

[8] Graves-End a port twenty-four miles south-east of London, on the south bank of the Thames; discovered revealed (OED discover v 4); Colonel Washington's lady probably Elizabeth, the wife of Colonel Henry Washington (1615–1664).

[9] my brother's house the house of Henry Murray, her oldest brother.

Though this was gone about with all the vigilancy imaginable, yet it pleased God to disappoint them of their intention by so infatuating those several persons who were employed for writing orders that none of them were able to write one right, but ten or twelve of them were cast by before one was according to their mind.[4] This account I had from Mr. N., who was mace-bearer to the Speaker at that time and a witness of it.[5] This disorder of the clerks contributed much to the Duke's safety, for he was at sea before any of the orders came to the ports and so was free from what was designed if they had taken His Highness. Though several were suspected for being accessory to the escape, yet they could not charge any with it but the person who went away, and he being out of their reach, they took no notice as either to examine or imprison others.

. . . .

To allay the joy that all the Loyal Party had for the king's return, there was two great occasions for disturbance, the one being strengthened by the other:[6] Cromwell coming in with an army when there was so great divisions both in Church and State, and such unsuitable things proposed for accommodation as I wish were buried in perpetual silence. After the king had been invited to several places and entertained suitably to what could be expected, His Majesty returned again to Dunfermline, having ordered the forces to march; and one morning came letters from the army lying at Dunbar that they had so surrounded the enemy that there was no possibility for them to escape, which news gave great joy and much security. But the sad effects made us see how little confidence should be placed in anything but God, who in his justice thought fit to punish this kingdom and bring it under subjection to an usurper because they paid not that subjection that was due to their lawful king.

The unexpected defeat which the king's army had at Dunbar put everyone to new thoughts how to dispose of themselves, and none was more perplexed than I where to go or what to do.... Upon Saturday, the 7th of September, we left Dunfermline and came that night to Kinrose, where we stayed till Monday. I cannot omit to insert here the opportunity I had of serving many poor wounded soldiers; for as we were riding to Kinrose I saw two that looked desperately ill, who were so weak they were hardly able to go along the high way; and inquiring what ailed them, they told me they had been soldiers at Dunbar and were going towards Kinrose, if their wounds would suffer them.[1] I bid them when they came there enquire for the Countess of D.'s lodging and there would be one there would dress them. It was late, it seems, before they came, and so till the next morning I saw them not, but then they came, attended with twenty more. And betwixt that time and Monday that we left that place, I believe threescore was the least that was dressed by me and my woman and Ar. Ro., who I employed to such as was unfit for me to dress; and besides the plasters or balsam I applied, I gave every one of them as much with them as might dress them 3 or 4 times, for I had provided myself very well of things necessary for that employment, expecting they might be useful.[2]

---

[1] given over ceased from, given up (OED give v. B.XVI.63a).

[2] divertisement recreation (OED divertisement 1).

[3] the Speaker...of Commons William Lenthall (1591–1662), Member of Parliament for Woodstock, Oxfordshire (1640–1653); Cinque Ports a group of sea-ports (originally five, whence the name) on the south coast of England.

[4] infatuating rendering them utterly foolish (OED infatuating v 2).

[5] Mr. N. Sergeant Norfolk.

[6] king's return The Prince of Wales (considered King Charles II by Royalists after his father's execution in 1649) landed in the Firth of Cromarty, June 16, 1650. Cromwell, commander of the New Model Army, invaded Scotland on July 22, 1650 and defeated the army of the Scottish Covenanters who fought for Charles II at Dunbar on September 3, 1650. Halkett traveled to Scotland to visit the King and to recover her interest in a property in Scotland.

Amongst the many variety of wounds amongst them, two was extraordinary. One was a man whose head was cut so that the [ ] was very visibly seen and the water came bubbling up, which when Ar. R. saw he cried out, "Lord have mercy upon thee, for thou art but a dead man." I seeing the man who had courage enough before begin to be much disheartened, I told him he need not be discouraged with what he that had no skill said, for if it pleased God to bless what I should give him he might do well enough; and this I said more to hearten him up than otherwise, for I saw it a very dangerous wound. And yet it pleased God he recovered, as I heard afterwards.... The other was a youth about 16 that had been run through the body with a tuke.[3] It went in under his right shoulder and came out under his left breast, and yet [he] had little inconvenience by it, but his greatest prejudice was from so infinite a swarm of creatures that it is incredible for any that were not eye witnesses of it.[4] I made a contribution and bought him other clothes to put on him and made the fire consume what else had been impossible to destroy.

—1875 (CA. 1677–78)

---

[1] suffer allow (OED suffer v II.12).

[2] plasters an external curative application consisting of a medicinal substance spread on a piece of muslin (OED plaster sb I.1a).

[3] tuke rapier (OED tuck sb^{3}).

[4] prejudice injury (OED prejudice sb I.1b).

Katharine Evans and Sarah Chevers
? – d. 1692; ? – d. 1664

Little is known of the early lives of Katharine Evans and Sarah Chevers. In documents from the Inquisition in Malta, it is recorded that Katharine Evans advised Inquisitors that she was the daughter of Anne and Roger "Canual," while Sarah Chevers said that she was the daughter of Margaret and William "Shenel."[1] Katharine Evans was married to the Quaker John Evans and resided in Englishbatch, Somersetshire. Chevers, her traveling companion, was married to Henry Chevers from Slaughterford, Wiltshire. Both women left their husbands and children to serve as Quaker missionaries and frequently experienced indignities during their travels. Evans was banished from the Isle of Wight some time between the years 1655 and 1657 and during the same time period, a soldier came to her bedside on the Isle of Man and carried her on shipboard. Her insistence on public preaching resulted in an imprisonment in Cornwall, and both Evans and Chevers suffered the humiliation of being "stripped and tied to a whipping-post in the market of Salisbury and there whipped" (1657).[2] In 1658, Evans and Chevers undertook a sea-voyage to Alexandria to extend their missionary work. These plans were thwarted when they were apprehended by the Inquisition on the Island of Malta, and imprisoned for more than three years. During their confinement, Evans and Chevers wrote This is a Short Relation of Some of the Cruel Sufferings (For the Truth's Sake) of Katharine Evans and Sarah Chevers (1662), a spiritual autobiography which details their endurance in the face of physical and psychological affliction. After their release in July, 1662, Evans and Chevers embarked on a series of missionary trips to Scotland, Wales and Ireland. Chevers died in 1664, but Evans continued her ministry and was imprisoned at Welchpool in Montgomeryshire (1666) and Newgate prison in Bristol (1682) before her death in 1692.

* * *

This is a Short Relation of Some of the Cruel Sufferings (For the Truth's Sake) of Katharine Evans and Sarah Chevers, in the Inquisition in the Isle of Malta

A true declaration concerning the Lord's love to us in all our voyage: We were at sea, between London and Plymouth, many weeks, and one day we had some trials; and between Plymouth and Legorn we were 31 days, and we had many trials and storms within and without;[3] but the Lord did deliver us out of all: And when we came to Legorn, with the rest of our friends, we went into the town after we had product,[4] and stayed there many days, where we had service every day; for all sorts of people came unto us, but no man did offer to hurt us, yet we gave them books and having got passage in a Dutch ship we sailed towards Cyprus, intending to go to Alexandria, but the Lord had appointed something for us to do by the way, as he did make it manifest to us, as I did speak, for the master of the ship had no business in the place; but being in company with another ship which had some business at the city of Malta (in the Island of Malta where Paul suffered shipwreck)[1] and being in the harbour, on the first day of the week, we being moved of the Lord, went into the town, and the English consul met us on the shore, and asked us concerning our coming, and we told him truth, and gave him some books, and a paper, and he told us there was an Inquisition, and he kindly entreated us to go to his house, and said all that he had was at our service while we were there. And in the fear and dread of the Lord we went, and there came many to see us, and we called them to repentance, and many of them were tender; but the whole city is given to idolatry. And we went a ship-board that night; and the next day we being moved to go into the city again, dared not to fly the cross, but in obedience went, desiring the will of God to be done. And when we came to the governor, he told us that he had a sister in the nunnery did desire to see us if we were free; and in the fear of God we went, and talked with them, and gave them a book, and one of their priests was with us (at the nunnery) and had us into their place of worship, and some would have us bow to the high altar, which we did deny; and having a great burden, we went to the consul again, and were waiting upon the Lord what to do, that we might know.

---

[1] The historian Stefano Villani, who has inspected the Inquisition Archive in Malta, believes (based on the fact that Inquisitors wrote English names in the same way they pronounced them) that "Canual" is likely "Canwal" and "Shenel" is likely "Channel." For more information on the events relating to the missionary service of Evans and Chevers in Malta, see Villani, Tremolantie Papisti: Missioni Quacchere Nell'Italia Del Seicento (Roma: Edizioni de Storia e Letterature, 1996), 115–135.

[2] Friends House in London provided us with a typescript of their forthcoming Dictionary of Quaker Biography to supply information not available until recently on early female Quakers.

[3] Legorn Legorno (now Livorno), Italy, a major port.

[4] had product obtained provisions (OED product sb[1] 2c).

And the Inquisitors sent for us, and when we came before them, they asked our names, and the names of our husbands, and the names of our fathers and mothers, and how many children we had; and they asked us, wherefore we came into that country? And we told them, we were the servants of the living God, and were moved to come and call them to repentance; and many other questions, and they went away, but commanded that we should be stayed there. And the next day they came again, and called for us, and we came; but they would examine us apart, and called Sarah, and they asked, whether she was a true Catholic? She said, that she was a true Christian that worshippeth God in spirit and in truth; and they proffered her the crucifix, and would have had her swear that she would speak the truth; and she said, she should speak the truth, but she would not swear, for Christ commanded her not to swear, saying, Swear not at all:[2] And the English consul persuaded her with much entreating to swear, saying, none should do her any harm: But she denied; and they took some books from her, and would have had her swear by them, but she would not: And they asked, wherefore she brought the books? And she said, because we could not speak their language, and they might know wherefore we came; and they asked of her, what George Fox was;[3] and she said, he was a minister. And they asked, wherefore she came thither? She said, to do the will of God, as she was moved of the Lord. And they asked, how the Lord did appear unto her? And she said, by his spirit. And they asked, where she was when the Lord appeared unto her? And she said, upon the way. And they asked, whether she did see his presence, and hear his voice? And she said, she did hear his voice, and saw his presence; and they asked, what he said to her? And she said, the Lord told her, she must go over the seas to do his will; and then they asked, how she knew it was the Lord? And she said, he bid her go, and his living presence should go with her, and he was faithful that had promised, for she did feel his living presence; and so they went away.

---

[1] where Paul suffered shipwreck After Paul was arrested in Jerusalem, he appealed to Caesar and was taken by ship to Rome. When the ship was wrecked, Paul escaped, landing on an island called "Melita," which has commonly been interpreted as "Malta" (Acts 28:1).

[2] Christ commanded... Swear not at all "But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne" (Matthew 5:34). Judicial swearing was considered profane by Quakers. After 1662, an Act was passed to prevent "mischiefs and dangers that may arise by certain persons called Quakers, and others refusing to take oaths," making it illegal to refuse to take an oath. In a short treatise, George Fox made the following response: "The world saith, 'Kiss the book,' but the book saith, 'Kiss the Son, lest He be angry.' And the Son saith, 'Swear not at all, but keep to Yea and Nay in all your communications, for whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil.'"

[3] George Fox George Fox (1624–1691) was the founder of the Children of Light, later known as the Society of Friends. In 1650, Fox reports in his Journal that Justice Bennet of Derby was the first to name Fox and his followers Quakers because Fox "bade them tremble at the word of the Lord."

. . . .

The next second day came a magistrate, two friars, and the man with the black rod, and a scribe, and the keeper, to the Inquisition, to sit upon judgment, and examined us apart concerning our faith in Christ. The magistrate would have had us to swear, and we answered, No; Christ said, Swear not at all; and so said James the apostle.[1] He asked, if we would speak truth? We said, yea. He asked, whether we did believe the creed?[2] We said, we did believe in God, and in Jesus Christ, which was born of the Virgin Mary, and suffered at Jerusalem under Pilate, and arose again from the dead the third day, and ascended to his Father, and shall come to judgment, to judge both quick and dead. He asked, how we did believe the resurrection? We answered, we did believe that the just and the unjust should arise, according to the Scriptures. He said, Do you believe in the saints, and pray to them? We said, we did believe the communion of saints;[3] but we did not pray to them, but to God only, in the name of Jesus Christ. He asked, whether we did believe in the Catholic Church? We said, we did believe the true Church of Christ; but the word Catholic we have not read in Scripture. He asked, if we believed a purgatory?[4] We said, no; but a heaven and a hell. The friar said, we were commanded to pray for the dead;[5] for those that were in heaven had no need; and they that were in hell there is no redemption; therefore there must be a purgatory. He asked, if we believed their holy sacrament? We said, we never read (the word) sacrament in Scripture.[6] The friar replied, where we did read in our Bibles sanctification, it was sacrament in theirs. He said, their holy sacrament was bread and wine, which they converted into the flesh and blood of Christ by the virtue of Christ.[7] We said, they did work miracles then, for Christ's virtue is the same as it was when he turned water into wine at the marriage in Cana.[1] He said, if we did not eat the flesh, and drink the blood of the Son of God, we had no life in us. We said, the flesh and blood of Christ is spiritual, and we do feed upon it daily; for that which is begotten of God in us, can no more live without spiritual food, than our temporal bodies can without temporal food. He said, that we did never hear Mass. We said, we did hear the voice of Christ, he only had the words of eternal life, and that was sufficient for us.[2] He said, we were heretics and heathens. We said, they were heretics that lived in sin and wickedness, and such were heathens that knew not God. He asked about our meetings in England? And we told them the truth to their amazement. And they asked, who was the head of our Church? We said, Christ. And they asked, what George Fox is. And we said, He is a minister of Christ. They asked, whether he sent us? We said, No, the Lord did move us to come. The friar said, we were deceived, and had not the faith; but we had all virtues. We said, that faith was the ground from whence virtues do proceed. They said, if we would take their holy sacrament, we might have our liberty; or else the Pope would not leave us for millions of gold, but we should lose our souls and our bodies too. We said, the Lord had provided for our souls, and our bodies were freely given up to serve the Lord. They asked us, if we did not believe marriage was a sacrament? We said, it was an ordinance of God. They asked us, if we did believe men could forgive sins? We said none could forgive sin, but God only. They brought us that Scripture, Whose sins ye remit in earth, shall be remitted in heaven.[3] We said, all power was God's, and he could give it to whom he would (that were born of the eternal spirit, and guided by the same; such have power to do the Father's will, as I answered a friar also in the city of Naples) and they were silent, the power greatly working. We asked them wherein we had wronged them, that we should be kept prisoners all [the] days of our lives, and said, our innocent blood would be required at their hands.

---

[1] and so said James the apostle "But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation" (James 5:12).

[2] creed The word "creed" derives from the Latin credo, "I believe" denoting a body of beliefs and a confession of faith. In Christian history three creeds are noteworthy: the Nicene Creed (381 C.E.), the Apostles' Creed (390) and the Athanasian Creed (fourth or fifth century). The response made by Evans and Chevers suggests that the Inquisitors were referring to the Apostles' Creed whose predecessor was the Old Roman Creed.

[3] communion of saints The phrase "communion of the saints" is taken from the Apostles' Creed and is generally interpreted to refer to the union of all believers, living or dead, in Christ. Roman Catholics frequently referred to this phrase as a justification for the practice of prayers for the dead.

[4] purgatory According to Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox teachings, purgatory is a place of temporal punishment in the intermediate realm. Those who die at peace with the church but who are not yet perfect must endure purgative suffering, during which time, Aquinas claims, "the stain of sinful habit is removed from the soul."

[5] commanded to pray for the dead The custom of praying for the dead appears to have arisen in the church at the end of the second century. II Maccabees 12:44 (Apocrypha) is often cited to support such a practice.

[6] sacrament According to Catholicism, the following sacraments were channels of divine grace: Eucharist, Baptism, Marriage, Holy Orders, Confirmation, Penance, and Extreme Unction. Protestants recognized only two sacraments, Eucharist (Holy Communion) and Baptism, which were seen as reminders rather than vehicles of divine grace. The Quakers argued that they experienced mystical union with God independent of the sacraments, rendering them unnecessary.

[7] Holy Sacrament...virtue of Christ Evans and Chevers are asked whether they accept the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation: that the bread and wine in Eucharist are literally transformed into Christ's body and blood. Luther had rejected transubstantiation, coining the term consubstantiation to express his belief that the bread and wine remain along with the body and blood of Christ. However,

. . . .

The tenth day of my fast there came two friars, the chancellor, the man with the black rod, and a physician, and the keeper; and the friar commanded my dear friend to go out of the room, and he came and pulled my hand out of the bed, and said, Is the Devil so great in you, that you cannot speak? I said, Depart from me thou worker of iniquity, I know thee not; the power of the Lord is upon me, and thou callest him Devil. He took his crucifix to strike me in the mouth; and I said, Look here! and I asked him, whether it were that cross which crucified Paul to the world, and the world unto him?[4] And he said, it was. I denied him, and said, the Lord had made me a witness for himself against all workers of iniquity. He bid me be obedient, and went to strike me: I said, Wilt thou strike me? He said, he would. I said, Thou art out of the apostles' doctrine, they were no strikers; I deny thee to be any of them who went in the name of the Lord. He said, he had brought me a physician in charity. I said, the Lord was my physician, and my saving-health. He said I should be whipped, and quartered, and burnt that night in many Protestant groups regarded Holy Communion as no more than a symbol of Christ's presence, a reminder of the crucifixion and resurrection.

---

[1] water into wine…in Cana The first miracle performed by Jesus was his transformation of water into wine (John 2:2–10).

[2] we did never…sufficient for us Quaker worship is based on the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, not limited by place, time or persons. The emphasis on the inward nature of one's relation to the divine, of Christ's presence in the "hearts of His people" as George Fox describes it, renders Mass a "vain tradition."

[3] Whose sins ye…remitted in heaven The friar appears to be referring to John 20:23, "Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye remit, they are retained."

[4] cross which crucified…world unto him "But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (Galatians 6:14).

Malta, and my mate too: wherefore did we come to teach them? I told him I did not fear, the Lord was on our side, and he had no power but what he had received; and if he did not use it to the same end the Lord gave it him, the Lord would judge him. And they were all smitten as dead men, and went away.

And as soon as they were gone, the Lord said unto me, The last enemy that shall be destroyed, is death; and the life arose over death, and I glorified God. The friar went to my friend, and told her, I called him worker of iniquity. Did she, said Sarah? Art thou without sin? He said he was; Then she hath wronged thee. (But I say, the wise reader may judge:) For between the eighth and ninth hour in the evening, he sent a drum to proclaim at the prison gate; we know not what it was, but the fire of the Lord consumed it. And about the fourth hour in the morning they were coming with a drum and guns; and the Lord said unto me, Arise out of thy grave clothes. And we arose, and they came up to the gate to devour us in a moment. But the Lord lifted up his standard with his own Spirit (of might) and made them to retreat, and they fled as dust before the wind; praises and honour be given to our God forever. I went to bed again, and the Lord said unto me, Herod will seek the young child's life to destroy it yet again;[1] and great was my affliction; so that my dear fellow and labourer in the work of God, did look every hour when I should depart the body for many days together, and we did look every hour when we should be brought to the stake day and night, for several weeks, and Isaac was freely offered up. But the Lord said, he had provided a ram in the bush.[2] Afterwards the friar came again with his physician; I told him, that I could not take anything, unless I was moved of the Lord. He said, we must never come forth of that room while we lived, and we might thank God and him it was no worse, for it was like to be worse. We said, if we had died, we had died as innocent as ever did servants of the Lord. He said, it was well we were innocent. They did (also) look still when I would die.

The friar bid my friend take notice what torment I would be in at the hour of death, thousands of devils (he said) would fetch my soul to hell. She said, she did not fear any such thing.

And he asked if I did not think it expedient for the elders of the Church to pray over the sick? I said, yea, such as were eternally moved of the spirit of the Lord. He fell down on[3] his knees and did howl, and wish bitter wishes upon himself if he had not the true faith; but we denied him. The physician was in a great rage at Sarah, because she could not bow to him, but to God only.[4]

The last day of my fast I began to be a hungry, but was afraid to eat, the enemy was so strong; but the Lord said unto me, If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink. In so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head; be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.[5] I did eat, and was refreshed, and glorified God; and in the midst of our extremity the Lord sent his holy angels to comfort us, so that we rejoiced and magnified God;

---

[1] Herod will seek…yet again an allusion to Herod's attempt to kill the Christ child by slaying all children two years and younger resident in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof (Matthew 2:13–16).

[2] Isaac was freely…the bush God tested Abraham's faith by requiring him to offer up his long-awaited son Isaac as a sacrifice. When Abraham demonstrated his faith by binding Isaac to an altar and preparing the knife, God withdrew his request, providing a ram as a substitute sacrifice. In the New Testament, Paul interprets Abraham's act as an exemplum of faith and as a type of Christ's universal sacrifice (Hebrews 11:17; see also James 2:21).

[3] on emended from 'of' in the 1662 text.

[4] could not bow…but God only In his journal, George Fox writes that God: "forbade me to put off my hat to any, high or low; and I was required to say Thee and Thou to all men and women, without any respect to rich or poor, great or small. And as I travelled up and down, I was not to bid people Good-morrow, or Good-evening, neither might I bow or scrape my leg to any one, and this made the sects and professions to rage." In accordance with Fox's principles, Evans and Chevers refuse to acknowledge social or religious hierarchy by bowing to ecclesiastical officials.

[5] If thine enemy…evil with good Romans 12:20–21.

and in the time of our great trial, the sun and earth did mourn visibly three days, and the horror of death and pains of hell was upon me: the sun was darkened, the moon was turned into blood, and the stars did fall from heaven, and there was great tribulation ten days, such as never was from the beginning of the world: and then did I see the Son of Man coming in the clouds, with power and great glory, triumphing over his enemies; the heavens were on fire, and the elements did melt with fervent heat, and the trumpet sounded out of Sion, and an alarm was struck up in Jerusalem, and all the enemies of God were called to the great day of battle of the Lord. And I saw a great wonder in heaven, the woman clothed with the sun, and had the moon under her feet and a crown of twelve stars upon her head, and she travailed in pain ready to be delivered of a man-child, and there was a great dragon stood ready to devour the man-child as soon as it was born; and there was given to the woman two wings of a great eagle to carry her into the desert, where she should be nourished for a time, times, and half a time; and the dragon cast a flood out of his mouth, etc. And I saw war in heaven, Michael and his angels against the dragon and his angels, and the Lamb and his army did overcome them; and there was a trumpet sounded in heaven, and I heard a voice saying to me, The city is divided into three parts, and I heard another trumpet sounding, and I looked and saw an angel go down into a great pool of water, and I heard a voice saying unto me, Whosoever goeth down next after the troubling of the waters, shall be healed of whatsoever disease he hath. And I heard another trumpet sounding, and I heard a voice, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, Babylon the great is fallen. And I looked, and saw the smoke of her torment, how it did ascend; and I heard another trumpet sounding, and I heard a voice saying, Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for he that is mighty hath magnified you, and holy is his name; and from henceforth all generations shall call you blessed: And I heard another trumpet sounding in heaven, and I heard a voice saying unto me, Behold! and I looked, and I saw Pharaoh and his host pursuing the children of Israel, and he and his host were drowned in the sea.[1]

Dear friends and people, whatsoever I have written is not because it is recorded in the Scripture, or that I have heard of such things; but in obedience to the Lord I have written the things which I did hear, see, tasted and handled of the good word of God, to the praise of his name forever.

And all this time my dear sister in Christ Jesus was in as great affliction as I (in a manner) to see my strong travail night and day; yet she was kept in the patience, and would willingly have given me up to death, that I might have been at rest; yet she would have been left in as great danger, woe and misery, as ever was any poor captive for the Lord's truth; for they did work night and day with their divinations, enchantments and temptations, thinking thereby to bring us under their power; but the Lord prevented them every way, so that great was their rage, and they came often with their physician, and said it was in charity; I asked them whether they did keep us in that hot room to kill us, and bring us a physician to make us alive.

The friar said, the Inquisitor would lose his head if he should take us thence; and it was better to keep us there, than to kill us.

The room was so hot and so close, that we were fain to rise often out of our bed, and lie down at a chink of their door for air to fetch breath; and with the fire within, and the heat without, our skin was like sheep's leather, and the hair did fall off our heads, and we did fail often; our afflictions and burdens were so great, that when it was day we wished for night; and when it was night we wished for day; we sought death, but could not find it; we desired to die, but death fled from us. We did eat our bread weeping, and mingled our drink with our tears. We did write to the Inquisitor, and laid before him our innocency, and our faithfulness, in giving our testimony for the Lord amongst them; and I told him, if it were our blood they did thirst after, they might take it any other way, as well as to smother us up in that hot room. So he sent the friar, and he took away our inkhorns (they had our Bibles before). We asked why they took away our goods? They said, it was all theirs, and our lives too, if they would. We asked how we had forfeited our lives unto them; they said, for bringing books and papers. We said, if there were any thing in them that was not true, they might write against it. They said, they did scorn to write to fools and asses that did not know true Latin. And they told us, the Inquisitor would have us separated, because I was weak, and I should go into a cooler room; but Sarah should abide there. I took her by the arm, and said, The Lord hath joined us together and woe be to them that should part us.[1] I said, I rather choose to die there with my friend, than to part from her. He was smitten, and went away, and came no more in five weeks, and the door was not opened in that time. Then they came again to part us; but I was sick, and broken out from head to foot. They sent for a doctor, and he said, we must have air, or else we must die. So the Lord compelled them to go to the Inquisitor, and he gave order for the door to be set open six hours in a day; they did not part us till ten weeks after: But oh the dark clouds and the sharp showers the Lord did carry us through! Death itself had been better than to have parted in that place. They said, we corrupted each other, and that they thought when we were parted, we would have bowed to them. But they found we were more stronger afterwards than we were before; the Lord our God did fit us for every condition. They came and brought a scourge of small hemp and asked us, if we would have any of it. They said, they did whip themselves till the blood did come. We said, that could not reach the Devil, he sat upon the heart. They said, all the men and women of Malta were for us, if we would be Catholics, for there would be none like unto us. We said, the Lord had changed us into that which changed not. They said, all their holy women did pray for us, and we should be honored of all the world if we would turn. We said, we were of God, and the whole world did lie in wickedness; and we denied the honor of the world, and the glory too. They said, we should be honored of God too, but now we were hated of all. We said, it is an evident token whose servants we are; the servant is not greater than the Lord, and that Scripture was fulfilled which saith, All this will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.[2]

---

[1] and in that time... in the sea Despite the claim that this apocalyptic vision was experiential rather than textually-based, this passage is a collage of biblical allusions: Psalm 116:3; Joel 2:31; Acts 2:20; Revelation 6:12; Matthew 24:29; Mark 13:25; Revelation 2:10; Matthew 24:30; II Peter 3:12; Revelation 12:1–4, 7,14,16; Revelation 16:9; Isaiah 41:18; John 5:4; Revelation 16:9; Revelation 18:12; Matthew 5:12; Luke 1:48-49; Exodus 14:23.

. . . .

And there were two or three English ships there, came into harbour, and Sarah saw the coming of them in a vision of the night, and there was great pleading for us, that we saw; but she heard a voice, saying, we could not go now. So we were made willing to wait the Lord's time.

Then they sent for us forth when the ships were gone, and asked us if we would be Catholics: And we said, we were true Christians, and had received the spirit of Christ, and he that had not the spirit of

---

[1] The Lord has…part us Evans alludes to the passage traditionally used to support the sanctity of marriage: "And [Jesus] said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh? Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder" (Matthew 19:5–6).

[2] All this will…and worship me This passage is taken from the temptation of Christ during his forty-day fast in the desert: "Again, the devil taketh him [Jesus] up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me" (Matthew 4:8–9).

Christ, was none of his. The English consul told us of the ships, and said, they would not let us go unless we would be Catholics; and that we must suffer more imprisonment yet; and said, he did what he could for us. One of the magistrates showed us the cross; we told them, and said, we did take up the cross of Christ daily, which is the great power of God to crucify sin and iniquity.[1] So we told them that one of their Fathers did promise us our liberty. We did think that friar was too tender hearted to stay among them; he did take a great deal of pains for us (the captain said);[2] we told him, he would never have cause to repent it; the blessing of God would be upon him for any thing he should do for us; for we were the servants of the living God, and he promised us our freedoms in a little time.[3]
—1662

---

[1] take up the cross of Christ daily "And he [Jesus] said to them all, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me" (Luke 9:23).

[2] that friar...(the captain said) In an earlier passage, Evans and Chevers describe attempts to free them from imprisonment: "They did not tell us of any English that were there; but there was one Francis Steward of London, a captain of a ship, and a friar of Ireland, which came to the city together (for what we know) and they did take great pains for us, and went to their ruler, and the Inquisitor, and to several magistrates and friars, and the new English consul with them, and wrought much amongst them that all were willing to let us go, save the Inquisitor."

[3] he promised...in a little time Evans and Chevers were both released in 1662 on condition that they immediately return to England.

John Aubrey

1626 – 1697

John Aubrey was one of the leading antiquaries of the second half of the seventeenth century, a period increasingly interested in documenting Britain's architectural, archeological, cultural, and folkloric past before it disappeared in the face of social change and political upheaval. He attended Trinity College, Oxford, though his education there was interrupted by the Civil War. In 1649 he uncovered the megalithic ruins at Avebury, ignored until that time; in 1662 he was nominated one of the original fellows of The Royal Society; and in the 1670s he made thorough antiquarian surveys of Surrey and his native Wiltshire. The only book Aubrey published in his lifetime was Miscellanies (1696), a collection of folklore and ghost stories. But he left a great deal of antiquarian and historical material in manuscript, much of which was used by later researchers or published after his death.

Aubrey is best known for his Brief Lives, a collection of biographical notes on more than four hundred British men and some women, almost all of whom lived in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Lives range in length from single sentences to detailed biographical sketches, and their subjects include writers (the largest group), mathematicians and scientists (the second largest), statesmen, clergymen, lawyers, physicians, educators, artists, merchants, well-known members of society, and Aubrey's own friends. Compiled over many years, Aubrey's material was originally intended as a contribution to Anthony à Wood's Athenae Oxoniensis. But after quarrelling with the difficult Wood over the use he was making of these notes, Aubrey withdrew them, and the Lives remained in manuscript until they were first published in the nineteenth century. Though he has been criticized for inaccuracy and credulity, Aubrey took his research seriously, interviewing friends, descendants, and relatives of his subjects, as well as checking local records and legal documents. But his Lives are famous less for their biographical facts than for Aubrey's shrewd eye for the character-revealing detail, and for his willingness to record the anecdotes, rumours, and scandals that vividly reveal the personalities of the men and women whose lives he recorded. For more biographical information on Andrewes, Bacon, Hobbes (a life-long friend of Aubrey's), Marvell, and Milton, see the headnotes to the selections from their works.

* * *

Brief Lives

(excerpts)

Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626)

Lancelot Andrewes, Lord Bishop of Winton, was born in London; went to school at Merchant Taylor's school. Mr. Mulcaster was his schoolmaster, whose picture he hung in his study.

Old Mr. Sutton…was his school fellow, and said that Lancelot Andrewes was a great long boy of 18 years old at least before he went to the university.

The Puritan faction did begin to increase in those days, and especially at Emmanuel College. This party had a great mind to draw in this learned young man, whom (if they could make theirs) they knew would be a great honour to them. They carried themselves outwardly with great sanctity and strictness. They preached up very strict keeping and observing the Lord's day: made, upon the matter, damnation to break it, and that 'twas less sin to kill a man. Yet these hypocrites did bowl in a private green at their college every Sunday after sermon; and one of the college (a loving friend to Mr. L. Andrewes) to satisfy him, one time lent him the key of a private back door to the bowling green, on a Sunday evening, which he opening, discovered these zealous preachers with their gowns off, earnest at play. But they were strangely surprised to see the entry of one that was not of the brotherhood.

There was then at Cambridge a good fat Alderman that was wont to sleep at church, which the Alderman endeavoured to prevent but could not. Well! this was preached against as a sign of reprobation. The good man was exceedingly troubled at it, and went to Andrewes his chamber to be satisfied in point of conscience. Mr. Andrewes told him, that it was an ill habit of body, not of mind, and that it was against his will; advised him on Sundays to make a more sparing meal, and to mend it at supper. The Alderman did so, but sleep comes on again for all that, and was preached at; comes again to be resolved with tears in his eyes. Andrewes then told him he would have him make a good hearty meal as he was wont to do, and presently take out his full sleep. He did so, came to St. Mary's where the Preacher was prepared with a sermon to damn all who slept at sermon, a certain sign of reprobation. The good Alderman, having taken his full nap before, looks on the preacher all sermon time, and spoiled the design. But I should have said that Andrewes was most extremely spoken against and preached against for offering to assoil or excuse a sleeper in sermon time.[1] But he had learning and wit enough to defend himself.

His good learning quickly made him known in the University, and also to King James, who much valued him for it, and advanced him, and at last made him Bishop of Winchester: which bishopric he ordered with great prudence as to government of the parsons, preferring of ingenious persons that were staked to poor livings and did delitescere [lie hidden]. He made it his enquiry to find out such men. Amongst several others (whose names have escaped my memory) Nicholas Fuller (he wrote Critica Sacra), Minister of Allington, near Amesbury in Wilts, was one. The Bishop sent for him, and the poor man was afraid and knew not what hurt he had done. Makes him sit down to dinner and, after the dessert, was brought in, in a dish, his Institution and Induction, or the donation of a Prebend; which was his way...

He had not that smooth way of oratory, as now. It was a shrewd and severe animadversion of a Scottish Lord, who, when King James asked him how he liked Bishop Andrewes' sermon, said that he was learned, but he did play with his text, as a Jack-an-apes does, who takes up a thing and tosses and plays with it, and then he takes up another, and plays a little with it. Here's a pretty thing, and there's a pretty thing!

SIR FRANCIS BACON (1561–1626)

In his Lordship's prosperity, Sir Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke was his great friend and acquaintance; but when he was in disgrace and want, he was so unworthy as to forbid his butler to let him have any more small beer, which he had often sent for, his stomach being nice, and the small beer of Gray's Inn not liking his palate. This has done his memory more dishonour than Sir Philip Sidney's friendship engraven on his monument hath done him honour....[2]

Mr. Ben Jonson was one of his friends and acquaintance, as doth appear by his excellent verses on his Lordship's birthday, and in his Underwoods, where he gives him a character, and concludes that about his time and within his view were born all the wits that could honour a nation or help study.

The learned and great Cardinal Richelieu was a great admirer of the Lord Bacon....

---

[1] assoil absolve, pardon, forgive (OED).

[2] his monument Fulke Greville (1554–1628) described himself on his monument as "Servant to Queen Elizabeth, Counsellor to King James, Friend to Sir Philip Sidney."

Mr. Thomas Hobbes was beloved by his Lordship, who was wont to have him walk with him in his delicate groves where he did meditate: and when a notion darted into his mind, Mr. Hobbes was presently to write it down, and his Lordship was wont to say that he did it better than anyone else about him; for that many times, when he read their notes he scarce understood what they writ, because they understood it not clearly themselves.

In short, all that were great and good loved and honoured him….

At every meal, according to the season of the year, he had his table strewed with sweet herbs and flowers, which he said did refresh his spirits and memory.

When his Lordship was at his country house at Gorhambery, St. Albans, [it] seemed as if the court were there, so nobly did he live. His servants had liveries with his crest (a boar); his watermen were more employed by gentlemen than any other, even the King's….

He was wont to say to his servant Hunt (who was a notable thrifty man, and loved the world…), "The world was made for man, Hunt; and not man for the world."

None of his servants durst appear before him without Spanish leather boots; for he would smell the neat's leather, which offended him….

He was a παιδεραστής [paiderastes].[1] His Ganymedes and favourites took bribes; but his Lordship always gave judgement secundum aequum et bonum [according as was just and good]. His decrees in Chancery stand firm, i.e. there are fewer of his decrees reversed than of any other Chancellor.

His dowager married her gentleman-usher Sir Thomas (I think) Underhill, whom she made deaf and blind with too much of Venus. She was living since the beheading of the late King.

He had a uterine brother, Anthony Bacon, who was a very great statesman, and much beyond his brother Francis for the politics, a lame man; he was a pensioner to and lived with the Earl of Essex. And to him he dedicates the first edition of his Essayes, a little book no bigger than a primer, which I have seen in the Bodleian Library….

He had a delicate, lively, hazel eye; Dr. Harvey told me it was like the eye of a viper….

The Bishop of London did cut down a noble cloud of trees at Fulham. The Lord Chancellor told him that he was a good expounder of dark places.

Upon his being in disfavour his servants suddenly went away; he compared them to the flying of the vermin when the house was falling….

Within the bounds of the walls of this old city of Verulam (his Lordship's Baronry) was Verulam House; which his Lordship built, the most ingeniously contrived little pile that ever I saw. No question but his Lordship was the chiefest architect; but he had for his assistant a favourite of his, a St. Albans' man, Mr. Dobson, who was his Lordship's right hand….

This house did cost nine or ten thousand [pounds] the building, and was sold about 1665 or 1666 by Sir Harbottle Grimston, Baronet, to two carpenters for four hundred pounds; of which they made eight hundred pounds. I am sorry I measured not the front and breadth; but I little suspected it would be pulled down for the sale of the materials….

The garden is large, which was (no doubt) rarely planted and kept in his Lordship's time. Here is a handsome door, which opens into oak wood; over this door in golden letters on blue are six verses.

The oaks of this wood are very great and shady. His Lordship much delighted himself here: under every tree, he planted some fine flower, or flowers, some whereof are there still (1656) viz. peonies, tulips.

---

[1] Latin paederastes; the older/active partner in a sexual relationship between men of unequal ages. But not the English "pederast": Aubrey claims that Bacon's partners were not boys but young men (his "Ganymedes," from the name of the young man beloved by Zeus in Greek mythology, were old enough to take bribes).

From this wood a door opens into a place as big as an ordinary park, the west part whereof is coppice wood,[1] where are walks cut out as straight as a line, and broad enough for a coach, a quarter of a mile long or better. Here his Lordship much meditated, his servant Mr. Bushell attending him with his pen and ink horn to set down his present notions.

The east of this parquet was heretofore, in his Lordship's prosperity, a paradise; now is a large ploughed field. The walks, both in the coppices and other boscages,[2] were most ingeniously designed: at several good views were erected elegant summer houses well built of Roman architecture, well wainscotted and ceiled; yet standing, but defaced, so that one would have thought the Barbarians had made a conquest here.

The figures of the ponds were thus: they were pitched at the bottoms with pebbles of several colours, which were worked in to several figures, as of fishes, etc., which in his Lordship's time were plainly to be seen through the clear water, now over-grown with flags and rushes. If a poor body had brought his Lordship half a dozen pebbles of a curious colour, he would give them a shilling, so curious was he in perfecting his fishponds, which I guess do contain four acres. In the middle of the middlemost pond, in the island, is a curious banqueting house of Roman architecture, paved with black and white marble; covered with Cornish slate, and neatly wainscotted....

In April, and the springtime, his Lordship would, when it rained, take his coach (open) to receive the benefit of irrigation, which he was wont to say was very wholesome because of the nitre in the air and the Universal Spirit of the world.

Mr. Hobbes told me that the cause of his Lordship's death was trying an experiment; viz. as he was taking the air in a coach with Dr. Witherborne (a Scotchman, physician to the King) towards Highgate, snow lay on the ground, and it came into my Lord's thoughts, why flesh might not be preserved in snow, as in salt. They were resolved they would try the experiment presently. They alighted out of the coach and went into a poor woman's house at the bottom of Highgate hill, and bought a hen, and made the woman exenterate it,[3] and then stuffed the body with snow, and my Lord did help to do it himself. The snow so chilled him that he immediately fell so extremely ill, that he could not return to his lodging (I suppose then at Gray's Inn) but went to the Earl of Arundel's house at Highgate, where they put him into a good bed warmed with a pan, but it was a damp bed that had not been lain in about a year before, which gave him such a cold that in two or three days as I remember Mr. Hobbes told me, he died of suffocation.

This October, 1681, it rang over all St. Albans that Sir Harbottle Grimston, Master of the Rolls, had removed the coffin of this most renowned Lord Chancellor to make room for his own to lie-in in the vault there at St. Michael's church.

Venetia Digby (1600-33)[4]

Venetia Stanley was the daughter of Sir Edward Stanley. She was a most beautiful desirable creature, and being matura viro [ready for a man] was left by her father to live with a tenant and servants at Enston Abbey in Oxfordshire: but as private as that place was, it seems her beauty could not lie hid. The young eagles had espied her, and she was sanguine and tractable, and of much suavity (which to abuse was great pity).[1]

---

[1] coppice a small wood or thicket grown for the purpose of periodic cutting (OED).

[2] boscages thickets or groves (OED).

[3] extenterate a latinism not in the OED; from context, eviscerate.

[4] One of the famous beauties of the age, Venetia Stanley secretly married Sir Kenelm Digby in 1625; her death prompted commemorative verse by many prominent poets of the period, including Ben Jonson.

In those days, Richard, Earl of Dorset (eldest son and heir to the Lord Treasurer) lived in the greatest splendor of any nobleman in England. Among other pleasures that he enjoyed, Venus was not the least. This pretty creature's fame quickly came to his Lordship's ears, who made no delay to catch at such an opportunity.

I have now forgot who first brought her to town, but I have heard my uncle Danvers say (who was her contemporary) that she was so commonly courted, and that by Grandees, that 'twas written over her lodging one night in literis uncialibus [capital letters]:

PRAY COME NOT NEAR,
FOR DAME VENETIA STANLEY LODGETH HERE.

The Earl of Dorset aforesaid was her greatest gallant, who was extremely enamoured of her, and had one, if not more children by her. He settled on her an annuity of 500 pounds per annum.

Among other young sparks of that time, Sir Kenelm Digby grew acquainted with her, and fell so much in love with her that he married her, much against the good will of his mother, but he would say that a wise man, and lusty, could make an honest woman out of a brothel house.

Sir Edmund Wild had her picture (and you may imagine was very familiar with her) which picture is now at Droitwich, in Worcestershire, at an Inn in an entertaining room, where now the town keep their meetings. Also at Mr. Rose's, a jeweller in Henrietta Street in Convent Garden, is an excellent piece of hers, drawn after she was newly dead.

She had a most lovely and sweet turned face, delicate dark brown hair. She had a perfect healthy constitution; strong; good skin; well proportioned; much inclining to a Bona Roba (near altogether).[2] Her face, a short oval; dark brown eyebrow, about which much sweetness, as also in the opening of her eyelids. The colour of her cheeks was just that of the damask rose, which is neither too hot nor too pale. She was of a just stature, not very tall.

Sir Kenelm had several pictures of her by Vandyke, &c. He had her hands cast in plaster, and her feet and face. See Ben Jonson's second volume, where he hath made her live in poetry, in his drawing of her both body and mind:

Sitting, and ready to be drawn,
What makes these tiffany, silks, and lawn,
Embroideries, feathers, fringes, lace,
When every limb takes like a face! etc.[3]

When these verses were made she had three children by Sir Kenelm, who are there mentioned, viz. Kenelm, George and John.

She died in her bed, suddenly. Some suspected that she was poisoned. When her head was opened there was found but little brain, which her husband imputed to her drinking of viper-wine;[4] but spiteful women would say 'twas a viper husband who was jealous of her that she would steal a leap. I have heard some say, e.g. my cousin Elizabeth Falkner, that after her marriage she redeemed her honour by her strict living. Once a year the Earl of Dorset invited her and Sir Kenelm to dinner, where the Earl would behold her with much passion, and only kiss her hand.

About 1676 or 5, as I was walking through Newgate Street, I saw Dame Venetia's bust from off her tomb standing at a stall at the Golden Cross, a brazier's shop. I perfectly remembered it, but the fire had got off the gilding; but taking notice of it to one that was with me, I could never see it afterwards exposed to the street. They melted it down. How these curiosities would be quite forgot, did not such idle fellows as I am put them down.

---

[1] suavity sweetness and agreeableness (OED).

[2] Bona Roba defined by John Florio in the sixteenth century as "a good wholesome plum-cheeked wench" (OED bona-roba).

[3] The first four lines from the third song (of ten) of Jonson's "Eupheme; or the Fair Fame Left to Posterity of that Truly-Noble Lady, the Lady Venetia Digby."

[4] viper-wine wine medicated by an extract obtained from vipers, supposedly lending it restorative powers (OED viper 5).

THOMAS FAIRFAX (1612–71) [1]

Thomas, Lord Fairfax of Cameron, Lord General of the Parliament army. When Oxford was surrendered, the first thing General Fairfax did was to set a good guard of soldiers to preserve the Bodleian Library. 'Tis said there was more hurt done by the Cavaliers (during their garrison) by way of embezzling and cutting off chains of books, than there was since. He was a lover of learning, and had he not taken this special care, that noble library had been utterly destroyed, for there were ignorant Senators enough who would have been contented to have had it so.

THOMAS HOBBES (1588–1679)

The day of his birth was April the fifth, Anno Domini 1588, on a Friday morning, which that year was Good Friday. His mother fell in labour with him upon the fright of the invasion of the Spaniards....

At fourteen years of age, he went away a good school scholar to Magdalen Hall, in Oxford. It is not to be forgotten that before he went to the University, he had turned Euripides' Medea out of Greek into Latin iambics, which he presented to his Master. Mr. H. told me that he would fain have had them, to see how he did grow. Twenty odd years ago I searched all old Mr. Latimer's papers, but could not find them; the oven had devoured them.

At Oxford Mr. T. H. used, in the summer time especially, to rise very early in the morning, and would tie the leaden counters with packthreads, which he did besmear with birdlime, and bait then with parings of cheese, and the jackdaws would spy them a vast distance up in the air, and as far as Osney Abbey, and strike at the bait, and so he harled in the string, which the weight of the counter would make cling about their wings. (This story he happened to tell me, discoursing of the optics, to instance such sharpness of sight in so little an eye.) He did not much care for logic, yet he learned it, and thought himself a good disputant. He took great delight there to go to the bookbinders' shops, and lie gaping on maps.

After he had taken his Bachelor of Arts degree, the then principal of Magdalen Hall (Sir James Hussee: a great encourager of towardly youths) recommended him to his young Lord (the Earl of Devonshire) when he left Oxon, who had a conceit that he should profit more in his learning if he had a scholar of his own age to wait on him than if he had the information of a grave Doctor. He was his Lordship's page, and rode a hunting and hawking with him, and kept his privy purse.

By this way of life he had almost forgot his Latin. He therefore bought him books of an Amsterdam print that he might carry in his pocket (particularly Caesar's Commentaries) which he did read in the lobby, or ante-chamber, whilst his Lord was making his visits.

He spent two years in reading romances and plays, which he has often repented and said that these two years were lost of him—wherein perhaps he was mistaken too. For it might furnish him with copy of words.

The Lord Chancellor Bacon loved to converse with him. He assisted his Lordship in translating several of his essays into Latin, one, I well remember, is that "Of the Greatness of Cities": the rest I have forgot....

---

[1] Lord Fairfax, Commander-in-Chief of the Parliamentary army from 1645.

When the Parliament sat that began in April 1640 and was dissolved in May following, and in which many points of the regal power, which were necessary for the peace of the Kingdom and safety of his Majesty's person, were disputed and denied, Mr. Hobbes wrote a little treatise in English, wherein he did set forth and demonstrate, that the said powers and rights were inseparably annexed to the sovereignty, which sovereignty they did not then deny to be in the King; but it seems understood not, or would not understand, that inseparability. Of this treatise, though not printed, many gentlemen had copies, which occasioned much talk of the author; and had not his Majesty dissolved the Parliament, it had brought him in danger of his life.

Bishop Manwaring (of St. David's) preached his [Hobbes'] doctrine; for which, among others, he was sent prisoner to the Tower. Then thought Mr. Hobbes, 'tis time now for me to shift for myself, and so withdrew into France, and resided at Paris. This little manuscript treatise grew to be his book De Cive, and at last grew there to be the so formidable Leviathan; the manner of writing of which book (he told me) was thus. He said that he sometimes would set his thoughts upon researching and contemplating, always with this rule that he very much and deeply considered one thing at a time (scilicet [namely], a week or sometimes a fortnight). He walked much and contemplated, and he had in the head of his staff a pen and ink horn, carried always a notebook in his pocket, and as soon as a notion darted, he presently entered it into his book, or else he should perhaps have lost it. He had drawn the design of the book into chapters, etc. so he knew whereabout it would come in. Thus that book was made.

He wrote and published the Leviathan far from the intention either of disadvantage to his Majesty, or to flatter Oliver [Cromwell] (who was not made Protector till three or four years after) on purpose to facilitate his return; for there is scarce a page in it that he does not upbraid him.

His Majesty was displeased with him (at Paris) for a while, but not very long, by means of some's complaining of and misconstruing his writing. But his Majesty had a good opinion of him, and said openly, that he thought Mr. Hobbes never meant him hurt....

It happened, about two or three days after his Majesty's happy return, that, as he was passing in his coach through the Strand, Mr. Hobbes was standing at Little Salisbury House gate (where his Lord then lived). The King espied him, put off his hat very kindly to him, and asked him how he did. About a week after, he had oral conference with his Majesty at Mr. S. Cowper's, where, as he sat for his picture, he was diverted by Mr. Hobbes' pleasant discourse. Here his Majesty's favours were redintegrated to him,[1] and order was given that he should have free access to his Majesty, who was always much delighted in his wit and smart repartees.

The wits at court were wont to bait him. But he feared none of them, and would make his part good. The King would call him the bear: here comes the bear to be baited (this is too low wit to be published)....

He had very few books. I never saw (nor Sir William Petty) above half a dozen about him in his chamber. Homer and Virgil were commonly on his Table; sometimes Xenophon, or some probable history, and Greek Testament, or so.

He had read much, if one considers his long life; but his contemplation was much more than his reading. He was wont to say that if he had read as much as other men, he should have known no more than other men.

He was wont to say that he had rather have the advice, or take physic from an experienced old woman, that had been at many sick people's bedsides, than from the learnedst but unexperienced physician.

---

[1] redintegrated restored (OED).

'Tis not consistent with an harmonical soul to be a woman-hater, neither had he an abhorrence to good wine, but he was, even in his youth (generally) temperate, both as to wine and women....

For his last 30+ years, his diet, etc., was very moderate and regular. He rose about seven, had his breakfast of bread and butter; and took his walk, meditating till ten; then he did put down the minutes of his thoughts, which he penned in the afternoon. He thought much and with excellent method and steadiness, which made him seldom make a false step....

When Mr. T. Hobbes was sick in France, the divines came to him, and tormented him (both Roman Catholic, Church of England, and Geneva). Said he to them, let me alone, or else I will detect all your cheats from Aaron to yourselves....

There was a report (and surely true) that in Parliament, not long after the King was settled, some of the Bishops made a motion to have the good old gentleman burnt for a heretic. Which, he hearing, feared that his papers might be searched by their order, and he told me he had burnt part of them; among other things, a poem, in Latin hexameter and pentameter, of the encroachment of the clergy (both Roman and Reformed) on the civil power.

That he was a Christian 'tis clear, for he received the sacrament of Dr. Pierson, and in his confession to Dr. John Cosins, on his (as he thought) deathbed, declared that he liked the religion of the Church of England best of all other....

Mr. Benjamin Jonson, Poet Laureate, was his loving and familiar friend and acquaintance....

When he was at Florence, he contracted a friendship with the famous Galileo Galilei, whom he extremely venerated and magnified; and not only as he was a prodigious wit, but for his sweetness of nature and manners. They pretty well resembled one another as to their countenances, as by their pictures doth appear; were both cheerful and melancholic sanguine; and had both a consimility of Fate, to be hated and persecuted by the ecclesiastics....

Mr. John Dryden, Poet Laureate, is his great admirer, and oftentimes makes use of his doctrine in his plays (from Mr. Dryden himself)....

He fell sick about the middle of October 1679. His disease was the stranguary,[1] and the physicians judged it incurable by reason of his great age and natural decay. About the 20th of November, my Lord being to remove from Chatsworth to Hardwick, Mr. Hobbes would not be left behind; and therefore with a featherbed laid into the coach, upon which he lay warm clad, he was conveyed safely, and was in appearance as well after that little journey as before it. But seven or eight days after, his whole right side was taken with the dead palsy, and at the same time he was made speechless. He lived after this seven days, taking very little nourishment, slept well, and by intervals endeavoured to speak, but could not. In the whole time of his sickness he was free from fever. He seemed therefore to die rather for want of the fuel of life (which was spent in him) and mere weakness and decay, than by the power of his disease, which was thought to be only an effect of his age and weakness. He was put into a woollen shroud and coffin, which was covered with a white sheet, and upon that a black hearse cloth, and so carried upon men's shoulders, a little mile to church. The company, consisting of the family and neighbours that came to his funeral, and attended him to his grave, were very handsomely entertained with wine, burned and raw, cake, biscuit, etc.

---

[1] stranguary a disease of the urinary tract.

ROBERT HOOKE (1635–1703) [1]

Mr Robert Hooke, curator of The Royal Society at London, was borne at Freshwater in the Isle of Wight; his father was minister there....

John Hoskyns, the painter, being at Freshwater to draw pictures, Mr. Hooke observed what he did, and, thought he, why cannot I do so too? So he gets him chalk, and ruddle,[2] and coal, and grinds them, and puts them on a trencher, got a pencil, and to work he went, and made a picture: then he copied (as they hung up in the parlour) the pictures there, which he made like. Also, being a boy there, at Freshwater, he made a dial on a round trencher; never having had any instruction. His father was not mathematical at all.

When his father died, his son Robert was but thirteen years old, to whom he left one hundred pounds, which was sent up to London with him, with an intention to have bound him apprentice to Mr. [Peter] Lilly the painter, with whom he was a little while upon trial; who liked him very well, but Mr. Hooke quickly perceived what was to be done, so, thought he, why cannot I do this by myself and keep my hundred pounds?

He went to Mr. Busby's the schoolmaster of Westminster, at whose house he was; and he made very much of him. With him he lodged his hundred pounds. There he learned to play twenty lessons on the organ. He there in one week's time made himself master of the first six books of Euclid, to the admiration of Mr. Busby. At school here he was very mechanical, and (amongst other things) he invented thirty several ways of flying....

Anno Domini 1658 he was sent to Christ Church in Oxford, where he had a chorister's place (in those days when the church music was put down) which was a pretty good maintenance. He lay in the chamber in Christ Church that was Mr. [Robert] Burton's, of whom 'tis whispered that, non obstante [notwithstanding] all his astrology and his book of Melancholy, he ended his days in that chamber by hanging himself.

He was there assistant to Dr. Thomas Willis in his chemistry; who afterwards recommended him to the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esquire, to be useful to him in his chemical operations. Anno Domini 1662 Mr. Robert Boyle recommended Mr. Robert Hooke to be Curator of the Experiments of The Royal Society, wherein he did an admirable good work to the Commonwealth of Learning, in recommending the fittest person in the world to them.

Anno Domini 1666 the great conflagration of London happened, and then he was chosen one of the two Surveyors of the city of London; by which he hath got a great estate. He built Bedlam, the Physicians' College, Montague House, the pillar on Fish Street Hill, and Theatre there; and he is much made use of in designing buildings....

As he is of prodigious inventive head, so is a person of great virtue and goodness. Now when I have said his inventive faculty is so great, you cannot imagine his memory to be excellent, for they are like two buckets, as one goes up, the other goes down. He is certainly the greatest mechanic this day in the world.

'Twas Mr. Robert Hooke that invented the pendulum watches, so much more useful than the other watches. He hath invented an engine for the speedy working of division, etc., or for the speedy and immediate finding out the divisor.

Before I leave this town, I will get of him a catalogue of what he hath wrote; and as much of his inventions as I can. But they are many hundreds; he believes not fewer than a thousand. 'Tis such a hard matter to get people to do themselves right.

Mr. Robert Hooke did in Anno 1670 write a discourse called An Attempt to Prove the Motion of the Earth, which he then read to The Royal Society;

---

[1] scientist, architect, astronomer, and inventor; Secretary of The Royal Society, 1677–82.

[2] ruddle a red ochre, used for marking sheep (OED).

wherein he has delivered the theory of explaining the celestial motions mechanically: his words are these: "I shall explain a system of the world, differing in many particulars from any yet known, answering in all things to the common rules of mechanical motions. This depends upon three suppositions; first, that all celestial bodies whatsoever have an attractive or gravitating power towards their own centers, whereby they attract not only their own parts, and keep them from flying from them, as we may observe the Earth to do, but that they do also attract all the other celestial bodies that are within the sphere of their activity, and consequently that not only the Sun and the Moon have an influence upon the body and motion of the Earth, and the Earth upon them, but that Mercury also, Venus, Mars, Saturn, and Jupiter, by their attractive powers have a considerable influence upon its motion, as, in the same manner, the corresponding attractive power of the Earth hath a considerable influence upon every one of their motions also. The second supposition is this, that all bodies whatsoever that are put into direct and simple motion will so continue to move forwards in a straight line, till they are by some other effectual powers deflected and bent into a motion describing a circle, ellipsis, or some other uncompounded curve line. The third supposition is, that these attractive powers are so much the more powerful in operating, by how much nearer the body wrought upon is to their own centers."

About nine or ten years ago, Mr. Hooke wrote to Mr. Isaac Newton, of Trinity College, Cambridge, to make a demonstration of this theory, not telling him, at first, the proportion of the gravity to the distance, nor what was the curved line that was thereby made. Mr. Newton, in his answer to the letter, did express that he had not thought of it; and in his first attempt about it, he calculated the curve by supposing the attraction to be the same at all distances: upon which Mr. Hooke sent, in his next letter, the whole of his hypothesis, scil. that the gravitation was reciprocal to the square of the distance: which is the whole celestial theory, concerning which Mr. Newton has made a demonstration, not at all owning he received the first intimation of it from Mr. Hooke. Likewise Mr. Newton has in the same book printed some other theories and experiments of Mr. Hooke's, without acknowledging from whom he had them. This is the greatest discovery in nature that ever was since the world's creation. It never was so much as hinted by any man before. I wish he had writ plainer, and afforded a little more paper.

ANDREW MARVELL (1621–78)

He was of middling stature, pretty strong set, roundish faced, cherry cheeked, hazel eye, brown hair. He was in his conversation very modest, and of very few words: and though he loved wine he would never drink hard in company, and was wont to say that, he would not play the goodfellow in any man's company in whose hands he would not trust his life. He had not a general acquaintance.

In the time of Oliver the Protector he was Latin Secretary. He was a great master of the Latin tongue; an excellent poet in Latin or English: for Latin verses there was no man could come into competition with him.

I remember I have heard him say that the Earl of Rochester was the only man in England that had the true vein of satire.

His native town of Hull loved him so well that they elected him for their representative in Parliament, and gave him an honourable pension to maintain him.

He kept bottles of wine at his lodging, and many times he would drink liberally by himself to refresh his spirits, and exalt his muse....

Obiit Londini [died London], Aug. 18, 1678; and is buried in St. Giles Church in-the-fields about the middle of the south aisle. Some suspect that he was poisoned by the Jesuits, but I cannot be positive.

SIR ROBERT MORAY (d. 1673)

Sir Robert Moray, Knight, was of the ancient family of the Morays in Scotland. He was born (as I take it) in the Highlands. The Highlanders (like the Swedes) can make their own clothes; and I have heard Sir Robert say that he could do it. I have heard some of Oliver Cromwell's army say, that the Highlanders ate only oatmeal and water and milk: that their rivers did abound with trouts but they had not the wit to take them till the English taught 'em.

He spent most of his time in France. After his juvenile education at school and the University he betook himself to military employment in the service of Louis the 13th. He was at last a Lieutenant Colonel. He was a great master of the Latin tongue and was very well read. They say he was an excellent soldier.

He was far from the rough humour of the camp-breeding, for he was a person the most obliging about the Court and the only man that would do a kindness gratis upon an account of friendship. A lackey could not have been more obsequious and diligent. What I do now aver I know to be true upon my own score as well as others. He was a most humble and good man, and as free from covetousness as a Carthusian. He was abstemious and abhorred women. His Majesty was wont to tease at him. 'Twas pity he was a Presbyterian.

He was the chief appuy of his countrymen and their good angel.[1] There had been formerly a great friendship between him and the Duke of Lauderdale, till, about a year or two before his death, he went to the Duke on his return from Scotland and told him plainly that he had betrayed his country.

He was one of the first contrivers and institutors of The Royal Society and was our first President, and performed his charge in the Chair very well.

He was my most honoured and obliging friend, and I was more obliged to him than to all the courtiers besides. I had a great loss in his death, for, had he lived, he would have got some employment or other for me before this time. He had the King's ear as much as anyone, and was indefatigable in his undertakings. I was often with him. I was with him three hours the morning he died; he seemed to be well enough. I remember he drank at least 1/2 pint of fair water, according to his usual custom.

His lodging where he died was the leaded pavilion in the garden at Whitehall. He died suddenly July 4th about 8 hours p.m. A.D. 1673. Had but one shilling in his pocket, i.e. in all. The King buried him. He lies by Sir William Davenant in Westminster Abbey.

He was a good chemist and assisted his Majesty in his chemical operations.

JOHN MILTON (1608–74)

Mr. John Milton was of an Oxfordshire family. His grandfather was a Roman Catholic of Holton, in Oxfordshire, near Shotover.

His father was brought up in the University of Oxon, at Christ Church, and his grandfather disinherited him because he kept not to the Catholic religion (he found a Bible in English, in his chamber). So thereupon he came to London, and became a scrivener (brought up by a friend of his; was not an apprentice) and got a plentiful estate by it, and left it off many years before he died. He was an ingenious man; delighted in music; composed many songs now in print, especially that of "Oriana." I have been told that the father composed a song of fourscore parts for the Lantgrave of Hess, for which his Highness sent a medal of gold, or a noble present. He died about 1647; buried in Cripplegate church from his house in the Barbican.

---

[1] appuy support, prop (OED appui).

His son John was born the 9th of December, 1608, die Veneris [Friday], half an hour after six in the morning, in Bread Street, in London, at the Spread Eagle, which was his house (he had also in that street another house, the Rose; and other houses in other places). Anno Domini 1619, he was ten years old; and was then a poet. His schoolmaster then was a Puritan, in Essex, who cut his hair short.

He went to school to old Mr. Gill, at Paul's school. Went, at his own charge only, to Christ's College in Cambridge at fifteen, where he stayed eight years at least. Then he traveled into France and Italy (had Sir Henry Wotton's commendatory letters). At Geneva he contracted a great friendship with the learned Dr. Deodati of Geneva. He was acquainted with Sir Henry Wotton, Ambassador at Venice, who delighted in his company. He was several years beyond sea, and returned to England just upon the breaking out of the Civil Wars.

From his brother, Christopher Milton: when he went to school, when he was very young, he studied very hard, and sat up very late, commonly till twelve or one o'clock at night, and his father ordered the maid to sit up for him, and in those years (10) composed many copies of verses which might well become a riper age. And was a very hard student in the University, and performed all his exercises there with very good applause. His first tutor there was Mr. Chapell; from whom receiving some unkindness (whipped him) he was afterwards (though it seemed contrary to the rules of the College) transferred to the tuition of one Mr. Tovell, who died Parson of Lutterworth. He went to travel about the year 1638 and was abroad about a year's space, chiefly in Italy.

Immediately after his return he took a lodging at Mr Russell's, a tailor, in St. Bride's Churchyard, and took into his tuition his sister's two sons, Edward and John Philips, the first ten, the other nine years of age; and in a year's time made them capable of interpreting a Latin author at sight. And within three years they went through the best of Latin and Greek poets—Lucretius and Manilius, of the Latins (and with him the use of the globes, and some rudiments of arithmetic and geometry) Hesiod, Aratus, Dionysius Afer, Oppian, Apollonii Argonautica, and Quintus Calaber. Cato, Varro and Columella De re rustica were the very first authors they learned. As he was severe on the one hand, so he was most familiar and free in his conversation to those to whom most sour in his way of education. N.B. he made his nephews songsters, and sing, from the time they were with him.

His first wife (Mrs. Powell, a Royalist) was brought up and lived where there was a great deal of company and merriment, dancing, etc. And when she came to live with her husband, at Mr. Russell's, in St. Bride's Churchyard, she found it very solitary; no company came to her; oftimes heard his nephews beaten and cry. This life was irksome to her, and so she went to her parents at Fost-hill. He sent for her, after some time; and I think his servant was evilly entreated: but as for matter of wronging his bed, I never heard the least suspicions; nor had he, of that, any jealousy.

Two opinions do not well on the same bolster; she was a Royalist, and went to her mother to the King's quarters, near Oxford. I have perhaps so much charity to her that she might not wrong his bed: but what man, especially contemplative, would like to have a young wife environed and stormed by the sons of Mars, and those of the enemy party? He parted from her, and wrote the Triplechord about divorce.[1]

He had a middle wife, whose name was Katharine Woodcock. No child living by her.

---

[1] Triplechord referring to Tetrachordon (1645), one of Milton's four pamphlets about divorce.

He married his third wife, Elizabeth Minshull, the year before the sickness: a gentle person, a peaceful and agreeable humour.

Hath two daughters living: Deborah was his amanuensis (he taught her Latin, and to read Greek to him when he had lost his eyesight).

His sight began to fail him at first upon his writing against Salmasius, and before 'twas full completed one eye absolutely failed. Upon the writing of other books, after that, his other eye decayed. His eyesight was decaying about twenty years before his death. His father read without spectacles at 84. His mother had very weak eyes, and used spectacles presently after she was thirty years old.

His harmonical and ingenious soul did lodge in a beautiful and well proportioned body. He was a spare man. He was scarce so tall as I am (of middle stature).

He had brown hair. His complexion exceeding fair—he was so fair that they called him "the Lady of Christ's College." Oval face. His eye a dark gray.

He was very healthy and free from all diseases: seldom took any physic (only sometimes he took manna):[1] only towards his latter end he was visited with the gout, spring and fall.

He had a delicate tuneable voice, and had good skill. His father instructed him. He had an organ in his house; he played on that most. Of a very cheerful humour. He would be cheerful even in his gout fits, and sing.

He had a very good memory; but I believe that his excellent method of thinking and disposing did much to help his memory.

His widow has his picture, drawn very well and like, when a Cambridge scholar, which ought to be engraven; for the Pictures before his books are not at all like him.

His exercise was chiefly walking. He was an early riser (scil. at four o'clock manè [in the morning]), yea, after he lost his sight. He had a man to read to him. The first thing he read was the Hebrew bible, and that was at four manè, 1/2 hour plus. Then he contemplated.

At seven his man came to him again, and then read to him again, and wrote till dinner; the writing was as much as the reading. His daughter, Deborah, could read to him in Latin, Italian and French, and Greek. Married in Dublin to one Mr. Clark (sells silk, etc.) very like her father. The other sister is Mary, more like her mother.

After dinner he used to walk three or four hours at a time (he always had a garden where he lived) went to bed about nine.

Temperate man, rarely drank between meals. Extreme pleasant in his conversation, and at dinner, supper, etc.; but satirical. (He pronounced the letter "R" very hard—a certain sign of a satirical wit—from John Dryden.)

All the time of writing his Paradise Lost, his vein began at the autumnal equinoctial, and ceased at the vernal or thereabouts (I believe about May) and this was four or five years of his doing it. He began about two years before the King came in, and finished about three years after the King's Restoration.

In the fourth book of Paradise Lost there are about six verses of Satan's exclamation to the Sun, which Mr. E. Philips remembers about 15 or 16 years before ever his poem was thought of, which verses were intended for the beginning of a tragedy which he had designed, but was diverted from it by other business.

He was visited much by the learned; more than he did desire. He was mightily importuned to go into France and Italy. Foreigners came much to see him, and much admired him, and offered to him great preferments to come over to them; and the only inducement of several foreigners that came over into England, was chiefly to see Oliver Protector, and Mr. John Milton; and would see the house and chamber where he was born. He was much more admired abroad than at home.

---

[1] manna a medicinal juice obtained from the bark of the Manna-ash or other plants (OED manna 4).

His familiar learned acquaintance were Mr. Andrew Marvell, Mr. Skinner, Dr. Pagett, M.D.

John Dryden, esq., Poet Laureate, who very much admires him, went to him to have leave to put his Paradise Lost into a drama in rhyme. Mr. Milton received him civilly, and told him he would give him leave to tag his verses.

His widow assures me that Mr. T. Hobbes was not one of his acquaintance, that her husband did not like him at all, but he would acknowledge him to be a man of great parts, and a learned man. Their interests and tenets did run counter to each other.

Whatever he wrote against monarchy was out of no animosity to the King's person, or out of any faction or interest, but out of a pure zeal to the liberty of mankind, which he thought would be greater under a free state than under a monarchical government. His being so conversant in Livy and the Roman authors, and the greatness he saw done by the Roman Commonwealth, and the virtue of their great commanders, induced him to [this belief].

—(WRITTEN CA. 1667–1692)

Dorothy Osborne

1627 – 1695

Dorothy Osborne was born in Bedfordshire, the daughter of Sir Peter Osborne and Lady Dorothy Danvers. At the age of twenty-one, she travelled with her brother to St. Malo, where her father, the Lieutenant-Governor of Guernsey, defended a garrison for the King. They stopped at an inn on the Isle of Wight, where Osborne met and fell in love with Sir William Temple (1628–1699), who was en route to France. Though Temple had been brought up by his uncle, the renowned theologian and Royalist Dr. Henry Hammond, his father sat in the Long Parliament and held an office in Ireland under Cromwell. When Sir John Temple heard that his son had accompanied Osborne to St. Malo, he instructed him to continue to Paris posthaste. In 1649, Osborne returned with her father to England, retiring to the family ancestral home, Chicksands, in Bedfordshire.

Though they rarely saw one another, Osborne and Temple continued their courtship, at times through secret correspondence, for seven years. Both families hoped for wealthier partners for their children, and opposed the match. During her extended courtship, Osborne rejected numerous suitors including Henry Cromwell, son of the Lord Protector. Shortly after the death of her father in March 1654, Osborne insisted that her engagement to Temple be made public, and by June negotiations for the marriage settlement had begun. Though Osborne contracted smallpox during these negotiations, she and Temple were married soon after her recovery. Over the course of her forty-year marriage, she served as ambassador's wife in Brussels, The Hague, Ireland and London, enjoyed intimate friendships with royalty, and was known as a patron of the arts. She outlived all of her children. Osborne died at Moor Park, the Temple estate in Surrey.

The love letters from Osborne to Temple written during their courtship remained unpublished until 1836, when extracts from forty-two of her letters were issued as a supplement to Thomas Courtenay's Memoirs of the Life, Works, and Correspondence of Sir William Temple. Temple had informed Osborne that she wrote "better than the most extraordinary person in the kingdom." Her letters have been appreciated for their expression of personal desire in the face of frustrated love, for their witty treatment of the morals and social life of the aristocracy and landed gentry during the Interregnum, and for their insight into political events of local and national significance.

◆

The Letters of Dorothy Osborne to Sir William Temple, 1652–54

[Saturday, January 8, 1653]

SIR, There is nothing moves my charity like gratitude; and when a beggar's thankful for a small relief, I always repent it was not more. But seriously, this place will not afford much towards the enlarging of a letter, and I am grown so dull with living in't (for I am not willing to confess that I was always so) as to need all helps. Yet you shall see I will endeavour to satisfy you, upon condition you will tell me why you quarrelled so at your last letter. I cannot guess at it, unless it were that you repented you told me so much of your story, which I am not apt to believe neither, because it would not become our friendship, a great part of it consisting (as I have been taught) in a mutual confidence. And to let you see that I believe it so, I will give you an account of myself, and begin my story, as you did yours, from our parting at Goring House.[1]

I came down hither not half so well pleased as I went up, with an engagement upon me that I had little hope of ever shaking off, for I had made use of all the liberty my friends would allow me to preserve my own, and 'twould not do; he was so weary of his, that he would part with't upon my terms. As my last refuge I got my brother to go down with him to see his house, who, when he came back, made the relation I wished. He said the seat was as ill as so good a country would permit, and the house so ruined for want of living in't, as it would ask a good proportion of time and money to make it fit for a woman to confine herself to. This (though it were not much) I was willing to take hold of, and made it considerable enough to break the engagement. I had no quarrel to his person or his fortune, but was in love with neither, and much out of love with a thing called marriage; and have since thanked God I was so, for 'tis not long since one of my brothers writ me word of him that he was killed in a duel, though since I hear that 'twas the other that was killed, and he is fled upon 't, which does not mend the matter much. Both made me glad I had 'scaped him, and sorry for his misfortune, which in earnest was the least return his many civilities to me could deserve.

Presently, after this was at an end, my mother died, and I was left at liberty to mourn her loss awhile. At length my aunt (with whom I was when you last saw me) commanded me to wait on her at London;[2] and when I came she told me how much I was in her care, how well she loved me for my mother's sake, and something for my own, and drew out a long set speech which ended in a good motion (as she called it);[3] and truly I saw no harm in't, for by what I had heard of the gentleman I guessed he expected a better fortune than mine. And it proved so. Yet he protested he liked me so well, that he was very angry my father would not be persuaded to give a £1,000 more with me; and I him so ill, that I vowed if I had £1,000 less I should have thought it too much for him. And so we parted. Since, he has made a story with a new mistress that is worth your knowing, but too long for a letter. I'll keep it for you.

After this, some friends that had observed a gravity in my face which might become an elderly man's wife (as they termed it) and a mother-in-law, proposed a widower to me, that had four daughters, all old enough to be my sisters;[4] but he had a great estate, was as fine a gentleman as ever England bred, and the very pattern of wisdom. I that knew how much I wanted it, thought this the safest place for me to engage in, and was mightily pleased to think I had met with one at last that had wit enough for himself and me too. But shall I tell you what I thought when I knew him (you will say nothing on't): 'twas the vainest, impertinent, self-conceited learned coxcomb that ever yet I saw; to say more were to spoil his marriage, which I hear he is towards with a daughter of my Lord of Coleraine's;[5] but for his sake I shall take heed of a fine gentleman as long as I live.

Before I had quite ended with him, coming to town about that and some other occasions of my own, I fell in Sir Thomas's way;[6] and what humour took him I cannot imagine, but he made very formal addresses to me, and engaged his mother and my brother to appear in't. This bred a story pleasanter than any I have told you yet, but so long a one that I must reserve it till we meet, or make it a letter of itself. Only by this you may see 'twas not for nothing he commended me, though to speak seriously, it was because it was to you. Otherwise I might have missed of his praises for we have hardly been cousins since the breaking up of that business.[1]

---

[1] Goring House the London residence of the Earl of Norwich.

[2] my aunt Osborne's maternal aunt, Lady Gargrave.

[3] motion proposal (OED motion sb 7a).

[4] a widower Sir Justinian Isham (1610–1674).

[5] daughter of ... Coleraine's daughter of Hugh Hare, first Baron Coleraine (1606?–1667).

[6] Sir Thomas's Sir Thomas Osborne's; Sir Thomas was Osborne's cousin on her mother's side.

The next thing I desired to be rid on was a scurvy spleen that I had ever been subject to, and to that purpose was advised to drink the waters.[2] There I spent the latter end of the summer, and at my coming home found that a gentleman (who has some estate in this country) had been treating with my brother, and it yet goes on fair and softly.[3] I do not know him so well as to give you much of his character: 'tis a modest, melancholy, reserved man, whose head is so taken up with little philosophical studies, that I admire how I found a room there. 'Twas sure by chance; and unless he is pleased with that part of my humour which other people think worst, 'tis very possible the next new experiment may crowd me out again. Thus you have all my late adventures, and almost as much as this paper will hold. The rest shall be employed in telling you how sorry I am you have got such a cold. I am the more sensible of your trouble by my own, for I have newly got one myself. But I will send you that which used to cure me. 'Tis like the rest of my medicines: if it do no good, 'twill be sure to do no harm, and 'twill be no great trouble to you to eat a little on't now and then; for the taste, as it is not excellent, so 'tis not very ill. One thing more I must tell you, which is that you are not to take it ill that I mistook your age by my computation of your journey through this country; for I was persuaded t'other day that I could not be less than thirty years old by one that believed it himself, because he was sure it was a great while since he had heard of such a one in the world

As your humble servant.

[THURSDAY-SATURDAY, JUNE 2–4, 1653]

SIR, I have been reckoning up how many faults you lay to my charge in your last letter, and I find I am severe, unjust, unmerciful, and unkind. Oh me, how should one do to mend all these! 'Tis work for an age, and 'tis to be feared I shall be so old before I am good, that 'twill not be considerable to anybody but myself whether I am so or not. I say nothing of the pretty humour you fancied me in, in your dream, because 'twas but a dream. Sure, if it had been anything else, I should have remembered that my Lord L. loves to have his chamber and his bed to himself.[4] But seriously, now, I wonder at your patience. How could you hear me talk so senselessly, though 'twere but in your sleep, and not to be ready to beat me? What nice mistaken points of honour I pretend to, and yet could allow him a room in the same bed with me! Well, dreams are pleasant things to people whose humours are so; but to have the spleen and to dream upon't, is a punishment I would not wish my greatest enemy. I seldom dream, or never remember them, unless they have been so sad as to put me into such disorder as I can hardly recover when I am awake, and some of those I am confident I shall never forget.

You ask me how I pass my time here. I can give you a perfect account not only of what I do for the present, but of what I am likely to do this seven years if I stay here so long. I rise in the morning reasonably early, and before I am ready I go round the house till I am weary of that, and then into the garden till it grows too hot for me. About ten o'clock I think of making me ready, and when that's done I go into my father's chamber, from thence to dinner, where my cousin Molle and I sit in great state in a room and at a table that would hold a great many more.[1] After dinner we sit and talk till Mr. B. comes in question, and then I am gone.[2] The heat of the day is spent in reading or working, and about six or seven o'clock I walk out into a common that lies hard by the house, where a great many young wenches keep sheep and cows, and sit in the shade singing of ballads. I go to them and compare their voices and beauties to some ancient shepherdesses that I have read of, and find a vast difference there; but, trust me, I think these are as innocent as those could be. I talk to them, and find they want nothing to make them the happiest people in the world but the knowledge that they are so. Most commonly, when we are in the midst of our discourse, one looks about her, and spies her cows going into the corn, and then away they all run as if they had wings at their heels. I, that am not so nimble, stay behind; and when I see them driving home their cattle, I think 'tis time for me to retire too. When I have supped, I go into the garden, and so to the side of a small river that runs by it, where I sit down and wish you with me (you had best say this is not kind neither). In earnest, 'tis a pleasant place, and would be much more so to me if I had your company. I sit there sometimes till I am lost with thinking; and were it not for some cruel thoughts of the crossness of our fortunes that will not let me sleep there, I should forget that there were such a thing to be done as going to bed.[3] [1] for we have... that business Attempts had been made to arrange a marriage between Osborne and Sir Thomas.

---

[2] scurvy spleen The spleen was regarded as the seat of melancholy or ill humour; scurvy fig. worthless, irritating; drink the waters The waters at Epsom Wells in Surrey were alleged to improve fits of ill temper caused by an ailing spleen.

[3] treating with negotiating terms with (OED treating vbl sb 1).

[4] Lord L. presumably Philip, Lord Lisle (1619–1698), third Earl of Leicester, under whom Temple served.

Since I writ this my company is increased by two, my brother Harry and a fair niece, the eldest of my brother Peyton's daughters.[4] She is so much a woman that I am almost ashamed to say I am her aunt; and so pretty, that, if I had any design to gain a servant, I should not like her company;[5] but I have none, and therefore shall endeavour to keep her here as long as I can persuade her father to spare her, for she will easily consent to it, having so much of my humour (though it be the worst in her) as to like a melancholy place and little company. My brother John is not come down again, nor am I certain when he will be here. He went from London into Gloucestershire to my sister who was very ill, and his youngest girl, of which he was very fond, is since dead.[6] But I believe by that time his wife has a little recovered her sickness and the loss of her child, he will be coming this way. My father is reasonably well, but keeps his chamber still, and will hardly, I am afraid, ever be so perfectly recovered as to come abroad again.

I am sorry for poor Walker, but you need not doubt of what he has of yours in his hands, for it seems he does not use to do his work himself.[7] I speak seriously, he keeps a Frenchman that sets all his seals and rings. If what you say of my Lady Leppington be of your own knowledge, I shall believe you, but otherwise I can assure you I have heard from people that pretend to know her very well, that her kindness to Compton was very moderate, and that she never liked him so well as when he died and gave her his estate.[8] But they might be deceived, and 'tis not so strange as that you should imagine a coldness and an indifference in my letters where I so little meant it; but I am not displeased you should desire my kindness enough to apprehend the loss of it when it is safest. Only I would not have you apprehend it so far as to believe it possible—that were an injury to all the assurances I have given you, and if you love me you cannot think me unworthy. I should think myself so, if I found you grew indifferent to me, that I have had so long and so particular a friendship for; but, sure, this is more than I need to say. You are enough in my heart to know all my thoughts, and if so, you know better than I can tell you how much I am

---

[1] making me ready dressing myself (OED ready a III.13b); my cousin Molle Henry Molle, a distant relative.

[2] Mr. B. Osborne's current suitor, Levinus Bennet, Sheriff of Cambridgeshire.

[3] crossness opposition (OED crossness 2).

[4] a fair niece Dorothy Peyton, the daughter of Osborne's eldest sister Elizabeth (d. 1642) and her brother-in-law Thomas Peyton of Knowlton, Kent.

[5] servant a professed lover (OED servant sb 4b).

[6] sister sister-in-law.

[7] Walker the goldsmith who had set Osborne's seals.

[8] If what you...his estate In May, 1652, Colonel Henry Crompton was killed by George Brydges, Lord Chandos, in a duel fought over Mary Carey, Lady Leppington, to whom Crompton bequeathed his estates. Chandos was convicted of manslaughter.

Yours.

[OCTOBER 1653]

SIR, You would have me say something of my coming.[1] Alas! how fain I would have something to say, but I know no more than you saw in that letter I sent you. How willingly would I tell you anything that I thought would please you; but I confess I do not love to give uncertain hopes, because I do not care to receive them. And I thought there was no need of saying I would be sure to take the first occasion, and that I waited with impatience for it, because I hoped you had believed all that already; and so you do, I am sure. Say what you will, you cannot but know my heart enough to be assured that I wish myself with you, for my own sake as well as yours. 'Tis rather that you love to hear me say it often, than that you doubt it; for I am no dissembler. I could not cry for a husband that were indifferent to me (like your cousin); no, nor for a husband that I loved neither. I think 'twould break my heart sooner than make me shed a tear. 'Tis ordinary griefs that only make me weep. In earnest, you cannot imagine how often I have been told that I had too much franchise in my humour, and that 'twas a point of good breeding to disguise handsomely;[2] but I answered still for myself, that 'twas not to be expected I should be exactly bred, that had never seen a Court since I was capable of anything. Yet I know so much—that my Lady Carlisle would take it very ill if you should not let her get the point of honour;[3] 'tis all she aims at, to go beyond everybody in compliment. But are not you afraid of giving me a strange vanity with telling me that I write better than the most extraordinary person in the kingdom? If I had not the sense to understand that the reason why you like my letters better is only because they are kinder than hers, such a word might have undone me.

But my Lady Isabella, that speaks, and looks, and sings, and plays, and all so prettily, why cannot I say that she is as free from faults as her sister believes her?[4] No; I am afraid she is not, and sorry that those she has are so generally known. My brother did not bring them for an example, but I did, and made him confess she had better have married a beggar than that beast with all his estate. She cannot be excused; but certainly they run a strange hazard that have such husbands as makes them think they cannot be more undone, whatever course they take.[5] Oh, 'tis ten thousand pities! I remember she was the first woman that ever I took notice of for extremely handsome; and, in earnest, she was then the loveliest thing that could be looked on, I think. But what should she do with beauty now? Were I as she, I would hide myself from all the world; I should think all people that looked on me read it in my face and despised me in their hearts; and at the same time they made me a leg, or spoke civilly to me, I should believe they did not think I deserved their respect.[1] I'll tell you who he urged for an example though, my Lord Pembroke and my Lady, who, they say, are upon parting after all his passion for her, and his marrying her against the consent of all his friends;[2] but to that I answered, that though he pretended great kindness he had for her, I never heard of much she had for him, and knew she married him merely for advantage. Nor is she a woman of that discretion as to do all that might become her, when she must do it rather as things fit to be done than as things she is inclined to. Besides that, what with a spleenatick side and a chimickall head, he is but an odd body himself.[3] [1] my coming Osborne had hoped to travel to London.

---

[2] franchise freedom or license (OED franchise sb. II.8).

[3] Lady Carlisle Lucy Hay, Countess of Carlisle (1599–1660), was praised by the poets of her day. Her beauty and wit afforded her a central position in Charles I's Court. After Strafford's execution in 1641, she allied herself with the Parliamentarians. Her political intrigues led to an eighteen-month imprisonment in the Tower; point of honour the obligation to demand satisfaction for a wrong or an insult (OED point *sb*¹ D.9).

[4] Lady Isabella sister of Lady Diana Rich and wife of Sir James Thynne.

[5] undone ruined (OED undone *ppl.a*²).

But is it possible what they say, that my Lord Leicester and my Lady are in great disorder, and that after forty years' patience he has now taken up the cudgels and resolves to venture for the mastery?[4] Methinks he wakes out of his long sleep like a froward child, that wrangles and fights with all that comes near it. They say he has turned away almost every servant in the house, and left her at Penshurst to digest it as she can.[5]

What an age do we live in, where 'tis a miracle if in ten couple that are married, two of them live so as not to publish to the world that they cannot agree. I begin to be of the opinion of him that (when the Roman Church first propounded whether it were not convenient for priests not to marry) said that it might be convenient enough, but sure it was not our Saviour's intention, for He commanded that all should take up their cross and follow Him;[6] and for his part, he was confident there was no such cross as a wife. This is an ill doctrine for me to preach; but to my friends I cannot but confess that I am afraid much of the fault lies in us; for I have observed that generally in great families, the men seldom disagree, but the women are always scolding; and 'tis most certain, that let the husband be what he will, if the wife have but patience (which, sure, becomes her best), the disorder cannot be great enough to make a noise;[7] his anger alone, when it meets with nothing that resists it, cannot be loud enough to disturb the neighbours. And such a wife may be said to do as a kinswoman of ours that had a husband who was not always himself; and when he was otherwise, his humour was to rise in the night, and with two bedstaves tabour upon the table an hour together.[8] She took care every night to lay a great cushion upon the table for him to strike on, that nobody might hear him, and so discover his madness. But 'tis a sad thing when all one's happiness is only that the world does not know you are miserable.

For my part, I think it were very convenient that all such as intend to marry should live together in the same house some years of probation; and if, in all that time, they never disagreed, they should then be permitted to marry if they pleased; but how few would do it then! I do not remember that I ever saw or heard of any couple that were bred up so together (as many you know are, that are designed for one another from children), but they always disliked one another extremely; and parted, if it were left in their choice. If people proceeded with this caution, the world would end sooner than is expected, I believe; and because, with all my wariness, 'tis not impossible but I may be caught, nor likely that I should be wiser than everybody else, 'twere best, I think, that I said no more in this point.

---

[1] made me a leg bowed (OED leg sb 4).

[2] my Lord Pembroke and my Lady probably Philip Herbert, fifth Earl of Pembroke (1619–1669), and his second wife Catherine, the daughter of Sir William Villiers.

[3] spleenatick ill-tempered, peevish; chimickall engaged in the practice or study of chemistry (OED chemical a 5).

[4] Lord Leicester and my Lady Robert Sidney, second Earl of Leicester (1595–1677), and his wife Dorothy Percy (d. 1659), daughter of Henry, ninth Earl of Northumberland. Lady Leicester was the sister of Lady Carlisle; taken up the cudgels engaged in a vigorous contest; cudgels are literally clubs (OED cudgel sb 2).

[5] digest endure, put up with (OED digest v 6).

[6] take up their cross and follow him a comical allusion to Matthew 16:24, "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."

[7] noise disturbance (OED noise sb 1a).

[8] bedstaves staffs or sticks used in some way about a bed; formerly well-known as a ready weapon (OED bedstaff Obs); tabour beat (OED tabour v 3).

What would I give to know that sister of yours that is so good at discovery;[1] sure she is excellent company; she had reason to laugh at you when you would have persuaded her the "moss was sweet." I remember Jane brought some of it to me, to ask me if I thought it had no ill smell, and whether she might venture to put it in the box or not.[2] I told her as I thought, she could not put a more innocent thing there, for I did not find that it had any smell at all; besides that I was willing it should do me some service in requital of the pains I had taken for it. My niece and I wandered through some six hundred acres of wood in search of it, to make rocks and strange things that her head is full of, and she admires it more than you did. If she had known I had consented it should have been used to fill up a box, she would have condemned me extremely. I told Jane that you liked her present, and she, I find, is resolved to spoil your compliment, and make you confess at last that they are not worth the eating; she threatens to send you more, but you would forgive her if you saw how she baits me every day to go to London; all that I can say will not satisfy her. When I urge (as 'tis true) that there is a necessity of my stay here, she grows furious, cries you will die with melancholy, and confounds me so with stories of your ill-humour, that I'll swear I think I should go merely to be at quiet, if it were possible, though there were no other reason for it. But I hope 'tis not so ill as she would have me believe it, though I know your humour is strangely altered from what it was, and am sorry to see it. Melancholy must needs do you more hurt than to another to whom it may be natural, as I think it is to me; therefore if you loved me you would take heed on't. Can you believe that you are dearer to me than the whole world besides, and yet neglect yourself? If you do not, you wrong a perfect friendship; and if you do, you must consider my interest in you, and preserve yourself to make me happy. Promise me this, or I shall haunt you worse than she does me. Scribble how you please, so you make your letter long enough; you see I give you good example; besides, I can assure you we do perfectly agree if you receive no satisfaction but from my letters, I have none but what yours give me.

[OCTOBER 1653]

SIR, Why are you so sullen, and why am I the cause? Can you believe that I do willingly defer my journey? I know you do not. Why, then, should my absence now be less supportable to you than heretofore? It cannot, nay it shall not be long (if I can help it), and I shall break through all inconveniences rather than deny you anything that lies in my power to grant. But by your own rules, then, may not I expect the same from you? Is it possible that all I have said cannot oblige you to a care of yourself? What a pleasant distinction you make when you say 'tis not melancholy makes you do these things, but a careless forgetfulness. Did ever anybody forget themselves to that degree that was not melancholy in extremity. Good God! how are you altered; and what is it that has done it? I have known you when of all the things in the world you would not have been taken for a discontent;[3] you were, as I thought, perfectly pleased with your condition; what has made it so much worse since? I know nothing you have lost, and am sure you have gained a friend. A friend that is capable of the highest degree of friendship you can propound, that has already given an entire heart for that which she received, and 'tis no more in her will than in her power ever to recall it or divide it; if this be not enough to satisfy you, tell me what I can do more? I shall find less difficulty in the doing it than in imagining what it may be; and will not you then do so much for my sake as to be careful of a health I am so infinitely concerned in and which those courses must needs destroy? If you loved me you would, I am sure you would, and let me tell you, you can never be that perfect friend you describe if you can deny me this. But will not your wife believe there is such a friendship?[1] I am not of her opinion at all, but I do not wonder neither that she is of it. Alas! how few there are that ever heard of such a thing, and fewer that understand it. Besides it is not to be taught or learned. It must come naturally to those that have it, and those must believe it before they can know it. But I admire, since she has it not, how she can be satisfied of her condition; nothing else, sure, can recompense the alterations you say it made in her fortune. What was it took her? Her husband's good face? What could invite her where there was neither fortune, wit, nor good usage, and a husband to whom she was but indifferent; which is all one to me, if not worse than an aversion, and I should sooner hope to gain upon one that hated me than upon one that did not consider me enough either to love or hate me. I'll swear she is a great deal easier to please than I should be.

---

[1] that sister of yours Martha Temple (d. 1722), who lived with Temple and their father, Sir John Temple, in London.

[2] Jane Jane Wright, Osborne's companion and chaperone.

[3] a discontent a malcontent.

There are a great many ingredients must go to the making me happy in a husband. First, as my cousin Franklin says, our humours must agree;[2] and to do that he must have that kind of breeding that I have had, and used that kind of company. That is, he must not be so much a country gentleman as to understand nothing but hawks and dogs, and be fonder of either than of his wife; nor of the next sort of them whose aim reaches no further than to be Justice of Peace, and once in his life High Sheriff, who reads no books but statutes, and studies nothing but how to make a speech interlarded with Latin that may amaze his disagreeing poor neighbours, and fright them rather than persuade them into quietness. He must not be a thing that began the world in a free school,[3] was sent from thence to the university, and is at his furthest when he reaches the Inns of Court, has no acquaintance but those of his form in these places, speaks the French he has picked out of old laws, and admires nothing but the stories he has heard of the revels that were kept there before his time. He must not be a town gallant neither, that lives in a tavern and an ordinary,[4] that cannot imagine how an hour should be spent without company unless it be in sleeping, that makes court to all the women he sees, thinks they believe him, and laughs and is laughed at equally. Nor a travelled Monsieur whose head is all feather inside and outside, that can talk of nothing but dances and duels, and has courage enough to wear slashes when everybody else dies with cold to see him.[5] He must not be a fool of no sort, nor peevish, nor ill-natured, nor proud, nor covetous; and to all this must be added, that he must love me and I him as much as we are capable of loving. Without all this, his fortune, though never so great, would not satisfy me; and with it, a very moderate one would keep me from ever repenting my disposal.

---

[1] your wife the person who assumes the role of your "wife" by giving such advice.

[2] humours temperaments (OED humour sb II.4).

[3] free school a school in which learning is given without pay (though this definition has been disputed) (OED free a A.IV.32b).

[4] an ordinary an eating house where public meals are provided at a fixed price. In the expensive ordinaries, dinner was followed by gambling, and the term was often used as synonymous with "gambling-house" (OED ordinary sb III.14b).

[5] slashes vertical slits made in garments in order to expose to view a lining or under garment of a different or contrasting colour (OED slash sb^{1} 3a).

I have been as large and as particular in my descriptions as my cousin Molle in his of Moor Park—but that you know the place so well I would send it you—nothing can come near his patience in writing it, but my reading on't. But would you had sent me your father's letter, it would not have been less welcome to me than to you; and you may safely believe that I am equally concerned with you in anything. I should be pleased, too, to see something of my Lady Carlisle's writing, because she is so extraordinary a person.[1] I have been thinking of sending you my picture till I could come myself; but a picture is but dull company, and that you need not; besides, I cannot tell whether it be very like me or not, though 'tis the best I ever had drawn for me, and Mr. Lely will have it that he never took more pains to make a good one in his life, and that was it I think that spoiled it.[2] He was condemned for making the first he drew for me a little worse than I, and in making this better he has made it as unlike as t'other. He is now, I think, at my Lord Paget's at Marlow, where I am promised he shall draw a picture of my Lady for me—she gives it me, she says, as the greatest testimony of her friendship to me, for by her own rule she is past the time of having pictures taken of her.[3] After eighteen, she says, there is no face but decays apparently; I would fain have had her excepted such as had never been beauties, for my comfort, but she would not.

When you see your friend Mr. Heningham, you may tell him in his ear there is a willow garland coming towards him.[4] He might have sped better in his suit if he had made court to me, as well as to my Lady Ruthin.[5] She has been my wife this seven year, and whosoever pretends there must ask my leave.[6] I have now given my consent that she shall marry a very pretty little gentleman, Sir Christopher Yelverton's son, and I think we shall have a wedding ere it be long.[7] My Lady her mother, in great kindness, would have recommended Heningham to me, and told me in a compliment that I was fitter for him than her daughter, who was younger, and therefore did not understand the world so well; that she was certain if he knew me he would be extremely taken for I would make just that kind of wife he looked for. I humbly thanked her, but said that without knowing him more than by relation, I was certain he would not make that kind of husband I looked for—and so it went no further.

I expect my elder brother here shortly, whose fortune is well mended by my other brother's death, so as if he were satisfied himself with what he has done, I know no reason why he might not be very happy; but I am afraid he is not. I have not seen my sister since I knew she was so;[8] but, sure, she can have lost no beauty, for I never saw any that she had, but good black eyes, which cannot alter. He loves her, I think, at the ordinary rate of husbands, but not enough, I believe, to marry her so much to his disadvantage if it were to do again; and that would kill me were I as she, for I could be infinitely better satisfied with a husband that had never loved me in hope he might, than with one that began to love me less than he had done.

---

[1] I should be…a person Temple later sends Osborne one of Lady Carlisle's letters, of which she writes: "Methinks the hand and the style both show her a great person, and 'tis writ in the way that's now affected by all that pretend to wit and breeding; only, I am a little scandalised I confess that she uses the word faithful—she that never knew how to be so in her life" (Sunday October 23, 1653).

[2] Mr. Lely Peter Lely, the Dutch portrait painter, lived in England from 1641 until his death in 1679.

[3] Lord Paget's Sir William Paget, fifth Baron Paget (1609–1678), was married to Lady Frances Rich. Frances was the sister of Osborne's close friend Lady Diana Rich, referred to throughout these letters as "my Lady."

[4] Mr. Heningham apparently an unsuccessful suitor of Osborne's; he is mentioned in a letter of May 25, 1654 as having also been jilted by Mrs. Gerard; willow garland a symbol of grief for unrequited love (OED willow sb I.1d).

[5] Lady Ruthin Susan, Lady Grey de Ruthin, daughter of Charles Longueville, Lord Grey de Ruthin.

[6] my wife an expression used between close women friends.

[7] Sir Christopher Yelverton's son Sir Harry Yelverton, who did marry Lady Ruthin as Osborne hoped.

[8] sister sister-in-law; John Osborne's new wife Eleanor Danvers.

I am yours.

[SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1654]

SIR, 'Tis well you have given over your reproaches; I can allow you to tell me of my faults kindly and like a friend. Possibly it is a weakness in me to aim at the world's esteem, as if I could not be happy without it; but there are certain things that custom has made almost of absolute necessity, and reputation I take to be one of those. If one could be invisible I should choose that; but since all people are seen and known, and shall be talked of in spite of their teeth,[1] who is it that does not desire, at least, that nothing of ill may be said of them, whether justly or otherwise? I never knew any so satisfied with their own innocence as to be content the world should think them guilty. Some out of pride have seemed to contemn ill reports when they have found they could not avoid them, but none out of strength of reason, though many have pretended to it. No, not my Lady Newcastle with all her philosophy, therefore you must not expect it from me.[2] I shall never be ashamed to own that I have a particular value for you above any other, but 'tis not the greatest merit of person will excuse a want of fortune; in some degree I think it will, at least with the most rational part of the world, and, as far as that will reach, I desire it should. I would not have the world believe I married out of interest and to please my friends;[3] I had much rather they should know I chose the person, and took his fortune, because 'twas necessary, and that I prefer a competency with one I esteem infinitely before a vast estate in other hands. 'Tis much easier, sure, to get a good fortune than a good husband; but whosoever marries without any consideration of fortune shall never be allowed to do it out of so reasonable an apprehension,[4] the whole world (without any reserve) shall pronounce they did it merely to satisfy their giddy humour.

Besides, though you imagine 'twere a great argument of my kindness to consider nothing but you, in earnest I believe 'twould be an injury to you. I do not see that it puts any value upon men when women marry them for love (as they term it); 'tis not their merit, but our folly that is always presumed to cause it; and would it be any advantage to you to have your wife thought an indiscreet person? All this I can say to you; but when my brother disputes it with me I have other arguments for him, and I drove him up so close t'other night that for want of a better gap to get out at he was fain to say that he feared as much your having a fortune as your having none, for he saw you held my Lord Lisle's principles.[5] That religion or honour were things you did not consider at all, and that he was confident you would take any engagement, serve in any employment, or do anything to advance yourself. I had no patience for this. To say you were a beggar, your father not worth £4000 in the whole world, was nothing in comparison of having no religion nor no honour. I forgot all my disguise, and we talked ourselves weary;[1] he renounced me again, and I defied him, but both in as civil language as it would permit, and parted in great anger with the usual ceremony of a leg and a courtesy, that you would have died with laughing to have seen us.

---

[1] in spite of their teeth notwithstanding their opposition (OED tooth sb III.5).

[2] Lady Newcastle Margaret Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle (1623–1673), published Philosophical Fancies in 1653. She was viewed by many as an eccentric because of her unusual apparel, her novel philosophic ideas, and her desire to write for publication.

[3] interest financial interest.

[4] apprehension notion (OED apprehension II.9).

[5] Lord Lisle's principles Lord Lisle held republican opinions. He was favoured by Cromwell, sat in the "Little Parliament" and was a member of both the councils of state elected by it. He was also a member of the two councils of state of the protectorate and sat in Cromwell's House of Lords.

The next day I, not being at dinner, saw him not till night; then he came into my chamber, where I supped but he did not. Afterwards Mr. Gibson and he and I talked of indifferent things till all but we two went to bed. Then he sat half-an-hour and said not one word, nor I to him. At last, in a pitiful tone, "Sister," says he, "I have heard you say that when anything troubles you, of all things you apprehend going to bed, because there it increases upon you, and you lie at the mercy of all your sad thoughts, which the silence and darkness of the night adds a horror to; I am at that pass now. I vow to God I would not endure another night like the last to gain a crown." I, who resolved to take no notice what ailed him, said 'twas a knowledge I had raised from my spleen only, and so fell into a discourse of melancholy and the causes, and from that (I know not how) into religion; and we talked so long of it, and so devoutly, that it laid all our anger.[2] We grew to a calm and peace with all the world. Two hermits conversing in a cell they equally inhabit, never expressed more humble, charitable kindness, one towards another, than we. He asked my pardon and I his, and he has promised me never to speak of it to me whilst he lives, but leave the event to God Almighty; and till he sees it done, he will be always the same to me that he is;[3] then he shall leave me, he says, not out of want of kindness to me, but because he cannot see the ruin of a person that he loves so passionately, and in whose happiness he had laid up all his. These are the terms we are at, and I am confident he will keep his word with me, so that you have no reason to fear him in any respect; for though he should break his promise, he should never make me break mine. No, let me assure you this rival, nor any other, shall ever alter me, therefore spare your jealousy, or turn it all into kindness.

I will write every week, and no miss of letters shall give us any doubts of one another. Time nor accidents shall not prevail upon our hearts, and, if God Almighty please to bless us, we will meet the same we are, or happier. I will do all you bid me. I will pray, and wish, and hope, but you must do so too, then, and be so careful of yourself that I may have nothing to reproach you with when you come back.

That vile wench lets you see all my scribbles, I believe;[4] how do you know I took care your hair should not be spoiled? 'Tis more than ere you did, I think, you are so negligent on't, and keep it so ill, 'tis pity you should have it. May you have better luck in the cutting it than I had with mine. I cut it two or three years agone, and it never grew since. Look to it; if I keep the lock you give me better than you do all the rest, I shall not spare you; expect to be soundly chidden. What do you mean to do with all my letters? Leave them behind you? If you do, it must be in safe hands, some of them concern you, and me, and other people besides us very much, and they will almost load a horse to carry.

Do not my cousins at Moor Park mistrust us a little? I have a great belief they do. I'm sure Robin Cheke told my brother of it since I was last in town.[5] Of all things, I admire my cousin Molle has not got it by the end, he that frequents that family so much, and is at this instant at Kimbolton. If he has, and conceals it, he is very discreet; I could never discern by anything that he knew it. I shall endeavour to accustom myself to the noise on't, and make it as easy to me as I can, though I had much rather it were not talked of till there were an absolute necessity of discovering it, and you can oblige me in nothing more than in concealing it.[1] I take it very kindly that you promise to use all your interest in your father to persuade him to endeavour our happiness, and he appears so confident of his power that it gives me great hopes.

---

[1] disguise counterfeit semblance or show (OED disguise sb 4).

[2] laid appeased (OED lay v^1 I.3a).

[3] sees it done witnesses our marriage.

[4] vile wench Nan Stacy, who may at one time have been Osborne's servant. She apparently lived in London, and Temple may have lodged with her and her mother.

[5] Robin Cheke a distant relative; presumably the son of Sir Thomas Cheke, Osborne's great-uncle.

Dear! shall we ever be so happy, think you? Ah! I dare not hope it. Yet 'tis not want of love gives me these fears. No, in earnest, I think; (nay, I am sure) I love you more than ever, and 'tis that only gives me these despairing thoughts; when I consider how small a proportion of happiness is allowed in this world, and how great mine would be in a person for whom I have a passionate kindness, and who has the same for me. As it is infinitely above what I can deserve, and more than God Almighty usually allots to the best people, I can find nothing in reason but seems to be against me; and, methinks, 'tis as vain in me to expect it as 'twould be to hope I might be a queen (if that were really as desirable a thing as 'tis thought to be); and it is just it should be so.

We complain of this world, and the variety of crosses and afflictions it abounds in, and yet for all this who is weary on't (more than in discourse), who thinks with pleasure of leaving it, or preparing for the next? We see old folks, that have outlived all the comforts of life, desire to continue it, and nothing can wean us from the folly of preferring a mortal being, subject to great infirmity and unavoidable decays, before an immortal one, and all the glories that are promised with it. Is this not very like preaching? Well, 'tis too good for you; you shall have no more on't. I am afraid you are not mortified enough for such discourses to work upon (though I am not of my brother's opinion, neither, that you have no religion in you). In earnest, I never took anything he ever said half so ill, as nothing, sure, is so great an injury. It must suppose one to be a devil in human shape. Oh, me! now I am speaking of religion, let me ask you is not his name Bagshawe that you say rails on love and women?[2] Because I heard one t'other day speaking of him, and commending his wit, but withal, said he was a perfect atheist. If so, I can allow him to hate us, and love, which, sure, has something of divine in it, since God requires it of us. I am coming into my preaching vein again. What think you, were it not a good way of preferment as the times are? If you advise me to it I'll venture. The woman at Somerset House was cried up mightily. Think on't.

Dear, I am yours.

[Saturday, February 11, 1654]

SIR, The lady was in the right. You are a very pretty gentleman and a modest; were there ever such stories as these you tell? The best on't is, I believe none of them, unless it be that of my Lady Newport, which I must confess is so like her that if it be not true 'twas at least excellently fancied.[3] But my Lord Rich is not caught, though he was near it.[4] My Lady Devonshire, whose daughter his first wife was, has engaged my Lord Warwick to put a stop to the business.[5] Otherwise, I think his present want of fortune, and the little sense of honour he has, might have been prevailed on to marry her.

---

[1] noise rumour (OED noise sb 2a); discovering disclosing (OED discover v 3a).

[2] Bagshawe Edward Bagshawe the Elder (d. 1662), a lawyer. Originally a staunch Puritan, he later joined the King's party.

[3] Lady Newport wife of the Earl of Newport and mother of Lady Anne Blunt, of whose scandal Osborne writes in a previous letter.

[4] Lord Rich Robert, Baron Rich (d. 1659), eldest son of Robert Rich, second Earl of Warwick. His first wife was Anne Cavendish, daughter of William Cavendish, Earl of Devonshire. His second wife was Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Cheke.

[5] My Lord Warwick Robert Rich, second Earl of Warwick (1587–1658). The nature of the business that he must "put a stop to" is not known, though it appears Lady Devonshire wants to prevent a

'Tis strange to see the folly that possesses the young people of this age, and the liberties they take to themselves. I have the charity to believe they appear very much worse than they are, and that the want of a Court to govern themselves by is in great part the cause of their ruin; though that was no perfect school of virtue, yet Vice there wore her mask, and appeared so unlike herself that she gave no scandal. Such as were really as discreet as they seemed to be gave good example, and the eminency of their condition made others strive to imitate them, or at least they durst not own a contrary course. All who had good principles and inclinations were encouraged in them, and such as had neither were forced to put on a handsome disguise that they might not be out of countenance at themselves. 'Tis certain (what you say) that where divine or human laws are not positive we may be our own judges; nobody can hinder us, nor is it in itself to be blamed. But, sure, it is not safe to take all the liberty that is allowed us—there are not many that are sober enough to be trusted with the government of themselves; and because others judge us with more severity than our indulgence to ourselves will permit, it must necessarily follow that 'tis safer being ruled by their opinion than by our own. I am disputing again, though you told me my fault so plainly.

I'll give it over, and tell you that Parthenissa is now my company. My brother sent it down, and I have almost read it.[1] 'Tis handsome language; you would know it to be writ by a person of good quality though you were not told it; but, in the whole, I am not very much taken with it. All the stories have too near a resemblance with those of other romances, there is nothing of new or surprenant in them;[2] the ladies are all so kind they make no sport, and I meet only with one that took me by doing a handsome thing of the kind. She was in a besieged town, and persuaded all those of her sex to go out with her to the enemy (which were a barbarous people) and die by their swords, that the provision of the town might last the longer for such as were able to do service in defending it. But how angry was I to see him spoil this again by bringing out a letter this woman left behind her for the governor of the town, where she discovers a passion for him, and makes that the reason why she did it. I confess I have no patience for our faiseurs de Romance when they make women court.[3] It will never enter into my head that 'tis possible any woman can love where she is not first loved, and much less that if they should do that, they could have the face to own it. Methinks he that writes L'illustre Bassa says well in his epistle that we are not to imagine his hero to be less taking than those of other romances because the ladies do not fall in love with him whether he will or not.[4] 'Twould be an injury to the ladies to suppose they could do so, and a greater to his hero's civility if he should put him upon being cruel to them, since he was to love but one. Another fault I find, too, in the style—'tis affected. Ambitioned is a great word with him, and ignore; my concern, or of great concern, is, it seems, properer than concernment: and though he makes his people say fine handsome things to one another, proposed second marriage.

---

[1] Parthenissa a romance written by Roger Boyle, Baron Broghill, later Earl of Orrery (1621–1679). Its first instalment was published in 1651, the last in 1669, though it was chiefly published during the years 1654–1656.

[2] surprenant surprising.

[3] faiseurs de Romance makers of Romance.

[4] L'illustre Bassa a romance written by Madelein de Scudery, and translated by Henry Cogan in 1652. The passage to which Osborne refers reads: "And if you see not my hero persecuted with love by women, it is not because he was not amiable, and that he could not be loved, but because it would clash with civility in the persons of ladies, and with true resemblance in that of men, who rarely show themselves cruel unto them, nor in doing it could have any good grace."

yet they are not easy and naïve like the French, and there is a little harshness in most of the discourses that one would take to be the fault of a translator rather than of an author. But perhaps I like it the worse for having a piece of Cyrus by me that I am hugely pleased with, and that I would fain have you read:[1] I'll send it [to] you. At least read one story that I'll mark you down, if you have time for no more. I am glad you stay to wait on your sister.[2] I would have my gallant civil to all, much more when it is so due, and kindness too.

I have the cabinet, and 'tis in earnest a pretty one;[3] though you will not own it for a present. I'll keep it as one, and 'tis like to be yours no more but as 'tis mine. I'll warrant you would ne'er have thought of making me a present of charcoal as my servant James would have done, to warm my heart I think he meant it.[4] But the truth is, I had been inquiring for some (as 'tis a commodity scarce enough in this country), and he hearing of it, told the bailiff he would give him some if 'twere for me. But this is not all. I cannot forbear telling you the other day he made me a visit, and I, to prevent his making discourses to me, made Mrs. Goldsmith and Jane sit by all the while.[5] But he came better provided that I could have imagined. He brought a letter with him, and gave it me as one that he had met with directed to me, he thought it came out of Northamptonshire. I was upon my guard, and suspecting all he said, examined him so strictly where he had it before I would open it, that he was hugely confounded, and I confirmed that 'twas his. I laid it by and wished then they would have left us, that I might have taken notice on't to him. But I had forbid it them so strictly before, that they offered not to stir farther than to look out at [the] window, as not thinking there was any necessity of giving us their eyes as well as their ears; but he that saw himself discovered took that time to confess to me (in a whispering voice that I could hardly hear myself) that the letter (as my Lord Broghill says) was of great concern to him, and begged I would read it, and give him my answer. I took it up presently, as if I had meant it, but threw it, sealed as it was, into the fire, and told him (as softly as he had spoke to me) I thought that the quickest and best way of answering it.[6] He sat awhile in great disorder, without speaking a word, and so rose and took his leave. Now what think you, shall I ever hear of him more?

You do not thank me for using your rival so scurvily nor are not jealous of him, though your father thinks my intentions were not handsome towards you, which methinks is another argument that one is not to be one's own judge; for I am very confident they were, and with his favour shall never believe otherwise. I am sure I have no ends to serve of my own in what I did—it could be no advantage to me that had firmly resolved never to marry; but I thought it might be an injury to you to keep you in expectation of what was never likely to be, as I apprehended. Why do I enter into this wrangling discourse? Let your father think me what he pleases, if he ever comes to know me, the rest of my actions shall justify me in this; if he does not, I'll begin to practise upon him (what you have so often preached to me) to neglect the report of the world, and satisfy myself in my own innocency.

'Twill be pleasinger to you, I am sure, to tell you how fond I am of your lock. Well, in earnest now, and setting aside all compliment, I never saw finer hair, nor of a better colour; but cut no more on't, I would not have it spoiled for the world. If you love me, be careful on't. I am combing, and curling, and kissing this lock all day, and dreaming on't all night. The ring, too, is very well, only a little of the biggest. Send me a tortoise-shell one to keep it on, that is a little less than that I sent for a pattern. I would not have the rule absolutely true without exception that hard hairs are ill natured, for then I should be so. But I can allow that all soft hairs are good, and so are you, or I am deceived as much as you are if you think I do not love you enough. Tell me, my dearest, am I? You will not be if you think I am

---

[1] Cyrus Madelein de Scudery's Artamenes, or The Grand Cyrus, translated by F.G. in 1653.

[2] I am glad...your sister Temple delayed his departure to Ireland, in order to accompany his sister Martha.

[3] cabinet a case for the safe custody of jewels, or other valuables, letters, documents, etc. (OED cabinet sb I.5).

[4] servant James Osborne's suitor James Beverley of Bedfordshire.

[5] Mrs. Goldsmith the wife of Daniel Goldsmith, the rector of Campton, in which parish Chicksands was situated.

[6] presently without delay (OED presently adv 3).

Yours.

[MARCH 18, 1654]

How true it is that a misfortune never comes single; we live in expectation of some one happiness that we propose to ourselves, an age almost, and perhaps miss it at the last; but sad accidents have wings to overtake us, and come in flocks like ill-boding ravens. You were no sooner gone but (as if that had not been enough) I lost the best father in the world; and though, as to himself, it was an infinite mercy in God Almighty to take him out of a world that can be pleasing to none, and was made more uneasy to him by many infirmities that were upon him, yet to me it is an affliction much greater than people judge it. Besides all that is due to nature and the memory of many (more than ordinary) kindnesses received from him, besides what he was to all that knew him, and what he was to me in particular, I am left by his death in the condition (which of all others) is the most insupportable to my nature, to depend upon kindred that are not friends, and that, though I pay as much as I should do to a stranger, yet think they do me a courtesy.[1] I expect my eldest brother to-day; if he comes, I shall be able to tell you before I seal up this where you are likely to find me. If he offers me to stay here, this hole will be more agreeable to my humour than any place that is more in the world. I take it kindly that you used arts to conceal our story and satisfy my nice apprehensions, but I'll not impose that constraint upon you any longer, for I find my kind brother publishes it with more earnestness than ever I strove to conceal it;[2] and with more disadvantage than anybody else would. Now he has tried all ways to what he desires, and finds it is vain, he resolves to revenge himself upon me, by representing this action in such colours as will amaze all people that know me, and do not know him enough to discern his malice to me; he is not able to forbear showing it now, when my condition deserves pity from all the world, I think, and that he himself has newly lost a father, as well as I; but takes this time to torment me, which appears (at least to me) so barbarous a cruelty, that though I thank God I have charity enough perfectly to forgive all the injuries he can do me, yet I am afraid I shall never look upon him as a brother more. And now do you judge whether I am not very unhappy, and whether that sadness in my face you used to complain of was not suited to my fortune. You must confess it; and that my kindness for you is beyond example. All these troubles and persecutions that make me weary of the world before my time, cannot lessen the concernment I have for you, and instead of being persuaded, as they would have me, by their malicious stories, methinks I am obliged to love you more in recompense of all the injuries they have done you upon my score. I shall need nothing but my own heart to fortify me in this resolution, and desire nothing in return of it but that your care of yourself may answer that which I shall always have for your interests.

---

[1] though I pay…a courtesy Osborne probably paid for her board and lodging at Chicksands out of her private income.

[2] nice tender, delicate (OED nice a 4c).

I received your letter of the 10th of this month; and I hope this will find you at your journey's end. In earnest, I have pitied your sister extremely, and can easily apprehend how troublesome this voyage must needs be to her, by knowing what others have been to me; yet, pray assure her I would not scruple at undertaking it myself to gain such an acquaintance, and would go much farther than where (I hope) she now is to serve her. I am afraid she will not think me a fit person to choose for a friend, that cannot agree with my own brother; but I must trust you to tell my story for me, and will hope for a better character from you than he gives me; who, lest I should complain, resolves to prevent me, and possess my friends first that he is the injured party.[1] I never magnified my patience to you, but I begin to have a good opinion on't since this trial; yet, perhaps, I have no reason, and it may be as well a want of sense in me as of passion; however, you will not be displeased to know that I can endure all that he or anybody else can say, and that setting aside my father's death and your absence, I make nothing an affliction to me, though I am sorry, I confess, to see myself forced to keep such distances with one of his relations, because religion and nature and the custom of the world teaches otherwise. I see I shall not be able to satisfy you in this how I shall dispose of myself, for my brother is not come;[2] the next will certainly tell you. In the meantime, I expect with great impatience to hear of your safe arrival. 'Twas a disappointment that you missed those fair winds. I pleased myself extremely with a belief that they had made your voyage rather a diversion than a trouble, either to you or your company, but I hope your passage was as happy, if not as sudden as you expected it; let me hear often from you, and long letters. I do not count this so. Have no apprehensions for me, but all the care of yourself that you please. My melancholy has no danger in't; and I believe the accidents of my life would work more upon any other than they do upon me, whose humour is always more prepared for them than that of gayer persons. I hear nothing that is worth your knowing; when I do, you shall have it. Tell me if there be anything I can do for you, and assure yourself I am perfectly

Yours.

—1888 (1652–54)

---

[1] possess persuade, convince (OED possess v II.9b).

[2] in this in this letter.

John Bunyan

1628 – 1688

Born in the village of Elstow, near Bedford, the son of a brazier (tinker), Bunyan learned to read and write at the village school and was trained in his father's trade. During the civil wars he was drafted into the Parliamentary army and stationed at Newport Pagnell from 1644 to 1646–47, though it is doubtful if he saw much if any military action. In 1649 he married his first wife, the daughter of one of "the godly," who introduced Bunyan to the popular devotional manuals that would become his primary reading matter along with the Bible and John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (the Book of Martyrs). After the lengthy spiritual struggles depicted in Grace Abounding (1666), Bunyan joined the Separatist congregation in Bedford in 1655, and began to preach the following year. He soon began to publish on religious subjects, basing his early books on sermons and his public disputations with local Quakers, Anglicans, and Presbyterians; by the late 1650s, the congregation in Bedford was being described as "Bunyan's people." The Restoration saw the resurrection of laws against dissent, and in November 1660 Bunyan was arrested for preaching without a license and holding a "conventicle," a religious gathering outside the established Church. The penalty was three months' imprisonment; Bunyan, however, refused to give up preaching, and consequently remained in prison for the following twelve years, though he was allowed out occasionally to visit friends and family. Many of his subsequent books, including Grace Abounding and the first part of The Pilgrim's Progress (probably completed during a second period of imprisonment in 1676), were written while Bunyan was in jail. Released under the Declaration of Indulgence in 1672, Bunyan returned to the congregation at Bedford and continued to preach for the remainder of his days.

Bunyan published dozens of books, many of which went through numerous editions before the end of the seventeenth century. Early copies of his books tend to be rare, since they were read to pieces—many are extant in only a few copies. The publication of the first part of The Pilgrim's Progress in 1678 brought Bunyan a measure of fame: it was reprinted over twenty times before 1700 (including an American edition printed in Boston), and translated into several languages before Bunyan's death. A second part, relating the spiritual journey of Christian's wife Christiana and her children, was first published in 1684. Bunyan's other principal works are The Life and Death of Mr. Badman (1680) and The Holy War (1682); a collected Works was first published in 1692.

* * *

Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners

(excerpt)

In this my relation of the merciful working of God upon my soul, it will not be amiss, if in the first place, I do, in a few words, give you a hint of my pedigree, and manner of bringing up; that thereby the goodness and bounty of God towards me, may be the more advanced and magnified before the sons of men.

For my descent then, it was, as is well known by many, of a low and inconsiderable generation; my father's house being of that rank that is meanest, and most despised of all the families in the land.[1] Wherefore I have not here, as others, to boast of noble blood, or of a high-born state according to the flesh; though all things considered, I magnify the Heavenly Majesty, for that by this door he brought me into this world, to partake of the grace and life that is in Christ by the Gospel.

---

[1] Bunyan exaggerates the lowliness of his family's social position to display the Christian humility expected by readers of personal religious testaments. While his father was a tradesman, he was not itinerant, and the family owned a small freehold.

But yet notwithstanding the meanness and inconsiderableness of my parents, it pleased God to put it into their heart, to put me to school, to learn both to read and write; the which I also attained, according to the rate of other poor men's children, though to my shame I confess, I did soon lose that little I learned, even almost utterly, and that long before the Lord did work his gracious work of conversion upon my soul.

As for my own natural life, for the time that I was without God in the world, it was indeed according to the course of this world, and the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience: Eph. 2:2, 3 it was my delight to be taken captive by the Devil "at his will," II Tim. 2:6 being filled with all unrighteousness; the which did also so strongly work, and put forth itself, both in my heart and life, and that from a child, that I had but few equals (especially considering my years, which were tender, being few), both for cursing, swearing, lying and blaspheming the holy name of God.

Yea, so settled and rooted was I in these things, that they became as a second nature to me; the which, as I also have with soberness considered since, did so offend the Lord, that even in my childhood he did scare and affright me with fearful dreams, and did terrify me with dreadful visions. For often, after I had spent this and the other day in sin, I have in my bed been greatly afflicted, while asleep, with the apprehensions of Devils, and wicked spirits, who still, as I then thought, laboured to draw me away with them; of which I could never be rid.

Also I should at these years be greatly afflicted and troubled with the thoughts of the day of Judgment, and that both night and day, and should tremble at the thoughts of the fearful torments of Hell-fire; still fearing that it would be my lot to be found at last amongst those Devils and hellish fiends, who are there bound down with the chains and bonds of eternal darkness.

These things I say, when I was but a child, about nine or ten years old, did so distress my soul, that then in the midst of my many sports and childish vanities, amidst my vain companions, I was often much cast down and afflicted in my mind therewith, yet could I not let go my sins; yea, I was so overcome with despair of life and Heaven, that then I should often wish, either that there had been no Hell, or that I had been a Devil; supposing they were only tormentors; that if it must needs be, that I indeed went thither, I might be rather a tormentor, than tormented my self.

A while after, these terrible dreams did leave me, which also I soon forgot; for my pleasures did quickly cut off the remembrance of them, as if they had never been: wherefore, with more greediness, according to the strength of nature, I did still let loose the reins to my lusts, and delighted in all transgression against the law of God: so that until I came to the state of marriage, I was the very ringleader of all the youth that kept me company, into all manner of vice and ungodliness.

Yea, such prevalency had the lusts and fruits of the flesh, in this poor soul of mine, that had not a miracle of precious grace prevented, I had not only perished by the stroke of eternal justice, but had also laid my self open, even to the stroke of those laws, which bring some to disgrace and open shame before the face of the world.

In these days, the thoughts of religion was very grievous to me; I could neither endure it myself, nor that any other should; so that when I have but seen some read in those books that concerned Christian piety, it would be as it were a prison to me. Then I said unto God, "depart from me, for I desire not the knowledge of thy ways," Job 21:14, 15. I was now void of all good consideration; Heaven and

Hell were both out of sight and mind; and as for saving and damning, they were least in my thoughts. O Lord, thou knowest my life, and my ways were not hid from thee.

Yet this I well remember, that though I could myself sin with the greatest delight and ease, and also take pleasure in the vileness of my companions; yet even then, if I have at any time seen wicked things by those who professed goodness, it would make my spirit tremble. As once above all the rest, when I was in my height of vanity, yet hearing one to swear that was reckoned for a religious man, it had so great a stroke upon my spirit, as it made my heart to ache.

But God did not utterly leave me, but followed me still, not now with convictions, but judgements, yet such as were mixed with mercy. For once I fell into a crick of the sea, and hardly escaped drowning: another time I fell out of a boat into Bedford River, but mercy yet preserved me alive: Besides, another time being in the field, with one of my companions, it chanced that an adder passed over the highway, so I having a stick in mine hand, struck her over the back; and having astounded her, I forced open her mouth with my stick, and plucked her sting out with my fingers, by which act had not God been merciful to me, I might by my desperateness have brought myself to mine end.

This also have I taken notice of with thanksgiving; when I was a soldier,[1] I with others were drawn out to go to such a place to besiege it; but when I was just ready to go, one of the company desired to go in my room, to which, when I had consented he took my place; and coming to the siege, as he stood sentinel, he was shot into the head with a musket bullet and died.

Here, as I said, were judgements and mercy, but neither of them did awaken my soul to righteousness, wherefore I sinned still, and grew more and more rebellious against God, and careless of mine own salvation.

Presently after this, I changed my condition into a married state, and my mercy was, to light upon a wife whose father was counted godly: this woman and I, though we came together as poor as poor might be (not having so much household stuff as a dish or spoon betwixt us both), yet this she had for her part, The Plain Man's Path-way to Heaven, and The Practice of Piety,[2] which her father had left her when he died. In these two books I should sometimes read with her, wherein I also found some things that were somewhat pleasing to me (but all this while I met with no conviction). She also would be often telling of me what a godly man her father was, and how he would reprove and correct vice, both in his house, and amongst his neighbours; what a strict and holy life he lived in his day, both in word and deed.

Wherefore these books, with this relation, though they did not reach my heart to awaken it about my sad and sinful state, yet they did beget within me some desires to religion: so that, because I knew no better, I fell in very eagerly with the religion of the times,[3] to wit, to go to church twice a day, and that too with the foremost, and there should very devoutly both say and sing as others did; yet retaining my wicked life: but withal, I was so overrun with the spirit of superstition, that I adored, and that with great devotion, even all things (both the high place, priest, clerk, vestments, service, and what else), belonging to the church; counting all things holy that were therein contained; and especially the priest and clerk most happy, and without doubt greatly blessed, because they were the servants, as I then thought, of God, and were principal in the holy temple, to do his work therein.

---

[1] Bunyan served in the Parliamentary army, though it is doubtful if he saw much, if any, military action.

[2] frequently reprinted works of popular devotion by Arthur Dent (first published 1601) and Lewis Bayley (first published before 1612) respectively.

[3] Though Bunyan's emphasis on ritual appears to refer to Anglican services, he is writing of a time (the late 1640s and early 1650s) when the Presbyterians controlled the national church.

This conceit grew so strong in little time upon my spirit, that had I but seen a priest (though never so sordid and debauched in his life), I should find my spirit fall under him, reverence him, and knit unto him; yea, I thought for the love I did bear unto them (supposing they were the Ministers of God), I could have lain down at their feet, and have been trampled upon by them; their name, their garb, and work, did so intoxicate and bewitch me.

After I had been thus for some considerable time, another thought came into my mind, and that was, Whether we were of the Israelites, or no: for finding in the Scriptures that they were once the peculiar People of God, thought I, if I were one of this race, my soul must needs be happy. Now again I found within me a great longing to be resolved about this question, but could not tell how I should: at last, I asked my father of it, who told me, "No, we were not": wherefore then I fell in my spirit, as to the hopes of that, and so remained.

But all this while, I was not sensible of the danger and evil of sin; I was kept from considering that sin would damn me, what religion soever I followed, unless I was found in Christ: nay, I never thought of him, nor whether there was one or no. Thus man, while blind, doth wander, but wearieth himself with vanity: for he knoweth not the way to the City of God, Eccles. 10:15.

But one day (amongst all the sermons our parson made), his subject was, to treat of the Sabbath day, and of the evil of breaking that, either with labour, sports, or otherwise (now I was, notwithstanding my religion, one that took much delight in all manner of vice, and especially that was the day that I did solace my self therewith). Wherefore I fell in my conscience under his sermon, thinking and believing that he made that sermon on purpose to show me my evil doing; and at that time I felt what guilt was, though never before, that I can remember; but then I was for the present greatly loaded therewith, and so went home when the sermon was ended, with a great burden upon my spirit.

This, for that instant, did benumb the sinews of my best delights, and did embitter my former pleasures to me: but behold, it lasted not; for before I had well dined, the trouble began to go off my mind, and my heart returned to its old course: but oh how glad was I, that this trouble was gone from me, and that the fire was put out, that I might sin again without control! Wherefore, when I had satisfied nature with my food, I shook the sermon out of my mind, and to my old custom of sports and gaming I returned with great delight.

But the same day, as I was in the midst of a game at cat,[1] and having struck it one blow from the hole; just as I was about to strike it the second time, a voice did suddenly dart from Heaven into my soul, which said, "Wilt thou leave thy sins, and go to Heaven? or have thy sins, and go to Hell?" At that I was put to an exceeding maze; wherefore, leaving my cat upon the ground, I looked up to Heaven, and was as if I had with the eyes of my understanding, seen the Lord Jesus looking down upon me, as being very hotly displeased with me, and as if he did severely threaten me with some grievous punishment for these, and other my ungodly practices.

I had no sooner thus conceived in my mind, but suddenly this conclusion was fastened on my spirit (for the former hint did set my sins again before my face), That I had been a great and grievous sinner, and that it was now too late for me to look after Heaven; for Christ would not forgive me, nor pardon

---

[1] game at cat also called tip-cat. Played with a cudgel and a wooden cylinder (the cat) tapering to a point at both ends; the cat was tipped into the air and then hit, with points scored for correctly estimating the distance it would go. The hole is the place on the ground where the cat was laid (OED tip-cat 2).

my transgressions. Then I fell to musing upon this also; and while I was thinking on it, and fearing lest it should be so, I felt my heart sink in despair, concluding it was too late; and therefore I resolved in my mind I would go on in sin: for thought I, if the case be thus, my state is surely miserable; miserable if I leave my sins; and but miserable if I follow them: I can but be damned; and if I must be so, I had as good be damned for many sins, as be damned for few.

Thus I stood in the midst of my play, before all that then were present; but yet I told them nothing: but, I say, I having made this conclusion, I returned desperately to my sport again; and I well remember, that presently this kind of despair did so possess my soul, that I was persuaded I could never attain to other comfort than what I should get in sin; for Heaven was gone already, so that on that I must not think: wherefore I found within me a great desire to take my fill of sin, still studying what sin was set to be committed, that I might taste the sweetness of it; and I made as much haste as I could to fill my belly with its delicates, lest I should die before I had my desire; for that I feared greatly. In these things, I protest before God, I lie not, neither do I feign this sort of speech: these were really, strongly, and with all my heart, my desires; the good Lord, whose mercy is unsearchable, forgive me my transgressions.

(And I am very confident, that this temptation of the Devil is more than usual amongst poor creatures than many are aware of, even to over-run their spirits with a scurvy and seared frame of heart, and benumbing of conscience: which frame, he stilly and slyly supplieth with such despair, that though not much guilt attendeth the soul, yet they continually have a secret conclusion within them, that there is no hopes for them; "for they have loved sins, therefore after them they will go," Jer. 2:25 & 18:12).

Now therefore I went on in sin with great greediness of mind, still grudging that I could not be so satisfied with it as I would: this did continue with me about a month, or more. But one day, as I was standing at a neighbour's shop window, and there cursing and swearing, and playing the madman, after my wonted manner, there sat within the woman of the house, and heard me; who, though she was a very loose and ungodly wretch, yet protested that I swore and cursed at that most fearful rate, that she was made to tremble to hear me; and told me further, "That I was the ungodliest fellow for swearing that ever she heard in all her life; and that I, by thus doing, was able to spoil all the youth in a whole town, if they came but in my company."

At this reproof I was silenced, and put to secret shame; and that too, as I thought, before the God of Heaven: wherefore, while I stood there, and hanging down my head, I wished with all my heart that I might be a little child again, that my father might learn me to speak without this wicked way of swearing: for, thought I, I am so accustomed to it, that it is but in vain for me to think of a reformation, for I thought it could never be.

But how it came to pass I know not, I did from this time forward so leave my swearing, that it was a great wonder to myself to observe it; and whereas before I knew not how to speak unless I put an oath before, and another behind, to make my words have authority, now, I could, without it, speak better, and with more pleasantness then ever I could before: all this while I knew not Jesus Christ, neither did I leave my sports and play.

But quickly after this, I fell in company with one poor man that made profession of religion; who, as I then thought, did talk pleasantly of the Scriptures, and of the matters of religion: wherefore falling into some love and liking to what he said, I betook me to my Bible, and began to take great pleasure in reading, but especially with the historical part thereof: for, as for Paul's Epistles, and Scriptures of that nature, I could not away with them, being as yet but ignorant either of the corruptions of my nature, or of the want and worth of Jesus Christ to save me.

Wherefore I fell to some outward reformation, both in my words and life, and did set the Commandments before me for my way to Heaven: which Commandments I also did strive to keep; and, as I thought, did keep them pretty well sometimes, and then I should have comfort; yet now and then should break one, and so afflict my conscience; but then I should repent, and say I was sorry for it, and promise God to do better next time, and there get help again, for then I thought I pleased God as well as any man in England.

Thus I continued about a year, all which time our neighbours did take me to be a very godly man, a new and religious man, and did marvel much to see such a great and famous alteration in my life and manners; and indeed so it was, though yet I knew not Christ, nor grace, nor faith, nor hope; and truly as I have well seen since, had I then died, my state had been most fearful: well, this I say, continued about a twelve-month, or more.

But, I say, my neighbours were amazed at this my great conversion, from prodigious profaneness, to something like a moral life; and, truly, so they well might; for this my conversion was as great, as for Tom of Bethlem to become a sober man.[1] Now, therefore, they began to praise, to commend, and to speak well of me, both to my face, and behind my back. Now, I was, as they said, become godly; now, I was become a right honest man. But Oh! when I understood that these were their words and opinions of me, it pleased me mighty well: For though, as yet, I was nothing but a poor painted hypocrite, yet I loved to be talked of as one that was truly godly. I was proud of my godliness; and, I did all I did, either to be seen of, or to be well spoken of, by men: well, this I say, continued for about a twelve-month or more.

Now you must know, that before this I had taken much delight in ringing,[2] but my conscience beginning to be tender, I thought that such a practice was but vain, and therefore forced myself to leave it, yet my mind hankered, wherefore I should go to the steeple house, and look on: though I durst not ring. But I thought this did not become religion neither, yet I forced myself and would look on still; but quickly after, I began to think, how, if one of the bells should fall: then I chose to stand under a main beam that lay over thwart the steeple from side to side, thinking there I might stand sure: But then I should think again, should the bell fall with a swing, it might first hit the wall, and then rebounding upon me, might kill me for all this beam; this made me stand in the steeple door, and now thought I, I am safe enough, for if a bell should then fall, I can slip out behind these thick walls, and so be preserved notwithstanding.

So after this, I would yet go to see them ring, but would not go further than the steeple door; but then it came into my head, how if the steeple itself should fall, and this thought (it may fall for ought I know), would when I stood and looked on, continually so shake my mind, that I durst not stand at the steeple door any longer, but was forced to fly, for fear it should fall upon my head.

Another thing was my dancing, I was a full year before I could quite leave it; but all this while, when I thought I kept this or that Commandment, or did by word or deed anything that I thought were good, I had great peace in my conscience, and should think with myself, God cannot choose but be now pleased with me, yea, to relate it in mine own way, I thought no man in England could please God better than I.

---

[1] Tom of Bethlem a generic name for a madman, derived from Bethlehem (often corrupted to Bedlam) Hospital outside London, where the insane were kept.

[2] ringing bell-ringing, a popular pastime requiring a team of ringers; Bunyan's church in Elstow had five tuned bells.

But poor wretch as I was, I was all this while ignorant of Jesus Christ, and going about to establish my own righteousness, had perished therein, had not God in mercy showed me more of my state by nature.

But upon a day, the good providence of God did cast me to Bedford,[1] to work on my calling; and in one of the streets of that town, I came where there was three or four poor women sitting at a door in the sun, and talking about the things of God; and being now willing to hear them discourse, I drew near to hear what they said; for I was now a brisk talker also myself in the matters of religion; but now I may say, "I heard, but I understood not"; for they were far above out of my reach, for their talk was about a new birth, the work of God on their hearts, also how they were convinced of their miserable state by nature: they talked how God had visited their souls with his love in the Lord Jesus, and with what words and promises they had been refreshed, comforted, and supported against the temptations of the Devil; moreover, they reasoned of the suggestions and temptations of Satan in particular, and told to each other by which they had been afflicted, and how they were borne up under his assaults: they also discoursed of their own wretchedness of heart, of their unbelief, and did contemn, slight, and abhor their own righteousness, as filthy, and insufficient to do them any good.

And me thought they spake as if joy did make them speak: they spake with such pleasantness of Scripture language, and with such appearance of grace in all they said, that they were to me as if they had found a new world, as if they were people that dwelt alone, and were not to be reckoned among their neighbours, Num. 23:9.

At this I felt my own heart began to shake, as mistrusting my condition to be naught; for I saw that in all my thoughts about religion and salvation, the new birth did never enter into my mind, neither knew I the comfort of the word and promise, nor the deceitfulness and treachery of my own wicked heart. As for secret thoughts, I took no notice of them; neither did I understand what Satan's temptations were, nor how they were to be withstood and resisted, &c.

Thus therefore when I had heard and considered what they said, I left them, and went about my employment again: but their talk and discourse went with me, also my heart would tarry with them, for I was greatly affected with their words, both because by them I was convinced that I wanted the true tokens of a truly godly man, and also because by them I was convinced of the happy and blessed condition of him that was such a one.

—1666

The Pilgrim's Progress
(excerpt)

CHRISTIAN AND FAITHFUL VISIT VANITY FAIR

Then I saw in my dream, that when they were got out of the wilderness, they presently saw a town before them, and the name of that town is Vanity; and at the town there is a fair kept called Vanity Fair:[2] It is kept all the year long, it beareth the name of Vanity Fair, because the town where 'tis kept, is lighter than vanity; and also, because all that is there sold, or that cometh thither, is vanity. As is the saying of the wise, "All that cometh is vanity."[3]

This fair is no new erected business, but a thing of ancient standing; I will show you the original of it.

Almost five thousand years agone, there were pilgrims walking to the celestial city, as these two honest persons are; and Beelzebub, Apollyon, and Legion, with their companions, perceiving by the path that the pilgrims made, that their way to the city lay through this town of Vanity, they contrived here to set up a fair; a fair wherein should be sold of all sorts of vanity, and that it should last all the year long. Therefore at this fair are all such merchandise sold, as houses, lands, trades, places, honours, preferments, titles, countries, kingdoms, lusts, pleasures, and delights of all sorts, as whores, bawds, wives, husbands, children, masters, servants, lives, blood, bodies, souls, silver, gold, pearls, precious stones, and what not.

---

[1] Bunyan moved to Bedford in 1655 and joined the Separatist congregation there; he began to preach in 1656.

[2] Bunyan's Vanity Fair is probably modeled in some details on the great annual fair held at Stourbridge, near Cambridge, which had its own court to try offences committed in the fair.

[3] Bunyan cites Isaiah 40:17 and Ecclesiastes 1:2, 11, 17.

And moreover, at this fair there is at all times to be seen jugglings, cheats, games, plays, fools, apes, knaves, and rogues, and that of all sorts.

Here are to be seen too, and that for nothing, thefts, murders, adulteries, false swearers, and that of a blood-red colour.

And as in other fairs of less moment, there are the several rows and streets under their proper names, where such and such wares are vended, so here likewise, you have the proper places, rows, streets (viz. countries, and kingdoms), where the wares of this fair are soonest to be found: Here is the Britain row, the French row, the Italian row, the Spanish row, the German row, where several sorts of vanities are to be sold. But as in other fairs, some one commodity is as the chief of all the fair, so the ware of Rome and her merchandise is greatly promoted in this fair.[1] Only our English nation, with some others, have taken a dislike thereat.

Now, as I said, the way to the celestial city lies just through this town, where this lusty fair is kept; and he that will go to the city, and yet not go through this town, must needs go out of the world. The prince of princes himself, when here, went through this town to his own country, and that upon a Fair-day too: Yea, and as I think it was Beelzebub, the chief Lord of this fair, that invited him to buy of his vanities; yea, would have made him Lord of the fair, would he but have done him reverence as he went through the town. Yea, because he was such a person of honour, Beelzebub had him from street to street, and showed him all the kingdoms of the world in a little time, that he might if possible allure that blessed one, to cheapen and buy some of his vanities. But he had no mind to the merchandise, and therefore left the town; without laying out so much as one farthing upon these vanities. This fair therefore is an ancient thing, of long standing, and a very great fair.

Now these pilgrims, as I said, must needs go through this fair: Well, so they did; but behold, even as they entered into the fair, all the people in the fair were moved, and the town itself as it were in a hubbub about them; and that for several reasons: For,

First, the pilgrims were clothed with such kind of raiment, as was diverse from the raiment of any that traded in that fair. The people therefore of the fair made a great gazing upon them: Some said they were fools, some they were bedlams, and some they were outlandish men.[2]

Secondly, and as they wondered at their apparel, so they did likewise at their speech; for few could understand what they said; they naturally spoke the language of Canaan; but they that kept the fair, were the men of this world: so that from one end of the fair to the other, they seemed barbarians each to the other.

Thirdly, but that which did not a little amuse the merchandisers,[3] was, that these pilgrims set very light by all their wares, they cared not so much as to look upon them: and if they called upon them to buy, they would put their fingers in their ears, and cry, "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity";[1] and look upwards, signifying that their trade and traffic was in Heaven.

---

[1] ware of Rome Roman Catholic doctrines and rites.

[2] outlandish men foreigners.

[3] amuse amaze, bewilder (OED amuse v 2).

One chanced mockingly, beholding the carriages of the men, to say unto them, What will ye buy? but they, looking gravely upon him, said, "We buy the truth."[2] At that, there was an occasion taken to despise the men the more; some mocking, some taunting, some speaking reproachfully, and some calling upon others to smite them. At last things came to an hubbub, and great stir in the fair; insomuch that all order was confounded. Now was word presently brought to the great one of the fair, who quickly came down, and deputed some of his most trusty friends to take these men into examination, about whom the fair was almost overturned. So the men were brought to examination; and they that sat upon them, asked them whence they came, whither they went, and what they did there in such an unusual garb? The men told them, that they were pilgrims and strangers in the world, and that they were going to their own country, which was the heavenly Jerusalem; and that they had given none occasion to the men of the town, nor yet to the merchandisers, thus to abuse them, and to let them in their journey,[3] except it was, for that, when one asked them what they would buy, they said, they would buy the truth. But they that were appointed to examine them, did not believe them to be any other then bedlams and mad, or else such as came to put all things into a confusion in the fair. Therefore they took them, and beat them, and besmeared them with dirt, and then put them into the cage, that they might be made a spectacle to all the men of the fair. There therefore they lay for some time, and were made the objects of any man's sport, or malice, or revenge, the great one of the fair laughing still at all that befell them. But the men being patient, and not rendering railing for railing, but contrariwise blessing, and giving good words for bad, and kindness for injuries done: Some men in the fair that were more observing, and less prejudiced than the rest, began to check and blame the baser sort for their continual abuses done by them to the men: They therefore in angry manner let fly at them again, counting them as bad as the men in the cage, and telling them that they seemed confederates, and should be made partakers of their misfortunes. The other replied, that for ought they could see, the men were quiet, and sober, and intended nobody any harm; and that there were many that traded in their fair, that were more worthy to be put into the cage, yea, and pillory too, than were the men that they had abused. Thus, after divers words had passed on both sides (the men behaving themselves all the while very wisely, and soberly before them), they fell to some blows, among themselves, and did harm one to another. Then were these two poor men brought before their examiners again, and there charged as being guilty of the late hubbub that had been in the fair. So they beat them pitifully, and hanged irons upon them, and led them in chains up and down the fair, for an example and a terror to others, lest any should further speak in their behalf, or join themselves unto them. But Christian and Faithful behaved themselves yet more wisely, and received the ignominy and shame that was cast upon them, with so much meekness and patience, that it won to their side (though but few in comparison of the rest) several of the men in the fair. This put the other party yet into a greater rage, insomuch that they concluded the death of these two men. Wherefore they threatened that neither the cage, nor irons, should serve their turn, but that they should die, for the abuse they had done, and for deluding the men of the fair.

---

[1] Psalm 119:37.

[2] Proverbs 23:23.

[3] let hinder.

Then were they remanded to the cage again, until further order should be taken with them. So they put them in, and made their feet fast in the stocks.

Here also they called again to mind what they had heard from their faithful friend Evangelist, and were the more confirmed in their way and sufferings, by what he told them would happen to them.[1] They also now comforted each other, that whose lot it was to suffer, even he should have the best on't; therefore each man secretly wished that he might have that preferment: but committing themselves to the all-wise dispose of him that ruleth all things, with much content they abode in the condition in which they were, until they should be otherwise disposed of.

Then a convenient time being appointed, they brought them forth to their trial in order to their condemnation. When the time was come, they were brought before their enemies and arraigned; the Judge's name was Lord Hategood.[2] Their indictment was one and the same in substance, though somewhat varying in form; the contents whereof was this:

"That they were enemies to, and disturbers of their trade; that they had made commotions and divisions in the town, and had won a party to their own most dangerous opinions, in contempt of the law of their Prince."[3]

Then Faithful began to answer, That he had only set himself against that which had set itself against him that is higher than the highest. And, said he, As for disturbance, I make none, being myself a man of peace; the party that were won to us, were won, by beholding our truth and innocence, and they are only turned from the worse to the better. And as to the King you talk of; since he is Beelzebub, the enemy of our Lord, I defy him and all his angels.

Then proclamation was made, that they that had ought to say for the Lord the King against the prisoner at the bar, should forthwith appear, and give in their evidence. So there came in three witnesses, to wit, Envy, Superstition, and Pickthank.[4] They were then asked, If they knew the prisoner at the bar? and what they had to say for their Lord the King against him?

Then stood forth Envy, and said to this effect; My Lord, I have known this man a long time, and will attest upon my oath before this honourable bench, that he is—

Judge. Hold, give him his oath: So they sware him. Then he said, My Lord, this man, notwithstanding his plausible name, is one of the vilest men in our country; he neither regardeth Prince nor people, law nor custom; but doth all that he can to possess all men with certain of his disloyal notions, which he in the general calls principles of faith and holiness. And in particular, I heard him once myself affirm, "That Christianity, and the customs of our town of Vanity, were diametrically opposite, and could not be reconciled." By which saying, my Lord, he doth at once, not only condemn all our laudable doings, but us in the doing of them.

Judge. Then did the Judge say to him, Hast thou any more to say?

Envy. My Lord, I could say much more, only I would not be tedious to the court. Yet if need be, when the other gentlemen have given in their evidence, rather than anything shall be wanting that will dispatch him, I will enlarge my testimony against him. So he was bid stand by. Then they called Superstition, and bid him look upon the prisoner; they also asked, What he could say for their Lord the King against him? Then they sware him, so he began.

---

[1] Evangelist had told Faithful and Christian that in Vanity Fair they would "be hardly beset with enemies who will strain hard but they will kill you; and be sure that one or both of you must seal the testimony which you hold, with blood: but be faithful unto death, and the King will give you a crown of life. He that shall die there, although his death will be unnatural, and his pain perhaps great, he will yet have the better of his fellow; not only because he will be arrived at the Celestial City soonest, but because he will escape many miseries that the other will meet with in the rest of his journey."

[2] a character probably based on the Lord Chief Justice George Jeffreys (1648–89), who was notoriously harsh in his treatment of Dissenters.

[3] Throughout the trial, Bunyan observes the formulas and procedures of contemporary English legal practice.

[4] Pickthank flatterer.

Superstition. My Lord, I have no great acquaintance with this man, nor do I desire to have further knowledge of him; however this I know, that he is a very pestilent fellow, from some discourse that the other day I had with him in this town; for then talking with him, I heard him say, "That our religion was naught, and such by which a man could by no means please God": which sayings of his, my Lord, your Lordship very well knows, what necessarily thence will follow, to wit, That we still do worship in vain, are yet in our sins, and finally shall be damned; and this is that which I have to say.

Then was Pickthank sworn, and bid say what he knew, in behalf of their Lord the King against the prisoner at the bar.

Pickthank. My Lord, and you gentlemen all, This fellow I have known of a long time, and have heard him speak things that ought not to be spoke. For he hath railed on our noble Prince Beelzebub, and hath spoke contemptibly of his honourable friends, whose names are the Lord Old Man, the Lord Carnal Delight, the Lord Luxurious, the Lord Desire of Vain-glory, my old Lord Lechery, Sir Having Greedy, with all the rest of our nobility; and he hath said moreover, that if all men were of his mind, if possible, there is not one of these noblemen should have any longer a being in this town. Besides, he hath not been afraid to rail on you, my Lord, who are now appointed to be his Judge, calling you an ungodly villain, with many other such like vilifying terms, with which he hath bespattered most of the gentry of our town. When this Pickthank had told his tale, the Judge directed his speech to the prisoner at the bar, saying, Thou runagate, heretic, and traitor, hast thou heard what these honest gentlemen have witnessed against thee.

Faithful. May I speak a few words in my own defence?

Judge. Sirrah, sirrah, thou deservest to live no longer, but to be slain immediately upon the place; yet that all men may see our gentleness towards thee, let us hear what thou hast to say.

Faithful. 1. I say then in answer to what Mr. Envy hath spoken, I never said ought but this, "That what rule, or laws, or custom, or people, were flat against the word of God, are diametrically opposite to Christianity." If I have said amiss in this, convince me of my error, and I am ready here before you to make my recantation.

2. As to the second, to wit, Mr. Superstition, and his charge against me, I said only this, "That in the worship of God there is required a divine faith; but there can be no divine faith, without a divine revelation of the will of God: therefore whatever is thrust into the worship of God, that is not agreeable to divine revelation, cannot be done but by an humane faith, which faith will not profit to eternal life."

3. As to what Mr. Pickthank hath said, I say (avoiding terms, as that I am said to rail, and the like), "That the Prince of this town, with all the rabblement his attendants, by this gentleman named, are more fit for a being in Hell, than in this town and country"; And so the Lord have mercy upon me.

Then the Judge called to the jury (who all this while stood by, to hear and observe), "Gentlemen of the jury, you see this man about whom so great an uproar hath been made in this town: you have also heard what these worthy gentlemen have witnessed against him; also you have heard his reply and confession: It lieth now in your breasts to hang him, or save his life. But yet I think meet to instruct you into our law.

"There was an act made in the days of Pharaoh the Great, servant to our Prince, That lest those of a contrary religion should multiply and grow too strong for him, their males should be thrown into the river. There was also an act made in the days of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, another of his servants, That whoever would not fall down and worship his golden image, should be thrown into a fiery furnace. There was also an act made in the days of Darius, That who so, for some time, called upon any God but his, should be cast into the lion's den. Now the substance of these laws this rebel has broken, not only in thought (which is not to be borne), but also in word and deed; which must therefore needs be intolerable.

"For that of Pharaoh, his law was made upon a supposition, to prevent mischief, no crime being yet apparent; but here is a crime apparent. For the second and third, you see he disputeth against our religion; and for the treason he hath confessed, he deserveth to die the death."

Then went the jury out, whose names were Mr. Blind-man, Mr. No-good, Mr. Malice, Mr. Love-lust, Mr. Live-loose, Mr. Heady, Mr. High-mind, Mr. Enmity, Mr. Liar, Mr. Cruelty, Mr. Hate-light, and Mr. Implacable, who everyone gave in his private verdict against him among themselves, and afterwards unanimously concluded to bring him in guilty before the Judge. And first Mr. Blind-man, the foreman, said, "I see clearly that this man is an heretic." Then said Mr. No-good, "Away with such a fellow from the earth." "Ay," said Mr. Malice, "for I hate the very looks of him." Then said Mr. Love-lust, "I could never endure him." "Nor I," said Mr. Live-loose, "for he would always be condemning my way." "Hang him, hang him," said Mr. Heady. "A sorry scrub," said Mr. High-mind. "My heart riseth against him," said Mr. Enmity. "He is a rogue," said Mr. Liar. "Hanging is too good for him," said Mr. Cruelty. "Let's dispatch him out of the way," said Mr. Hate-light. Then said Mr. Implacable, "Might I have all the world given me, I could not be reconciled to him, therefore let us forthwith bring him in guilty of death": And so they did, therefore he was presently condemned, To be had from the place where he was, to the place from whence he came, and there to be put to the most cruel death that could be invented.

They therefore brought him out, to do with him according to their law; and first they scourged him, then they buffeted him, then they lanced his flesh with knives; after that they stoned him with stones, then pricked him with their swords, and last of all they burned him to ashes at the stake.[1] Thus came Faithful to his end. Now, I saw that there stood behind the multitude, a chariot and a couple of horses, waiting for Faithful, who (so soon as his adversaries had dispatched him) was taken up into it,[2] and straightway was carried up through the clouds, with sound of trumpet, the nearest way to the celestial gate. But as for Christian, he had some respite, and was remanded back to prison; so he there remained for a space: But he that over-rules all things, having the power of their rage in his own hand, so wrought it about, that Christian for that time escaped them, and went his way.

And as he went he sang:

Well Faithful, thou hast faithfully profest
Unto thy Lord: with him thou shalt be blest;
When Faithless ones, with all their vain
delights,
Are crying out under their hellish plights.
Sing, Faithful, sing; and let thy name survive;
For though they kill'd thee, thou art yet alive.

—1678

---

[1] Bunyan draws on the descriptions of Protestant martyrdoms in John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (often known as the Book of Martyrs), first published in 1563 and frequently reprinted in increasingly expanded editions.

[2] like Elijah, in II Kings 2:11.

King Charles II

1630 – 1685

In February 1660, General George Monck marched his army from Scotland to London and forced the recall of the members of Parliament expelled in Pride's Purge (1648). The augmented House voted to dissolve the Long Parliament, and in March a Convention Parliament was elected in which the republicans were routed. The final obstacle to the restoration of the monarchy was removed in April, when Charles issued a declaration from Breda, his residence in southwestern Netherlands, in which he promised a general pardon to those who had acted against the crown in the previous twenty years (with exceptions to be named), liberty of conscience in religion (where it "did not disturb the peace of the kingdom"), and the determination of all disputed matters (such as the sale of Royalist lands) in Parliament. The Earl of Clarendon, who had helped write the text, believed that the Declaration of Breda "by God's inspiration had been the sole visible motive to that wonderful change that had ensued." All clauses were subject to ratification by Parliament. The sale of Royalist lands was eventually confirmed, and the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion (1660) gave legislative effect to the promised general amnesty, with the exception of fifty named individuals (thirteen regicides were eventually executed). The promise of religious toleration, however, was to prove unacceptable to the "Cavalier" Parliament, which passed instead an Act of Uniformity (1662) that led to the resignation of a large number of dissenting clergy.

* * *

The Declaration of Breda

Charles R.

Charles, by the grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all our loving subjects, of what degree or quality soever, greeting.

If the general distraction and confusion which is spread over the whole kingdom doth not awaken all men to a desire and longing that those wounds which have so many years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all we can say will be to no purpose; however, after this long silence, we have thought it our duty to declare how much we desire to contribute thereunto; and that as we can never give over the hope, in good time, to obtain the possession of that right which God and nature hath made our due, so we do make it our daily suit to the Divine Providence, that He will, in compassion to us and our subjects, after so long misery and sufferings, remit and put us into a quiet and peaceable possession of that our right, with as little blood and damage to our people as is possible; nor do we desire more to enjoy what is ours, than that all our subjects may enjoy what by law is theirs, by a full and entire administration of justice throughout the land, and by extending our mercy where it is wanted and deserved.

And to the end that the fear of punishment may not engage any, conscious to themselves of what is past, to a perseverance in guilt for the future, by opposing the quiet and happiness of their country, in the restoration of King, Peers and people to their just, ancient and fundamental rights, we do, by these presents, declare, that we do grant a free and general pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to pass under our Great Seal of England, to all our subjects, of what degree or quality soever, who, within forty days after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall, by any public act, declare their doing so, and that they return to the loyalty and obedience of good subjects; excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament, those only to be excepted. Let all our subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the word of a King, solemnly given by this present declaration, that no crime whatsoever, committed against us or our royal father before the publication of this, shall ever rise in judgment, or be brought in question, against any of them, to the least endamagement of them, either in their lives, liberties or estates, or (as far forth as lies in our power) so much as to the prejudice of their reputations, by any reproach or term of distinction from the rest of our best subjects; we desiring and ordaining that henceforth all notes of discord, separation and difference of parties be utterly abolished among all our subjects, whom we invite and conjure to a perfect union among themselves, under our protection, for the re-settlement of our just rights and theirs in a free Parliament, by which, upon the word of a King, we will be advised.

And because the passion and uncharitableness of the times have produced several opinions in religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animosities against each other (which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of conversation, will be composed or better understood), we do declare a liberty to tender consciences, and that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matter of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom; and that we shall be ready to consent to such an Act of Parliament, as, upon mature deliberation, shall be offered to us, for the full granting that indulgence.

And because, in the continued distractions of so many years, and so many and great revolutions, many grants and purchases of estates have been made to and by many officers, soldiers and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to actions at law upon several titles, we are likewise willing that all such differences, and all things relating to such grants, sales and purchases, shall be determined in Parliament, which can best provide for the just satisfaction of all men who are concerned.

And we do further declare, that we will be ready to consent to any Act or Acts of Parliament to the purposes aforesaid, and for the full satisfaction of all arrears due to the officers and soldiers of the army under the command of General Monck; and that they shall be received into our service upon as good pay and conditions as they now enjoy.

Given under our Sign Manual and Privy Signet,
at our Court at Breda, this 14 day of April, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.[1]

—1660

---

[1] The reign is dated from the execution of Charles I in January 1649.

John Dryden

1631 – 1700

John Dryden was born in Northamptonshire of a Puritan family. He was a King's Scholar at Westminster School from 1644–1650 and then went up to Trinity College, Cambridge. Thomas Hill, a Presbyterian graduate of Emmanuel College, Cambridge (notable for its Puritan tendencies) was the preacher at the local church during Dryden's boyhood, became a regular preacher at Westminster Abbey while Dryden was at the school, and became Master of Trinity College while Dryden was an undergraduate there. Dryden's "lifelong distrust of the clergy" has been ascribed to his long acquaintance with this earnest and long-winded preacher, and his views on church and state to the influence of Richard Busby, who was Headmaster of Westminster from 1638 until 1695. The fact that Busby, a Royalist and Laudian Anglican, was allowed to keep his place after the Royalist defeat, might be taken as evidence of his relative unimportance; in fact as Headmaster of the most important school in England, he was a prominent figure. Dryden's earliest publication, "Upon the death of the Lord Hastings," is an extravagantly baroque poem, demonstrating Dryden's acquaintance with the aesthetic of Charles I's court. However, families like Dryden's benefited from the so-called "retreat from revolution" which followed the execution of Charles I, that is from the defence of private property and the opposition to the extension of democracy. When Cromwell became Lord Protector in 1653, Dryden's kinsman Sir Gilbert Pickering was appointed to the Council of State and Dryden seems to have been given government employment, though just what he did remains obscure. He walked in Cromwell's funeral procession with Milton and Marvell. The "Heroic Stanzas" consecrated to the memory of Cromwell (1659) suggest that Dryden no more foresaw the return of monarchy than did most of his contemporaries. When the Restoration did occur, however, he foresaw, and positioned himself to take advantage of the fact, that it was likely to bring about increased patronage for the arts, and that stage plays would become popular. He became the leading dramatist and political satirist of the Restoration period, but recognized Milton's pre-eminence in classical epic. His non-dramatic verse takes the public sphere for its themes, and two important poems, Religio Laici and The Hind and the Panther, set forth his position as an Anglican and as a convert to Roman Catholicism. His religious views are consonant with a lifelong dislike of the kind of religious dissent which "turned the world upside down" during his boyhood. As a Roman Catholic, Dryden lost his position at the "Glorious Revolution" in 1688, and from then on made his living by translations of the great classical poets, so heralding the transition from reliance on patronage to reliance on income derived from the sale of his books.

* * *

Annus Mirabilis [1]

The Year of Wonders 1666

Duke of Albemarle's battle, first day [2]

Our fleet divides, and straight the Dutch appear,
In number and a famed commander bold:
The narrow seas can scarce their navy bear,
Or crowded vessels can their soldiers hold.

---

[1] Annus Mirabilis 1666 had been expected to be in some way extraordinary, because 666 is the number of the beast (Revelation 13:18). The Dutch War and the Fire of London were seen as fulfilments of prophecy. The poem represents Dryden's attempt at a "modern epic," that is one without myth and legend. Charles II was so gratified by Annus Mirabilis that he made Dryden Poet Laureate.

[2] This extract represents stanzas 54–71 (lines 213–284).

The duke, less numerous, but in courage more,
On wings of all the winds to combat flies;
His murdering guns a loud defiance roar
And bloody crosses on his flag-staffs rise.

Both furl their sails and strip them for the fight;
Their folded sheets dismiss the useless air;
Th' Elean plains could boast no nobler sight,
When struggling champions did their bodies bare.[1]

Borne each by other in a distant line,
The sea-built forts in dreadful order move:
So vast the noise, as if not fleets did join,
But lands unfixed and floating nations strove.

Now passed, on either side they nimbly tack;
Both strive to intercept and guide the wind:
And in its eye more closely they come back
To finish all the deaths they left behind.

On high-raised decks the haughty Belgians ride,
Beneath whose shade our humble frigates go;
Such port the elephant bears, and so defied
By the rhinoceros, her unequal foe.

And as the build, so different is the fight;
Their mounting shot is on our sails designed:
Deep in their hulls our deadly bullets light
And through the yielding planks a passage find.

Our dreaded admiral from far they threat
Whose battered rigging their whole war receives.
All bare, like some old oak which tempests beat,
He stands, and sees below his scattered leaves.

Heroes of old when wounded shelter sought;
But he, who meets all danger with disdain,
E'en in their face his ship to anchor brought
And steeple-high stood propped upon the main.

At this excess of courage, all amazed,
The foremost of his foes a while withdraw.
With such respect in entered Rome they gazed
Who on high chairs the godlike fathers saw.

And now, as where Patroclus' body lay,
Here Trojan chiefs advanced, and there the Greek,
Ours o'er the duke their pious wings display,
And theirs the noblest spoils of Britain seek.

Meantime, his busy mariners he hastes
His shattered sails with rigging to restore;
And willing pines ascend his broken masts,
Whose lofty heads rise higher than before.

Straight to the Dutch he turns his dreadful prow
More fierce the important quarrel to decide:
Like swans, in long array his vessels show,
Whose crests, advancing, do the waves divide.

They charge, recharge, and all along the sea
They drive, and squander the huge Belgian fleet.
Berkeley alone, not making equal way,
Did a like fate with lost Creusa meet.[2]

The night comes on, we eager to pursue
The combat still, and they ashamed to leave:
Till the last streaks of dying day withdrew,
And doubtful moonlight did our rage deceive.

In the English fleet each ship resounds with joy
And loud applause of their great leader's fame:
In fiery dreams the Dutch they still destroy,
And, slumbering, smile at the imagined flame.

---

[1] Th' Elean plains scene of the ancient Olympic games.

[2] not making equal way Some copies read "who nearest danger lay."

Not so the Holland fleet, who, tired and done,
Stretched on their decks like weary oxen lie:
Faint sweats all down their mighty members run,
(Vast bulks, which little souls but ill supply.)

In dreams they fearful precipices tread,
Or, shipwrecked, labour to some distant shore,
Or in dark churches walk among the dead:
They wake with horror, and dare sleep no more.

DIGRESSION CONCERNING SHIPPING AND NAVIGATION [1]

By viewing nature, nature's handmaid, art,
Makes mighty things from small beginnings grow:
Thus fishes first to shipping did impart
Their tail the rudder, and their head the prow.

Some log, perhaps, upon the waters swam,
A useless drift, which, rudely cut within,
And hollowed, first a floating trough became,
And cross some rivulet passage did begin.

In shipping such as this the Irish kern,
And untaught Indian, on the stream did glide:
Ere sharp-keeled boats to stem the flood did learn,
Or fin-like oars did spread from either side.

Add but a sail, and Saturn so appeared, [2]
When from lost empire he to exile went,
And with the golden age to Tiber steered,
Where coin and first commerce he did invent.

Rude as their ships was navigation then,
No useful compass or meridian known:
Coasting, they kept the land within their ken,
And knew no north but when the pole-star shone.

Of all who since have used the open sea,
Than the bold English none more fame have won:
Beyond the year, and out of heaven's highway,
They make discoveries where they see no sun.

But what so long in vain, and yet unknown,
By poor mankind's benighted wit is sought,
Shall in this age to Britain first be shown,
And hence be to admiring nations taught.

The ebbs of tides and their mysterious flow
We as art's elements shall understand,
And as by line upon the ocean go,
Whose paths shall be familiar as the land,

Instructed ships shall sail to quick commerce,[3]
By which remotest regions are allied;
Which makes one city of the universe,
Where some may gain and all may be supplied.

Then, we upon our globe's last verge shall go
And view the ocean leaning on the sky
From thence our rolling neighbours we shall know
And on the lunar world securely pry.
—1667

Absalom and Achitophel

si propius stes
te capiet magis.
[if you stand nearer it will attract you more]

TO THE READER

It is not my intention to make an apology for my poem: some will think it needs no excuse, and others will receive none. The design, I am sure, is honest; but he who draws his pen for one party must expect to make enemies of the other. For wit and fool are consequents of Whig and Tory; and every man is a knave or an ass to the contrary side. There's a treasury of merits in the fanatic church, as well as in the Papist; and a pennyworth to be had of saintship, honesty, and poetry, for the lewd, the factious, and the blockheads; but the longest chapter in Deuteronomy has not curses enough for an anti Bromingham.' My comfort is, their manifest prejudice to my cause will render their judgment of less authority against me. Yet if a poem have a genius, it will force its own reception in the world; for there's a sweetness in good verse, which tickles even while it hurts, and no man can be heartily angry with him who pleases him against his will. The commendation of adversaries is the greatest triumph of a writer, because it never comes unless extorted. But I can be satisfied on more easy terms: if I happen to please the more moderate sort, I shall be sure of an honest party, and, in all probability, of the best judges; for the least concerned are commonly the least corrupt. And I confess, I have laid in for those by rebating the satire (where justice would allow it) from carrying too sharp an edge. They who can criticise so weakly as to imagine I have done my worst, may be convinced, at their own cost, that I can write severely with more ease than I can gently. I have but laughed at some men's follies, when I could have declaimed against their vices; and other men's virtues I have commended as freely as I have taxed their crimes. And now, if you are a malicious reader, I expect you should return upon me that I affect to be thought more impartial than I am. But if men are not to be judged by their professions, God forgive you commonwealth's-men for professing so plausibly for the government. You cannot be so unconscionable as to charge me for not subscribing of my name; for that would reflect too grossly upon your own party, who never dare, though they have the advantage of a jury to secure them. If you like not my poem, the fault may, possibly, be in my writing (though it is hard for an author to judge against himself); but, more probably, it is in your morals, which cannot bear the truth of it. The violent, on both sides, will condemn the character of Absalom, as either too favourably or too hardly drawn. But they are not the violent whom I desire to please. The fault on the right hand is to extenuate, palliate, and indulge, and, to confess freely, I have endeavoured to commit it. Besides the respect which I owe his birth, I have a greater for his heroic virtues, and David himself could not be more tender of the young man's life than I would be of his reputation. But since the most excellent natures are always the most easy, and, as being such, are the soonest perverted by ill counsels, especially when baited with fame and glory; it is no more a wonder that he withstood not the temptations of Achitophel, than it was for Adam not to have resisted the two devils, the serpent and the woman. The conclusion of the story I purposely forbore to prosecute, because I could not obtain from myself to show Absalom unfortunate. The frame of it was cut out but for a picture to the waist, and if the draft be so far true, it is as much as I designed.

---

[1] This extract represents stanza 155–164 (lines 617–656).

[2] Saturn brought arts and laws to Italy (Aeneid 8.3319ff).

[3] Instructed By a more exact measure of Longitude (Dryden's note).

Were I the inventor, who am only the historian, I should certainly conclude the piece with the reconçilement of Absalom to David. And who knows but this may come to pass? Things were not brought to an extremity where I left the story; there seems yet to be room left for a composure; hereafter there may only be for pity. I have not so much as an uncharitable wish against Achitophel, but am content to be accused of a good-natured error, and to hope with Origen, that the Devil himself may at last be saved. For which reason, in this poem, he is neither brought to set his house in order, nor to dispose of his person afterwards as he in wisdom shall think fit. God is infinitely merciful; and his vicegerent is only not so, because he is not infinite. The true end of satire is the amendment of vices by correction. And he who writes honestly is no more an enemy to the offender, than the physician to the patient, when he prescribes harsh remedies to an inveterate disease; for those are only in order to prevent the surgeon's work of an ense rescindendum, which I wish not to my very enemies. To conclude all: if the body politic have any analogy to the natural, in my weak judgment, an act of oblivion were as necessary in a hot, distempered state, as anopiate would be in a raging fever.

ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL [1]

In pious times, ere priest-craft did begin, [2]
Before polygamy was made a sin;
When man on many multiplied his kind,
Ere one to one was cursedly confined:
When Nature prompted, and no law denied
Promiscuous use of concubine and bride;
Then Israel's monarch after Heaven's own heart,
His vigorous warmth did variously impart
To wives and slaves: and, wide as his command,
Scattered his Maker's image through the land.
Michal, of royal blood, the crown did wear,
A soil ungrateful to the tiller's care: [3]
Not so the rest; for several mothers bore
To godlike David, several sons before.
But since like slaves his bed they did ascend,
No true succession could their seed attend.
Of all this numerous progeny was none
So beautiful, so brave as Absolom:
Whether, inspired by some diviner lust,
His father got him with a greater gust; [4]
Or that his conscious destiny made way,
By manly beauty, to imperial sway.
Early in foreign fields he won renown,
With kings and states allied to Israel's crown:
In peace the thoughts of war he could remove,
And seemed as he were only born for love.
Whate'er he did was done with so much ease,
In him alone 'twas natural to please.
His motions all accompanied with grace;
And paradise was opened in his face.
With secret joy, indulgent David viewed
His youthful image in his son renewed:
To all his wishes nothing he denied,
And made the charming Annabel his bride. [5]
What faults he had (for who from faults is free?)
His father could not, or he would not see.
Some warm excesses which the law forbore,
Were construed youth that purged by boiling o'er:
And Amnon's murder, by a specious name,
Was called a just revenge for injured fame. [6]
Thus praised and loved the noble youth remained,
While David, undisturbed, in Sion reigned. [7]
But life can never be sincerely blest:
Heaven punishes the bad, and proves the best. [8]
The Jews, a headstrong, moody, murmuring race,
As ever tried th' extent and stretch of grace;
God's pampered people whom, debauched with ease,
No king could govern, nor no God could please; [9]

---

[1] Dryden uses the biblical story of the rebellion of Absalom against his father, David (II Samuel 13–18), to allegorize the threat of the Duke of Monmouth, an illegitimate son of Charles II, against the King. James Duke of York, Charles's brother and heir, was Catholic. The political and religious strife occasioned by the Popish plot (1678) initiated by Titus Oates created a tumultuous atmosphere, which the Earl of Shaftesbury took as opportunity to have Monmouth crowned King. Charles managed the situation by dissolving Parliament.

[2] priest-craft the exercise of priestly responsibilities; the arts used by worldly & ambitious priests.

[3] Daughter of Saul and one of David's wives. She was childless, as was Catherine of Braganza, Charles II's Queen. See II Samuel 6:12–23.

[4] gust relish (OED gust sb ^{2} 4).

[5] Annabel Anne, Countess of Buccleuch (1651–1732).

[6] Amnon, Absalom's half-brother, raped Tamar, Absalom's sister, and was murdered as a result (II Samuel 13:28–29). There is presumably a reference to an act of violence with which Monmouth was associated, but nothing is certainly known.

[7] Sion that is, Jerusalem; here, London.

[8] proves tries, tests.

[9] debauched seduced from allegiance (OED debauch v 1); corrupted (OED debauch v 2).

(Gods they had tried of every shape and size
That God-smiths could produce, or priests devise:)
These Adam-wits, too fortunately free,
Began to dream they wanted liberty; [1]
And when no rule, no precedent was found
Of men, by laws less circumscribed and bound,
They led their wild desires to woods and caves,
And thought that all but savages were slaves.
They who when Saul was dead, without a blow,
Made foolish Ishbosheth the crown forgo; [2]
Who banished David did from Hebron bring,
And with a general shout proclaimed him King: [3]
Those very Jews, who, at their very best,
Their humour more than loyalty expressed,
Now, wondered why so long they had obeyed
An idol monarch which their hands had made:
Thought they might ruin him they could create;
Or melt him to that golden calf, a state. [4]
But these were random bolts: no formed design,
Nor interest made the factious crowd to join:
The sober part of Israel, free from stain,
Well knew the value of a peaceful reign,
And, looking backward with a wise affright,
Saw seams of wounds, dishonest to the sight;
In contemplation of whose ugly scars,
They cursed the memory of civil wars.
The moderate sort of men, thus qualified,
Inclined the balance to the better side:
And David's mildness managed it so well,
The bad found no occasion to rebel.
But when to sin our biased nature leans,
The careful devil is still at hand with means;
And providently pimps for ill desires.
The Good Old Cause revived, a plot requires: [5]
Plots, true or false, are necessary things,
To raise up Commonwealths, and ruin kings.
  Th' inhabitants of old Jerusalem
Were Jebusites: the town so called from them; [6]
And their's the native right—
But when the chosen people grew more strong, [7]
The rightful cause at length became the wrong:
And every loss the men of Jebus bore,
They still were thought God's enemies the more.
Thus worn and weakened, well or ill content,
Submit they must to David's government:
Impoverished and deprived of all command,
Their taxes doubled as they lost their land,
And, what was harder yet to flesh and blood,
Their gods disgraced, and burnt like common wood.
This set the heathen priesthood in a flame;
For priests of all religions are the same:
Of whatsoe'er descent their godhead be,
Stock, stone, or other homely pedigree, [8]
In his defence his servants are as bold
As if he had been born of beaten gold.
The Jewish Rabbins, though their enemies,
In this conclude them honest men and wise:
For 'twas their duty, all the learned think,
T'espouse his cause by whom they eat and drink.
From hence began that Plot, the nation's curse,
Bad in itself, but represented worse; [9]
Raised in extremes, and in extremes decried;
With oaths affirmed, with dying vows denied.

---

[1] Adam-wits The name Adam was used figuratively of the unregenerate condition or character (OED). Dryden is recalling the story of Adam and Eve and the forbidden fruit (Genesis 2–3).

[2] Saul Cromwell; Ishbosheth Richard Cromwell.

[3] proclaimed him King Charles was restored to the throne in 1660.

[4] that golden calf, a state in reference to the golden calf worshipped by the Jews while Moses was on Mt. Sinai (Exodus 32). The language of idolatry was used both by Royalists, as here, and by their opponents. Republicans regarded the restored monarchy as an idol.

[5] The Good Old Cause that is, the cause of the Commonwealth.

[6] Jebus was the original name of Jerusalem. Here, "Jebusites" refer to Roman Catholics.

[7] the chosen people in the biblical source, the Jews; here, the Protestants.

[8] Stock wood (OED stock 1b).

[9] that Plot the Popish plot.

Not weighed or winnowed by the multitude;[1]
But swallowed in the mass, unchewed and crude.[2]
Some truth there was, but dashed and brewed with lies;
To please the fools, and puzzle all the wise.
Succeeding times did equal folly call,
Believing nothing, or believing all.
Th' Egyptian rites the Jebusites embraced;
Where gods were recommended by their taste.[3]
Such savoury deities must needs be good,
As served at once for worship and for food.
By force they could not introduce these gods;
For ten to one in former days was odds.
So fraud was used, (the sacrificer's trade):
Fools are more hard to conquer than persuade.
Their busy teachers mingled with the Jews,
And raked for converts, even the court and stews:[4]
Which Hebrew priests the more unkindly took,
Because the fleece accompanies the flock.[5]
Some thought they God's anointed meant to slay
By guns, invented since full many a day:
Our author swears it not; but who can know
How far the Devil and Jebusites may go?
This Plot, which failed for want of common sense,
Had yet a deep and dangerous consequence:
For, as when raging fevers boil the blood,
The standing lake soon floats into a flood;
And every hostile humour, which before
Slept quiet in its channels, bubbles o'er:
So, several factions from this first ferment,
Work up to foam, and threat the government.
Some by their friends, more by themselves thought wise,
Opposed the power to which they could not rise.
Some had in courts been great, and thrown from thence,
Like fiends were hardened in impenitence.
Some, by their monarch's fatal mercy, grown,
From pardoned rebels kinsmen to the throne;
Were raised in power and public office high:
Strong bands, if bands ungrateful men could tie.
Of these the false Achitophel was first:
A name to all succeeding ages cursed.[6]
For close designs, and crooked counsels fit;[7]
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, unfixed in principles and place;
In power unpleased, impatient of disgrace:
A fiery soul, which working out its way,
Fretted the pygmy body to decay,
And o'er informed the tenement of clay.[8]
A daring pilot in extremity;
Pleased with the danger, when the waves went high
He sought the storms; but for a calm unfit,
Would steer too nigh the sands, to boast his wit.
Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
Else, why should he, with wealth and honour blest,
Refuse his age the needful hours of rest?
Punish a body which he could not please;
Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?
And all to leave what with his toil he won,
To that unfeathered, two legged thing, a son:
Got, while his soul did huddled notions try;[9]
And born a shapeless lump, like anarchy.

---

[1] winnowed cleared of worthless elements (OED winnow v 1b).

[2] crude uncooked; undigested (OED crude a 2, 3).

[3] Th' Egyptian rites…recommended by their taste The reference is to Catholicism, and the consumption of bread and wine in the Mass.

[4] stews brothels.

[5] the fleece a common metaphor in the period for financial compensation, especially in the form of commissions, bribes, and tithes.

[6] Achitophel the Earl of Shaftesbury, who agitated to have Monmouth crowned king.

[7] close designs concealed, secret designs (OED close a 4a).

[8] o'er informed over-animated (OED inform v 3a).

[9] huddled confused, crowded together without order (OED huddled ppl.a).

In friendship false, implacable in hate:
Resolved to ruin or to rule the state.
To compass this the triple bond he broke;[1]
The pillars of the public safety shook:
And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke.
Then seized with fear, yet still affecting fame,[2]
Usurped a patriot's all-atoning name.
So easy still it proves in factious times,
With public zeal to cancel private crimes:
How safe is treason, and how sacred ill,
Where none can sin against the people's will:
Where crowds can wink, and no offence be known,
Since in another's guilt they find their own.
Yet fame deserved no enemy can grudge;
The statesman we abhor, but praise the judge.
In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abbethdin[3]
With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean:
Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress;
Swift of dispatch, and easy of access.
Oh, had he been content to serve the Crown,
With virtues only proper to the gown;
Or, had the rankness of the soil been freed
From cockle, that oppressed the noble seed:[4]
David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
And Heaven had wanted one immortal song.
But wild Ambition loves to slide, not stand;
And Fortune's ice prefers to Virtue's land:
Achitophel, grown weary to possess
A lawful Fame, and lazy Happiness;
Disdained the golden fruit to gather free,
And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.[5]
Now, manifest of crimes contrived long since,
He stood at bold defiance with his Prince:[6]
Held up the buckler of the people's cause,[7]
Against the Crown; and skulked behind the laws.
The wished occasion of the Plot he takes,
Some circumstances finds, but more he makes.
By buzzing emissaries fills the ears
Of listening crowds with jealousies and fears
Of arbitrary counsels brought to light,
And proves the King himself a Jebusite:
Weak arguments! which yet he knew full well,
Were strong with people easy to rebel.
For, governed by the moon, the giddy Jews
Tread the same track when she the prime renews:[8]
And once in twenty years, their scribes record,
By natural instinct they change their Lord.
Achitophel still wants a chief, and none
Was found so fit as warlike Absalom:[9]
Not, that he wished his greatness to create,
(For politicians neither love nor hate:)
But, for he knew his title not allowed,
Would keep him still depending on the crowd:
That kingly power, thus ebbing out, might be Drawn to the dregs of a democracy.
Him he attempts with studied arts to please,
And sheds his venom, in such words as these:
Auspicious Prince! at whose nativity
Some royal planet ruled the southern sky;

---

[1] the triple bond an alliance of England, Sweden, and Holland against France (formed in 1668).

[2] affecting aspiring toward (OED affect v 1).

[3] Abbethdin senior judge in the Jewish civil court (Shaftesbury was Lord Chancellor).

[4] rankness abundance (OED rank a 2) or overabundance (OED rank a 6a). The word is chosen carefully; several senses apply; cockle in reference to plants that grow in cornfields, varying according to location (OED cockle sb^{1} 1); there is an implied reference to the Parable of the Sower.

[5] the golden fruit recalling Eden's forbidden fruit and the golden apples of the Hesperides.

[6] manifest clearly guilty of (OED manifest a 2).

[7] buckler originally a small round shield used defensively (OED buckler sb 1); often associated with the champion in a confrontation (OED buckler sb 5).

[8] prime lunar cycle of nineteen years (OED prime sb^{1} 4b).

[9] wants lacks, is in need of.

Thy longing country's darling and desire;
Their cloudy pillar and their guardian fire:[1]
Their second Moses, whose extended wand
Divides the seas, and shows the promised land:
Whose dawning day in every distant age
Has exercised the sacred prophet's rage:
The people's prayer, the glad diviner's theme,
The young men's vision, and the old men's dream!
Thee, Saviour, thee, the nation's vows confess;
And, never satisfied with seeing, bless:
Swift, unbespoken pomps, thy steps proclaim,
And stammering babes are taught to lisp thy name.[2]
How long wilt thou the general joy detain;
Starve, and defraud the people of thy reign?
Content ingloriously to pass thy days
Like one of Virtue's fools that feeds on praise,
Till thy fresh glories, which now shine so bright,
Grow stale and tarnish with our daily sight.
Believe me, royal youth, thy fruit must be
Or gathered ripe, or rot upon the tree.
Heaven has to all allotted, soon or late,
Some lucky revolution of their fate,
Whose motions, if we watch and guide with skill,
(For human good depends on human will),
Our fortune rolls, as from a smooth descent,
And from the first impression takes the bent:
But if unseized, she glides away like wind;
And leaves repenting Folly far behind.
Now, now she meets you, with a glorious prize,
And spreads her locks before her as she flies.
Had thus old David, from whose loins you spring,
Not dared, when Fortune called him, to be King,
At Gath an exile he might still remain,[3]
And Heaven's anointing oil had been in vain.[4]
Let his successful youth your hopes engage,
But shun th' example of declining age:
Behold him setting in his western skies,
The shadows lengthning as the vapours rise.
He is not now, as when on Jordan's sand
The joyful people thronged to see him land,
Cov'ring the beach, and blackning all the strand:[5]
But, like the Prince of Angels, from his height
Comes tumbling downward with diminished light;
Betrayed by one poor plot to public scorn,
(Our only blessing since his cursed return);
Those heaps of people which one sheaf did bind,
Blown off and scattered by a puff of wind.
What strength can he to your designs oppose,
Naked of friends, and round beset with foes?
If Pharaoh's doubtful succour he should use,
A foreign aid would more incense the Jews:[6]
Proud Egypt would dissembled friendship bring;
Foment the war, but not support the King:
Nor would the royal party e'er unite
With Pharaoh's arms, t'assist the Jebusite;
Or if they should, their interest soon would break,
And with such odious aid make David weak.
All sorts of men by my successful arts,
Abhorring kings, estrange their altered hearts
From David's rule: and 'tis the general cry,
'Religion, commonwealth, and liberty.'
If you, as champion of the public good,
Add to their arms a chief of royal blood,
What may not Israel hope, and what applause
Might such a general gain by such a cause?
Not barren Praise alone, that gaudy flower,
Fair only to the sight, but solid power;
And nobler is a limited command,
Giv'n by the love of all your native land,

---

[1] Their cloudy pillar and their guardian fire During the Exodus, the Israelites were led by a cloud by day, and by a pillar of fire by night.

[2] unbespoken spontaneous; a pomp is a triumphal or ceremonial procession (OED pomp sb 2).

[3] At Gath an exile he might still remain David took refuge from Saul in Gath (I Samuel 27: 1–7); the latter part of Charles II's exile was spent in Brussels.

[4] Heaven's anointing oil See I Samuel 6: 1–13: God rejects Saul and commands Samuel to anoint David.

[5] on Jordan's sand recollecting the scene when Charles landed at Dover upon his restoration.

[6] Pharaoh's doubtful succour the dubious aid of Louis XIV of France.

Than a successive title, long, and dark,
Drawn from the mouldy rolls of Noah's Ark."
What cannot praise effect in mighty minds,
When flattery soothes, and when ambition blinds!
Desire of power, on earth a vicious weed,
Yet, sprung from high, is of celestial seed:
In God 'tis glory: and when men aspire,
'Tis but a spark too much of heavenly fire.
Th' ambitious youth, too covetous of fame,
Too full of angel's metal in his frame; [1]
Unwarily was led from virtue's ways;
Made drunk with honour, and debauched with praise. [2]
Half loath, and half consenting to the ill,
(For loyal blood within him struggled still)
He thus replied—"And what pretence have I
To take up arms for public liberty?
My father governs with unquestioned right;
The faith's defender, and mankind's delight:
Good, gracious, just, observant of the laws;
And Heaven by wonders has espoused his cause.
Whom has he wronged in all his peaceful reign?
Who sues for justice to his throne in vain?
What millions has he pardoned of his foes,
Whom just revenge did to his wrath expose?
Mild, easy, humble, studious of our good;
Inclined to mercy, and averse from blood.
If mildness ill with stubborn Israel suit,
His crime is God's beloved attribute.
What could he gain, his people to betray,
Or change his right for arbitrary sway?
Let haughty Pharaoh curse with such a reign,
His fruitful Nile, and yoke a servile train.
If David's rule Jerusalem displease,
The Dog-star heats their brains to this disease. [3]
Why then should I, encouraging the bad,
Turn rebel and run popularly mad? [4]
Were he a tyrant who, by lawless might,
Oppressed the Jews, and raised the Jebusite,
Well might I mourn; but Nature's holy bands
Would curb my spirits, and restrain my hands:
The people might assert their liberty;
But what was right in them, were crime in me.
His favour leaves me nothing to require;
Prevents my wishes, and outruns desire. [5]
What more can I expect while David lives,
All but his kingly diadem he gives;
And that":—But there he paused; then sighing, said—
"Is justly destined for a worthier head.
For when my father from his toils shall rest,
And late augment the number of the blest,
His lawful issue shall the throne ascend,
Or the collateral line where that shall end. [6]
His brother, though oppressed with vulgar spite,
Yet dauntless, and secure of native right,
Of every royal virtue stands possessed;
Still dear to all the bravest and the best.
His courage foes, his friends his truth proclaim;
His loyalty the king, the world his fame.
His mercy e'en th' offending crowd will find,
For sure he comes of a forgiving kind.
Why should I then repine at Heaven's decree;
Which gives me no pretence to royalty?
Yet O that Fate, propitiously inclined,

---

[1] angel's metal the "stuff" of which man—or angel—is made (OED metal sb 1f). The apparent compliment is double-edged; the angel Satan's pride and ambition led him to rebel against God.

[2] debauched See the note to line 47.

[3] The Dog-star heats their brains The re-appearance of Sirius in late summer was associated in ancient times with fever and madness. Compare the beginning of Pope's Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

[4] run popularly mad run into the madness of pandering to the majority.

[5] Prevents anticipates, goes before. Compare the Collect for Easter Sunday in the Book of Common Prayer, with its reference to God's special grace preventing us and putting into our minds good desires.

[6] the collateral line descended from the same stock, but in a different line (OED collateral a 4).

Had raised my birth, or had debased my mind;
To my large soul not all her treasure lent,
And then betrayed it to a mean descent.
I find, I find my mounting spirits bold,
And David's part disdains my mother's mould. [1]
Why am I scanted by a niggard birth? [2]
My soul disclaims the kindred of her earth:
And made for empire, whispers me within;
'Desire of greatness is a godlike sin.' "
    Him staggering so when Hell's dire agent found,
While fainting Virtue scarce maintained her ground, [3]
He pours fresh forces in, and thus replies:
    "Th' eternal God, supremely good and wise,
Imparts not these prodigious gifts in vain:
What wonders are reserved to bless your reign?
Against your will your arguments have shown,
Such virtue's only given to guide a throne.
Not that your father's mildness I contemn;
But manly force becomes the diadem.
'Tis true, he grants the people all they crave;
And more perhaps than subjects ought to have:
For lavish grants suppose a monarch tame,
And more his goodness than his wit proclaim.
But when should people strive their bonds to break,
If not when kings are negligent or weak?
Let him give on till he can give no more,
The thrifty Sanhedrin shall keep him poor: [4]
And every shekel which he can receive,
Shall cost a limb of his prerogative. [5]
To ply him with new plots, shall be my care,
Or plunge him deep in some expensive war;
Which when his treasure can no more supply,
He must, with the remains of kingship, buy.
His faithful friends, our jealousies and fears [6]
Call Jebusites; and Pharaoh's pensioners:
Whom when our fury from his aid has torn,
He shall be naked left to public scorn.
The next successor, whom I fear and hate,
My arts have made obnoxious to the state;
Turned all his virtues to his overthrow,
And gained our elders to pronounce a foe. [7]
His right, for sums of necessary gold,
Shall first be pawned, and afterwards be sold:
Till time shall ever-wanting David draw,
To pass your doubtful title into law:
If not, the people have a right supreme
To make their kings; for kings are made for them.
All empire is no more than power in trust,
Which when resumed, can be no longer just.
Succession, for the general good designed,
In its own wrong a nation cannot bind:
If altering that, the people can relieve,
Better one suffer, than a nation grieve.
The Jews well know their power: ere Saul they chose,
God was their King, and God they durst depose.
Urge now your piety, your filial name,
A father's right, and fear of future fame,
The public good, that universal call,
To which e'en Heav'n submitted, answers all.
Nor let his love enchant your generous mind;

---

[1] David's part disdains my mother's mould That is, his royal inheritance predominates over his mother's humble birth.

[2] scanted diminished (OED scanted ppl.a); niggard miserly. Monmouth felt himself to be short-changed by the fact that his mother was a commoner, and his father's mistress, not his queen. He would have done well to count his blessings, as his fate was to be executed for rebelling against James II.

[3] Him staggering so when Hell's dire agent found The Miltonic inversion signals the fact that this is in parts a "heroic" satire, dealing with momentous events; staggering beginning to doubt or waver (OED stagger v 2).

[4] Sanhedrin Jerusalem's most authoritative judicial council, which here stands for Parliament.

[5] his prerogative the Royal prerogative, that is the Crown's special privileges (OED prerogative sb 1a). It is thematic to Stuart history that successive Parliaments used their power of controlling the King's money-supply in order to check the powers of the crown.

[6] jealousies and fears Dryden, writing in the Stuart interest, here recalls a phrase common in pre-Restoration Parliamentary pamphlets.

[7] prevailed upon, or caused, elders to pronounce him an enemy.

'Tis Nature's trick to propagate her kind.
Our fond begetters, who would never die,
Love but themselves in their posterity.
Or let his kindness by th' effects be tried,
Or let him lay his vain pretence aside.
God said he loved your father; could he bring
A better proof, than to anoint him King?
It surely showed he loved the shepherd well,
Who gave so fair a flock as Israel. [1]
Would David have you thought his darling son?
What means he then, to alienate the crown? [2]
The name of godly he may blush to bear:
'Tis after God's own heart to cheat his heir.
He to his brother gives supreme command,
To you a legacy of barren land:
Perhaps th' old harp, on which he thrums his lays:
Or some dull Hebrew ballad in your praise.
Then the next heir, a prince severe and wise,
Already looks on you with jealous eyes;
Sees through the thin disguises of your arts,
And marks your progress in the people's hearts.
Though now his mighty soul its grief contains;
He meditates revenge who least complains. [3]
And like a lion, slumbring in the way,
Or sleep dissembling, while he waits his prey,
His fearless foes within his distance draws;
Constrains his roaring, and contracts his paws:
Till at the last, his time for fury found,
He shoots with sudden vengeance from the ground:
The prostrate vulgar passes o'er, and spares;
But with a lordly rage, his hunters tears. [4]
Your case no tame expedients will afford:
Resolve on death, or conquest by the sword,
Which for no less a stake than life you draw;
And self-defence is Nature's eldest law.
Leave the warm people no considering time;
For then rebellion may be thought a crime.
Prevail yourself of what occasion gives,
But try your title while your father lives: [5]
And that your arms may have a fair pretence,
Proclaim you take them in the King's defence:
Whose sacred life each minute would expose,
To plots, from seeming friends, and secret foes.
And who can sound the depth of David's soul?
Perhaps his fear his kindness may control.
He fears his brother, though he loves his son,
For plighted vows too late to be undone.
If so, by force he wishes to be gained,
Like women's lechery, to seem constrained:
Doubt not, but when he most affects the frown,
Commit a pleasing rape upon the crown. [6]
Secure his person to secure your cause;
They who possess the Prince, possess the laws."
    He said, And this advice above the rest,
With Absalom's mild nature suited best;
Unblamed of Life (ambition set aside,)
Not stained with cruelty, nor puffed with pride;
How happy had he been, if destiny
Had higher placed his birth, or not so high!
His kingly virtues might have claimed a throne,
And blessed all other countries but his own:
But charming greatness, since so few refuse;
'Tis juster to lament him, than accuse.
Strong were his hopes a rival to remove,
With blandishments to gain the public love;
To head the faction while their zeal was hot,
And popularly prosecute the Plot.
To further this, Achitophel unites
The malcontents of all the Israelites;
Whose differing parties he could wisely join,
For several ends, to serve the same design.
The best, and of the princes some were such,

---

[1] the shepherd David was once a shepherd boy (I Samuel 16:11). To see Charles II as David had become a habit even before the Restoration; Dryden is good at squeezing meanings out of the comparison.

[2] to alienate the crown to transfer into the ownership of another (OED alienate v 2).

[3] grief anger, sense of having been wronged (OED grief sb 4).

[4] vulgar the ordinary or "common" class (OED vulgar sb 2a).

[5] Prevail avail (OED prevail v 4c).

[6] Doubt not Don't scruple or hesitate (OED doubt v 3).

Who thought the power of monarchy too much:
Mistaken men, and patriots in their hearts;
Not wicked, but seduced by impious arts.
By these the springs of property were bent,
And wound so high, they cracked the government.
The next for interest sought t' embroil the state,
To sell their duty at a dearer rate; [1]
And make their Jewish markets of the throne,
Pretending public good, to serve their own.
Others thought kings an useless heavy load,
Who cost too much, and did too little good.
These were for laying honest David by,
On principles of pure good husbandry. [2]
With them joined all th' haranguers of the throng,
That thought to get preferment by the tongue.
Who follow next, a double danger bring,
Not only hating David, but the King,
The Solymaean rout, well-versed of old,
In godly faction, and in treason bold; [3]
Cow'ring and quaking at a conqu'ror's sword,
But lofty to a lawful prince restored;
Saw with disdain an ethnic plot begun,
And scorned by Jebusites to be outdone. [4]
Hot Levites headed these; who pulled before [5]
From th' Ark, which in the Judges' days they bore,' [6]
Resumed their cant, and with a zealous cry, [7]
Pursued their old beloved theocracy: [8]
Where Sanhedrin and priest enslaved the nation,
And justified their spoils by inspiration; [9]
For who so fit for reign as Aaron's race,
If once dominion they could found in grace? [10]
These led the pack; though not of surest scent,
Yet deepest-mouthed against the government.
A numerous host of dreaming saints succeed,
Of the true old enthusiastic breed: [11]
'Gainst form and order they their power employ;
Nothing to build and all things to destroy.
But far more numerous was the herd of such,
Who think too little, and who talk too much.
These, out of mere instinct, they knew not why,
Adored their fathers' god, and property:
And, by the same blind benefit of Fate,
The Devil and the Jebusite did hate:
Born to be saved, even in their own despite;
Because they could not help believing right.
Such were the tools; but a whole Hydra more
Remains, of sprouting heads too long, to score. [12]
Some of their chiefs were princes of the land:
In the first rank of these did Zimri stand: [13]
A man so various, that he seemed to be

---

[1] rate benefit, profit (OED 2b).

[2] thrifty management.

[3] The Solymaean rout the London rabble. Solyma is a contraction of the Latin Hierosolyma (OED Solymaean a, this place cited).

[4] an ethnic plot literally, a heathen plot, here a Roman Catholic one.

[5] Levites Levi's tribe carried the Ark of the Covenant while the Jews were exiled; here, the dissenting Presbyterian clergy, deprived of their benefices after the Restoration.

[6] the Judges non-monarchical leaders of Israel, in reference to the Interregnum.

[7] cant OED cites this line as a reference to the peculiar phraseology of a religious sect or class (cant sb ^{3} 4c). It also suggests affected or inauthentic use of religious language (OED cant sb ^{3} 6b).

[8] theocracy a system of government in which God is recognised as King, his laws taken as the kingdom's statutes and administered by priests claiming divine commission; here, the Commonwealth.

[9] Sanhedrin See line 390 and note.

[10] Aaron's race The priests of Israel were descended from Aaron; see Exodus 28:1.

[11] enthusiastic by this period, a pejorative word for most people, in reaction to the perceived fanaticism of the "sectaries" during the interregnum. Enthusiasm first meant supernatural inspiration and subsequently extravagant religiosity (OED enthusiasm sb 1 and 2).

[12] Hydra in Greek myth, a baneful and destructive many-headed serpent difficult to extirpate because its several heads sprout again as they are cut off.

[13] Zimri perhaps a double allusion, to the blasphemous and lustful Zimri of Numbers 25:6–15, and to the conspiring regicide of I Kings 16:8–20 and II Kings 9:31. He is here attacking George Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham, who had satirized Dryden in The Rehearsal.

Not one, but all mankind's epitome.
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong;
Was everything by starts, and nothing long:
But, in the course of one revolving moon,
Was chemist, fiddler, statesman, and buffoon:
Then all for women, painting, rhyming, drinking;
Besides ten thousand freaks that died in thinking.[1]
Blest madman, who could every hour employ,
With something new to wish, or to enjoy!
Railing and praising were his usual themes;
And both (to show his judgment) in extremes:
So over-violent, or over-civil,
That every man, with him, was god or devil.
In squandering wealth was his peculiar art:
Nothing went unrewarded, but desert.
Beggared by fools, whom still he found too late:
He had his jest, and they had his estate.[2]
He laughed himself from court, then sought relief
By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief:
For, spite of him, the weight of business fell
On Absalom and wise Achitophel:
Thus, wicked but in will, of means bereft,
He left not faction, but of that was left.
Titles and names 'twere tedious to rehearse
Of lords, below the dignity of verse.
Wits, warriors, commonwealth's-men, were the best:
Kind husbands and mere nobles all the rest.
And therefore, in the name of dullness, be
The well-hung Balaam and cold Caleb free.
And canting Nadab let oblivion damn,[3]
Who made new porridge for the Paschal Lamb.[4]
Let friendship's holy band some names assure:
Some their own worth, and some let scorn secure.
Nor shall the rascal rabble here have place,
Whom kings no titles gave, and God no grace:
Not bull-faced Jonas, who could statutes draw
To mean rebellion, and make treason law.[5]
But he, though bad, is followed by a worse,
The wretch who Heaven's anointed dared to curse.
Shimei, whose youth did early promise bring
Of zeal to God and hatred to his King;[6]
Did wisely from expensive sins refrain,
And never broke the Sabbath, but for gain:
Nor ever was he known an oath to vent,
Or curse unless against the government.
Thus, heaping wealth, by the most ready way
Among the Jews, which was to cheat and pray;
The city, to reward his pious hate
Against his master, chose him magistrate:
His hand a vare of justice did uphold;[7]
His neck was loaded with a chain of gold.
During his office, treason was no crime;
The sons of Belial had a glorious time:[8]

---

[1] freaks whims.

[2] still always

[3] For Balaam, see Numbers 22–24; for Caleb, see Numbers 13–14; for Nadab, see Leviticus 10:1–2. Balaam is possibly Theophilus Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon; Caleb is Arthur Capel, Earl of Essex; Nadab is William, Lord Howard of Esrick (canting Nadab because he was formerly a preacher).

[4] Who made new porridge for the Paschal Lamb who did away with the Book of Common Prayer; porridge (a hotchpotch) was a contemptuous term used by opponents of the Book of Common Prayer; the Paschal Lamb is Jesus whose sacrifice on the cross is commemorated in the Holy Communion.

[5] Jonas Sir William Jones, largely responsible for both the Exclusion Bill (against James's succession) and the prosecutor of those accused in the Popish plot.

[6] Shimei See II Samuel 16:5–13, a lively episode in which Shimei curses and stones David while he flees from the rebellious Absalom; here Slingsby Bethel, responsible for Shaftesbury's avoiding charges of treason.

[7] vare a rod, staff or wand, carried as a symbol of authority (OED vare sb 2).

[8] sons of Belial a biblical phrase referring to reprobate, dissolute or uncouth persons. See Deuteronomy 13:13, Judges 19:22, I Samuel 2:12.

For Shimei, though not prodigal of pelf, [1]
Yet loved his wicked neighbour as himself:
When two or three were gathered to declaim
Against the monarch of Jerusalem,
Shimei was always in the midst of them.
And if they cursed the King when he was by,
Would rather curse than break good company.
If any durst his factious friends accuse,
He packed a jury of dissenting Jews,
Whose fellow-feeling, in the godly cause,
Would free the suffering saint from human laws.
For laws are only made to punish those,
Who serve the King, and to protect his foes.
If any leisure time he had from power,
(Because 'tis sin to misemploy an hour),
His business was, by writing, to persuade
That kings were useless, and a clog to trade:
And, that his noble style he might refine,
No Rechabite more shunned the fumes of wine. [2]
Chaste were his cellars, and his shrieval board
The grossness of a city feast abhorred: [3]
His cooks, with long disuse, their trade forgot;
Cool was his kitchen, though his brains were hot.
Such frugal virtue malice may accuse,
But sure 'twas necessary to the Jews:
For towns once burnt, such magistrates require
As dare not tempt God's providence by fire.
With spiritual food he fed his servants well,
But free from flesh, that made the Jews rebel:
And Moses' laws he held in more account,
For forty days of fasting in the Mount. [4]
To speak the rest, who better are forgot,
Would tire a well breathed witness of the plot:
Yet, Corah, thou shalt from oblivion pass; [5]
Erect thy self, thou monumental brass:
High as the serpent of thy metal made, [6]
While nations stand secure beneath thy shade.
What though his birth were base, yet comets rise
From earthy vapours ere they shine in skies.
Prodigious actions may as well be done
By weaver's issue as by prince's son.
This arch-attestor for the public good,
By that one deed ennobles all his blood.
Who ever asked the witnesses' high race,
Whose oath with martyrdom did Stephen grace? [7]
Ours was a Levite, and as times went then,
His tribe were God Almighty's gentlemen.
Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud,
Sure signs he neither choleric was, nor proud: [8]
His long chin proved his wit; his saintlike grace
A church vermilion, and a Moses' face; [9]
His memory, miraculously great,
Could plots exceeding man's belief, repeat;
Which, therefore cannot be accounted lies,
For human wit could never such devise.
Some future truths are mingled in his book;
But where the witness failed, the Prophet spoke:
Some things like visionary flights appear;
The Spirit caught him up, the Lord knows where:
And gave him his rabbinical degree

---

[1] pelf money, wealth, riches, filthy lucre (OED pelf sb 3).

[2] No Rechabite more shunned the fumes of wine Rachab's descendants refused to drink wine (Jeremiah 35).

[3] shrieval belonging to a sheriff.

[4] the Mount Mount Sinai, where Moses received God's commandments during a forty day fast (Exodus 34:28).

[5] Corah After challenging Moses and Aaron, he was swallowed up by the earth (Numbers 16); here, Titus Oates, the manufacturer of the Popish Plot.

[6] the serpent of thy metal made Israelites complaining against God and bitten by serpents as punishment were saved when Moses erected a brass serpent for them to look upon (Numbers 21:4–9); thy metal because Oates was a brazen liar.

[7] Stephen "a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost" was martyred as a result of false witnesses (Acts 6–7).

[8] choleric ill-tempered (OED choleric a 3).

[9] a Moses' face After receiving the commandments, Moses' face shone (Exodus 34:29–30).

Unknown to foreign university.[1]
His judgment yet his memory did excel;
Which pieced his wondrous evidence so well,
And suited to the temper of the times;
Then groaning under Jebusitic crimes.
Let Israel's foes suspect his heavenly call,
And rashly judge his writ apocryphal;[2]
Our laws for such affronts have forfeits made:
He takes his life, who takes away his trade.
Were I myself in witness Corah's place,
The wretch who did me such a dire disgrace,
Should whet my memory, though once forgot,
To make him an appendix of my plot.
His zeal to Heaven made him his Prince despise,
And load his person with indignities:
But zeal peculiar privilege affords;
Indulging latitude to deeds and words;
And Corah might for Agag's murder call,
In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul.[3]
What others in his evidence did join,
(The best that could be had for love or coin),
In Corah's own predicament will fall:
For witness is a common name to all.
Surrounded thus with friends of every sort,
Deluded Absalom forsakes the court:
Impatient of high hopes, urged with renown,
And fired with near possession of a crown:
Th' admiring crowd are dazzled with surprise,
And on his goodly person feed their eyes:
His joy concealed, he sets himself to show;
On each side bowing popularly low:
His looks, his gestures, and his words he frames,
And with familiar ease repeats their names.
Thus formed by nature, furnished out with arts,
He glides unfelt into their secret hearts:
Then with a kind compassionating look,
And sighs, bespeaking pity ere he spoke,
Few words he said; but easy those and fit:
More slow than Hybla drops, and far more sweet.[4]
"I mourn, my countrymen, your lost estate;
Though far unable to prevent your fate:
Behold a banished man, for your dear cause
Exposed a prey to arbitrary laws!
Yet O! that I alone could be undone,
Cut off from empire, and no more a son!
Now all your liberties a spoil are made;
Egypt and Tyrus intercept your trade,
And Jebusites your sacred rites invade.[5]
My father, whom with reverence yet I name,
Charmed into ease, is careless of his fame:
And, bribed with petty sums of foreign gold,
Is grown in Bathsheba's embraces old:[6]
Exalts his enemies, his friends destroys:
And all his power against himself employs.
He gives, and let him give, my right away:
But why should he his own and yours betray?
He, only he, can make the nation bleed,
And he alone from my revenge is freed.
Take then my tears" (with that he wiped his eyes)
"'Tis all the aid my present power supplies:
No court informer can these arms accuse,
These arms may sons against their father's use,
And, tis my wish, the next successor's reign
May make no other Israelite complain."
Youth, beauty, graceful action, seldom fail:
But common interest always will prevail:
And pity never ceases to be shown
To him who makes the people's wrongs his own.
The crowd, (that still believe their kings oppress)

---

[1] his rabbinical degree Titus Oates pretended to have academic qualifications which he did not possess, thus anticipating a form of deception popular in the twentieth century.

[2] apocryphal literally, excluded from the sacred writings; therefore, not certainly to be trusted.

[3] And Corah might...as Samuel used to Saul After Saul had shown him mercy, Samuel hewed Agag to pieces. See I Samuel 15.

[4] Hybla a Sicilian honey celebrated for its sweetness.

[5] Egypt and Tyrus France and Holland.

[6] For David's adultery with Bathsheba, see II Samuel 11. The reference here is to the Duchess of Portsmouth, one of Charles's mistresses.

With lifted hands their young Messiah bless:
Who now begins his progress to ordain
With chariots, horsemen, and a numerous train:
From east to west his glories he displays,
And, like the sun, the promised land surveys.[1]
Fame runs before him as the morning star;
And shouts of joy salute him from afar:
Each house receives him as a guardian god;
And consecrates the place of his abode:
But hospitable treats did most commend
Wise Issachar, his wealthy western friend. [2]
This moving court, that caught the people's eyes,
And seemed but pomp, did other ends disguise:
Achitophel had formed it, with intent
To sound the depths, and fathom, where it went,
The people's hearts; distinguish friends from foes;
And try their strength, before they came to blows:
Yet all was coloured with a smooth pretence
Of specious love, and duty to their Prince.
Religion, and redress of grievances,
Two names that always cheat and always please,
Are often urged; and good King David's life
Endangered by a brother and a wife. [3]
Thus in a pageant show a plot is made;
And peace itself is war in masquerade.
Oh foolish Israel! never warned by ill,
Still the same bait, and circumvented still!
Did ever men forsake their present ease,
In midst of health imagine a disease;
Take pains contingent mischiefs to foresee,
Make heirs for monarchs, and for God decree?
What shall we think! Can people give away
Both for themselves and sons, their native sway?
Then they are left defenceless, to the sword
Of each unbounded, arbitrary lord:
And laws are vain, by which we right enjoy,
If kings unquestioned can those laws destroy.
Yet, if the crowd be judge of fit and just,
And kings are only officers in trust,
Then this resuming cov'nant was declared
When kings were made, or is for ever barred:
If those who gave the scepter, could not tie
By their own deed their own posterity,
How then could Adam bind his future race?
How could his forfeit on mankind take place?
Or how could heavenly justice damn us all,
Who ne'er consented to our father's fall?
Then kings are slaves to those whom they command,
And tenants to their people's pleasure stand.
Add, that the power for property allowed,
Is mischievously seated in the crowd:
For who can be secure of private right,
If sovereign sway may be dissolved by might?
Nor is the people's judgment always true:
The most may err as grossly as the few.
And faultless kings run down, by common cry,
For vice, oppression, and for tyranny.
What standard is there in a fickle rout,
Which, flowing to the mark, runs faster out?
Nor only crowds, but Sanhedrins may be Infected with this public lunacy: [4]
And share the madness of rebellious times,
To murder monarchs for imagined crimes. [5]
If they may give and take whene'er they please,
Not kings alone, (the Godhead's images),
But government itself at length must fall
To Nature's state; where all have right to all.
Yet, grant our lords the people kings can make,
What prudent men a settled throne would shake?
For whatsoe'er their sufferings were before,
That change they covet makes them suffer more.

---

[1] From east to west his glories he displays Monmouth journeyed through England in 1680, hoping to attract popular support.

[2] Issachar Jacob's son. See Genesis 49:14–15. Here, the wealthy Thomas Thynne of Longleat, who entertained Monmouth on his progress.

[3] Endangered by a brother and a wife Oates accused both Charles's Queen and his brother James of conspiring to kill him.

[4] Sanhedrins See line 390 and note.

[5] To murder monarchs for imagined crimes Charles I was executed in 1649.

All other errors but disturb a state;
But innovation is the blow of Fate.
If ancient fabrics nod, and threat to fall,
To patch the flaws, and buttress up the wall, [1]
Thus far 'tis duty; but here fix the mark: [2]
For all beyond it is to touch our ark.
To change foundations, cast the frame anew,
Is work for rebels, who base ends pursue:
At once divine and human laws control;
And mend the parts by ruin of the whole.
The tampering world is subject to this curse,
To physic their disease into a worse. [3]
Now what relief can righteous David bring?
How fatal 'tis to be too good a king!
Friends he has few, so high the madness grows,
Who dare be such, must be the people's foes:
Yet some there were, e'en in the worst of days;
Some let me name, and naming is to praise.
In this short file Barzillai first appears; [4]
Barzillai, crowned with honour and with years:
Long since, the rising rebels he withstood
In region's waste, beyond the Jordan's flood:
Unfortunately brave to buoy the state;
But sinking underneath his master's fate:
In exile with his godlike prince he mourned;
For him he suffered, and with him returned.
The court he practised, not the courtier's art:
Large was his wealth, but larger was his heart:
Which well the noblest objects knew to choose,
The fighting warrior, and recording Muse.
His bed could once a fruitful issue boast:
Now more than half a father's name is lost.
His eldest hope, with every grace adorned,
By me (so Heaven will have it) always mourned,
And always honoured, snatched in manhood's prime
By unequal fates, and Providence's crime: [5]
Yet not before the goal of honour won,
All parts fulfilled of subject and of son;
Swift was the race, but short the time to run.
O narrow circle, but of power divine,
Scanted in space, but perfect in thy line!
By sea, by land, thy matchless worth was known;
Arms thy delight, and war was all thy own:
Thy force, infused, the fainting Tyrians propped: [6]
And haughty Pharaoh found his fortune stopped. [7]
O ancient honour! O unconquered hand,
Whom foes unpunished never could withstand!
But Israel was unworthy of thy name:
Short is the date of all immoderate fame.
It looks as Heaven our ruin had designed,
And durst not trust thy fortune and thy mind.
Now, free from Earth, thy disencumbered soul
Mounts up, and leaves behind the clouds and starry pole:
From thence thy kindred legions mayst thou bring
To aid the guardian angel of thy King.
Here stop my Muse, here cease thy painful flight;
No pinions can pursue immortal height: [8]
Tell good Barzillai thou canst sing no more,
And tell thy soul she should have fled before;
Or fled she with his life, and left this verse
To hang on her departed patron's hearse?
Now take thy steepy flight from Heaven, and see [9]
If thou canst find on earth another he;
Another he would be too hard to find,
See then whom thou canst see not far behind.

---

[1] nod sway (OED nod v 3).

[2] mark boundary (OED mark sb 1).

[3] To physic their disease into a worse Dryden was intelligent enough to observe that in his time, as occasionally in our own, medical treatment was more dangerous than the disease treated.

[4] Barzillai loyal to David during Absalom's rebellion (II Samuel 17:27–9; 19:31–9). Here, James Butler, Duke of Ormond (1610–1688), a model of loyalty to the crown.

[5] unequal unjust.

[6] Tyrians here, the Dutch.

[7] haughty Pharaoh Louis XIV of France.

[8] pinions wings.

[9] steepy precipitous.

Zadok the priest, whom, shunning power and place,
His lowly mind advanced to David's grace: [1]
With him the Sagan of Jerusalem, [2]
Of hospitable soul and noble stem;
Him of the western dome, whose weighty sense
Flows in fit words and heavenly eloquence. [3]
The prophets' sons by such example led,
To learning and to loyalty were bred: [4]
For colleges on bounteous kings depend,
And never rebel was to arts a friend.
To these succeed the pillars of the laws,
Who best could plead and best can judge a cause.
Next them a train of loyal peers ascend:
Sharp judging Adriel the Muses' friend,
Himself a Muse—In Sanhedrin's debate
True to his Prince; but not a slave of state [5]
Whom David's love with honours did adorn,
That from his disobedient son were torn.
Jotham of piercing wit and pregnant thought, [6]
Endued by nature, and by learning taught [7]
To move assemblies, who but only tried
The worse awhile, then chose the better side;
Nor chose alone, but turned the balance too;
So much the weight of one brave man can do.
Hushai, the friend of David in distress, In public storms of manly steadfastness; [8]
By foreign treaties he informed his youth;
And joined experience to his native truth.
His frugal care supplied the wanting throne,
Frugal for that, but bounteous of his own:
'Tis easy conduct when exchequers flow,
But hard the task to manage well the low:
For sovereign power is too depressed or high,
When kings are forced to sell, or crowds to buy.
Indulge one labour more my weary Muse,
For Amiel, who can Amiel's praise refuse? [9]
Of ancient race by birth, but nobler yet
In his own worth, and without title great:
The Sanhedrin long time as chief he ruled,
Their reason guided and their passion cooled;
So dext'rous was he in the crown's defence,
So formed to speak a loyal nation's sense,
That as their band was Israel's tribes in small,
So fit was he to represent them all.
Now rasher charioteers the seat ascend,
Whose loose careers his steady skill commend:
They like th' unequal ruler of the day, [10]
Misguide the seasons and mistake the way; [11]
While he withdrawn at their mad labour smiles,

---

[1] Zadok the priest Zadok and the Levites followed David out of the city when he was threatened by Absalom, but David commanded that they remain. The reference is to William Sancroft (1617–1693), Dean of St. Paul's and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury.

[2] the Sagan of Jerusalem The Sagan, deputy to the Jewish high priest, was the second highest temple functionary. The reference is to Henry Compton (1632–1713). Bishop of London from 1675, he supervised the Protestant education of James's children and opposed the Exclusion Bill.

[3] Him of the western dome John Dolben (1625–1686), Dean of Westminster from 1662.

[4] The prophets' sons the boys of Westminster School, probably the most influential school in seventeenth-century England, where Dryden, like Cowley, had been a King's Scholar.

[5] Adriel See I Samuel 18,19. The reference is to John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave (1648–1721), Dryden's patron.

[6] Jotham Jotham denounced Abimelech, the would-be usurper. The reference is to George Savile (1633–1695), trusted associate of Charles II.

[7] Endued endowed (OED endow v 7).

[8] Hushai, the friend of David in distress Hushai collaborated with David against Absalom during David's exile by staying in Jerusalem to spy on and mislead Absalom (II Samuel 15:32–7, 16:16–19, 17:5–16). The reference is to Lawrence Hyde (1642–1711), who opposed the exclusion of James from succession and, as one of Charles II's treasury commissioners, assisted Dryden financially.

[9] Amiel Amiel brought David supplies during his exile (II Samuel 17: 27–9). As Speaker in the House of Commons (1673–1678) Edward Seymour (1633–1708) strove to further the cause of the court; he opposed Exclusion.

[10] unequal not equal or capable of rule; inadequate (OED unequal 2b).

[11] th' unequal ruler of the day an allusion to Phaethon, son of Helios or Apollo. Phaethon asked to convey the Sun across the sky, but he could not control the immortal horses and threatened to set the world ablaze until Zeus killed him with a thunderbolt.

And safe enjoys the sabbath of his toils.
These were the chief, a small but faithful band
Of worthies, in the breach who dared to stand,
And tempt th' united fury of the land.
With grief they viewed such powerful engines bent,
To batter down the lawful government.
A numerous faction with pretended frights,
In Sanhedrins to plume the regal rights.[1]
The true successor from the court removed:
The Plot, by hireling witnesses improved.
These ills they saw, and as their duty bound,
They showed the King the danger of the wound:
That no concessions from the throne would please,
But lenitives fomented the disease:[2]
That Absalom, ambitious of the crown,
Was made the lure to draw the people down;
That false Achitophel's pernicious hate,
Had turned the Plot to ruin church and state:
The Council violent, the rabble worse[3]
That Shimei taught Jerusalem to curse.
With all these loads of injuries oppressed,
And long revolving in his careful breast
Th' event of things; at last his patience tired,
Thus from his royal throne, by Heaven inspired,
The god-like David spoke: with awful fear
His train their maker in their master hear.
"Thus long have I, by native mercy swayed,
My wrongs dissembled, my revenge delayed:
So willing to forgive th' offending age,
So much the father did the king assuage.
But now so far my clemency they slight,
Th' offenders question my forgiving right.
That one was made for many, they contend:
But 'tis to rule; for that's a monarch's end.
They call my tenderness of blood, my fear:
Though manly tempers can the longest bear.
Yet, since they will divert my native course,
'Tis time to show I am not good by force.
Those heaped affronts that haughty subjects bring,
Are burdens for a camel, not a king:
Kings are the public pillars of the state,
Born to sustain and prop the nation's weight:
If my young Samson will pretend a call
To shake the column, let him share the fall:[4]
But O that yet he would repent and live!
How easy 'tis for parents to forgive!
With how few tears a pardon might be won
From Nature, pleading for a darling son!
Poor pitied youth, by my paternal care,
Raised up to all the height his frame could bear:
Had God ordained his fate for empire born,
He would have given his soul another turn:
Gulled with a patriot's name, whose modern sense
Is one that would by law supplant his Prince:[5]
The people's brave, the politician's tool;[6]
Never was patriot yet, but was a fool.
Whence comes it that religion and the laws
Should more be Absalom's than David's cause?
His old instructor, ere he lost his place,
Was never thought endued with so much grace.
Good Heavens, how faction can a patriot paint!
My rebel ever proves my people's saint:
Would they impose an heir upon the throne?
Let Sanhedrins be taught to give their own.
A king's at least a part of government,
And mine as requisite as their consent:
Without my leave a future king to choose,
Infers a right the present to depose:

---

[1] to plume to pluck the feathers from; strip (OED plume v 1).

[2] lenitives mitigating or pallitative medicines (OED lenitive sb B 2); to "foment" is to stimulate or spread (OED foment v 4a).

[3] The Council violent The Privy Council, after being broadened in 1679 to include opposition leaders, was often the scene of violent debate.

[4] Samson See Judges 13–16.

[5] Gulled tricked (OED gull v^{3} 1).

[6] brave soldier; warrior; bully, hired assassin (OED brave sb 1 a, 1 b).

True, they petition me t' approve their choice,
But Esau's hands suit ill with Jacob's voice.[1]
My pious subjects for my safety pray,
Which to secure, they take my power away.
From plots and treasons Heaven preserve my years,
But save me most from my petitioners.
Unsatiate as the barren womb or grave;
God cannot grant so much as they can crave.
What then is left but with a jealous eye
To guard the small remains of royalty?
The law shall still direct my peaceful sway,
And the same law teach rebels to obey:
Votes shall no more established power control,
Such votes as make a part exceed the whole:
No groundless clamours shall my friends remove,
Nor crowds have power to punish ere they prove:
For gods, and godlike kings their care express,
Still to defend their servants in distress.
Oh that my power to saving were confined:
Why am I forced, like heaven, against my mind,
To make examples of another kind?
Must I at length the sword of justice draw?
Oh cursed effects of necessary law!
How ill my fear they by my mercy scan,[2]
Beware the fury of a patient man.
Law they require, let law then show her face;
They could not be content to look on grace,
Her hinder parts, but with a daring eye
To tempt the terror of her front, and die.[3]
By their own arts 'tis righteously decreed,
Those dire artificers of death shall bleed.
Against themselves their witnesses will swear,
Till viper-like their mother Plot they tear:
And suck for nutriment that bloody gore
Which was their principle of life before.
Their Belial with their Belzebub will fight;
Thus on my foes, my foes shall do me right:
Nor doubt th' event: for factious crowds engage
In their first onset, all their brutal rage;[4]
Then, let 'em take an unresisted course,
Retire, and traverse, and delude their force:
But when they stand all breathless, urge the fight,
And rise upon 'em with redoubled might:
For lawful power is still superior found,
When long driven back, at length it stands the ground."
He said. Th' Almighty, nodding, gave consent;
And peals of thunder shook the firmament.
Henceforth a series of new time began,
The mighty years in long procession ran:
Once more the godlike David was restored,
And willing nations knew their lawful lord.
—1681

Mac Flecknoe[5]

All human things are subject to decay,
And, when Fate summons, monarchs must obey:
This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus, young
Was called to empire, and had governed long:[6]
In prose and verse, was owned, without dispute
Through all the realms of Nonsense, absolute.
This aged prince, now flourishing in peace,
And blest with issue of a large increase,
Worn out with business, did at length debate

---

[1] Esau's hands suit ill with Jacob's voice In order to receive Isaac's blessing, Jacob disguised himself as his brother Esau (Genesis 27).

[2] scan judge (OED scan v 2b).

[3] To tempt the terror of her front, and die Moses was not allowed to see God's face. See Exodus 33:20–23.

[4] event outcome, result (OED event sb 3a).

[5] The title means "son of Flecknoe." Richard Flecknoe was a notoriously bad writer. The occasion of this poem was a debate between Dryden and Thomas Shadwell, a rival playwright. The poem constructs parallels between the handing on of Rome by Aeneas and the handing on of the mantle of dullness from Flecknoe to Shadwell. Neither Flecknoe nor Shadwell was Irish; the implication of Irishness in the title represents a persistent attitude to the Irish in English culture.

[6] like Augustus, young / Was called to empire Octavius Caesar became Emperor at the age of 32.

To settle the succession of the state:
And, pondering which of all his sons was fit
To reign, and wage immortal war with wit;
Cried, "'Tis resolved; for Nature pleads that he Should only rule, who most resembles me:
Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
Mature in dullness from his tender years.
Shadwell alone, of all my sons, is he
Who stands confirmed in full stupidity.
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense.
Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike through and make a lucid interval;
But Shadwell's genuine night admits no ray,
His rising fogs prevail upon the day:
Besides, his goodly fabric fills the eye, [1]
And seems designed for thoughtless majesty:
Thoughtless as monarch oaks, that shade the plain,
And, spread in solemn state, supinely reign. [2]
Heywood and Shirley were but types of thee,
Thou last great prophet of tautology: [3]
Even I, a dunce of more renown than they,
Was sent before but to prepare thy way:
And, coarsely clad in Norwich drugget, came
To teach the nations in thy greater name. [4]
My warbling lute, the lute I whilom strung [5]
When to King John of Portugal I sung, [6]
Was but the prelude to that glorious day,
When thou on silver Thames did'st cut thy way,
With well-timed oars before the royal barge,
Swelled with the pride of thy celestial charge;
And big with hymn, commander of an host,
The like was ne'er in Epsom blankets tost. [7]
Methinks I see the new Arion sail, [8]
The lute still trembling underneath thy nail.
At thy well-sharpened thumb from shore to shore
The treble squeaks for fear, the basses roar:
Echoes from Pissing-Ally, "Shadwell" call, [9]
And "Shadwell" they resound from Ashton Hall. [10]
About thy boat the little fishes throng,
As at the morning toast, that floats along.
Sometimes as prince of thy harmonious band
Thou wield'st thy papers in thy threshing hand.
St. Andre's feet ne'er kept more equal time, [11]
Not ev'n the feet of thy own Psyche's rhyme:
Though they in number as in sense excel;
So just, so like tautology they fell,
That, pale with envy, Singleton forswore
The lute and sword, which he in triumph bore, [12]
And vowed he ne'er would act Villerius more. [13]
Here stopped the good old sire, and wept for joy
In silent raptures of the hopeful boy.
All arguments, but most his plays, persuade,
That for anointed dullness he was made.

---

[1] goodly fabric large bulk; see OED fabric sb 3b.

[2] supinely indolently (OED supinely adv 2).

[3] Heywood and Shirley were but types of thee Thomas Heywood (?1570–1641) and James Shirley (1596–1666) were dramatists; a type is "a thing which prefigures, anticipates, or symbolizes another imperfectly" (OED type sb 1 1b).

[4] Norwich drugget Drugget is coarse woolen cloth (OED drugget sb 1a); Shadwell was a Norfolk man.

[5] whilom once (OED adv 2).

[6] King John of Portugal who, according to Flecknoe, had been his patron.

[7] Epsom blankets In Shadwell's Virtuoso, Sir Samuel Hearty, who believed himself to be a wit, was tossed in a blanket; there is also a reference to an affray in Epsom of June1676, when several men, among them Rochester and Etherege, tossed in a blanket fiddlers who had refused to play for them.

[8] According to Greek mythology, Arion was a celebrated musician who, returning from a profitable visit to Italy and Sicily, was thrown overboard by sailors, and was rescued by dolphins (OCD).

[9] Pissing-Ally near the Strand.

[10] Ashton Hall possibly a reference to the house of Edmund Ashton, one of Shadwell's friends.

[11] St. Andre choreographer of Shadwell's opera, Psyche.

[12] Singleton a musician at the Royal Theatre.

[13] Villerius character in William Davenant's opera Siege of Rhodes (1656).

Close to the walls which fair Augusta bind, [1]
(The fair Augusta much to fears inclined)
An ancient fabric, raisd t'inform the sight,
There stood of yore, and Barbican it hight: [2]
A watchtower once; but now, so fate ordains,
Of all the pile an empty name remains.
From its old ruins brothel-houses rise,
Scenes of lewd loves, and of polluted joys,
Where their vast courts the mother-strumpets keep,
And, undisturbed by watch, in silence sleep.
Near these a nursery erects its head,
Where queens are formed, and future heroes bred;
Where unfledged actors learn to laugh and cry,
Where infant punks their tender voices try, [3]
And little Maximins the gods defy. [4]
Great Fletcher never treads in buskins here,
Nor greater Johnson dares in socks appear. [5]
But gentle Simkin just reception finds
Amidst this monument of vanished minds: [6]
Pure clenches, the suburban Muse affords; [7]
And Panton waging harmless war with words.
Here Flecknoe, as a place to Fame well known,
Ambitiously designed his Shadwell's throne.
For ancient Decker prophesied long since, [8]
That in this pile should reign a mighty prince,
Born for a scourge of wit, and flail of sense:
To whom true dullness should some Psyches owe,
But worlds of Misers from his pen should flow;
Humorists and Hypocrites it should produce, [9]
Whole Raymond families, and tribes of Bruce. [10]
Now Empress Fame had published the renown
Of Shadwell's coronation through the town.
Rous'd by report of Fame, the nations meet,
From near Bun-Hill, and distant Watling-street. [11]
No Persian carpets spread th' imperial way,
But scattered limbs of mangled poets lay:
From dusty shops neglected authors come,
Martyrs of pies, and relics of the bum. [12]
Much Heywood, Shirley, Ogilby there lay, [13]
But loads of Shadwell almost choked the way.
Bilked stationers for yeomen stood prepared,
And Herringman was captain of the guard. [14]
The hoary prince in majesty appeared,
High on a throne of his own labours reared.
At his right hand our young Ascanius sat [15]
Rome's other hope, and pillar of the state.
His brows thick fogs, instead of glories, grace,
And lambent dullness played around his face. [16]
As Hannibal did to the altars come,
Sworn by his sire a mortal foe to Rome; [17]
So Shadwell swore, nor should his vow be vain,
That he till death true dullness would maintain;

---

[1] Augusta "the old name of London" (Dryden's note to Annus Mirabilis, line 1177).

[2] Barbican it hight It was called the Barbican; a fortification in the wall of London.

[3] punks prostitutes (OED punk sb 1).

[4] little Maximins Maximin was the raging atheist emperor in Dryden's Tyrannic Love (1670).

[5] Great Fletcher…greater Jonson John Fletcher (1579–1625) and Ben Jonson (1572–1637); buskins…socks Buskins were the high boots worn by tragic actors; socks were the low shoes or slippers of Athenian comedy.

[6] Simkin simpleton, a common name for a character in a farce.

[7] clenches word-plays (OED clench sb II 4).

[8] Decker a London dramatist (1572–1632).

[9] Misers, Humorists, and Hypocrites the titles of early plays by Shadwell.

[10] Raymond families, and tribes of Bruce Raymond and Bruce were characters in Shadwell's works.

[11] Bun-Hill…Watling-street Bunhill was in the City; Watling Street was a Roman road, a section of which ran through London.

[12] Martyrs of pies, and relics of the bum Unsold printed sheets were used to line pie-plates or as toilet paper.

[13] John Ogilby (1600–1676) translated Homer and Virgil.

[14] Bilked stationers publishers who lost money by their authors; Henry Herringman published both Shadwell and Dryden.

[15] Ascanius the son of Aeneas, he typified the ideal Roman youth (OCD).

[16] lambent playing lightly over the surface (OED lambent a 1b).

[17] Hannibal the Carthaginian general, whose father made him swear never to be a friend to Rome (OCD).

And in his father's right, and realm's defence,
Ne'er to have peace with wit, nor truce with sense.
The King himself the sacred unction made, [1]
As King by office, and as priest by trade:
In his sinister hand, instead of ball, [2]
He placed a mighty mug of potent ale;
Love's Kingdom to his right he did convey,
At once his sceptre and his rule of sway; [3]
Whose righteous lore the prince had practised young,
And from whose loins recorded Psyche sprung.
His temples, last, with poppies were o'erspread, [4]
That nodding seemed to consecrate his head:
Just at that point of time, if Fame not lie,
On his left hand twelve reverend owls did fly.
So Romulus, 'tis sung, by Tiber's brook,
Presage of sway from twice six vultures took. [5]
Th' admiring throng loud acclamations make,
And omens of his future empire take.
The sire then shook the honours of his head,
And from his brows damps of oblivion shed [6]
Full on the filial dullness: long he stood,
Repelling from his breast the raging God;
At length burst out in this prophetic mood:
"Heavens bless my son, from Ireland let him reign
To far Barbados on the western main;
Of his dominion may no end be known,
And greater than his father's be his throne.
Beyond Loves Kingdom let him stretch his pen;
He paused, and all the people cried "Amen."
Then thus, continued he, "My son, advance
Still in new impudence, new ignorance.
Success let others teach, learn thou from me
Pangs without birth, and fruitless industry.
Let Virtuosos in five years be writ;
Yet not one thought accuse thy toil of wit.
Let gentle George in triumph tread the stage, [7]
Make Dorimant betray, and Loveit rage; [8]
Let Cully, Cockwood, Fopling, charm the pit,
And in their folly show the writer's wit. [9]
Yet still thy fools shall stand in thy defence,
And justify their author's want of sense.
Let 'em be all by thy own model made
Of dullness, and desire no foreign aid:
That they to future ages may be known,
Not copies drawn, but issue of thy own.
Nay let thy men of wit too be the same,
All full of thee, and differing but in name;
But let no alien Sedley interpose
To lard with wit thy hungry Epsom prose. [10]
And when false flowers of rhetoric thou would'st cull,
Trust Nature, do not labour to be dull;
But write thy best, and top; and, in each line,
Sir Formal's oratory will be thine. [11]
Sir Formal, though unsought, attends thy quill,
And does thy northern dedications fill. [12]
Nor let false friends seduce thy mind to fame,
By arrogating Jonson's hostile name.
Let father Flecknoe fire thy mind with praise,
And Uncle Ogilby thy envy raise.

---

[1] the sacred unction the sacramental oil used in coronation ceremonies.

[2] In his sinister hand, instead of ball in his left hand, instead of the ball which symbolized the world in the coronation ceremony.

[3] Love's Kingdom one of Flecknoe's plays (1664).

[4] poppies instead of laurels, soporifics; an allusion to the fact that Shadwell took opium.

[5] twice six vultures Plutarch relates that Romulus was allowed to choose the site of Rome because he saw twelve vultures to Remus's six.

[6] honours adornments (OED honour sb 6b).

[7] gentle George Sir George Etherege (1636–1692), dramatist.

[8] Dorimant...Loveit characters in Etherege's well-known play The Man of Mode (1676).

[9] Cully, Cockwood, Fopling other characters from Etherege's comedies.

[10] Sir Charles Sedley (1638–1701) wrote a prologue to Shadwell's Epsom Wells and was said to have assisted in its composition.

[11] Sir Formal Sir Formal Trifle, a character in Shadwell's Virtuoso.

[12] northern dedications Shadwell dedicated several works to the Duke and Duchess of Newcastle.

Thou art my blood, where Jonson has no part;
What share have we in nature, or in art?
Where did his wit on learning fix a brand,
And rail at arts he did not understand?
Where made he love in Prince Nicander's vein, [1]
Or swept the dust in Psyche's humble strain?
Where sold he bargains, 'whip-stitch', 'kiss my arse',
Promised a play and dwindled to a farce?
When did his muse from Fletcher scenes purloin,
As thou whole Eth'rege dost transfuse to thine?
But so transfused as oil on water's flow,
His always float above, thine sinks below.
This is thy province, this thy wondrous way,
New humours to invent for each new play:
This is that boasted bias of thy mind,
By which one way, to dullness, 'tis inclined.
Which makes thy writings lean on one side still,
And ,in all changes, that way bends thy will.
Nor let thy mountain belly make pretence
Of likeness; thine's a tympany of sense. [2]
A tun of man in thy large bulk is writ, [3]
But sure thou'rt but a kilderkin of wit. [4]
Like mine, thy gentle numbers feebly creep,
Thy tragic Muse gives smiles, thy comic sleep.
With whate'er gall thou sett'st thy self to write,
Thy inoffensive satires never bite.
In thy felonious heart, though venom lies,
It does but touch thy Irish pen, and dies.
Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame
In keen iambics, but mild anagram: [5]
Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command
Some peaceful province in acrostic land. [6]
There thou mayest wings display and altars raise, [7]
And torture one poor word ten thousand ways.
Or if thou would'st thy different talents suit,
Set thy own songs, and sing them to thy lute."
He said, but his last words were scarcely heard,
For Bruce and Longvil had a Trap prepared,
And down they sent the yet declaiming bard. [8]
Sinking he left his drugget robe behind,
Borne upwards by a subterranean wind.
The mantle fell to the young prophet's part, [9]
With double portion of his father's art.
—1682

---

[1] Prince Nicander's vein Nicander is a character in Psyche.

[2] tympany a swelling often figured as a disease; bombast (OED tympany 2).

[3] tun large cask for liquids (OED tun sb 1).

[4] kilderkin a cask for liquids, fish etc.; half a barrrel (OED kilderkin 1).

[5] keen iambics biting satiric verse (OED iambic B sb); compare Cleveland, "The Rebel Scot," lines 27–28: "Come keen Iambicks, with your Badger's feet, / And Badger-like, bite till your teeth do meet."

[6] Some peaceful province in acrostic land An acrostic is a poem whose initial letters spell out a word.

[7] wings display and altars raise Dryden is thinking of Herbert's "Easter Wings" and "The Altar."

[8] Bruce and Longvil In The Virtuoso, Clarinda and Miranda lower Sir Formal through a trapdoor while he speaks. Bruce and Longvil are audience to the trick.

[9] While Elijah, carried in a chariot of fire upon a whirlwind, was borne to heaven, his mantle descended upon his successor, Elisha (II Kings 2: 9–14).

Religio Laici
or A Layman's Faith [1]

Ornari res ipsa negat; contenta doceri [2]

THE PREFACE

A poem with so bold a title, and a name prefixed, from which the handling of so serious a subject would not be expected, may reasonably oblige the author, to say somewhat in defence both of himself, and of his undertaking. In the first place, if it be objected to me that being a layman, I ought not to have concerned myself with speculations, which belong to the profession of divinity; I could answer, that perhaps, laymen, with equal advantages of parts and knowledge, are not the most incompetent judges of sacred things; but in the due sense of my own weakness and want of learning, I plead not this: I pretend not to make my self a judge of faith, in others, but only to make a confession of my own; I lay no unhallowed hand upon the ark;[3] but wait on it, with the reverence that becomes me at a distance: In the next place I will ingenuously confess, that the helps I have used in this small treatise, were many of them taken from the works of our own reverend divines of the Church of England; so that the weapons with which I combat irreligion, are already consecrated; though I suppose they may be taken down as lawfully as the sword of Goliah was by David,[4] when they are to be employed for the common cause, against the enemies of piety. I intend not by this to entitle them to any of my errors;[5] which, yet, I hope are only those of charity to mankind; and such as my own charity has caused me to commit, that of others may more easily excuse. Being naturally inclined to scepticism in philosophy, I have no reason to impose my opinions, in a subject which is above it: But whatever they are, I submit them with all reverence to my Mother Church, accounting them no further mine, than as they are authorized, or at least, uncondemned by her. And, indeed, to secure my self on this side, I have used the necessary precaution, of showing this paper before it was published to a judicious and learned friend, a man indefatigably zealous in the service of the Church and State: and whose writings, have highly deserved of both. He was pleased to approve the body of the discourse, and I hope he is more my friend, than to do it out of complaisance:[6] 'Tis true he had too good a taste to like it all; and amongst some other faults recommended to my second view, what I have written, perhaps too boldly on St. Athanasius:[7] which he advised me wholly to omit. I am sensible enough that I had done more prudently to have followed his opinion:[8] But then I could not have satisfied myself, that I had done honestly not to have written what was my own. It has always been my thought, that heathens, who never did, nor without miracle could hear of the name of Christ were yet in a possibility of salvation. Neither will it enter easily into my belief, that before the coming of our Saviour, the whole world, excepting only the Jewish nation, should lie under the inevitable necessity of everlasting punishment, for want of that revelation, which was confined to so small a spot of ground as that of Palestine. Among the sons of Noah we read of one only who was accursed; and if a blessing in the ripeness of time was reserved for Japhet, (of whose progeny we are,) it seems unaccountable to me, why so many generations of the same offspring, as preceded our saviour in the flesh, should be all involved in one common condemnation, and yet that their posterity should be entitled to the hopes of salvation: As if a bill of exclusion[1] had passed only on the fathers, which debarred not the sons from their succession. Or that so many ages had been delivered over to Hell, and so many reserved for Heaven, and that the Devil had the first choice, and God the next. Truly I am apt to think, that the revealed religion which was taught by Noah to all his sons, might continue for some ages in the whole posterity. That afterwards it was included wholly in the family of Sem is manifest: but when the progenies of Cham and Japhet swarmed into colonies, and those colonies were subdivided into many others; in process of time their descendants lost by little and little the primitive and purer rites of divine worship, retaining only the notion of one deity; to which succeeding generations added others: (for men took their degrees in those ages from conquerors to Gods.) Revelation being thus eclipsed to almost all Mankind, the light of Nature as the next in dignity was substituted; and that is it which St. Paul concludes to be the rule of the heathens; and by which they are hereafter to be judged. If my supposition be true, then the consequence which I have assumed in my poem may be also true; namely, that deism, or the principles of natural worship,[2] are only the faint remnants or dying flames of revealed religion in the posterity of Noah: And that our modern philosophers, nay and some of our philosophising divines have too much exalted the faculties of our souls, when they have maintained that by their force, Mankind has been able to find out that there is one supreme agent or intellectual being which we call God:[3] that praise and prayer are his due worship; and the rest of those deducements, which I am confident are the remote effects of revelation, and unattainable by our discourse,[4] I mean as simply considered, and without the benefit of divine illumination. So that we have not lifted up ourselves to God, by the weak pinions of our Reason, but he has been plead to descend to us; and what Socrates said of him, what Plato writ, and the rest of the heathen philosophers of several nations, is all no more than the twilight of revelation, after the sun of it was set in the race of Noah. That there is something above us, some principle of motion, our reason can apprehend, though it cannot discover what it is, by its own virtue. And indeed 'tis very improbable, that we, who by the strength of our faculties cannot enter into the knowledge of any being, not so much as of our own, should be able to find out by them, that Supreme Nature, which we cannot otherwise define, than by saying it is infinite; as if infinite were definable, or infinity a subject for our narrow understanding. They who would prove religion by Reason, do but weaken the cause which they endeavour to support: 'tis to take away the pillars from our faith, and to prop it only with a twig: 'tis to design a tower like that of Babel,[5] which if it were possible (as it is not) to reach Heaven, would come to nothing by the confusion of the workmen. For every man is building a several way;[1] impotently conceited of his own model, and his own materials: Reason is always striving, and always at a loss, and of necessity it must so come to pass, while 'tis exercised about that which is not its proper object. Let us be content at last, to know God, by his own methods; at least so much of him, as he is pleased to reveal to us, in the sacred Scriptures; to apprehend them to be the word of God, is all our reason has to do; for all beyond it is the work of faith, which is the seal of Heaven impressed upon our human understanding.

---

[1] This poem was occasioned by a translated work of biblical criticism, Father Richard Simon's Critical History of the Old Testament. Simon's discussion of the problems of the biblical text, with its many manuscript variants, concludes that they justify Catholicism's interpreting the Bible in the light of its own traditions. Dryden saw that discussion of textual problems could lead to denial of the supernatural authority of scripture, and in the poem presents himself as an Anglican whose faith is biblically based. In the poem Dryden attacks Deism, Catholic authoritarianism, and the Dissenters. There is some irony here, because Dryden ended his days as a Roman Catholic.

[2] "My subject is content to be taught; and scorns adornment" (Manilius, Astronomica 3.39).

[3] See I Chronicles 13:9–10, where Uzza touches the ark and is killed as a result.

[4] After David has killed Goliath, he receives Goliath's sword from Abimelech (I Samuel 21:8–9).

[5] to entitle them impute to them (OED 5c).

[6] complaisance courtesy.

[7] Athanasius See note, p. 995.

[8] sensible aware, cognizant (OED 11a).

---

[1] an attempt (1680–81) to keep James from becoming King.

[2] Deists contend that a supreme being set the world in motion and that our rationality is sufficient to discover this and bring us to worship Him. They reject a more 'conventional' Christian stress on supernatural revelation.

[3] intellectual being apprehended only through our intellect (OED 2).

[4] discourse reasoning; rationality (OED 2).

[5] See Genesis 2.

And now for what concerns the Holy Bishop Athanasius,[2] the preface of whose creed seems inconsistent with my opinion; which is, that heathens may possibly be saved; in the first place I desire it may be considered that it is the preface only, not the creed itself, which, (till I am better informed) is of too hard a digestion for my charity. 'Tis not that I am ignorant how many several texts of Scripture seemingly support that cause; but neither am I ignorant how all those texts may receive a kinder, and more mollified interpretation. Every man who is read in church history, knows that belief was drawn up after a long contestation with Arius,[3] concerning the divinity of our blessed Saviour, and his being one substance with the Father; and that thus compiled, it was sent abroad among the Christian churches, as a kind of test, which whosoever took, was looked on as an orthodox believer. 'Tis manifest from hence, that the heathen part of the empire was not concerned in it: for its business was not to distinguish betwixt pagans and Christians, but betwixt heretics and true believers. This, well considered, takes off the heavy weight of censure, which I would willingly avoid from so venerable a man; for if this proportion, whosoever will be saved, be restrained only, to those to whom it was intended, and for whom it was composed, I mean the Christians; then the anathema,[4] reaches not the heathens, who had never heard of Christ, and were nothing interested in that dispute. After all, I am far from blaming even that prefatory addition to the creed, and as far from cavilling at the continuation of it in the liturgy of the Church; where on the days appointed, 'tis publicly read:[5] for I suppose there is the same reason for it now, in opposition to the Socinians,[6] as there was then against the Arians; the one being a heresy, which seems to have been refined out of the other; and with how much more plausibility of reason it combats our religion, with so much more caution to be avoided: and therefore the prudence of our Church is to be commended which has interposed her authority for the recommendation of this creed. Yet to such as are grounded in the true belief, those explanatory creeds, the Nicene[7] and this of Athanasius might perhaps be spared: for what is supernatural, will always be a mystery in spite of exposition: and for my own part the plain Apostle's Creed, is most suitable to my weak understanding; as the simplest diet is the most easy of digestion.

I have dwelt longer on this subject than I intended; and longer than, perhaps, I ought; for having laid down, as my foundation, that the scripture is a rule; that in all things needful to salvation, it is clear, sufficient, and ordained by God Almighty for that purpose, I have left myself no right to interpret obscure places, such as concern the possibility of eternal happiness to heathens: because whatsoever is obscure is concluded not necessary to be known.

---

[1] several separate, distinct.

[2] Bishop of Alexandria, St. Athanasius (296–373) opposed the Arian heresy (below). Before he begins his written argument, Athanasius asserts that all those who do not hold the Catholic faith are automatically condemned to oblivion.

[3] An Alexandrian presbyter, Arius (256–336) opposed the idea that Christ was divine (consubstantial with God), as well as the doctrine of the Trinity (the idea that father, son, and the Holy Spirit together constitute one God).

[4] anathema God's curse, whereby a person is consigned to Satan.

[5] The Book of Common Prayer assigns certain days when the Athanasian creed should be used instead of the Apostle's Creed.

[6] Socinians Renaissance sect which accepted Arian claims.

[7] statement of Christian belief conceived at the first Council of Nicea, to combat the Arian heresy.

But, by asserting the scripture to be the canon of our faith, I have unavoidably created to myself two sorts of enemies: The Papists indeed, more directly, because they have kept the scripture from us, what they could; and have reserved to themselves a right of interpreting what they have delivered under the pretence of infallibility: and the fanatics more collaterally, because they have assumed what amounts to an infallibility in the private spirit: and have detorted those texts of scripture, which are not necessary to salvation, to the damnable uses of sedition, disturbance and destruction of the civil government. To begin with the Papists, and to speak freely, I think them the less dangerous (at least in appearance) to our present state; for not only the penal laws are in force against them, and their number is contemptible; but also their peerage and commons are excluded from parliaments, and consequently those laws in no probability of being repealed. A general and uninterrupted plot of their clergy, ever since the Reformation, I suppose all protestants believe. For 'tis not reasonable to think but that so many of their orders, as were ousted from their fat possessions, would endeavour a reentrance against those whom they account heretics. As for the late design, Mr. Coleman's letters, for ought I know are the best evidence; and what they discover, without wire-drawing their sense, or malicious glosses, all men of reason conclude credible.[1] If there be any thing more than this required of me, I must believe it as well as I am able, in spite of the witnesses, and out of a decent conformity to the votes of parliament: For I suppose the fanatics will not allow the private spirit in this case: Here the infallibility is at least in one part of the government; and our understandings as well as our wills are represented. But to return to the Roman Catholics, how can we be secure from the practice of Jesuited Papists in that religion? For not two or three of that Order, as some of them would impose upon us, but almost the whole body of them are of opinion, that their infallible master has a right over kings, not only in spirituals but temporals. Not to name Mariana, Bellarmine, Emanuel Sa, Molina, Santarel, Simancha, and at the least twenty others of foreign countries; we can produce of our own nation, Campian, and Doleman or Parsons, besides many are named whom I have not read, who all of them attest this doctrine, that the Pope can depose and give away the right of any sovereign prince, si vel paulum deflexerit, if he shall never so little warp: but if he once comes to be excommunicated, then the bond of obedience is taken off from subjects; and they may and ought to drive him like another Nebuchadnezzar, ex hominum Christianorum Dominatu, from exercising dominion over Christians: and to this they are bound by virtue of divine precept, and by all the ties of conscience under no less penalty than damnation. If they answer me (as a learned priest has lately written,) that this doctrine of the Jesuits is not de fide [an article of faith], and that consequently they are not obliged by it, they must pardon me, if I think they have nothing to the purpose; for 'tis a Maxim in their church, where points of faith are not decided, and that doctors are of contrary opinions, they may follow which part they please; but more safely the most received and most authorized. And their champion Bellarmine has told the world, in his apology, that the King of England is a vassal to the Pope, ratione directi Dominii, and that he holds in villeinage of his Roman landlord.[1] Which is no new claim put in for England. Our chronicles are his authentic witnesses, that King John was deposed by the same plea, and Philip Augustus admitted tenant. And which makes the more for Bellarmine, the French king was again ejected when our King submitted to the church, and the crown received under the sordid condition of a vassalage.

---

[1] Edward Coleman, executed in 1678 for conspiring to re-establish Catholicism in England.

'Tis not sufficient for the more moderate and well-meaning Papists, (of which I doubt not there are many) to produce the evidences of their loyalty to the late King, and to declare their innocency in this plot; I will grant their behaviour in the first, to have been as loyal and as brave as they desire; and will be willing to hold them excused as to the second, (I mean when it comes to my turn, and after my betters; for 'tis a madness to be sober alone, while the nation continues drunk:) but that saying of their father Cres:[2] is still running in my head, that they may be dispensed with in their obedience to an heretic prince, while the necessity of the times shall oblige them to it: (for that [as another of them tells us,] is only the effect of Christian prudence) but when once they shall get power to shake him off, an heretic is no lawful king, and consequently to rise against him is no rebellion. I should be glad therefore, that they would follow the advice which was charitably given them by a reverend prelate of our church; namely, that they would join in a public act of disowning and detesting those Jesuitick principles; and subscribe to all doctrines which deny the Pope's authority of deposing kings, and releasing subjects from their oath of allegiance: to which I should think they might easily be induced, if it be true that this present Pope has condemned the doctrine of king-killing (a thesis of the Jesuits) amongst others ex Cathedra (as they call it) or in open consistory.

Leaving them, therefore, in so fair a way (if they please themselves) of satisfying all reasonable men, of their sincerity and good meaning to the government, I shall make bold to consider that other extreme of our religion, I mean the fanatics, or schismatics, of the English church. Since the Bible has been translated into our tongue, they have used it so, as if their business was not to be saved but to be damned by its contents. If we consider only them, better had it been for the English nation, that it had still remained in the original Greek and Hebrew, or at least in the honest Latin of St. Jerome, than that several texts in it, should have been prevaricated to the destruction of that government, which put it into so ungrateful hands.

How many heresies the first translation of Tyndal produced in few years,[3] let my Lord Herbert's history of Henry the Eighth inform you; insomuch that for the gross errors in it, and the great mischiefs it occasioned, a sentence passed on the first edition of the Bible, too shameful almost to be repeated. After the short reign of Edward the Sixth (who had continued to carry on the Reformation, on other principles than it was begun) every one knows that not only the chief promoters of that work, but many others, whose consciences would not dispense with popery, were forced, for fear of persecution, to change climates: from whence returning at the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, many of them who had been in France, and at Geneva, brought back the rigid opinions and imperious discipline of Calvin, to graft upon our Reformation. Which, though they cunningly concealed at first (as well knowing how nauseously that drug would go down in a lawful monarchy, which was prescribed for a rebellious commonwealth), yet they always kept it in reserve; and were never wanting to themselves either in court or parliament, when either they had any prospect of a numerous party of fanatic members in the one, or the encouragement of any favourite in the other, whose covetousness was gaping at the patrimony of the church. They who will consult the works of our venerable Hooker,[1] or the account of his life, or more particularly the letter written to him on this subject, by George Cranmer, may see by what gradations they proceeded; from the dislike of cap and surplice, the very next step was admonitions to the parliament against the whole government ecclesiastical: then came out volumes in English and Latin in defence of their tenets: and immediately, practices were set on foot to erect their discipline without authority. Those not succeeding, satire and railing was the next: And Martin Mar-Prelate (the Marvel of those times) was the first Presbyterian scribbler, who sanctified libels and scurrility to the use of the good old cause.[2] Which was done (says my author) upon this account; that (their serious treatises having been fully answered and refuted) they might compass by railing what they had lost by reasoning; and when their cause was sunk in court and parliament, they might at least hedge in a stake amongst the rabble: for to their ignorance all things are wit which are abusive; but if church and state were made the theme, then the doctoral degree of wit was to be taken at Billingsgate: even the most saintlike of the party, though they durst not excuse this contempt and vilifying of the government, yet were pleased, and grinned at it with a pious smile; and called it a judgment of God against the hierarchy. Thus sectaries, we may see, were born with teeth, foul-mouthed and scurrilous from their infancy: and if spiritual pride, venom, violence, contempt of superiors and slander had been the marks of orthodox belief; the Presbytery and the rest of our schismatics, which are their spawn, were always the most visible church in the Christian world.

---

[1] villeinage tenure in service to a feudal lord.

[2] Cres Hugh Cressy, English chaplain to Queen Catherine.

[3] Tyndal William Tyndale (?1490–1536); his translation provided the basis for most of the Authorized version.

'Tis true, the government was too strong at that time for a rebellion; but to show what proficiency they had made in Calvin's school, even then their mouths watered at it: for two of their gifted brotherhood (Hacket and Coppinger) as the story tells us, got up into a pease-cart, and harangued the people, to dispose them to an insurrection, and to establish their discipline by force:[3] so that however it comes about, that now they celebrate Queen Elizabeth's birth-night, as that of their saint and patroness; yet then they were for doing the work of the Lord by arms against her; and in all probability, they wanted but a fanatic Lord Mayor and two sheriffs of their party to have compassed it.

Our venerable Hooker, after many admonitions which he had given them, toward the end of his preface, breaks out into this prophetic speech. "There is in every one of these considerations most just cause to fear, lest our hastiness to embrace a thing of so perilous consequence (meaning the 'Presbyterian discipline') should cause posterity to feel those evils, which as yet are more easy for us to prevent, than they would be for them to remedy."

How fatally this Cassandra has foretold we know too well by sad experience: the seeds were sown in the time of Queen Elizabeth, the bloody harvest ripened in the reign of King Charles the Martyr: and because all the sheaves could not be carried off without shedding some of the loose grains, another crop is too like to follow; nay I fear 'tis unavoidable if the conventiclers be permitted still to scatter.

A man may be suffered to quote an adversary to our religion, when he speaks truth: and 'tis the observation of Meimbourg in his History of Calvinism, that where-ever that discipline was planted and embraced, rebellion, civil war and misery attended it. And how indeed should it happen otherwise? Reformation of church and state has always been the ground of our divisions in England. While we were Papists, our Holy Father rid us, by pretending authority out of the scriptures to depose princes, when we shook off his authority, the sectaries furnished themselves with the same weapons, and out of the same magazine, the Bible. So that the scriptures, which are in themselves the greatest security of governors, as commanding express obedience to them, are now turned to their destruction; and never since the Reformation has there wanted a text of their interpreting to authorize a rebel. And 'tis to be noted by the way, that the doctrines of king-killing and deposing, which have been taken up only by the worst party of the Papists, the most frontless flatterers of the Pope's authority, have been espoused, defended and are still maintained by the whole body of nonconformists and republicans. 'Tis but dubbing themselves the People of God, which 'tis the interest of their preachers to tell them they are, and their own interest to believe; and after that, they cannot dip into the Bible, but one text or another will turn up for their purpose: If they are under persecution (as they call it,) then that is a mark of their election; if they flourish, then God works miracles for their deliverance, and the saints are to possess the earth.

---

[1] Hooker Richard Hooker (?1554–1600); his Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity was the standard defence of the Church of England.

[2] Martin Mar-Prelate the pseudonymous author of a series of surreptitiously printed anti-episcopal tracts (1588–89); Dryden links their use of satire to the polemical work of Andrew Marvell.

[3] Hacket and Coppinger a self-proclaimed Messiah and his disciple; William Hacket was executed in 1591, Edmund Coppinger died in prison in 1592.

They may think themselves to be too roughly handled in this paper; but I who know best how far I could have gone on this subject, must be bold to tell them they are spared: though at the same time I am not ignorant that they interpret the mildness of a writer to them, as they do the mercy of the government; in the one they think it fear, and conclude it weakness in the other. The best way for them to confute me, is, as I before advised the Papists, to disclaim their principles, and renounce their practices. We shall all be glad to think them true Englishmen when they obey the King, and true Protestants when they conform to the church discipline.

It remains that I acquaint the reader, that the verses were written for an ingenious young gentleman my friend; upon his translation of The Critical History of the Old Testament, composed by the learned Father Simon: the verses therefore are addressed to the translator of that work, and the style of them is, what it ought to be, epistolary.[1]

If any one be so lamentable a critic as to require the smoothness, the numbers and the turn of heroic poetry in this poem; I must tell him, that if he has not read Horace, I have studied him, and hope the style of his epistles is not ill imitated here. The expressions of a poem, designed purely for instruction, ought to be plain and natural, and yet majestic: for here the poet is presumed to be a kind of law-giver, and those three qualities which I have named are proper to the legislative style. The florid, elevated and figurative way is for the passions; for love and hatred, fear and anger, are begotten in the soul by showing their objects out of their true proportion; either greater than the life, or less; but instruction is to be given by showing them what they naturally are. A man is to be cheated into passion, but to be reasoned into truth.

Religio Laici
(excerpts)

Dim, as the borrow'd beams of moon and stars
To lonely, weary, wandering travellers,
Is Reason to the soul: and as on high,
Those rolling fires discover but the sky
Not light us here; so Reason's glimmering ray
Was lent, not to assure our doubtful way,
But guide us upward to a better day.
And as those nightly tapers disappear
When day's bright Lord ascends our hemisphere;
So pale grows Reason at religion's sight;
So dies, and so dissolves in supernatural light.

---

[1] my friend Henry Dickinson.

Some few, whose lamp shone brighter, have been led
From cause to cause, to Nature's secret head;
And found that one first principle must be:
But what, or who, that UNIVERSAL HE;
Whether some soul encompassing this ball
Unmade, unmod'd; yet making, moving all;
Or various atoms interfering dance
Leapt into form, (the noble work of chance;)
Or this great all was from eternity;
Not ev'n the stagirite himself could see;
And Epicurus guess'd as well as he:
As blindly grop'd they for a future state;
As rashly judg'd of providence and fate:
But least of all could their endeavours find
What most concern'd the good of humane kind:[1]
For happiness was never to be found;
But vanish'd from 'em, like enchanted ground.
One thought content the good to be enjoy'd:
This, every little accident destroy'd:
The wiser madmen did for virtue toil:
A thorny, or at best a barren soil:
In pleasure some their glutton souls would steep;
But found their line too short, the well too deep;
And leaky vessels which no bliss cou'd keep.
Thus, anxious thoughts in endless circles roll,
Without a centre where to fix the soul:
In this wild maze their vain endeavours end.
How can the less the greater comprehend?
Or finite reason reach infinity?
For what cou'd fathom GOD were more than he.
  The Deist thinks he stands for firmer ground;
Cries ευρεκα: the might secret's found:
God is that spring of good; supreme, and best;
We, made to serve, and in that service blest;
If so, some rules of worship must be given,
Distributed alike to all by Heaven:
Else God were partial, and to some deny'd
The means his justice shou'd for all provide.
This general worship is to PRAISE, and PRAY:
One part to borrow blessings, one to pay:
And when frail Nature slides into offence,
The sacrifice for crimes is penitence.
Yet, since th' effects of providence, we find
Are variously dispens'd to humane kind;
That vice triumphs, and virtue suffers here,
(A brand that sovereign justice cannot bear;)
Our reason prompts us to a future state:
The last appeal from fortune, and from fate:
Where God's all-righteous ways will be declar'd;
The bad meet punishment, the good, reward.
  Thus Man by his own strength to Heaven wou'd soar:[2]
And wou'd not be oblig'd to God for more.
Vain, wretched creature, how art thou misled
To think thy wit these God-like notions bred!
These truths are not the product of thy mind,
But dropped from Heaven, and of a nobler kind.
Reveal'd religion first inform'd thy sight,
And Reason saw not, till faith sprung the light.
Hence all thy natural worship takes the source:
'Tis revelation what thou thinkst discourse.
Else, how com'st thou to see these truths so clear,
Which so obscure to heathens did appear?
Not Plato these, nor Aristotle found:
Nor he whose wisdom oracles renown'd.[3]
Hast thou a wit so deep, or so sublime,
Or canst thou lower dive, or higher climb?
Canst thou, by reason, more of God-head know
Than Plutarch, Seneca, or Cicero?
Those giant wits, in happier ages born,
(When arms, and arts did Greece and Rome adorn)
Knew no such system: no such piles cou'd raise
Of natural worship, built on pray'r and praise,
To one sole GOD.
Nor did remorse, to expiate sin, prescribe:
But slew their fellow creatures for a bribe:

---

[1] "Opinions of the several sects of philosophers concerning the summum bonum" (Dryden's marginal note).

[2] "Of revealed religion" (Dryden's marginal note).

[3] "Socrates" (Dryden's marginal note).

The guiltless victim groan'd for their offence;
And cruelty, and blood was penitence.
If sheep and oxen cou'd atone for men
Ah! at how cheap a rate the rich might sin!
And great oppressors might Heaven's wrath beguile
By offering his own creatures for a spoil!
Dar'st thou, poor worm, offend infinity?
And must the terms of peace be given by thee?
Then thou art justice in the last appeal;
Thy easy God instructs thee to rebel:
And, like a King remote, and weak, must take
What satisfaction thou art pleas'd to make.
But if there be a pow'r too just, and strong
To wink at crimes, and bear unpunish'd wrong;
Look humbly upward, see his will disclose:
The forfeit first, and then the fine impose:
A mulct thy poverty cou'd never pay
Had not eternal wisdom found the way:
And with celestial wealth supply'd thy store:
His justice makes the fine, his mercy quits the score.
See God descending in thy humane frame;
Th' offended, suff'ring in th' offenders name:
All thy misdeeds to him imputed see,
And all his righteousness devolv'd on thee.

. . . .

THE CONCLUSION

What then remains, but, waiving each extreme,
The tides of ignorance, and pride to stem?
Neither so rich a treasure to forgo;
Nor proudly seek beyond our pow'r to know:
Faith is not built on disquisitions vain;
The things we must believe, are few, and plain:
But since men will believe more than they need;
And every man will make himself a creed:
In doubtful questions 'tis the safest way
To learn what unsuspected ancients say:
For 'tis not likely we shou'd higher soar
In search of Heav'n, than all the church before:
Nor can we be deceiv'd, unless we see
The scripture, and the fathers disagree.
If after all, they stand suspected still,
(For no man's faith depends upon his will;)
'Tis some relief, that points not clearly known,
Without much hazard may be let alone:
And, after hearing what our Church can say,
If still our Reason runs another way,
That private reason 'tis more just to curb,
Than by disputes the public peace disturb.
For points obscure are of small use to learn:
But common quiet is mankind's concern.
Thus have I made my own opinions clear:
Yet neither praise expect, nor censure fear:
And this unpolish'd, rugged verse, I chose;
As fittest for discourse, and nearest prose:
For, while from sacred truth I do not swerve,
Tom Sternhold's, or Tom Shadwell's rhymes will serve.
—1682

A Song for St Cecilia's Day, 1687[1]

I

From harmony, from heav'nly harmony
This universal frame began.[2]
When Nature underneath a heap
Of jarring atoms lay,
And could not heave her head,
The tuneful voice was heard from high,
Arise ye more than dead.
Then cold, and hot, and moist, and dry,[3]
In order to their stations leap,

---

[1] Dryden wrote two odes for a series of celebrations of St. Cecilia's Day (November 22) organized by the "Gentlemen Lovers of Musick." This is the first; the second, "Alexander's Feast," was written some ten years later. Both were later set to music by Handel, and both were performed at the Theatre Royal on November 22, 1739. There is an excellent Archive recording of "A Song for St Cecilia's Day" by The English Concert Choir, directed by Trevor Pinnock.

[2] universal frame the universe, or physical world.

[3] cold, and hot, and moist, and dry corresponding to the "four elements" of earth, water, air and fire.

And music's power obey.
From harmony, from heav'nly harmony
This universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in Man. [1]

II

What passion cannot music raise and quell!
When Jubal struck the corded shell, [2]
His list'ning brethren stood around
And wond'ring, on their faces fell
To worship that celestial sound.
Less than a God they thought there could not dwell
Within the hollow of that shell
That spoke so sweetly and so well.
What passion cannot music raise and quell!

III

The trumpet's loud clangour
Excites us to arms
With shrill notes of anger
And mortal alarms.
The double double double beat
Of the thundering DRUM
Cries, hark the foes come;
Charge, charge, 'tis too late to retreat.

IV

The soft complaining FLUTE
In dying notes discovers
The woes of hopeless lovers,
Whose dirge is whisper'd by the warbling LUTE.

V

Sharp VIOLINS proclaim
Their jealous pangs, and desperation,
Fury, frantic indignation,
Depth of pains, and height of passion,
For the fair, disdainful dame.

VI

But oh! what art can teach
What human voice can reach
The sacred ORGANS praise?
Notes inspiring holy love,
Notes that wing their heav'nly ways
To mend the choirs above.

VII

Orpheus could lead the savage race;
And trees unrooted left their place;
Sequacious of the lyre: [3]
But bright CECILIA rais'd the wonder higher;
When to her ORGAN, vocal breath was given
An angel heard, and straight appeared
Mistaking Earth for Heaven.

GRAND CHORUS

As from the power of sacred lays
The spheres began to move,
And sung the great creator's praise
To all the bless'd above;
So when the last and dreadful hour
This crumbling pageant shall devour,
The TRUMPET shall be heard on high,
The dead shall live, the living die,
And MUSIC shall untune the sky.
—1687

---

[1] diapason the whole range of notes (OED diapason sb 3c, this place cited).

[2] Jubal "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ" (Genesis 4:21).

[3] Orpheus "the bard of Thrace" who "drew the trees, held beasts enthralled and constrained stones to follow him" (Ovid, Metamorphoses 1); Sequacious of following.

To the Memory of Mr. Oldham[1]

Farewell, too little and too lately known,
Whom I began to think and call my own;
For sure our souls were near allied; and thine
Cast in the same poetic mould with mine.
One common note on either lyre did strike,
And knaves and fools we both abhorred alike:
To the same goal did both our studies drive,
The last set out the soonest did arrive.[2]
Thus Nisus fell upon the slippery place,
While his young friend perform'd and won the race.[3]
O early ripe! to thy abundant store
What could advancing age have added more?
It might (what Nature never gives the young)
Have taught the numbers of thy native tongue.[4]
But satire needs not those, and wit will shine
Through the harsh cadence of a rugged line.
A noble error, and but seldom made,
When poets are by too much force betrayed.
Thy generous fruits, though gathered ere thy prime
Still shewed a quickness; and maturing time
But mellows what we write to the dull sweets of Rime.
Once more, hail and farewell; farewell thou young,
But ah too short, Marcellus of our tongue;[5]
Thy brows with ivy, and with laurels bound;
But fate and gloomy night encompass thee around.
—1684

Juvenal's Sixth Satire

(excerpts)

THE EMPRESS MESSALINA

This was a private crime; but you shall hear
What fruits the sacred brows of monarchs bear:
The good old sluggard but began to snore,
When, from his side, up rose the imperial whore;[6]
She, who preferred the pleasures of the night
To pomps, that are but impotent delight,
Strode from the palace, with an eager pace,
To cope with a more masculine embrace.
Muffled she marched, like Juno in a cloud,
Of all her train but one poor wench allowed;
One whom in secret service she could trust,
The rival and companion of her lust.
To the known brothel-house she takes her way,
And for a nasty room gives double pay;
That room in which the rankest harlot lay.
Prepared for fight, expectingly she lies,
With heaving breasts, and with desiring eyes.
The fair unbroken belly lay displayed
Where once the brave Britannicus was laid.
Bare was her bosom, bare the field of lust,
Eager to swallow every sturdy thrust.
Still as one drops, another takes his place,
And baffled, still succeeds to like disgrace.
At length, when friendly darkness is expired,
And every strumpet from her cell retired,
She lags behind and lingering at the gate,
With a repining sigh submits to fate;
All filth without, and all afire within,
Tired with the toil, unsated with the sin.

---

[1] John Oldham the satirist, who was about thirty when he died.

[2] The last set out the soonest did arrive probably a studied ambiguity: Oldham was born later than Dryden, but died earlier; but the primary meaning is that Oldham achieved poetic excellence at an earlier stage in his life than Dryden did in his.

[3] Nisus etc. See Virgil, Aeneid 5.295ff. "Euryalus famed for beauty and flower of youth, Nisus for tender love of the boy." In a race, Nisus was leading but slipped; in rising, "not forgetful" of his friend, he tripped the person behind him, thus allowing Euryalus to win "by grace of his friend."

[4] the numbers of thy native tongue more harmonious English versification.

[5] Marcellus son of Octavia, sister of Augustus; see Virgil, Aeneid, 860ff.

[6] good old sluggard Claudius. Juvenal "tells the famous story of Messalina, wife to Claudius" (Dryden's note)

Old Caesar's bed the modest matron seeks,
The steam of lamps still hanging on her checks
In ropy smut; thus foul, and thus bedight,
She brings him back the product of the night.

The learned wife

But of all plagues, the greatest is untold;
The book-learned wife, in Greek and Latin bold;
The critic-dame, who at her table sits,
Homer and Virgil quotes, and weighs their wits,
And pities Dido's agonising fits.
She has so far the ascendant of the board,
The prating pedant puts not in one word;
The man of law is nonplussed in his suit,
Nay, every other female tongue is mute.
Hammers and beating anvils you would swear,
And Vulcan, with his whole militia, there.
Tabors and trumpets, cease; for she alone
Is able to redeem the labouring moon.
E'en wit's a burden, when it talks too long;
But she, who has no continence of tongue,
Should walk in breeches, and should wear a beard,
And mix among the philosophic herd.
O what a midnight curse has he, whose side
Is pestered with a mood and figure bride!
Let mine, ye Gods! (if such must be my fate,)
No logic learn, nor history translate,
But rather be a quiet, humble fool;
I hate a wife to whom I go to school,
Who climbs the grammar-tree, distinctly knows
Where noun, and verb, and participle grows;
Corrects her country-neighbour; and, abed,
For breaking Priscian's breaks her husband's head.

The gaudy gossip

The gaudy gossip, when she's set agog,
In jewels dressed, and at each ear a bob,
Goes flaunting out, and in her trim of pride,
Thinks all she says or does is justified.
When poor, she's scarce a tolerable evil;
But rich, and fine, a wife's a very devil.
She duly, once a month, renews her face;
Meantime it lies in daub and hid in grease.
Those are the husband's nights; she craves her due,
He takes fat kisses, and is stuck in glue.
But to the loved adulterer when she steers,
Fresh from the bath, in brightness she appears:
For him the rich Arabia sweats her gum,
And precious oils from distant Indies come,
How haggardly soe'er she looks at home.
The eclipse then vanishes, and all her face
Is opened, and restored to every grace;
The crust removed, her cheeks as smooth as silk
Are polished with a wash of asses' milk;
And should she to the furthest north be sent,
A train of these attend her banishment.
But hadst thou seen her plastered up before,
'Twas so unlike a face, it seemed a sore.
'Tis worth our while, to know what all the day
They do, and how they pass their time away;
For, if o'ernight the husband has been slack,
Or counterfeited sleep, and turned his back,
Next day, be sure, the servants go to wrack.
The chambermaid and dresser are called whores,
The page is stripped, and beaten out of doors;
The whole house suffers for the master's crime,
And he himself is warned to wake another time.
She hires tormentors by the year; she treats
Her visitors, and talks, but still she beats.
Beats while she paints her face, surveys her gown,
Casts up the day's account, and still beats on:
Tired out, at length, with an outrageous tone,
She bids them in the devil's name be gone.
Compared with such a proud, insulting dame,
Sicilian tyrants may renounce their name.
For if she hastes abroad to take the air,
Or goes to Isis' church, (the bawdy house of prayer)
She hurries all her handmaids to the task;

Her head, alone, will twenty dressers ask.
Psecas, the chief, with breast and shoulders bare,
Trembling, considers every sacred hair;
If any straggler from his rank be found,
A pinch must for the mortal sin compound.
Psecas is not in fault; but in the glass,
The dame's offended at her own ill face.
That maid is banished; and another girl
More dexterous manages the comb and curl.
The rest are summoned on a point so nice,
And first the grave old woman gives advice;
The next is called, and so the turn goes round,
As each for age, or wisdom, is renowned:
Such counsel, such deliberate care they take,
As if her life and honour lay at stake:
With curls on curls, they build her head before,
And mount it with a formidable tower.
A giantess she seems; but look behind,
And then she dwindles to the pigmy kind.
Duck-legged, short-waisted, such a dwarf she is,
That she must rise on tiptoes for a kiss.
Meanwhile her husband's whole estate is spent;
He may go bare, while she receives his rent.
She minds him not; she lives not as a wife,
But like a bawling neighbour, full of strife:
Near him in this alone, that she extends
Her hate to all his servants and his friends.
—1693

Juvenal's Tenth Satire

(excerpts)

SEJANUS

In his own age, Democritus could find
Sufficient cause to laugh at humankind:
Learn from so great a wit; a land of bogs
With ditches fenced, a heaven fat with fogs,
May form a spirit fit to sway the state,
And make the neighbouring monarchs fear their fate.
He laughs at all the vulgar cares and fears;
At their vain triumphs, and their vainer tears:
An equal temper in his mind he found,
When fortune flattered him and when she frowned.
'Tis plain from hence that what our vows request
Are hurtful things, or useless at the best.
Some ask for envied power; which public hate
Pursues, and hurries headlong to their fate:
Down go the titles; and the statue crowned,
Is by base hands in the next river drowned.
The guiltless horses, and the chariot wheel,
The same effects of vulgar fury feel:
The smith prepares his hammer for the stroke,
While the lunged bellows hissing fire provoke.
Sejanus, almost first of Roman names,
The great Sejanus crackles in the flames:
Formed in the forge, the pliant brass is laid
On anvils; and of head and limbs are made,
Pans, cans, and piss-pots, a whole kitchen trade.
Adorn your doors with laurels; and a bull,
Milk white, and large, lead to the Capitol;
Sejanus with a rope is dragged along,
The sport and laughter of the giddy throng;
"Good lord!" they cry, "what Ethiop lips he has;
How foul a snout, and what a hanging face!"
By heaven, I never could endure his sight!
But say, how came his monstrous crimes to light?
What is the charge, and who the evidence,
(The saviour of the nation and the prince?)
Nothing of this; but our old Caesar sent
A noisy letter to his parliament.
'Nay, sirs, if Caesar writ, I ask no more;
He's guilty, and the question's out of door.
How goes the mob? (for that's a mighty thing,)
When the king's trump, the mob are for the king;
They follow fortune, and the common cry
Is still against the rogue condemned to die
But the same very mob, that rascal crowd,
Had cried "Sejanus," with a shout as loud,
Had his designs (by fortune's favour blest)

Succeeded, and the prince's age oppressed.
But long, long since, the times have changed their face,
The people grown degenerate and base;
Not suffered now the freedom of their choice
To make their magistrates, and sell their voice.
Our wise forefathers, great by sea and land,
Had once the power and absolute command;
All offices of trust themselves disposed;
Raised whom they pleased, and whom they pleased deposed:
But we who give our native rights away
And our enslaved posterity betray
Are now reduced to beg an alms, and go
On holidays to see a puppet-show.
"There was a damned design," cries one, "no doubt,
For warrants are already issued out:
I met Brutidius in a mortal fright,
He's dipped for certain, and plays least in sight;
I fear the rage of our offended prince,
Who thinks the senate slack in his defence.
Come, let us haste, our loyal zeal to show,
And spurn the wretched corpse of Caesar's foe:
But let our slaves be present there; lest they
Accuse their masters, and for gain betray.
Such were the whispers of those jealous times,
About Sejanus' punishment and crimes.
Now tell me truly, wouldst thou change thy fate,
To be, like him, first minister of state?
To have thy levees crowded with resort,
Of a depending, gaping, servile court;
Dispose all honours of the sword and gown,
Grace with a nod, and ruin with a frown;
To hold thy prince in pupilage, and sway
That monarch, whom the mastered world obey?
While he, intent on secret lusts alone,
Lives to himself, abandoning the throne;
Cooped in a narrow isle, observing dreams
With flattering wizards, and erecting schemes!
I well believe thou wouldst be great as he,
For every man's a fool to that degree:
All wish the dire prerogative to kill;
E'en they would have the power, who want the will:
But wouldst thou have thy wishes understood,
To take the bad together with the good?
Wouldst thou not rather choose a small renown,
To be the mayor of some poor paltry town;
Bigly to look, and barbarously to speak;
To pound false weights, and scanty measures break?
Then, grant we that Sejanus went astray
In every wish, and knew not how to pray;
For he who grasped the world's exhausted store
Yet never had enough, but wished for more,
Raised a top-heavy tower, of monstrous height,
Which, mouldering, crushed him underneath the weight.

—1693

The Secular Masque[1]

Enter Janus.

JANUS

Chronos, Chronos, mend thy pace,
An hundred times the rolling sun
Around the radiant belt has run
In his revolving race.
Behold, behold, the goal in sight,
Spread thy fans, and wing thy flight.

Enter Chronos, with a scythe in his hand, and a great globe on his back, which he sets down at his entrance.

---

[1] The title refers to the turn of the century (see OED a secular III 5). Dryden wrote a prologue, epilogue and this "masque" as additions to "an old play of Fletcher's, called the Pilgrim" (from a letter of Dryden's, April 11, 1700). There is a story that Dryden died on the third night of performance, which would date the first night as April 29, 1700 (Kinsley, Poems, p. 2082).

CHRONOS
Weary, weary of my weight,
Let me, let me drop my freight,
And leave the world behind.
I could not bear
Another year
The load of human-Kind.

Enter Momus Laughing.

MOMUS
Ha! ha! ha! Ha! ha! ha! well hast thou done,
To lay down thy pack,
And lighten thy back,
The world was a Fool, e'er since it begun,

And since neither Janus, nor Chronos, nor I,
Can hinder the crimes,
Or mend the bad times,
'Tis better to laugh than to cry.

Chorus of all three 'Tis better to laugh than to cry.

JANUS
Since Momus comes to laugh below,
Old Time begin the show,
That he may see, in every scene,
What changes in this age have been,

CHRONOS
Then goddess of the silver bow begin.

Horns, or Hunting-Music within.
Enter Diana.

DIANA
With horns and with hounds I waken the day,
And hie to my woodland walks away;
I tuck up my robe, and am buskined soon,
And tie to my forehead a waxing moon.
I course the fleet stag, unkennel the fox,
And chase the wild goats o'er summits of rocks,
With shouting and hooting we pierce through the sky;
And Echo turns hunter, and doubles the cry.

CHORUS OF ALL
With shouting and hooting, we pierce through the sky,
And Echo turns hunter, and doubles the cry.

JANUS
Then our age was in its prime,

CHRONOS
Free from rage.

DIANA
—And free from crime.

MOMUS
A very merry, dancing, drinking,
Laughing, quaffing, and unthinking time.

CHORUS OF ALL
Then our age was in its prime,
Free from rage, and free from crime,
A very merry, dancing, drinking,
Laughing, quaffing, and unthinking time.

Dance of Diana's Attendants.
Enter Mars.

MARS
Inspire the vocal brass, inspire;
The world is past its infant age:
Arms and Honour,
Arms and Honour,
Set the martial mind on fire,
And kindle manly rage.

Mars has looked the sky to red;
And Peace, the lazy good, is fled.
Plenty, Peace, and Pleasure fly;
The Sprightly Green
In Woodland-walks, no more is seen;
The sprightly green, has drunk the Tyrian dye.

CHORUS OF ALL

Plenty, Peace, &c.

MARS

Sound the trumpet, beat the drum,
Through all the world around;
Sound a reveille, sound, sound,
The warrior god is come.

CHORUS OF ALL

Sound the Trumpet, &c.

MOMUS

Thy sword within the scabbard keep,
And let mankind agree;
Better the world were fast asleep,
Than kept awake by thee.
The fools are only thinner,
With all our cost and care;
But neither side a winner,
For things are as they were.

CHORUS OF ALL

The Fools are only, &c.

Enter Venus.

VENUS

Calms appear, when storms are past;
Love will have his hour at last:
Nature is my kindly care;
Mars destroys, and I repair;
Take me, take me, while you may,
Venus comes not ev'ry day.

CHORUS OF ALL

Take her, take her, &c.

CHRONOS

The world was then so light,
I scarcely felt the Weight;
Joy rul'd the day, and love the night.
But since the queen of pleasure left the ground,
I faint, I lag
And feebly drag
The pond'rous Orb around.

MOMUS

All, all, of a piece throughout;
Pointing
to Diana Thy chase had a beast in view;
to Mars Thy wars brought nothing about;
to Venus Thy lovers were all untrue.

JANUS

'Tis well an old Age is out

CHRONOS

And time to begin a new.

CHORUS OF ALL

All, all, of apiece throughout
Thy chase had a beast in view
Thy wars brought nothing about
Thy lovers were all untrue.
'Tis well an old Age is out,
And time to begin a new.

Dance of Huntsmen, Nymphs, Warriors and Lovers.

—1700

Katherine Philips

1632 – 1664

Katherine Philips's parents were John Fowler, a prosperous London merchant, and Katherine Oxenbridge. According to John Aubrey, "she had read the Bible through before she was full four years old" and "could have brought away a sermon in her memory." At eight years of age, she was sent to a fashionable boarding school in Hackney, where she was instructed by the famous Presbyterian schoolmistress, Mrs. Salmon. Though raised in a Puritan family, she made friendships during her schooldays that drew her into the literary milieu of the London Cavaliers. When in 1646 her widowed mother married Sir Richard Philips of Picton Castle in Pembrokeshire, the family moved to Wales. Two years later, Katherine married Colonel James Philips, a kinsman of Sir Richard's and a prominent Parliamentarian in west Wales. He was thirty-eight years her senior. The couple settled at Cardigan Priory, where she bore a son (1655), who died in infancy, and a daughter (1656).

Early in her marriage, Philips formed a "Society of Friendship" whose members, despite her husband's political affiliations, were Royalists. Those adopted into the Society received pseudonyms, Katherine's being "Orinda." When her husband was appointed as a Commissioner under the Act for the Propagation of the Gospel in Wales, she continued to participate in Cavalier literary circles. In 1662, Philips visited Dublin where she was befriended by Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery, who urged her to translate Corneille's La Mort de Pompée. Philips's Pompey, first performed on February 10, 1663 in Dublin, was critically acclaimed. When an unauthorized edition of her poems was published in 1664, she denied responsibility for the volume, and the printer quickly withdrew it from sale. The same year, Philips traveled to London where she contracted smallpox and died, leaving unfinished a translation of Corneille's Horace.

In 1667, her poems and translations were published posthumously by her friend Sir Charles Cotterel ("Poliarchus"), Master of Ceremonies at the Court of Charles II. In 1705, Cotterel published his correspondence with Philips under the title Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus. The literary reputation of Philips, the "Matchless Orinda," flourished after her death. She became a symbol of female literary achievement, figuring in the poetry and prose of her contemporaries as the model of female authorship.

◆

Upon the Double Murder of K. Charles I in Answer to a Libelous Copy of Rimes by Vavasour Powell[1]

I think not on the state, nor am concerned
Which way soever the great helm is turned:
But as that son whose father's danger nigh
Did force his native dumbness, and untie
The fettered organs; so this is a cause
That will excuse the breach of nature's laws.
Silence were now a sin, nay passion now
Wise men themselves for merit would allow.
What noble eye could see (and careless pass)
The dying lion kicked by every ass?[2]
Has Charles so broke God's laws, he must not have
A quiet crown, nor yet a quiet grave?
Tombs have been sanctuaries; thieves lie there

---

[1] Powell, a Fifth Monarchist, held the post of Approver of Ministers under the Propagation Act. Philips's biographer notes that while he was staying at Cardigan Priory in the early 1650s, Powell wrote an anti-monarchical poem about the dead King (Patrick Thomas, Katherine Philips ['Orinda']. Cardiff: U of Wales P, 1988, 23).

[2] dying lion The Scottish lion was the dominant image on the Stuart coat of arms; hence, the Stuart monarch was often figured as a lion.

Secure from all their penalty and fear.
Great Charles his double misery was this,
Unfaithful friends, ignoble enemies.
Had any heathen been this prince's foe,
He would have wept to see him injured so.
His title was his crime, they'd reason good
To quarrel at the right they had withstood.
He broke God's laws, and therefore he must die;
And what shall then become of thee and I?
Slander must follow treason; but yet stay,
Take not our reason with our king away.
Though you have seized upon all our defence,
Yet do not sequester our common sense. [1]
Christ will be King, but I ne'er understood
His subjects built his kingdom up with blood,
Except their own; or that he would dispense
With his commands, though for his own defence.
Oh! to what height of horror are they come
Who dare pull down a crown, tear up a tomb?
—1667

On the Numerous Access of the English to wait upon the King in Flanders [2]

Hasten, great prince, unto thy British Isles,
Or all thy subjects will become exiles.
To thee they flock, thy presence is their home,
As Pompey's camp, where'er it moved, was Rome. [3]
They that asserted thy just cause go hence
To testify their joy and reverence;
And those that did not, now, by wonder taught,
Go to confess and expiate their fault. [4]
So that if thou dost stay, thy gasping land
Itself will empty on the Belgic sand: [5]
Where the affrighted Dutchman does profess
He thinks it an invasion, not address.
As we unmonarched were for want of thee,
So till thou come we shall unpeopled be.
None but the close fanatic will remain, [6]
Who by our loyalty his ends will gain:
And he th'exhausted land will quickly find
As desolate a place as he designed.
For England (though grown old with woes) will see
Her long denied and sovereign remedy.
So when old Jacob could but credit give
That his prodigious Joseph still did live,
(Joseph that was preserved to restore
Their lives that would have taken his before)
It is enough, (said he) to Egypt I
Will go, and see him once before I die. [7]
—1667

On the 3 of September, 1651 [8]

As when the glorious magazine of light
Approaches to his canopy of night, [9]
He with new splendour clothes his dying rays,
And double brightness to his beams conveys;
And (as to brave and check his ending fate)
Puts on his highest looks in's lowest state, [10]
Dressed in such terror as to make us all

---

[1] sequester confiscate, take forcible possession of (OED sequester v 2).

[2] King Charles II. En route to England, Charles left Brussels for Holland on March 30, 1660.

[3] As Pompey's camp…was Rome Roman general and consul Gnaeus Pompeius (106–48 B.C.E.) ruled officially in Spain and unofficially in Gaul, Africa, the East and parts of Italy until his murder in Egypt.

[4] expiate extinguish the guilt of (OED expiate*v* 3).

[5] Belgic of or pertaining to the Netherlands (OED belgic a Ab).

[6] close secret (OED close A.4a).

[7] So when old…I die Jacob's favorite son Joseph was sold into slavery by his jealous brothers who told their father he had been killed. Joseph rose to prominence in Egypt and saved his family from famine. When Jacob was told Joseph lived, he said, "It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die" (Genesis 45:28).

[8] Charles II was defeated at the battle of Worcester on September 3rd.

[9] magazine repository (OED magazine sb 1a).

[10] brave and check defy and arrest.

Be anti-Persians, and adore his fall; [1]
Then quits the world depriving it of day,
While every herb and plant does droop away:
So when our gasping English royalty
Perceived her period was now drawing nigh,
She summons her whole strength to give one blow,
To raise herself, or pull down others too.
Big with revenge and hope she now spake more
Of terror than in many months before;
And musters her attendants, or to save
Her from, or else attend her to, the grave: [2]
Yet but enjoyed the miserable fate
Of setting majesty, to die in state.
Unhappy kings, who cannot keep a throne,
Nor be so fortunate to fall alone!
Their weight sinks others: Pompey could not fly,
But half the world must bear him company;
And captived Sampson could not life conclude,
Unless attended with a multitude. [3]
Who'd trust to greatness now, whose food is air,
Whose ruin sudden, and whose end despair?
Who would presume upon his glorious birth,
Or quarrel for a spacious share of earth,
That sees such diadems become so cheap,
And heroes tumble in a common heap?
Oh give me virtue then, which sums up all,
And firmly stands when crowns and scepters fall.
—1667

Friendship's Mystery, To My Dearest Lucasia [4]

1

Come, my Lucasia, since we see
That miracles men's faith do move, [5]
By wonder and by prodigy
To the dull angry world let's prove
There's a religion in our love.

2

For though we were designed t'agree,
That fate no liberty destroys,
But our election is as free
As angels, who with greedy choice
Are yet determined to their joys.[6]

3

Our hearts are doubled by the loss,
Here mixture is addition grown;
We both diffuse, and both engross: [7]
And we whose minds are so much one,
Never, yet ever are alone.

4

We court our own captivity
Than thrones more great and innocent:
'Twere banishment to be set free,
Since we wear fetters whose intent
Not bondage is, but ornament.

---

[1] anti-Persians in reference to the Indo-Iranian cult of Mithras, understood as a sun-god.

[2] or…or either…or.

[3] And captived….a multitude Blinded and imprisoned after his defeat at the hands of the Philistine agent Delilah, Samson pulled down the pillars which held up the house filled with Philistines, killing his enemies and himself (Judges 16).

[4] Friendship's Mystery friendship as a religious rite or a sacrament (OED mystery^1 3).

[5] Lucasia the name assigned to Anne Owen on her formal acceptance into the "Society of Friendship" December 29, 1651.

[6] For though we…their joys Though the speaker and Lucasia are designed by nature to be of one mind (OED agree v IV.9), as the angels are determined to worship God, yet their ability to choose (OED election 2a) is not lessened thereby, for they elect the fate for which they are predestined.

[7] diffuse extend, spread out (OED diffuse v. 3); engross collect together, condense (OED engross v II.4a,III.8).

5

Divided joys are tedious found,
And griefs united easier grow:
We are ourselves but by rebound,
And all our titles shuffled so,
Both princes, and both subjects too.

6

Our hearts are mutual victims laid,
While they (such power in friendship lies)
Are altars, priests, and off'rings made:
And each heart which thus kindly dies, [1]
Grows deathless by the sacrifice.
—1667

A Retired Friendship, To Ardelia [2]

1

Come, my Ardelia, to this bower,
Where kindly mingling souls awhile
Let's innocently spend an hour,
And at all serious follies smile.

2

Here is no quarreling for crowns,
Nor fear of changes in our fate;
No trembling at the great one's frowns,
Nor any slavery of state.

3

Here's no disguise nor treachery,
Nor any deep concealed design;
From blood and plots this place is free,
And calm as are those looks of thine.

4

Here let us sit and bless our stars,
Who did such happy quiet give,
As that removed from noise of wars
In one another's hearts we live.

5

Why should we entertain a fear
Love cares not how the world is turned:
If crowds of dangers should appear,
Yet friendship can be unconcerned.

6

We wear about us such a charm,
No horror can be our offence;
For mischief's self can do no harm
To friendship or to innocence.

7

Let's mark how soon Apollo's beams
Command the flocks to quit their meat, [3]
And not entreat the neighbouring streams
To quench their thirst, but cool their heat.

8

In such a scorching age as this
Who would not ever seek a shade,
Deserve their happiness to miss,
As having their own peace betrayed.

9

But we (of one another's mind
Assured) the boisterous world disdain;
With quiet souls and unconfined
Enjoy what princes wish in vain.
—1667

Wiston Vault

And why this vault and tomb? Alike we must
Put off distinction, and put on our dust.
Nor can the stateliest fabric help to save
From the corruptions of a common grave;

---

[1] kindly readily or congenially (OED kindly adv. I.1c).

[2] Ardelia Ardelia's identity is not known.

[3] Apollo's beams sunbeams; Apollo is the god of the sun.

Nor for the resurrection more prepare
Than if the dust were scattered into air.
What then? Th' ambition's just, say some, that we May thus perpetuate our memory.
Ah false vain task of art! Ah poor weak man!
Whose monument does more than's merit can: [1]
Who by his friends' best care and love's abused,
And in his very epitaph accused:
For did they not suspect his name would fall,
There would not need an epitaph at all.
But after death too I would be alive,
And shall, if my Lucasia do, survive.
I quit these pomps of death, and am content,
Having her heart to be my monument:
Thou ne'er stone to me, 'twill stone for me prove,
By the peculiar miracles of love.
There I'll inscription have which no tomb gives,
Not, Here Orinda lies, but, Here she lives.
—1667

To My Excellent Lucasia, On Our Friendship

I did not live until this time
Crowned my felicity,
When I could say without a crime,
I am not thine, but thee. [2]

This carcass breathed, and walked, and slept,
So that the world believed
There was a soul the motions kept; [3]
But they were all deceived.

For as a watch by art is wound
To motion, such was mine:
But never had Orinda found
A soul till she found thine; [4]

Which now inspires, cures and supplies, [5]
And guides my darkened breast:
For thou art all that I can prize,
My joy, my life, my rest.

No bridegroom's nor crown-conqueror's mirth
To mine compared can be:
They have but pieces of this earth,
I've all the world in thee.

Then let our flames still light and shine,
And no false fear control,
As innocent as our design,
Immortal as our soul.
—1667

A Country Life [6]

How sacred and how innocent
A country-life appears,
How free from tumult, discontent,
From flattery or fears!
This was the first and happiest life,
When man enjoyed himself;
Till pride exchanged peace for strife,
And happiness for pelf. [7]
'Twas here the poets were inspired,
Here taught the multitude;

---

[1] than's than his.

[2] I did not live…but thee Until this time when my happiness was perfected, I could not truly say "I am not yours, but you."

[3] carcass the body as a lifeless shell from which the soul has fled (OED carcass sb 4).

[4] Orinda the pseudonym of Katherine Philips.

[5] inspires breathes life into (OED inspire v I.2b).

[6] A Country Life The classical source for the retirement poem is Horace's Epode II, Beatus ille ("The Happy Man"), a lyric which contrasts the peace and contentment of country living with the vexations of urban life. Compare Ben Jonson's translation of this Epode, "The Praises of a Country Life" and Lucy Hutchinson's "All Sorts of Men."

[7] pelf wealth (OED pelf sb 3).

The brave they here with honour fired, [1]
And civilized the rude.
That golden age did entertain
No passion but of love;
The thoughts of ruling and of gain
Did ne'er their fancies move.
None then did envy neighbour's wealth,
Nor plot to wrong his bed:
Happy in friendship and in health,
On roots, not beasts, they fed.
They knew no law nor physic then,
Nature was all their wit.
And if there yet remain to men
Content, sure this is it.
What blessings doth this world afford
To tempt or bribe desire?
Her courtship is all fire and sword,
Who would not then retire?
Then welcome dearest solitude,
My great felicity;
Though some are pleased to call thee rude,
Thou art not so, but we.
Them that do covet only rest,
A cottage will suffice:
It is not brave to be possessed
Of earth, but to despise. [2]
Opinion is the rate of things,
From hence our peace doth flow;
I have a better fate than kings,
Because I think it so.
When all the stormy world doth roar
How unconcerned am I?
I cannot fear to tumble lower
Who never could be high.
Secure in these unenvied walls
I think not on the state,
And pity no man's case that falls
From his ambition's height.
Silence and innocence are safe;
A heart that's nobly true
At all these little arts can laugh [3]
That do the world subdue.
While others revel it in State,
Here I'll contented sit,
And think I have as good a fate
As wealth and pomp admit.
Let some in courtship take delight,
And to th'Exchange resort; [4]
Then revel out a winter's night,
Not making love, but sport.
These never know a noble flame,
'Tis lust, scorn, or design:
While vanity plays all their game,
Let peace and honour mine.
When the inviting spring appears,
To Hyde Park let them go, [5]
And hasting thence be full of fears
To lose Spring-Garden show. [6]
Let others (nobler) seek to gain
In knowledge happy fate,
And others busy them in vain
To study ways of State.
But I, resolved from within,
Confirmed from without,
In privacy intend to spin
My future minutes out.
And from this hermitage of mine

---

[1] fired inspired with passion (OED fire v^1 3a).

[2] brave worthy (OED brave a A.3a).

[3] arts stratagems (OED art sb III.14).

[4] Exchange The New Exchange, a bazaar on the south side of the Strand, was a popular market best known for its haberdashery and millinery shops.

[5] Hyde Park People "toured" Hyde Park in hopes of catching a glimpse of prominent members of the court.

[6] Spring-Garden The Spring Garden was then a part of St. James's Park. In her Memoirs, Lady Anne Halkett writes that in her youth (before 1644) she did "walk in the Spring Garden sometimes (before it grew something scandalous by the abuse of some)" (Oxford, 1979, p.11).

I banish all wild toys,[1]
And nothing that is not divine
Shall dare to tempt my joys.
There are below but two things good,
Friendship and honesty,
And only those of all I would
Ask for felicity.
In this retired and humble seat
Free from both war and strife,
I am not forced to make retreat
But choose to spend my life.
—1667

Orinda to Lucasia parting October 1661 at London

Adieu dear object of my love's excess,
And with thee all my hopes of happiness,
With the same fervent and unchangèd heart
Which did its whole self once to thee impart,
(And which though fortune has so sorely bruised,
Would suffer more, to be from this excused)
I to resign thy dear converse submit,
Since I can neither keep, nor merit it.
Thou hast too long to me confinèd been,
Who ruin am without, passion within.
My mind is sunk below thy tenderness,
And my condition does deserve it less;
I'm so entangled and so lost a thing
By all the shocks my daily sorrow bring,
That would'st thou for thy old Orinda call
Thou hardly could'st unravel her at all.
And should I thy clear fortunes interline
With the incessant miseries of mine?
No, no, I never loved at such a rate
To tie thee to the rigours of my fate,
As from my obligations thou art free,
Sure thou shalt be so from my injury,
Though every other worthiness I miss,
Yet I'll at least be generous in this.
I'd rather perish without sigh or groan,
Than thou should'st be condemned to give me one;
Nay in my soul I rather could allow
Friendship should be a sufferer, than thou;
Go then, since my sad heart has set thee free,
Let all the loads and chains remain on me.
Though I be left the prey of sea and wind,
Thou being happy wilt in that be kind;
Nor shall I my undoing much deplore,
Since thou art safe, whom I must value more.
Oh! mayst thou ever be so, and as free
From all ills else, as from my company,
And may the torments thou hast had from it
Be all that heaven will to thy life permit.
And that they may thy virtue service do,
Mayst thou be able to forgive them too:
But though I must this sharp submission learn,
I cannot yet unwish thy dear concern.
Not one new comfort I expect to see,
I quit my joy, hope, life, and all but thee;
Nor seek I thence ought that may discompose
That mind where so serene a goodness grows.
I ask no inconvenient kindness now,
To move thy passion, or to cloud thy brow;
And thou wilt satisfy my boldest plea
By some few soft remembrances of me,
Which may present thee with this candid thought,
I meant not all the troubles that I brought.
Own not what passion rules, and fate does crush,
But wish thou couldst have done 't without a blush,
And that I had been, ere it was too late,
Either more worthy, or more fortunate.
Ah who can love the thing they cannot prize?
But thou mayst pity though thou dost despise.
Yet I should think that pity bought too dear,
If it should cost those precious eyes a tear.
Oh may no minute's trouble thee possess,
But to endear the next hour's happiness;
And mayst thou when thou art from me removed,
Be better pleased, but never worse beloved:

---

[1] toys amusements (OED toy sb I.2).

Oh pardon me for pouring out my woes
In rhyme now, that I dare not do ’t in prose.
For I must love whatever is called dear,
And thy assistance all that loss to bear,
And have more cause than ere I had before,
To fear that I shall never see thee more.
—1667

Orinda Upon Little Hector Philips[1]

1

Twice forty months of wedlock I did stay,[2]
Then had my vows crowned with a lovely boy,
And yet in forty days he dropped away,[3]
O swift vicissitude of human joy.

2

I did but see him and he disappeared,
I did but pluck the rosebud and it fell,
A sorrow unforeseen and scarcely feared,
For ill can mortals their afflictions spell.[4]

3

And now (sweet babe) what can my trembling heart
Suggest to right my doleful fate or thee,
Tears are my muse and sorrow all my art,
So piercing groans must be thy elegy.

4

Thus whilst no eye is witness of my moan,
I grieve thy loss (Ah boy too dear to live)
And let the unconcerned world alone,
Who neither will, nor can refreshment give.

5

An off’ring too for thy sad tomb I have,
Too just a tribute to thy early hearse,
Receive these gasping numbers to thy grave,[5]
The last of thy unhappy mother’s verse.[6]
—1667

Orinda to Lucasia

Observe the weary birds ere night be done,
How they would fain call up the tardy sun,
With feathers hung with dew,
And trembling voices too.
They court their glorious planet to appear,
That they may find recruits of spirits there.
The drooping flowers hang their heads,
And languish down into their beds:[7]
While brooks more bold and fierce than they,
Wanting those beams, from whence
All things must drink influence,
Openly murmur and demand the day.[8]

2

Thou my Lucasia art far more to me,
Than he to all the underworld can be;[9]
From thee I’ve heat and light,
Thy absence makes my night.
But ah! my friend, it now grows very long,
The sadness weighty, and the darkness strong:
My tears (its dew) dwell on my cheeks,
And still my heart thy dawning seeks,
And to thee mournfully it cries,

---

[1] Hector Philips Hector Philips was born on April 23, 1655 and died May 2, 1655.

[2] Twice forty months in wedlock Philips was married in August, 1648; stay wait (OED stay *v*¹ I.9).

[3] in forty days within forty days.

[4] spell discover (OED spell *v*² I.2a).

[5] numbers metrical periods or feet; hence, lines, verses (OED number sb IV 18b).

[6] The last…mother’s verse Philips in fact continued to write verse until her death.

[7] recruits of spirits a fresh supply of the vital or animating principle (OED recruit sb I.3c; spirit sb I.1).

[8] influence the ethereal fluid which streams from the stars to act upon all things sublunary (OED influence sb 2a).

[9] he the sun.

   That if too long I wait,
   Ev'n thou mayst come too late,
And not restore my life, but close my eyes.
—1667

A Married State[1]

A married state affords but little ease:
The best of husbands are so hard to please.
This in wives' careful faces you may spell,[2]
Though they dissemble their misfortunes well.
A virgin state is crowned with much content,
It's always happy as it's innocent.
No blustering husbands to create your fears,
No pangs of childbirth to extort your tears,
No children's cries for to offend your ears,
Few worldly crosses to distract your prayers.
Thus are you freed from all the cares that do
Attend on matrimony and a husband too.
Therefore, madam, be advised by me:
Turn, turn apostate to love's levity.[3]
Suppress wild nature if she dare rebel,
There's no such thing as leading apes in hell.[4]
—(WRITTEN BEFORE 1648)

---

[1] Not included in any early-modern printed edition of Philips's works, this poem is one of two handwritten on a single sheet (Orielton MSS Box 24, National Library of Wales). It was written before 1648. Compare Jane Barker's "A Virgin Life."

[2] spell decipher (OED spell v^2 2b).

[3] apostate one who forsakes her moral allegiance (OED apostate sb A1).

[4] leading apes in hell the fancied consequence of dying an old maid.

Philo-Philippa

fl. 1663

Katherine Philips's Pompey, an English translation of Corneille's La Mort de Pompée, was first performed at the Theatre Royal, Smock Alley, Dublin, on February 10, 1663. The play was well received. In a letter to Sir Charles Cotterell ("Poliarchus"), Philips describes the response: "I have had many letters and copies of verses sent me, some from acquaintance[s], and some from strangers, to compliment me upon Pompey, which, were I capable of vanity, would even surfeit me with it; for they are so full of flattery, that I have not the confidence to send them to you. One of them, who pretends to be a woman, writes very well, but I cannot imagine who the author is, nor by any inquiry I can make, have hitherto been able to discover" (April 8, 1663). The poem written by this unknown Irish woman, to whom Cotterell assigned the name "Philo-Philippa," was included among the commendatory poems which prefaced the 1667 edition of Philips's Poems. "To the Excellent Orinda" explicitly challenges the dominant conceptions of gender and authorship in seventeenth-century England.

To the Excellent Orinda

Let the male poets their male Phoebus choose, [1]
Thee I invoke, Orinda, for my Muse;
He could but force a branch, Daphne her tree
Most freely offers to her sex and thee,
And says to verse, so unconstrained as yours,
Her laurel freely comes, your fame secures:
And men no longer shall with ravished bays
Crown their forced poems by as forced a praise. [2]
Thou glory of our sex, envy of men,
Who are both pleased and vexed with thy bright pen:
Its lustre doth entice their eyes to gaze,
But men's sore eyes cannot endure its rays;
It dazzles and surprises so with light,
To find a noon where they expected night:
A woman translate Pompey! which the famed
Corneille with such art and labour framed! [3]
To whose close version the wits club their sense,
And a new lay poetic SMEC springs thence! [4]
Yes, that bold work a woman dares translate,
Not to provoke, nor yet to fear men's hate.
Nature doth find that she hath erred too long,
And now resolves to recompense that wrong:
Phoebus to Cynthia must his beams resign,
The rule of day and wit's now feminine. [5]
That sex, which heretofore was not allowed
To understand more than a beast, or crowd;
Of which problems were made, whether or no

---

[1] Phoebus Apollo, the sun god, and patron of music and poetry.

[2] He could ... a praise Sworn to virginity, Daphne was transformed into a laurel tree to escape the sexual advances of Apollo, who created a crown from one of the tree's branches. Thereafter, the laurel crown was bestowed on those distinguished for excellence in poetry.

[3] Pompey Corneille's La Mort de Pompée (Paris, 1644).

[4] To whose..their sense In 1663, Sir William Davenant produced an English translation of Corneille's Pompée collaboratively written by the "Wits" Edmund Waller, Sidney Godolphin, Charles Sackville, Sir Charles Sedley and Sir Edward Filmer; club combine (OED club v 6); SMEC In 1641, Stephen Marshal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen and William Spurstow co-authored an anti-episcopal pamphlet and published it under their initials: "Smectymnuus."

[5] Cynthia the goddess of the moon.

Women had souls; but to be damned, if so; [1]
Whose highest contemplation could not pass,
In men's esteem, no higher than the glass;
And all the painful labours of their brain,
Was only how to dress and entertain:
Or, if they ventured to speak sense, the wise
Made that, and speaking ox, like prodigies. [2]
From these thy more than masculine pen hath reared
Our sex; first to be praised, next to be feared.
And by the same pen forced, men now confess,
To keep their greatness, was to make us less.
Men know of how refined and rich a mould
Our sex is framed, what sun is in our gold: [3]
They know in lead no diamonds are set,
And jewels only fill the cabinet. [4]
Our spirits purer far than theirs, they see; [5]
By which even men from men distinguished be:
By which the soul is judged, and does appear
Fit or unfit for action, as they are.
When in an organ various sounds do stroke,
Or grate the ear, as birds sing, or toads croak;
The breath, that voices every pipe, 's the same,
But the bad metal doth the sound defame.
So, if our souls by sweeter organs speak,
And theirs with harsh false notes the air do break;
The soul's the same, alike in both doth dwell,
'Tis from her instruments that we excel. [6]
Ask me not then, why jealous men debar
Our sex from books in peace, from arms in war;
It is because our parts will soon demand
Tribunals for our persons, and command. [7]
Shall it be our reproach, that we are weak,
And cannot fight, nor as the school-men speak?
Even men themselves are neither strong nor wise,
If limbs and parts they do not exercise.
Trained up to arms, we Amazons have been,
And Spartan virgins strong as Spartan men:
Breed women but as men, and they are these;
Whilst Sybarit men are women by their ease. [8]
Why should not brave Semiramis break a lance,
And why should not soft Ninias curl and dance? [9]
Ovid in vain bodies with change did vex,
Changing her form of life, Iphis changed sex, [10]
Nature to females freely doth impart
That, which the males usurp, a stout, bold heart.
Thus hunters female beasts fear to assail;
And female hawks more metalled than the male: [11]
Men ought not then courage and wit engross,

---

[1] That sex…damned, if so Compare Elizabeth Johnson's criticism of those who render women "mere slaves, perfect Turkish wives, without properties, or sense or souls" ("Preface" Poems…Written by Philomela, 1696).

[2] like prodigies similar prodigies, that is, things out of the ordinary course of nature (OED prodigy 2).

[3] what sun…our gold The ancients believed that threads of gold were woven into the earth by the sun.

[4] cabinet a case for the safe custody of jewels; fig. the body (OED cabinet sb I.5,1b).

[5] spirits the vital principle (or breath of life) which gives life to the physical organism (OED spirit sb. I.1); Philo-Philippa relies on St. Paul's division of persons into body, soul and spirit (I Thessalonians 5:23). Compare Speght's "Both man and woman of three parts consist, / Which Paul doth body, soul and spirit call" ("A Dream" ll.127–128).

[6] So if our souls…we excel Philo-Philippa echoes Cornelius Agrippa's belief that while "there is no preeminence of nobility (between man and woman, by the essence of the soul) of one above the other," "as for the exercise and operation of the soul, the illustrious sex of women, infinitely almost excels the rough and unpolished generation of men" (Of the nobility and preeminence of the female sex [1532], translated by Edward Fleetwood in 1652 and entitled The Glory of Women).

[7] parts abilities (OED part sb II.12).

[8] Sybarit inhabitants of Sybaris whose epicureanism was proverbial.

[9] Semiramis in Greek legend, the daughter of the Syrian goddess Derceto. After the death of her second husband, Ninus, king of Assyria, she ruled Assyria and was renowned in war; Ninias the son of Ninus and Semiramis. He is described by Bradstreet as "A Prince wedded to ease and to delight" ("The Four Monarchies" I.149–182).

[10] Iphis In Ovid's Metamorphoses (Book IX), the impoverished Ligdus tells his pregnant wife Telethusa that if she bears a daughter, the child must die. When she bears a daughter, she disguises the child as a boy and names "him" Iphis. When Ligdus arranges Iphis's marriage, Telethusa prays to Isis for assistance and Iphis is transformed into a young man.

[11] metalled spirited (OED mettle sb 2).

Whilst the fox lives, the lion, or the horse.[1]
Much less ought men both to themselves confine,
Whilst women, such as you, Orinda, shine.
That noble friendship brought thee to our coast,
We thank Lucasia, and thy courage boast.[2]
Death in each wave could not Orinda fright,
Fearless she acts that friendship she did write:
Which manly virtue to their sex confined,
Thou rescuest to confirm our softer mind;
For there's required (to do that virtue right)
Courage, as much in friendship as in fight.
The dangers we despise, doth this truth prove,
Though boldly we not fight, we boldly love.
Engage us unto books, Sappho comes forth,
Though not of Hesiod's age, of Hesiod's worth.[3]
If souls no sexes have, as 'tis confessed,
'Tis not the he or she makes poems best:
Nor can men call these verses feminine,
Be the sense vigorous and masculine.
'Tis true, Apollo sits as judge of wit,
But the nine female learned troop are it:[4]
Those laws, for which Numa did wise appear,
Wiser Ægeria whispered in his ear.[5]
The Gracchi's mother taught them eloquence;[6]
From her breasts courage flowed, from her brain sense;
And the grave beards, who heard her speak in Rome,
Blushed not to be instructed, but o'ercome.
Your speech, as hers, commands respect from all,
Your very looks, as hers, rhetorical:
Something of grandeur in your verse men see,
That they rise up to it as majesty.
The wise and noble Orrery's regard,
Was much observed, when he your poem heard:[7]
All said, a fitter match was never seen,
Had Pompey's widow been Arsamne's queen.[8]
Pompey, who greater than himself's become,
Now in your poem, than before in Rome;
And much more lasting in the poet's pen,
Great princes live, than the proud towers of men.
He thanks false Egypt for its treachery,
Since that his ruin is so sung by thee;[9]
And so again would perish, if withal,
Orinda would but celebrate his fall.
Thus pleasingly the bee delights to die,
Foreseeing, he in amber tomb shall lie.
If that all Egypt, for to purge its crime,
Were built into one pyramid o'er him,
Pompey would lie less stately in that hearse,
Than he doth now, Orinda, in thy verse:
This makes Cornelia for her Pompey vow,
Her hand shall plant his laurel on thy brow:
So equal in their merits were both found,

---

[1] engross attribute exclusively to themselves (OED engross v II.4c).

[2] Lucasia Anne Lewis Owen of Pembrokeshire. When in 1662 Anne married her second husband, Colonel Marcus Trevor, Philips accompanied them to their new home in Ireland.

[3] Sappho the Greek poet of Lesbos (b. 612 B.C.E.) whose work was collected into nine books; Hesiod the ancient Greek poet (fl. 700 B.C.E.), often coupled or contrasted with Homer as the other chief representative of early epic.

[4] nine female learned troop the nine Muses, the Greek deities who preside over music, poetry, the arts and sciences.

[5] Those laws… in his ear Numa, according to legend king of Rome after Romulus. Later Romans attrributed many of their religious institutions to him. Legends recount that he received counsel from the nymph Ægeria.

[6] Gracchi's mother Cornelia (second century B.C.E.), the daughter of P. Scipio Africanus and the mother of the social reformers Tiberius and Gaius Gracchus. She was considered the model Roman matron, and her epistles, admired by Cicero, were accounted models of style.

[7] Orrery's regard While in Ireland, Philips met Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery (1621–1679) and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. One of the pioneers of heroic drama, he encouraged Philips to translate Corneille's Pompée.

[8] Pompey's widow Cornelia (fl. 48 B.C.E.), the daughter of Metellus Scipio, is praised in Plutarch's Lives: "She was well versed in literature, in playing the lyre, and in geometry, and had been accustomed to listen to philosophical discourses with profit." Arsamne unidentified.

[9] false Egypt… treachery After he was defeated by Caesar at Pharsalus, Pompey (106–48 B.C.E.) fled the field of battle, was joined by his wife Cornelia, and sailed to Egypt. He was stabbed to death as he landed.

That the same wreath poets and princes crowned:
And what on that great captain's brow was dead,
She joys to see re-flourished on thy head.
In the French rock Cornelia first did shine,
But shined not like herself till she was thine:
Poems, like gems, translated from the place
Where they first grew, receive another grace.
Dressed by thy hand, and polished by thy pen,
She glitters now a star, but jewel then:
No flaw remains, no cloud, all now is light
Transparent as the day, bright parts more bright.
Corneille, now made English, so doth thrive,
As trees transplanted do much lustier live. [1]
Thus ore digged forth, and by such hands as thine
Refined and stamped, is richer than the mine.
Liquors from vessel into vessel poured,
Must lose some spirits, which are scarce restored: [2]
But the French wines, in their own vessel rare,
Poured into ours, by thy hand, spirits are;
So high in taste, and so delicious,
Before his own Corneille thine would choose.
He finds himself enlightened here, where shade
Of dark expression his own words had made:
There what he would have said, he sees so writ,
As generously, to just decorum fit.
When in more words than his you please to flow,
Like a spread flood, enriching all below,
To the advantage of his well meant sense,
He gains by you another excellence.
To render word for word, at the old rate,
Is only but to construe, not translate:
In your own fancy free, to his sense true,
We read Corneille, and Orinda too:
And yet ye both are so the very same,
As when two tapers joined make one bright flame.
And sure the copier's honour is not small,
When artists doubt which is original.
But if your fettered Muse thus praised be,
What great things do you write when it is free?
When it is free to choose both sense and words,
Or any subject the vast world affords?
A gliding sea of crystal doth best show
How smooth, clear, full, and rich your verse doth flow:
Your words are chosen, culled, not by chance writ, [3]
To make the sense, as anagrams do hit.
Your rich becoming words on the sense wait,
As Maids of Honour on a Queen of State.
'Tis not white satin makes a verse more white,
Or soft; iron is both, write you on it.
Your poems come forth cast, no file you need,
At one brave heat both shaped and polished.
But why all these encomiums of you, [4]
Who either doubts, or will not take as due?
Renown how little you regard, or need,
Who like the bee, on your own sweets doth feed?
There are, who like weak fowl with shouts fall down,
Dozed with an army's acclamation: [5]
Not able to endure applause, they fall,
Giddy with praise, their praise's funeral.
But you, Orinda, are so unconcerned,
As if when you, another we commend.
Thus, as the sun, you in your course shine on,
Unmoved with all our admiration:
Flying above the praise you shun, we see
Wit is still higher by humility.
—1667

---

[1] lustier in the sense of having greater vigour and fertility (OED lust sb 6).

[2] spirits extracts, essences (OED spirit sb v.22).

[3] culled selected (OED cull v^1 1).

[4] encomiums formal or high-flown expressions of praise (OED encomium).

[5] dozed with stupefied by (OED dozed ppl.a).

Anthony à Wood

1632 – 1695

The antiquary Anthony à Wood (the "à" was his characteristically idiosyncratic addition) was born in Oxford in a house across from Merton College, which he entered as an undergraduate in 1647; he would live in the same house for the rest of his life, surviving on a modest inherited income and compiling materials for the history of the university and its members. In his lifetime Wood published Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis (Oxford, 1674) and a biographical dictionary, Athenae Oxoniensis: An Exact History of all the Writers and Bishops who have had their Education in the University of Oxford (1691–92). In addition, he left at his death a mass of manuscript papers, including substantial autobiographical material, much of which has been subsequently edited. Wood's quarrelsome personality and frank opinions made him unpopular at Oxford: contemporaries resented his "slanderous and saucy reflections" on the characters of the men he wrote about, and in 1693 Athenae Oxoniensis was accused of libelling the Earl of Clarendon and publicly burned. But the collections Wood compiled are an invaluable resource for historians and literary scholars, and are in many ways most interesting for Wood's gossipy and often abusive accounts of people and events in Oxford during the second half of the seventeenth century.

The nineteenth-century editor of Wood's Life and Times produced his five-volume text by combining an autobiographical narrative with journals and other manuscript sources Wood left at his death. In the autobiography, Wood refers to himself in the third person. The short passages omitted between the selected entries presented here include such information as lists of books loaned, death notices, transcriptions of Latin inscriptions, College election results, genealogical charts, and money spent on food, drink, and pamphlets. The biographies of Jeremy Taylor and Robert Burton are selected from Athenae Oxoniensis; for more on these writers, see the introductions to the selections from their works.

* * *

The Life and Times of Anthony à Wood

(extracts)

NOTES ON OXFORD DURING THE INTERREGNUM

Now for a conclusion I shall make bold to show you in what esteem the University stood in the late broken times, viz. from the year 1648 to 1660, and then a character of the members thereof in general of that time....

'Tis well known that the Universities of this land have had their beginnings and continuances to no other end but to propagate religion and good manners and supply the nation with persons chiefly professing the three famous faculties of Divinity, Law, and Physick. But in these late times when the dregs of people grew wiser than their teachers, and pretended to have received revelations, visions, inspirations, and I know not what, and therefore above all religion ordinarily professed, nothing could satisfy their insatiable desires but aiming at an utter subversion of them [the Universities], church, and schools, or those places that they thought might put a curb to their proceedings. Intelligent men knew and saw very well that it was their intent to rout up all and to ruin those things that smelt of an Academy, never rejoicing more than when they could trample on the gown and bring humane learning and arts into disgrace. This I may very boldly say and none can deny it that these domestic confusions among ourselves about matters of religion, and insurrections of seditious subjects that have and do pretend to reformation, hath been the only reason why these nurseries must first feel the smart of their implacasy,[1] supposing thereby that unless they were subverted nothing of their designs as to the settlement of their opinions can take place.

Some there were also that made it their common practice to preach against them, styling them "the nurseries of wickedness, the nests of mutton tuggers, the dens of formal drones"; ever and anon styling the Colleges and Halls "cages of unclean birds"; and such like....

And as it was a common matter to declaim against Universities in public, so was it also in the private meetings and conventicles of Anabaptists, Quakers, and such like unstable people, challenging also sometimes the gown itself to oppose what they did and said, and this ever in the Universities themselves, they being backed by force of arms or else some authority....

Furthermore also some there were that endeavoured in their writings to make a reformation of the Universities not as to manners, but discipline; not as to a settlement and well-ordering of their lands, but to the taking them away "to the end that drones might not be nursed up"; not to the increasing or augmenting of several nurseries in the Universities, but to the decreasing, by joining several into one....

Manners: factious, saucy, and some impudent and conceited, morose (incident to most that are sedentary and studious),[2] false, factious in College, and delighting in petty plots and raising in basin of water,[3] reserved (being always jealous that what they said or did should be told to others to disadvantage). Scorning at anything that seemed formal; laughing at a man in a cassock or canonical coat or long cloak to the heels, at those praying with hats before their eyes when they come into the church or kneeling down against a pillar or form. Scorning and laughing at those that used the Lord's prayer. Never styled any church by the name of "St." as "St. Mary's," "St. Peter's" etc.; but "he preached at Mary's," "Peter's" etc.

Discipline: by constant preaching and praying they worked very much upon the affections of people, and some in so great manner that they proved no better than crazed people, or such that are dreamers of dreams, that pretend to revelations, to be instructed by visions.... Disputing constantly, and many good disputants they bred up, especially in philosophy; for divinity, I think none, for few or none had respect for the fathers and schoolmen, and scholars made use of them in disputing. Philosophical disputations often in the Greek tongue in those times (but since this Restoration seldom or never); but fighting in the schools and other times in the streets (to the great scandal of the gown), frequent. The sale of books very much, practical divinity and quaint discourses, and money plenty;[4] not so after the Restoration. Quaint discourses extant; since, nothing but plays and sermons, and foolish drollery.

[They used to] love and encourage instrumental music; but did not care for vocal, because that was used in church by the prelatical party. They would not go to ale-houses or taverns, but send for their liquors to their respective chambers and tipple it there. Some would go in public; but then, if overtaken [with drink] they were so cunning as to dissemble it in their way home by a lame leg or that some sudden pain there had taken them. [They would] countenance none but such that "had the grace of God in them." No public spirits, but minded only their endearments and comfortable importances....

---

[1] implacasy apparently coined by Wood from "implacable."

[2] incident to most that are...studious Robert Burton discusses this belief at some length in the selection from The Anatomy of Melancholy (in "Love of Learning, or Overmuch Study. With a Digression of the Misery of Scholars").

[3] raising in basin of water making storms in a teacup.

[4] In another version of this note, Wood expands: "Money then stirring, and coming in from the new gentlemen."

They were great enemies to May-games and would never suffer anything thereof to be done in the University or city, as May-poles, morrises, Whitsun ales; nay, scarce wakes.

They would not suffer any common players to come into the University, nor scholars to act in private but what they did by stealth; yet at Act times they would permit dancing the rope, drolls, or monstrous sights to be seen.

They would not suffer any swearing or cursing; and if a scholar was found guilty of either, expulsion for the most part was his punishment: if any town-man, a forfeiture of money, the stocks, or prison.

[They did] avoid the company of royalists and the prelatical party, as the protestants did the papists and popishly affected after the plot was discovered in the latter end of September 1678.[1]

They suffered not public drunkenness but punished it very severely, and did make the boon party that were guilty of it so scandalous in their discourse, nay, in sermons, that it frighted the young fry from it and their company.

Being taken off from these pleasing matters, they became factious among themselves, and ever and anon carrying tales to the great persons and endeavouring to lift one another out; so that every man carrying himself wary and being jealous, seldom free discourse or company was made. We had no coffee houses then.

Many also of them that were the sons of upstart gentlemen, such that had got the good places into their hands belonging to the law-courts and had bought the lands of the clergy and gentry, were generally very proud, saucy, impudent, and seldom gave respect to any but the leading person. As for any of the old stock, they laughed and flouted at them, scarce gave them the wall, much less the common civility of a hat:[2] and so it was that the ancient gentry of the nation were despised.

The inferior sort or juniors went very lavishly in their apparel; they always wore hats with ribbon, powdered hair, laced bands and tassel or snake-bow band-strings, half shirts, and long cuffs: and no wonder, seeing Dr. [John] Owen when vice-chancellor had always his hair powdered, cambric band with large costly band-strings, velvet jacket, his breeches set round at knee with ribbons pointed, Spanish leather boots with cambric tops, etc. And all this was in opposition to a prelatical cut.

Gowns with wide sleeves (as wide as surplices), brought by the Cambridge bachelors; imitated by undergraduates. Masters' gowns long, draggling on the ground, sleeves also not used by ancient scholars, faced with velvet.

The University flourished in number, but few nobility; few gentry also, unless to Colleges where an old Head and some Fellows remained. After the Restoration it did in some manner decay in number: Presbyterians and Independents and other fanatical people did forbear to send them for fear of orthodox principles. Another party thought an University too low a breeding; entertained one [a tutor] at home, who infused principles of atheism. Others sent them beyond the seas and they return home factious and propagate faction. Another party (the papists), they send also beyond sea.

THE RESTORATION

Feb. 13, Monday, at night, was great rejoicing here in Oxon [Oxford] for the news that then was brought, that there should suddenly be a free parliament. The bells rang, and bonfires were made, and some rumps or tails of sheep were flung into a bonfire at Queen's College gate. Dr. John Palmer, a great rumper, warden of All Souls College in the place of Dr. [Gilbert] Sheldon, being then very ill and weak, had a rump thrown up from the street at his windows. He had been one of the rump parliament, and a favourite of Oliver [Cromwell]....

---

[1] the plot the Popish Plot (1678), a fictitious Jesuit plot to assassinate Charles II and place the Catholic James, Duke of York, on the throne; reports of the plot caused widespread panic.

[2] old stock the pre-war Masters of Arts and Fellows of Colleges who still remained in Oxford; give the wall a mark of courtesy: when two people approached one another on a street, the junior of the two was expected to let the senior pass closest to the building, where the ground was likely less messy; civility of the hat undergraduates were expected to raise their cap to any M.A. or Fellow.

At this time [February 1660] A. W. [Anthony Wood] being resolved to set himself to the study of antiquities and do something in them in the house where he was born, he set up a chimney in the upper room looking eastward; and in the next room joining he put out a window next to the street, and made it a study, in which he composed for the most part those things which he afterwards published....

The pictures of prophets, apostles, saints, &c. that had been painted on the back-side of the stalls in Merton College choir, in various and antique shapes, about the beginning of the reign of King Henry 7, were daubed over with paint by the command of the usurpers, about 1651, to the sorrow of curious men that were admirers of ancient painting. But that daubing wearing away in two or three years, they were all painted over in oil colours this year [1660] and the ancient pictures quite obliterated. While the workmen were performing this work, several of the brass plates, with inscriptions, on gravestones were most sacrilegiously torn up, and taken away, either by some of the painters, or other workmen then working in the chapel. A.W. complained of these things to the Fellows and desired them to look after the offenders; but, with shame be it spoken, not one of them did resent the matter, or enquire after the sacrilegists, such were their degenerated and poor spirits. However A.W. had before this time transcribed them, which were afterwards printed....[1]

Some cavaliers that were restored [to positions at Oxford] were good scholars, but the generality dunces. And of those good scholars but few preferred....

In this month (April) all tokens of monarchy restored. Arms that had been plastered over in the broken times, especially those in the Public Schools were all plastered over. The sign of the King's Head that had been dashed out or daubed over in paint tempore Olivari [in Oliver's time] (and in its place was written "This was the King's Head"), was new painted....

May.— Upon the votes in the Parliament House, May 1, Tuesday, the King's arms are everywhere renewed, etc.

May 1, Tuesday, May poles, May games. A May pole against the Bear [Inn] in Allhallows parish, set up on purpose to vex the Presbyterians and Independents. Dr. John Conant, then vice-chancellor, came with his beadles and servants to have it sawed down, but before he had entered an inch into it, he and his party were forced to leave that place....

May 24, Thursday, there was a most excellent music lecture of the practick part in the public school of that faculty, where A.W. performed a part on the violin. There were also voices; and by the direction of Edward Low, organist of Christ Church, who was then the Deputy Professor for Dr. John Wilson, all things were carried very well and gave great content to the most numerous auditory. This meeting was to congratulate his majesty's safe arrival to his kingdoms. The school was exceeding full, and the gallery at the end of the school was full of the female sex. After all was concluded, Mr. Low and some of the performers, besides others that did not perform, retired to the Crowne Tavern where they drank a health to the king, the two dukes,[1] George Monck,[2] &c....

---

[1] in Wood's Historia et Antiquitates, lib. 2, p. 91.

May 29, Tuesday, the day of restoration of King Charles 2 observed in all or most places in England, particularly at Oxon which did exceed any place of its bigness. Many from all parts flocked to London to see his entry; but A.W. was not there, but at Oxon, where the jollity of the day continued till next morning. The world of England was perfectly mad. They were freed from the chains of darkness and confusion which the Presbyterians and fanatics had brought upon them; yet some of them seeing then what mischief they had done, tacked about to participate of the universal joy, and at length closed with the royal party.

This Holy Thursday [May 31] the people of Oxon were so violent for May poles in opposition to the Puritans that there was numbered 12 May poles besides 3 or 4 morrisses, etc. But no opposition appearing afterwards, the rabble flagged in their zeal; and seldom after above 1 or 2 in a year....

June 16, Saturday, John Milton's and John Goodwin's books called in and burned.[3] Taken out of those libraries where they were, especially out of the Public Library. About the same time, William Prynne's book against the bishops and books against archbishop Laud were taken out of the Public Library and put in the study in the gallery.[4]
—(CA. 1660)

Athenae Oxoniensis

(excerpts)

ROBERT BURTON, known otherwise to scholars by the name of Democritus Junior, younger brother to William Burton, whom I shall mention under the year 1645, was born of an ancient and genteel family at Lindley in Leicestershire, 8 Feb. 1576, and therefore in the titles of several of his choice books which he gave to the public library, he added to his surname Lindliacus Leycestrensis. He was educated in grammar learning in the free school of Sutton-Colfield in Warwickshire, whence he was sent to Brasen-nose College in the long vacation, an. 1593, where he made a considerable progress in Logic and Philosophy in the condition of a commoner. In 1599, he was elected student of Christ Church and for form sake, though he wanted not a tutor, he was put under the tuition of Dr. John Bancroft, afterwards Bishop of Oxon. In 1614, he was admitted to the reading of the sentences,[5] and on the 29 Nov. 1616, he had the vicarage of St. Thomas's parish in the west suburb of Oxon conferred on him by the Dean and Canons of Christ Church (to the parishioners whereof, he always gave the sacrament in wafers), which, with the rectory of Segrave in Leicestershire, given to him some years after by George Lord Berkeley, he kept with much ado to his dying day. He was an exact mathematician, a curious calculator of nativities, a general read scholar, a thorough-paced philologist, and one that understood the surveying of lands well. As he was by many accounted a severe student, a devourer of authors, a melancholy and humorous person;[6] so by others, who knew him well, a person of great honesty, plain dealing and charity. I have heard some of the ancients of Christ Church often say that his company was very merry, facete and juvenile,[1] and no man in his time did surpass him for his ready and dextrous interlarding his common discourses among them with verses from the poets or sentences from classical authors. Which being then all the fashion in the University, made his company more acceptable. He hath written,

---

[1] the two dukes the King's brothers, James, Duke of York, and Henry, Duke of Gloucester (who died in September 1660).

[2] George Monck (1608–1670), first Duke of Albemarle; he commanded the army whose entrance into London in 1660 initiated the events that would lead to the restoration of the monarchy.

[3] Parliament ordered the burning of Milton's Eikonoklastes (1649) and Defensio pro populo Anglicano (1651), and Goodwin's Hybristodikai. The Obstructours of Justice (1649); all three books defended the trial and execution of the King. John Goodwin (1594?–1665) was a prominent Independent minister and polemicist.

[4] For Prynne, a militant Presbyterian who published numerous anti-episcopal works, see the preface to William Laud's Diary.

[5] admitted to the reading of the sentences that is, he was awarded his Bachelor of Divinity. In the medieval university, being admitted to B.D. meant that a scholar could lecture on the Sentences of Peter Lombard (ca. 1100–1160), the standard textbook of Catholic theology.

[6] humorous subject to his humour of melancholy.

The Anatomy of Melancholy.—First printed in quarto [1621] and afterwards several times in folio an. 1624, [1628,] 1632, 1638, and 1652, &c. to the great profit of the bookseller, who got an estate by it. 'Tis a book so full of variety of reading, that gentlemen who have lost their time and are put to a push for invention, may furnish themselves with matter for common or scholastical discourse and writing. Several authors have unmercifully stolen matter from the said book without any acknowledgment, particularly one William Greenwood, in his book entitled A Description of the Passion of Love, &c. (London, 1657, octavo). Who, as others of the like humour do, sometimes takes his quotations without the least mention of Democritus Junior. He the said Robert Burton paid his last debt to nature, in his chamber in Christ Church at, or very near that time, which he had some years before foretold from the calculation of his own nativity. Which being exact, several of the students did not forbear to whisper among themselves, that rather than there should be a mistake in the calculation, he sent up his soul to Heaven through a slip about his neck. His body was afterwards with due solemnity buried near that of Dr. Robert Weston, in the North Aisle which joins next to the Choir of the Cathedral of Christ Church, on the 27 of January in sixteen hundred thirty and nine. Over his grave was soon after erected a comely monument on the upper pillar of the said aisle, with his bust painted to the life: On the right hand of which, is the calculation of his nativity, and under the bust this inscription made by himself; all put up by the care of William Burton his brother. Paucis notus, paucioribus ignotus, hic jacet Democritus junior, cui vitam dedit, & mortem Melancholia. Obiit viii. Id. Jan. A.C. MDCXXXIX.[2] He left behind him a very choice library of books, many of which he bequeathed to that of Bodley, and a hundred pounds to buy five pounds yearly for the supplying of Christ Church library with books.

JEREMY TAYLOR tumbled out of his mother's womb into the lap of the muses at Cambridge, was educated in Gonville and Caius College there till he was M. of A. Afterwards entering into holy orders, he supplied for a time the Divinity Lecturer's place in the Cathedral of St. Paul in London, where behaving himself with great credit and applause far above his years, came to the cognisance of that great encourager of learning, ingenuity, and virtue, Dr. Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, who thinking it for the advantage of the world that such mighty parts should be afforded better opportunity of study and improvement, than a course of constant preaching would allow of, he caused him to be elected Fellow of All Souls College an. 1636: where being settled, love and admiration still waited upon him; while he improved himself much in books. But this the reader is to know that tho' he came in merely by the paramount interest of the said Archbishop, yet it was done against the statutes of the College in these two respects. First because he had exceeded the age, within which the said statutes make candidates capable of being elected, and secondly that he had not been of three years standing in the University of Oxon, only a week or two before he was put in. However he being a person of most wonderful parts and like to be an ornament thereunto, he was dispensed with, and thereby obtained in that house much of that learning, wherewith he was enabled to write casuistically. About the same time he was in a ready way to be confirmed a member of the Church of Rome, as many of that persuasion have said, but upon a sermon delivered in St. Mary's Church in Oxon on the 5 of Nov. (Gun-powder-treason day) an. 1638, wherein several things were put in against the Papists by the then Vice-chancellor he was afterwards rejected with scorn by those of that party, particularly by Fr. à S. Clara his intimate acquaintance;[1] to whom afterwards he expressed some sorrow for those things he had said against them, as the said S. Clara hath several times told me.[2] About that time, he became one of the chaplains to the said Archbishop of Canterbury who bestowed upon him the rectory of Uppingham in Rutlandshire, and other matters he would have done for him in order to his advance in the Church, had not the rebellion unluckily broke out. In the year 1642 he was with others, by virtue of his Majesty's letters sent to this University, actually created D. of D. [Doctor of Divinity] in that noted convocation held on the first day of Nov. the same year, he being then Chaplain in Ordinary to his said Majesty, and a frequent preacher before him and the court in Oxon. Afterwards he attended in his Majesty's army in the condition of a Chaplain, where tho' he had not a command of his time and books, yet he laid the foundation of several treatises in defence of Episcopacy, the Liturgy, Ministry, and Church of England. Upon the declining of the King's cause, he retired into Wales, where he was suffered under the loyal Earl of Carbury of the Golden Grove in Caermarthenshire to officiate, and keep school, to maintain him and his children. From which, tho' it continued but a few years were several youths most loyally educated, and afterwards sent to the universities. In this solitude he began to write his excellent discourses which are enough of themselves to furnish a library, and will be famous to all succeeding generations for the exactness of wit, profoundness of judgment, richness of fancy, clearness of expression, copiousness of invention, and general usefulness to all purposes of a Christian. By which he soon after got a great reputation among all persons of judgment and indifference and his name grew greater still,[3] as the world grew better and wiser. When he had spent some years in this retirement, in a private corner, as 'twere, of the world, his family was visited with sickness, and thereby lost the dear pledges of God's favour, three sons of great hopes, within the space of two or three months. And tho' he had learned a quiet submission to the divine will, yet this affliction touched him so sensibly, that it made him desirous to leave the country: And going to London, he there for a time officiated in a private congregation of Loyalists to his great hazard and danger. At length meeting with Edward Lord Conway, a person of great honour and generosity, that Lord, after he had understood his condition, made him a kind proffer, which our author Taylor embracing, it carried him over into Ireland, and settled him at Portmore, a place made for study and contemplation; which he therefore dearly loved. And there he wrote his Cases of Conscience,[4] a book that is able alone to give its author immortality. By this time the wheel of providence brought about the King's happy restoration, and out of a confused chaos beauty and order began to appear: Whereupon our loyal author went over to congratulate the Prince and people's happiness, and bear a part in the universal triumph. It was not long after his sacred Majesty began the settlement of the Church, and Dr. Taylor being resolved upon for the Bishopric of Downe and Connor, was consecrated thereinto at Dublin on the 27th of January 1660, and on the 21st of June 1661 he had the administration of the See of Dromore granted to him by his Majesty, in consideration, that he had been the Church's champion, and that he had suffered much in defence of its cause. With what care and faithfulness he discharged his office, all upon the place knew well, and what good rules and directions he gave to his clergy, and how he taught them the practice of them by his own example. Upon his being made Bishop he was constituted a Privy Counsellor, and the University of Dublin gave him their testimony, by recommending him for their Vice-chancellor, which honourable office he kept to his dying day. He was esteemed by the generality of persons a complete artist, accurate logician, exquisite, quick and acute in his reasonings, a person of great fluency in his language and prodigious readiness in his learning.... But he had not only the accomplishments of a gentleman, but so universal were his parts, that they were proportioned to everything. And tho' his spirit and humour were made up of smoothness and gentleness, yet he could bear with the harshness and roughness of the schools, and was not unseen in their subtleties and spinosities.[1] His skill was great both in the civil and canon law and casuistical divinity: And he was a rare conductor of souls, and knew how to counsel, and to advise; to solve difficulties, and determine cases, and quiet consciences. To these may be added his great acquaintance with the fathers and ecclesiastical writers, and the doctors of the first and purest age both of the Greek and Latin Church; which he hath made use of against the Roman Catholics, to vindicate the Church of England from the challenge of innovation, and to prove her ancient, Catholic, and apostolical. Add to all these, he was a person of great humility, had nothing in him of pride and humour, but was courteous and affable and of easy access. He was withal a person of great charity and hospitality: and whosoever compares his plentiful incomes with the inconsiderable estate he left at his death, will be easily convinced that charity was steward for a great proportion of his revenue. To sum up all in a few words of another author, "This great Prelate had the good humour of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, the wisdom of a chancellor, the sagacity of a prophet, the reason of an angel, and the piety of a saint. He had devotion enough for a cloister, learning enough for an university, and wit enough for a College of Virtuosi. And had his parts and endowments been parcelled out among his poor clergy that he left behind him, it would perhaps have made one of the best dioceses in the world."...[2]

---

[1] facete graceful, polished, elegant (OED facete 2); juvenile youthful (without the pejorative implication).

[2] "Known by few, unknown by fewer, here lies Democritus Junior, to whom Melancholy gave both life and death. Died eight days after the ides of January [actually January 25] 1639 [i.e. 1640]."

---

[1] Christopher Davenport (1598–1680) assumed the name Franciscus à Sancta Clara upon becoming a Franciscan friar. He was chaplain to Queen Henrietta Maria and Catherine of Braganza, and a friend of William Laud's.

[2] Wood's account is somewhat unclear. His story is that Taylor was compelled to preach a sermon which contained anti-Catholic passages added by the Vice-Chancellor, that these passages offended Taylor's Catholic friends, and that he apologized to them for the incident. Taylor denied that he had considered conversion, and there is no evidence that this sermon contains the work of anybody other than Taylor. Wood's source is a Catholic friar with an interest in encouraging the belief that a prominent member of the Church of England considered converting to Catholicism.

[3] indifference impartiality.

[4] Ductor Dubitantium, or the Rule of Conscience (1660), which Taylor entitled Cases of Conscience in later editions.

[He] being overtaken with a violent fever, surrendered up his pious soul to the omnipotent at Lisburne alias Lisnegarvy on the thirteenth day of August in sixteen hundred sixty and seven, and was buried in a chapel of his own erection on the ruins of the old Cathedral of Dromore.

—1691–92

---

[1] spinosities to be spinous is to be thorny; figuratively, difficult or unprofitable arguments or theories (OED spinosity 2).

[2] from George Rust, A Funeral Sermon Preached at the Obsequies of... Jeremy Lord Bishop of Down (1668).

John Locke

1632 – 1704

Born at Wrington in Somerset, the son of an attorney, Locke attended Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford, where he was made an M.A. and Fellow in 1658. At Oxford he met Robert Boyle, who would become a life-long friend, and other scientists who would later be involved in the establishment of The Royal Society (which Locke joined in 1668). In the early 1660s Locke was appointed to university positions in Greek, rhetoric, and moral philosophy; in addition he devoted himself to scientific and medical studies. Locke left Oxford in 1667 to become confidential advisor to Anthony Ashley Cooper (later the Earl of Shaftesbury), who employed Locke as secretary to various government councils and commissions. In 1675 Locke travelled to France in hopes of improving his health, where he worked on the Essay Concerning Human Understanding and studied science, civil engineering, gardening, and politics. The fall of Shaftesbury and his Whig adherents in 1682 forced Locke to live in Holland from 1683 to 1689. He returned after the Revolution and was appointed Commissioner of Appeals (1689–1704) and made a member of the new Council of Trade (1696–1700). In 1691 Locke moved to Essex to live in the home of Sir Francis and Lady Masham, where he continued to write and publish.

An Essay Concerning Human Understanding was first published in 1690, though Locke had begun writing it twenty years earlier. He continued to revise the text for the three later editions published in his lifetime, and left further revisions that were included in a posthumously published fifth edition. The text was also translated into French and Latin, and an abridgement by an Oxford scholar was published in 1696. The classic statement of empiricist philosophy, An Essay would wield considerable influence throughout the following century. Locke's other works include the two Treatises of Government (1690), in which he denied the divine right of kings and argued that rulers were obligated to protect the liberties of citizens, three Letters on toleration (1689–1692), and The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695). The following excerpt, the chapter "Of Enthusiasm" (added to the fourth edition, in 1700), follows chapters "Of Reason" and "Of Faith and Reason, and Their Distinct Provinces." For Locke, faith involved assenting to truth revealed from God. It was up to reason, however, to decide if a given idea was genuinely revealed. Enthusiasm to Locke is the refusal to apply reason to ideas that the believer thinks are revealed truth, and the question he seeks to answer in this chapter is: how to distinguish between true revelation and mere enthusiasm?

* * *

An Essay Concerning Human Understanding

(excerpt)

OF ENTHUSIASM

BOOK IV, CHAPTER XIX

He that would seriously set upon the search of truth, ought in the first place to prepare his mind with a love of it. For he that loves it not, will not take much pains to get it; nor be much concerned when he misses it. There is nobody in the Commonwealth of Learning who does not profess himself a lover of truth: and there is not a rational creature that would not take it amiss to be thought otherwise of. And yet for all this one may truly say, there are very few lovers of truth for truth's sake, even amongst those who persuade themselves that they are so. How a man may know whether he be so in earnest is worth enquiry: And I think there is this one unerring mark of it, viz. The not entertaining any proposition with greater assurance than the proofs it is built upon will warrant. Whoever goes beyond this measure of assent, 'tis plain receives not truth in the love of it; loves not truth for truth's sake, but for some other bye end. For the evidence that any proposition is true (except such as are self-evident) lying only in the proofs a man has of it, whatsoever degrees of assent he affords it beyond the degrees of that evidence, 'tis plain all that surplusage of assurance is owing to some other affection, and not to the love of truth: It being as impossible, that the love of truth should carry my assent above the evidence that there is to me that it is true, as that the love of truth should make me assent to any proposition, for the sake of that evidence, which it has not, that it is true: which is in effect to love it as a truth, because it is possible or probably that it may not be true. In any truth that gets not possession of our minds by the irresistible light of self-evidence, or by the force of demonstration, the arguments that gain it assent are the vouchers and gage of its probability to us; and we can receive it for no other than such as they deliver it to our understandings. Whatsoever credit or authority we give to any proposition more than it receives from the principles and proofs it supports itself upon, is owing to our inclinations that way, and is so far a derogation from the love of truth as such: which as it can receive no evidence from our passions or interests, so it should receive no tincture from them.

The assuming an authority of dictating to others, and a forwardness to prescribe to their opinions, is a constant concomitant of this bias and corruption of our judgments. For how almost can it be otherwise, but that he should be ready to impose on others' belief, who has already imposed on his own? Who can reasonably expect arguments and conviction from him, in dealing with others, whose understanding is not accustomed to them in his dealing with himself? Who does violence to his own faculties, tyrannizes over his own mind, and usurps the prerogative that belongs to truth alone, which is to command assent by only its own authority, i.e. by and in proportion to that evidence which it carries with it.

Upon this occasion I shall take the liberty to consider a third ground of assent, which with some men has the same authority, and is as confidently relied on as either faith or reason, I mean enthusiasm. Which laying by reason would set up revelation without it. Whereby in effect it takes away both reason and revelation, and substitutes in the room of it, the ungrounded fancies of a man's own brain, and assumes them for a foundation both of opinion and conduct.

Reason is natural revelation, whereby the eternal Father of Light, and Fountain of all Knowledge, communicates to mankind that portion of truth which he has laid within the reach of their natural faculties: Revelation is natural reason enlarged by a new set of discoveries communicated by God immediately, which reason vouches the truth of, by the testimony and proofs it gives that they come from God. So that he that takes away reason, to make way for revelation, puts out the Light of both, and does much what the same, as if he would persuade a man to put out his eyes the better to receive the remote light of an invisible star by a telescope.

Immediate revelation being a much easier way for men to establish their opinions, and regulate their conduct, than the tedious and not always successful labour of strict reasoning, it is no wonder, that some have been very apt to pretend to revelation, and to persuade themselves that they are under the peculiar guidance of Heaven in their actions and opinions, especially in those of them, which they cannot account for by the ordinary methods of knowledge, and principles of reason. Hence we see, that in all ages, men in whom melancholy has mixed with devotion, or whose conceit of themselves has raised them into an opinion of a greater familiarity with God, and a nearer admittance to his favour than is afforded to others, have often flattered themselves with a persuasion of an immediate intercourse with the deity, and frequent communications from the divine spirit. God I own cannot be denied to be able to enlighten the understanding by a ray darted into the mind immediately from the Fountain of Light: This they understand he has promised to do, and who then has so good a title to expect it, as those who are his peculiar people, chosen by him and depending on him?

Their minds being thus prepared, whatever groundless opinion comes to settle itself strongly upon their fancies, is an illumination from the spirit of God, and presently of divine authority: And whatsoever odd action they find in themselves a strong inclination to do, that impulse is concluded to be a call or direction from Heaven, and must be obeyed; 'tis a commission from above, and they cannot err in executing it.

This I take to be properly enthusiasm, which though founded neither on reason, nor divine revelation, but rising from the conceits of a warmed or over-weening brain, works yet, where it once gets footing, more powerfully on the persuasions and actions of men, than either of those two, or both together: Men being most forwardly obedient to the impulses they receive from themselves; and the whole man is sure to act more vigorously, where the whole man is carried by a natural motion. For strong conceit like a new principle carries all easily with it, when got above common sense, and freed from all restraint of reason and check of reflection, it is heightened into a divine authority, in concurrence with our own temper and inclination.

Though the odd opinions and extravagant actions Enthusiasm has run men into, were enough to warn them against this wrong principle so apt to misguide them both in their belief and conduct: yet the love of something extraordinary, the ease and glory it is to be inspired and be above the common and natural ways of knowledge, so flatters many men's laziness, ignorance, and vanity, that when once they are got into this way of immediate revelation; of illumination without search; and of certainty without proof, and without examination, 'tis a hard matter to get them out of it. Reason is lost upon them, they are above it: they see the Light infused into their understandings, and cannot be mistaken; 'tis clear and visible there; like the light of bright sunshine, shows itself, and needs no other proof, but its own evidence: they feel the hand of God moving them within, and the impulses of the spirit, and cannot be mistaken in what they feel. Thus they support themselves, and are sure reason hath nothing to do with what they see and feel in themselves: what they have a sensible experience of admits no doubt, needs no probation. Would he not be ridiculous who should require to have it proved to him, that the Light shines, and that he sees it? It is its own proof, and can have no other. When the spirit brings Light into our minds, it dispels darkness. We see it, as we do that of the sun at noon, and need not the twilight of reason to show it us. This light from Heaven is strong, clear, and pure, carries its own demonstration with it, and we may as rationally take a glow-worm to assist us to discover the sun, as to examine the celestial ray by our dim candle, reason.

This is the way of talking of these men: they are sure, because they are sure: and their persuasions are right, only because they are strong in them. For, when what they say is stripped of the metaphor of seeing and feeling, this is all it amounts to: and yet these similes so impose on them, that they serve them for certainty in themselves, and demonstration to others.

But to examine a little soberly this internal Light, and this feeling on which they build so much. These men have, they say, clear Light, and they see; they have an awakened sense, and they feel:

this cannot, they are sure, be disputed them. For when a man says he sees or he feels, no body can deny it him, that he does so. But here let me ask: This seeing, is it the perception of the truth of the proposition, or of this, that it is a revelation from God? This feeling, is it a perception of an inclination or fancy to do something, or of the spirit of God moving that inclination? These are two very different perceptions, and must be carefully distinguished, if we would not impose upon ourselves. I may perceive the truth of a proposition, and yet not perceive that it is an immediate revelation from God. I may perceive the truth of a proposition in Euclid, without its being, or my perceiving it to be, a revelation: Nay I may perceive I came not by this knowledge in a natural way, and so may conclude it revealed, without perceiving that it is a revelation from God. Because there be Spirits,[1] which, without being divinely commissioned, may excite those Ideas in me, and lay them in such order before my mind, that I may perceive their connection. So that the knowledge of any proposition coming into my mind, I know not how, is not a perception that it is from God. Much less is a strong persuasion, that it is true, a perception that it is from God, or so much as true. But however it be called Light and seeing; I suppose, it is at most but belief, and assurance: and the proposition taken for a revelation is not such as they know to be true, but taken to be true. For where a proposition is known to be true, revelation is needless. And it is hard to conceive how there can be a revelation to any one of what he knows already. If therefore it be a proposition which they are persuaded, but do not know, to be true, whatever they may call it, it is not seeing, but believing. For these are two ways whereby truth comes into the mind, wholly distinct, so that one is not the other. What I see I know to be so by the evidence of the thing itself: what I believe I take to be so upon the testimony of another: But this testimony I must know to be given, or else what ground have I of believing? I must see that it is God that reveals this to me, or else I see nothing. The question then here is, How do I know that God is the revealer of this to me; that this impression is made upon my mind by his holy spirit, and that therefore I ought to obey it? If I know not this, how great soever the assurance is that I am possessed with, it is groundless; whatever Light I pretend to, it is but Enthusiasm. For whether the proposition supposed to be revealed, be in itself evidently true, or visibly probable, or by the natural ways of knowledge uncertain, the proposition that must be well grounded and manifested to be true is this, that God is the revealer of it, and that what I take to be a revelation is certainly put into my mind by him, and is not an illusion dropped in by some other spirit, or raised by my own fancy. For if I mistake not, these men receive it for true, because they presume God revealed it. Does it not then stand them upon, to examine upon what grounds they presume it to be a revelation from God? or else all their confidence is mere presumption: and this Light they are so dazzled with, is nothing but an ignis fatuus that leads them continually round in this circle.[2] It is a revelation because they firmly believe it, and they believe it, because it is a revelation.

In all that is of divine revelation there is need of no other proof but that it is an inspiration from God: For he can neither deceive nor be deceived. But how shall it be known, that any proposition in our minds is a truth infused by God; a truth that is revealed to us by him, which he declares to us, and therefore we ought to believe? Here it is that Enthusiasm fails of the evidence it pretends to. For men thus possessed boast of a Light whereby they say, they are enlightened, and brought into the knowledge of this or that truth. But if they know it to be a truth, they must know it to be so either by its own self-evidence to natural reason; or by the rational proofs that make it out to be so. If they see and know it to be a truth, either of these two ways, they in vain suppose it to be a revelation: For they know it to be true by the same way that any other man naturally may know that it is so without the help of revelation. For thus all the truths of what kind soever that men uninspired are enlightened with, came into their minds, and are established there. If they say they know it to be true, because it is a revelation from God, the reason is good: but then it will be demanded, how they know it to be a revelation from God. If they say by the Light it brings with it, which shines bright in their minds, and they cannot resist; I beseech them to consider, whether this be any more, than what we have taken notice of already, viz. that it is a revelation because they strongly believe it to be true. For all the Light they speak of is but a strong, though ungrounded persuasion of their own minds that it is a truth. For rational grounds from proofs that it is a truth they must acknowledge to have none, for then it is not received as a revelation, but upon the ordinary grounds that other truths are received: And if they believe it to be true, because it is a revelation, and have no other reason for its being a revelation, but because they are fully persuaded without any other reason that it is true, they believe it to be a revelation only because they strongly believe it to be a revelation, which is a very unsafe ground to proceed on, either in our tenets, or actions: And what readier way can there be to run ourselves into the most extravagant errors and miscarriages than thus to set up fancy for our supreme and sole guide, and to believe any proposition to be true, any action to be right, only because we believe it to be so? The strength of our persuasions are no evidence at all of their own rectitude: Crooked things may be as stiff and inflexible as straight: and men may be as positive and peremptory in error as in truth. How come else the intractable zealots in different and opposite parties? For if the Light, which everyone thinks he has in his mind, which in this case is nothing but the strength of his own persuasion, be an evidence that it is from God, contrary opinions may have the same title to be inspirations; and God will be not only the Father of Lights, but of opposite and contradictory Lights, leading men contrary ways; and contradictory propositions will be divine truths, if an ungrounded strength of assurance be an evidence that any proposition is a divine revelation.

---

[1] Spirits Locke argues earlier in the Essay for the existence of a wide range of spirits or angels, forming a continuous chain of being leading up to the perfection of God: "That there should be more species of intelligent creatures above us than there are of sensible and material below us is probable to me from hence: that in all the visible corporeal world we see no chasm or gaps" (bk. 3, ch. 6, sect. 12).

[2] ignis fatuus "false light"; the "will-o'-the-wisp" or phosphorescent gas (created by decaying organic matter) that could lead unwary travellers astray in marshy areas; metaphorically any delusive hope.

This cannot be otherwise, whilst firmness of persuasion is made the cause of believing, and confidence of being in the right is made an argument of truth; St. Paul himself believed he did well, and that he had a call to it, when he persecuted the Christians, whom he confidently thought in the wrong: But yet it was he, and not they, who were mistaken.[1] Good men are men still, liable to mistakes, and are sometimes warmly engaged in errors, which they take for divine truths, shining in their minds with the clearest Light.

Light, true Light in the mind is, or can be nothing else but the evidence of the truth of any proposition; and if it be not a self-evident proposition, all the Light it has, or can have, is from the clearness and validity of those proofs, upon which it is received. To talk of any other Light in the understanding is to put ourselves in the dark, or in the power of the Prince of Darkness, and by our own consent, to give ourselves up to delusion to believe a lie. For if strength of persuasion be the Light, which must guide us; I ask how shall anyone distinguish between the delusions of Satan, and the inspirations of the Holy Ghost? He can transform himself into an Angel of Light. And they who are led by this Son of the Morning are as fully satisfied of the illumination, i.e. are as strongly persuaded, that they are enlightened by the Spirit of God, as any one who is so: They acquiesce and rejoice in it, are acted by it: and nobody can be more sure, nor more in the right (if their own strong belief may be judge) than they.

---

[1] Acts 8–9 (with Paul then known as Saul).

He therefore that will not give himself up to all the extravagancies of delusion and error must bring this guide of his Light within to the trial. God when he makes the prophet does not unmake the man. He leaves all his faculties in their natural state, to enable him to judge of his inspirations, whether they be of divine original or no. When he illuminates the mind with supernatural Light, he does not extinguish that which is natural. If he would have us assent to the truth of any proposition, he either evidences that truth by the usual methods of natural reason, or else makes it known to be a truth, which he would have us assent to, by his authority, and convinces us that it is from him, by some marks which reason cannot be mistaken in. Reason must be our last judge and guide in every thing. I do not mean, that we must consult reason, and examine whether a proposition revealed from God can be made out by natural principles, and if it cannot, that then we may reject it: But consult it we must, and by it examine, whether it be a revelation from God or no: And if reason finds it to be revealed from God, reason then declares for it, as much as for any other truth, and makes it one of her dictates. Every conceit that thoroughly warms our fancies must pass for an inspiration, if there be nothing but the strength of our persuasions, whereby to judge of our persuasions: If reason must not examine their truth by something extrinsical to the persuasions themselves; inspirations and delusions, truth and falsehood will have the same measure, and will not be possible to be distinguished.

If this internal Light, or any proposition which under that title we take for inspired, be conformable to the principles of reason or to the word of God, which is attested revelation, reason warrants it, and we may safely receive it for true, and be guided by it in our belief and actions: If it receive no testimony nor evidence from either of these rules, we cannot take it for a revelation, or so much as for true, till we have some other mark that it is a revelation, besides our believing that it is so. Thus we see the holy men of old, who had revelations from God, had something else besides that internal Light of assurance in their own minds, to testify to them that it was from God. They were not left to their own persuasions alone, that those persuasions were from God; but had outward signs to convince them of the author of those revelations. And when they were to convince others, they had a power given them to justify the truth of their commission from Heaven; and by visible signs to assert the divine authority of the message they were sent with. Moses saw the bush burn without being consumed, and heard a voice out of it. This was something besides finding an impulse upon his mind to go to Pharaoh, that he might bring his brethren out of Egypt: and yet he thought not this enough to authorise him to go with that message, till God by another miracle, of his rod turned into a serpent, had assured him of a power to testify his mission by the same miracle repeated before them, whom he was sent to.[1] Gideon was sent by an angel to deliver Israel from the Mideanites, and yet he desired a sign to convince him, that this commission was from God.[2] These and several the like instances to be found among the prophets of old, are enough to show, that they thought not an inward seeing or persuasion of their own minds without any other proof a sufficient evidence that it was from God, though the Scripture does not everywhere mention their demanding or having such proofs.

---

[1] Exodus 3:1–4; 4:1–5.

[2] Judges 6:11–21.

In what I have said I am far from denying, that God can, or doth sometimes enlighten men's minds in the apprehending of certain truths, or excite them to good actions by the immediate influence and assistance of the Holy Spirit, without any extraordinary signs accompanying it. But in such cases too we have reason and the Scripture, unerring rules to know whether it be from God or no. Where the truth embraced is consonant to the revelation in the written word of God; or the action conformable to the dictates of right reason or Holy Writ, we may be assured that we run no risk in entertaining it as such, because though perhaps it be not an immediate revelation from God, extraordinarily operating on our minds, yet we are sure it is warranted by that revelation which he has given us of truth. But it is not the strength of our private persuasion within ourselves, that can warrant it to be a Light or motion from Heaven: Nothing can do that but the written word of God without us, or that standard of reason which is common to us with all men. Where reason or Scripture is express for any opinion or action, we may receive it as of divine authority: But 'tis not the strength of our own persuasions which can by itself give it that stamp. The bent of our own minds may favour it as much as we please; that may show it to be a foundling of our own, but will by no means prove it to be an offspring of Heaven, and of divine original.

—1700

George Savile, Marquis of Halifax

1633 – 1695

The heir to one of Yorkshire's great county families, Halifax was educated at Shrewsbury and in France and Italy; he inherited his father's baronetcy in 1644. His background was Royalist—his father had been the Royalist governor of York—and he sat for Pontefract in the Convention Parliament of 1660. Halifax's involvement in public affairs began soon after the Restoration. Tolerant (he opposed the execution of both Catholic and Whig "plotters"), independent, urbane, witty, a fine orator, and a mediator by instinct, Halifax came to be known as the trimmer, a master of compromise and the middle way in politics. In an otherwise sympathetic sketch, Gilbert Burnet wrote that Halifax "changed sides so often, that in conclusion no side trusted him." He was ennobled in 1668 (eventually made Marquis in 1682), admitted to the Privy Council in 1672, dismissed from office in 1676, and reinstated three years later. He opposed the Exclusion Bill, though he did not like James II. He was initially neutral about the Revolution, though he served eventually as chief minister to William and Mary (1689–1690). Halifax appears in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel as "Jotham of piercing wit and pregnant thought, / Endued by nature and learning taught / To move assemblies" (lines 882–884).

As a writer and prose stylist, Halifax is best known for The Character of a Trimmer, a defence of political moderation first published in 1688 but circulated previously in manuscript; his other works include A Letter to a Dissenter (1687) and Advice to a Daughter (1688). A Character of King Charles II was first published in 1750, when it was edited from manuscript by Alexander Pope. Halifax wrote the sketch sometime between the death of the King in 1685 and his own death a decade later. The biographical character was a convention of history writing (for another Restoration example, see Clarendon's character of William Laud), though the genre did borrow from the psychology of the literary character as practised earlier in the century by writers such as Overbury, Earle, and Breton. For Halifax, this sketch was also in a sense a working political document, the product of years of careful observation necessitated by a life in court politics.

* * *

A Character of King Charles II

Of his Religion

A character differeth from a picture only in this, every part of it must be like, but it is not necessary that every feature should be comprehended in it as in a picture, only some of the most remarkable.

This Prince at his first entrance into the world had adversity for his introducer, which is generally thought to be no ill one, but in his case it proved so, and laid the foundation of most of those misfortunes or errors that were the causes of the great objections made to him.

The first effect it had was in relation to his religion.

The ill-bred familiarity of the Scotch divines had given him a distaste of that part of the Protestant religion.[1] He was left then to the little remnant of the Church of England in the Fauxbourg St. Germain;[2] which made such a kind of figure, as might easily be turned in such a manner as to make him lose his veneration for it. In a refined country where religion appeared in pomp and splendor, the outward appearance of such unfashionable men was made an argument against their religion; and a young Prince not averse to raillery was the more susceptible of a contempt for it.

---

[1] After the execution of Charles I in 1649, the Scots proclaimed Charles II King of Scotland in 1649—but on the condition that he accept the Presbyterian Solemn League and Covenant.

[2] an Anglican chapel in Paris established by diplomat Sir Richard Browne.

The company he kept, the men in his pleasures, and the arguments of State that he should not appear too much a Protestant whilst he expected assistance from a popish Prince;[1] all these, together with a habit encouraged by an application to his pleasures, did so loosen and untie him from his first impressions, that I take it for granted, after the first year or two, he was no more a Protestant. If you ask me what he was, my answer must be, that he was of the religion of a young Prince in his warm blood, whose enquiries were more applied to find arguments against believing, than to lay any settled foundations for acknowledging providence, mysteries, &c. A general creed, and no very long one, may be presumed to be the utmost religion of one, whose age and inclination could not well spare any thoughts that did not tend to his pleasures.

In this kind of indifference or unthinkingness, which is too natural in the beginnings of life to be heavily censured, I will suppose he might pass some considerable part of his youth. I must presume too that no occasions were lost, during that time, to insinuate everything to bend him towards popery. Great art without intermission, against youth and easiness, which are seldom upon their guard, must have its effect. A man is to be admired if he resisteth, and therefore cannot reasonably be blamed if he yieldeth to them. When the critical minute was, I'll not undertake to determine; but certainly the inward conviction doth generally precede the outward declarations: At what distances, dependeth upon men's several complexions and circumstances; no stated period can be fixed.

It will be said that he had not religion enough to have conviction; that is a vulgar error. Conviction indeed is not a proper word but where a man is convinced by reason; but in the common acceptation, it is applied to those who cannot tell why they are so: If men can be at least as positive in a mistake as when they are in the right; they may be as clearly convinced when they do not know why, as when they do.

I must presume that no man of the King's age, and his methods of life, could possibly give a good reason for changing his religion in which he was born, let it be what it will. But our passions are much oftener convinced than our reason. He had but little reading, and that tending to his pleasures more than to his instruction. In the library of a young Prince, the solemn folios are not much rumpled, books of a lighter digestion have the dog's ears.

Some pretend to be very precise in the time of his reconciling; the Cardinal de Retz, &c.[2] I will not enter into it minutely, but whenever it was, it is observable that the government of France did not think it advisable to discover it openly; upon which such obvious reflections may be made, that I will not mention them.

Such a secret can never be put into a place which is so closely stopped, that there shall be no chinks. Whispers went about, particularly men had intimations: Cromwell had his advertisements in other things,[3] and this was as well worth his paying for. There was enough said of it to startle a great many, though not universally diffused; so much, that if the government here, had not crumbled of itself, his right alone, with that and other clogs upon it, would hardly have thrown it down. I conclude that when he came into England he was as certainly a

---

[1] a popish Prince the King of France, Louis XIV.

[2] Retz Jean-François-Paul de Gondi, Cardinal de Retz (1613–1679), with whom Charles negotiated in 1658–1659 about Catholic support for an invasion of England.

[3] advertisements reports from his spies.

Roman Catholic, as that he was a man of pleasure; both very consistent by visible experience.

It is impertinent to give reasons for men's changing their religion. None can give them but themselves, as every man has quite a different way of arguing: A thing which may very well be accounted for. They are differing kinds of wit, to be quick to find a fault, and to be capable to find out a truth: There must be industry in the last; the first requires only a lively heat, that catcheth hold of the weak side of any thing, but to choose the strong one is another talent. The reason why men of wit are often the laziest in their enquiries is, that their heat carrieth their thoughts so fast that they are apt to be tired, and they faint in the drudgery of a continued application. Have not men of great wit in all times permitted their understandings to give way to their first impressions? It taketh off from the diminution when a man doth not mind a thing; and the King had then other business: The inferior part of the man was then in possession, and the faculties of the brain, as to serious and painful enquiries, were laid asleep at least, tho' not extinguished. Careless men are most subject to superstition. Those who do not study reason enough to make it their guide, have more unevenness: As they have neglects, so they have starts and frights; dreams will serve the turn; omens and sicknesses have violent and sudden effects upon them. Nor is the strength of an argument so effectual from its intrinsic force, as by its being well suited to the temper of the party.

The genteel part of the Catholic religion might tempt a Prince that had more of the fine gentleman than his governing capacity required: and the exercise of indulgence to sinners being more frequent in it, than of inflicting penance, might be some recommendation. Mistresses of that faith are stronger specifics in this case,[1] than any that are in physic.

The Roman Catholics complained of his breach of promise to them very early.[2] There were broad peepings out, glimpses so often repeated, that to discerning eyes it was flaring: In the very first year there were such suspicions as produced melancholy shakings of the head, which were very significant.[3] His unwillingness to marry a Protestant was remarkable, though both the Catholic and the Christian Crown would have adopted her. Very early in his youth, when any German Princess was proposed, he put off the discourse with raillery. A thousand little circumstances were a kind of accumulative evidence, which in these cases may be admitted.

Men that were earnest Protestants were under the sharpness of his displeasure, expressed by raillery, as well as by other ways. Men near him have made discoveries from sudden breakings out in discourse, &c. which showed there was a root. It was not the least skilful part of his concealing himself, to make the world think he leaned towards an indifference in religion.

He had sicknesses before his death, in which he did not trouble any Protestant divines; those who saw him upon his death-bed, saw a great deal.[4]

. . . .

HIS AMOURS, MISTRESSES, &C.

It may be said that his inclinations to love were the effects of health, and a good constitution, with as little mixture of the seraphic part as ever man had:[5]

---

[1] Mistresses of that faith Louise de Kéroualle (later Duchess of Portsmouth) and Barbara Palmer (later Countess of Castlemaine and Duchess of Cleveland) were both Catholic (the latter a convert).

[2] Charles had promised toleration of Catholicism in the Declaration of Breda (1660).

[3] The first Act of Parliament passed after the Restoration contained a clause that sought to curb such speculations with a clause prohibiting anyone from saying that the King was Catholic.

[4] The Benedictine Father John Huddleston administered the Catholic rites to Charles on his deathbed.

[5] seraphic devout, elevated (OED seraphic 2, 3b); Halifax is saying that the King's "inclinations to love" were spurred more by physical than emotional considerations.

And though from that foundation men often raise their passions; I am apt to think his stayed as much as any man's ever did in the lower region. This made him like easy mistresses: They were generally resigned to him while he was abroad, with an implied bargain. Heroic refined lovers place a good deal of their pleasure in the difficulty, both for the vanity of conquest, and as a better earnest of their kindness.

After he was restored, mistresses were recommended to him; which is no small matter in a Court, and not unworthy the thoughts even of a Party. A mistress either dexterous in herself, or well-instructed by those that are so, may be very useful to her friends, not only in the immediate hours of her ministry, but by her influences and insinuations at other times. It was resolved generally by others, whom he should have in his arms, as well as whom he should have in his councils. Of a man who was so capable of choosing, he chose as seldom as any man that ever lived.

He had more properly, at least in the beginning of his time, a good stomach to his mistresses, than any great passion for them. His taking them from others was never learnt in a romance; and indeed fitter for a philosopher than a knight-errant. His patience for their frailties showed him no exact lover. It is a heresy according to a true lover's creed, ever to forgive an infidelity, or the appearance of it. Love of ease will not do it, where the heart is much engaged; but where mere nature is the motive, it is possible for a man to think righter than the common opinion, and to argue, that a rival taketh away nothing but the heart, and leaveth all the rest.

In his latter times he had no love, but insensible engagements that made it harder than most might apprehend to untie them. The politics might have their part; a secret, a commission, a confidence in critical things, though it doth not give a lease for a precise term of years, yet there may be difficulties in dismissing them; there may be no love all the while; perhaps the contrary.

He was said to be as little constant as they were thought to be. Though he had no love, he must have some appetite, or else he could not keep them for mere ease, or for the love of sauntering; mistresses are frequently apt to be uneasy; they are in all respects craving creatures; so that though the taste of those joys might be flattened, yet a man who loved pleasure so as to be very unwilling to part with it, might (with the assistance of his fancy, which doth not grow old so fast) reserve some supplemental entertainments, that might make their personal service be still of use to him. The definition of pleasure, is what pleaseth, and if that which grave men may call a corrupted fancy, shall administer any remedies for putting off mourning for the loss of youth, who shall blame it?

The young men seldom apply their censure to these matters; and the elder have an interest to be gentle towards a mistake, that seemeth to make some kind of amends for their decays.

He had wit enough to suspect, and he had wit enough too not to care: The ladies got a great deal more than would have been allowed to be an equal bargain in Chancery,[1] for what they did for it; but neither the manner, nor the measure of pleasure is to be judged by others.

Little inducements at first grew into strong reasons by degrees. Men who do not consider circumstances, but judge at a distance, by a general way of arguing, conclude if a mistress in some cases is not immediately turned off, it must needs be that the gallant is incurably subjected. This will by no means hold in private men, much less in Princes, who are under more entanglements, from which they cannot so easily loosen themselves.

His mistresses were as different in their humours, as they were in their looks. They gave matter of very different reflections. The last especially was quite out of the definition of an ordinary mistress; the causes and the manner of her being first introduced were very different.[1] A very peculiar distinction was spoken of, some extraordinary solemnities that might dignify, though not sanctify her function.[2] Her chamber was the true cabinet council. The King did always by his councils, as he did sometimes by his meals; he sat down out of form with the Queen, but he supped below stairs. To have the secrets of a King, who happens to have too many, is to have a King in chains: He must not only, not part with her, but he must in his own defence dissemble his dislike: The less kindness he hath, the more he must show: There is great difference between being muffled, and being tied: He was the first, not the last. If he had quarrelled at some times, besides other advantages, this mistress had a powerful second (one may suppose a kind of guarantee);[3] this to a man that loved his ease, though his age had not helped, was sufficient.

---

[1] Chancery the court concerned with remedying wrongs not covered under the common law.

The thing called sauntering,[4] is a stronger temptation to Princes than it is to others. The being galled with importunities, pursued from one room to another with asking faces; the dismal sound of unreasonable complaints, and ill-grounded pretences; the deformity of fraud ill-disguised; all these would make any man run away from them; and I used to think it was the motive for making him walk so fast. So it was more properly taking sanctuary. To get into a room, where all business was to stay at the door, excepting such as he was disposed to admit, might be very acceptable to a younger man than he was, and less given to his ease. He slumbered after dinner, had the noise of the company to divert him, without their solicitations to importune him. In these hours where he was more unguarded, no doubt the cunning men of the court took their times to make their observations, and there is as little doubt but he made his upon them too: Where man had chinks he would see through them as soon as any man about him. There was much more real business done there in his politic, than there was in his personal capacity, Stans pede in uno;[5] and there was the French part of the Government,[6] which was not the least.

In short, without endeavouring to find more arguments, he was used to it. Men do not care to put off a habit, nor do often succeed when they go about it. His was not an unthinkingness; he did not perhaps think so much of his subjects as they might wish; but he was far from being wanting to think of himself.

His Conduct to his Ministers

He lived with his ministers as he did with his mistresses; he used them, but he was not in love with them. He showed his judgment in this, that he cannot properly be said ever to have had a favourite, though some might look so at a distance. The present use he might have of them, made him throw favours upon them, which might lead the lookers on into that mistake; but he tied himself no more to them, than they did to him, which implied a sufficient liberty on either side.

---

[1] The last Louise de Kéroualle (1649–1734).

[2] In October 1671, John Evelyn noted in his diary that de Kéroualle "was bedded one of these nights, and the stocking flung, after the manner of a married bride."

[3] second a back-up (OED second v 2); in this case Louis XIV of France.

[4] sauntering as in its modern sense, to dawdle or trifle, to do anything in an aimless or leisurely way; this meaning of the word was new in the Restoration (OED).

[5] From Horace, Satires, I.iv.9–10: "Herein lay his fault: often in an hour, as though a great exploit, he would dictate two hundred lines while standing, as they say, on one foot"—a proverbial expression for doing something without effort.

[6] Louise de Kéroualle was assumed to represent the interests of Louis XIV.

Perhaps he made dear purchases: If he seldom gave profusely, but where he expected some unreasonable thing, great rewards were material evidences against those who received them.

He was free of access to them, which was a very gaining quality. He had at least as good a memory for the faults of his Ministers as for their services; and whenever they fell, the whole inventory came out; there was not a slip omitted.

That some of his Ministers seemed to have a superiority,[1] did not spring from his resignation to them, but to his ease. He chose rather to be eclipsed than to be troubled.

His brother was a Minister,[2] and he had his jealousies of him. At the same time that he raised him, he was not displeased to have him lessened. The cunning observers found this out, and at the same time that he reigned in the cabinet, he was very familiarly used at the private supper.

A Minister turned off is like a Lady's waiting-woman, that knoweth all her washes, and hath a shrewd guess at her strayings: So there is danger in turning them off, as well as in keeping them.

He had back stairs to convey informations to him, as well as for other uses; and though such informations are sometimes dangerous (especially to a Prince that will not take pains necessary to digest them), yet in the main, that humour of hearing every body against every body, kept those about him in much awe, than they would have been without it. I do not believe that ever he trusted any man, or any set of men so entirely, as not to have some secrets, in which they had no share: As this might make him less well served, so in some degree it might make him the less imposed upon.

You may reckon under this article his Female Ministry; for though he had Ministers of the Council, Ministers of the Cabinet, and Ministers of the Ruelle; the Ruelle was often the last appeal.[3] Those who were not well there, were used because they were necessary at the time, not because they were liked; so that their tenure was a little uncertain. His Ministers were to administer business to him as doctors do physic, wrap it up in something to make it less unpleasant; some skilful digressions were so far from being impertinent, that they could not many times fix him to a fair audience without them. His aversion to formality made him dislike a serious discourse, if very long, except it was mixed with something to entertain him. Some even of the graver sort too, used to carry this very far, and rather than fail, use the coarsest kind of youthful talk.

In general, he was upon pretty even terms with his Ministers, and could as easily bear their being hanged as some of them could his being abused.

Of his Wit and Conversation

His wit consisted chiefly in the quickness of his apprehension. His apprehension made him find faults, and that led him to short sayings upon them, not always equal, but often very good.

By his being abroad, he contracted a habit of conversing familiarly, which added to his natural genius, made him very apt to talk; perhaps more than a very nice judgment would approve.

He was apter to make broad allusions upon anything that gave the least occasion, than was altogether suitable with the very good breeding he showed in most other things. The company he kept whilst abroad, had so used him to that sort of dialect, that he was so far from thinking it a fault or an indecency, that he made it a matter of raillery upon those who could not prevail upon themselves to join in it. As a man who hath a good stomach loveth generally to talk of meat, so in the vigour of his age, he began that style, which by degrees grew so natural to him, that after he ceased to do it out of pleasure, he continued to do it out of custom. The hypocrisy of the former times inclined men to think they could not show too great an aversion to it, and that helped to encourage this unbounded liberty of talking, without the restraints of decency which were before observed. In his more familiar conversations with the ladies, even they must be passive, if they would not enter into it. How far sounds as well as objects may have their effects to raise inclination, might be an argument to him to use that style; or whether using liberty at its full stretch, was not the general inducement without any particular motives to it.

---

[1] probably referring to Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon; Thomas Osborne, Earl of Danby; and Charles Spencer, Earl of Sunderland.

[2] His brother James, Duke of York (later King James II), who was Lord High Admiral.

[3] Ruelle a reception room in which ladies of fashion would meet in the morning to entertain persons of distinction (OED ruelle 2).

The manner of that time of telling stories, had drawn him into it; being commended at first for the faculty of telling a tale well, he might insensibly be betrayed to exercise it too often. Stories are dangerous in this, that the best expose a man most, by being oftenest repeated. It might pass for an evidence for the Moderns against the Ancients,[1] that it is now wholly left off by all that have any pretence to be distinguished by their good sense....

HIS TALENTS, TEMPER, HABITS, &C.

He had a mechanical head, which appeared in his inclination to shipping and fortification, &c. This would make one conclude, that his thoughts would naturally have been more fixed to business, if his pleasures had not drawn them away from it.

He had a very good memory, though he would not always make equal good use of it. So that if he had accustomed himself to direct his faculties to his business, I see no reason why he might not have been a good deal master of it. His chain of memory was longer than his chain of thought; the first could bear any burden, the other was tired by being carried on too long; it was fit to ride a heat, but it had not wind enough for a long course.

A very great memory often forgetteth how much time is lost by repeating things of no use. It was one reason of his talking so much; since a great memory will always have something to say, and will be discharging itself, whether in or out of season, if a good judgment doth not go along with it, to make it stop and turn. One might say of his memory, that it was a Beauté Journaliere:[2] Sometimes he would make shrewd applications, &c., at others he would bring things out of it, that never deserved to be laid in it.

He grew by age into a pretty exact distribution of his hours, both for his business, pleasures, and the exercise for his health, of which he took as much care as could possibly consist with some liberties he was resolved to indulge in himself. He walked by his watch, and when he pulled it out to look upon it, skilful men would make haste with what they had to say to him.

He was often retained in his personal against his politic capacity. He would speak upon those occasions most dexterously against himself; Charles Stuart would be bribed against the King; and in the distinction, he leaned more to his natural self, than his character would allow. He would not suffer himself to be so much fettered by his character as was convenient; he was still starting out of it, the power of nature was too strong for the dignity of his calling, which generally yielded as often as there was a contest.

It was not the best use he made of his back stairs to admit men to bribe him against himself, to procure a defalcation,[1] help a lame accountant to get off, or side with the farmers against the improvement of the revenue.[2] The King was made the instrument to defraud the Crown, which is somewhat extraordinary.

---

[1] Moderns against the Ancients a long-running debate on the relative merits of ancient versus modern learning, most famously summarized in Jonathan Swift's The Battle of the Books (1704).

[2] Beauté Journaliere beautiful but capricious or unpredictable.

That which might tempt him to it probably was, his finding that those about him so often took money upon those occasions; so that he thought he might do well at least to be a partner. He did not take the money to hoard it; there were those at Court who watched those times, as the Spaniards do for the coming in of the Plate Fleet.[3] The beggars of both sexes helped to empty his Cabinet, and to leave room in them for a new lading upon the next occasion. These negotiators played double with him too, when it was for their purpose so to do. He knew it, and went on still; so he gained his present end, at the time, he was less solicitous to enquire into the consequences.

He could not properly be said to be either covetous or liberal; his desire to get was not with an intention to be rich; and his spending was rather an easiness in letting money go, than any premeditated thought for the distribution of it. He would do as much to throw off the burden of a present importunity, as he would to relieve a want.

When once the aversion to bear uneasiness taketh place in a man's mind, it doth so check all the passions, that they are damped into a kind of indifference; they grow faint and languishing, and come to be subordinate to that fundamental maxim, of not purchasing any thing at the price of a difficulty. This made that he had as little eagerness to oblige, as he had to hurt men; the motive of his giving bounties was rather to make men less uneasy to him, than more easy to themselves; and yet no ill-nature all this while. He would slide from an asking face, and could guess very well. It was throwing a man off from his shoulders, that leaned upon them with his whole weight; so that the party was not gladder to receive, than he was to give. It was a kind of implied bargain; though men seldom kept it, being so apt to forget the advantage they had received, that they would presume the King would as little remember the good he had done them, so as to make it an argument against their next request.

This principle of making the love of ease exercise an entire sovereignty in his thoughts, would have been less censured in a private man, than might be in a Prince. The consequence of it to the public changeth the nature of that quality, or else a philosopher in his private capacity might say a great deal to justify it. The truth is, a King is to be such a distinct creature from a man, that their thoughts are to be put in quite a differing shape, and it is such a disquieting task to reconcile them, that Princes might rather expect to be lamented than to be envied, for being in a station that exposeth them, if they do not do more to answer men's expectations than human nature will allow.

That men have the less ease for their loving it so much, is so far from a wonder, that it is a natural consequence, especially in the case of a Prince. Ease is seldom got without some pains, but it is yet seldomer kept without them. He thought giving would make men more easy to him, whereas he might have known it would certainly make them more troublesome.

When men receive benefits from Princes, they attribute less to his generosity than to their own deserts; so that in their own opinion, their merit cannot be bounded; by that mistaken rule, it can as little be satisfied. They would take it for a diminution to have it circumscribed. Merit hath a thirst upon it that can never be quenched by golden showers. It is not only still ready, but greedy to receive more. This King Charles found in as many instances as any Prince that ever reigned, because the easiness of access introducing the good success of their first request, they were the more encouraged to repeat those importunities, which had been more effectually stopped in the beginning by a short and resolute denial. But his nature did not dispose him to that method, it directed him rather to put off the troublesome minute for the time, and that being his inclination, he did not care to struggle with it.

---

[1] defalcation a fraudulent shortcoming or misappropriation in financial matters (OED defalcation 5).

[2] referring to a political battle (1682–1683) over the "farming" of the excise tax: fee "farmers" are those who bought for a fixed sum the right to collect the profits of a tax or office.

[3] Plate Fleet the fleet carrying silver from mines in the New World.

I am of an opinion, in which I am every day more confirmed by observation, that gratitude is one of those things that cannot be bought. It must be born with men, or else all the obligations in the world will not create it. An outward show may be made to satisfy decency, and to prevent reproach; but a real sense of a kind thing is a gift of nature, and never was, nor can be acquired.

The love of ease is an opiate, it is pleasing for the time, quieteth the spirits, but it hath its effects that seldom fail to be most fatal. The immoderate love of ease maketh a man's mind pay a passive obedience to any thing that happeneth: It reduceth the thoughts from having desire to be content.

It must be allowed he had a little over-balance on the well-natured side, not vigour enough to be earnest to do a kind thing, much less to do a harsh one; but if a hard thing was done to another man, he did not eat his supper the worse for it. It was rather a deadness than severity of nature, whether it proceeded from a dissipation of spirits, or by the habit of living in which he was engaged.

If a King should be born with more tenderness than might suit with his office, he would in time be hardened. The faults of his subjects make severity so necessary, that by the frequent occasions given to use it, it comes to be habitual, and by degrees the resistance that nature made at first groweth fainter, till at last it is in a manner quite extinguished.

In short, this Prince might more properly be said to have gifts than virtues, as affability, easiness of living, inclinations to give, and to forgive: Qualities that flowed from his nature rather than from his virtue.

He had not more application to any thing than the preservation of his health; it had an entire preference to any thing else in his thoughts, and he might be said without aggravation to study that, with as little intermission as any man in the world. He understood it very well, only in this he failed, that he thought it was more reconcilable with his pleasures, than it really was. It is natural to have such a mind to reconcile these, that 'tis the easier for any man that goeth about it, to be guilty of that mistake.

This made him overdo in point of nourishment, the better to furnish to those entertainments; and then he thought by great exercise to make amends, and to prevent ill effects of his blood being too much raised. The success he had in this method, whilst he had youth and vigour to support him in it, encouraged him to continue it longer than nature allowed. Age stealeth so insensibly upon us, that we do not think of suiting our way of reasoning to the several stages of life; so insensibly that not being able to pitch upon any precise time, when we cease to be young, we either flatter ourselves that we always continue to be so, or at least forget how much we are mistaken in it.

CONCLUSION

After all this, when some rough strokes of the pencil have made several parts of the picture look a little hard, it is a justice that would be due to every man, much more to a Prince, to make some amends, and to reconcile men as much as may be to it by the last finishing.

He had as good a claim to a kind interpretation as most men. First as a Prince: living and dead, generous and well-bred men will be gentle to them; next as an unfortunate Prince in the beginning of his time, and a gentle one in the rest.

A Prince neither sharpened by his misfortunes whilst abroad, nor by his power when restored, is such a shining character, that it is a reproach not to be so dazzled with it, as not to be able to see a fault in its full light. It would be a scandal in this case to have an exact memory. And if all who are akin to his vices, should mourn for him, never Prince would be better attended to his grave. He is under the protection of common frailty, that must engage men for their own sakes not to be too severe, where they themselves have so much to answer.

What therefore an angry philosopher would call lewdness, let frailer men call a warmth and sweetness of the blood, that would not be confined in the communicating itself; an over-flowing of good nature, of which he had such a stream, that it would not be restrained within the banks of a crabbed and unsociable virtue.

If he had sometimes less firmness than might have been wished; let the kindest reason be given, and if that should be wanting, the best excuse. I would assign the cause of it to be his loving at any rate to be easy, and his deserving the more to be indulged in it, by his desiring that everybody else should be so.

If he sometimes let a servant fall,[1] let it be examined whether he did not weigh so much upon his master, as to give him a fair excuse. That yieldingness, whatever foundations it might lay to the disadvantage of posterity, was a specific to preserve us in peace for his own time. If he loved too much to lie upon his own down bed of ease, his subjects had the pleasure, during his reign, of lolling and stretching upon theirs. As a sword is sooner broken upon a feather bed than upon a table, so his pliantness broke the blow of a present mischief much better than a more immediate resistance would perhaps have done.

Ruin saw this, and therefore removed him first to make way for further overturnings.[2]

If he dissembled; let us remember, first, that he was a King, and that dissimulation is a Jewel of the Crown; next, that it is very hard for a man not to do sometimes too much of that, which he concludeth necessary for him to practice. Men should consider, that as there would be no false dice, if there were no true ones, so if dissembling is grown universal, it ceaseth to be foul play, having an implied allowance by the general practice. He that was so often forced to dissemble in his own defence, might the better have the privilege sometimes to be the aggressor, and to deal with men at their own weapon.

Subjects are apt to be as arbitrary in their censure, as the most assuming Kings can be in their power. If there might be matter for objections, there is not less reason for excuses; the defects laid to his charge, are such as may claim indulgence from mankind.

Should nobody throw a stone at his faults but those who are free from them, there would be but a slender shower.

What private man will throw stones at him because he loved? Or what Prince, because he dissembled?

If he either trusted, or forgave his enemies, or in some cases neglected his friends, more than could in strictness be allowed; let not those errors be so arraigned as take away the privilege that seemeth to be due to Princely frailties. If Princes are under the misfortune of being accused to govern ill, their subjects have the less right to fall hard upon them, since they generally so little deserve to be governed well.

---

[1] let a servant fall referring to the Earl of Clarendon, forced into exile in 1667, and the Earl of Danby, impeached in 1679.

[2] likely referring to the 1688 Revolution, contrasting Charles II's "pliantness" with James II's inflexibility; though possibly referring also to the Monmouth rebellion (1685) and/or James II's assault on the constitution and the Anglican privileges.

The truth is, the calling of a King, with all its glittering, hath such an unreasonable weight upon it, that they may rather expect to be lamented, than to be envied; for being set upon a pinnacle, where they are exposed to censure, if they do not do more to answer men's expectations, than corrupted nature will allow.

It is but justice therefore to this Prince, to give all due softening to the less shining parts of his life; to offer flowers and leaves to hide, instead of using aggravations to expose them.

Let his royal ashes then lie soft upon him, and cover him from harsh and unkind censures; which though they should not be unjust, can never clear themselves from being indecent.

—(ca. 1685–1695)

Samuel Pepys

1633 – 1703

Born in London, the son of a tailor who would rise to become a landowner, Pepys (pronounced "peeps") was educated at St. Paul's School and at Trinity Hall and Magdalene College, Cambridge; he received his B.A. in 1654 and his M.A. in 1660. In 1655 he married Elizabeth St. Michael, the daughter of a French Huguenot refugee. The following year Sir Edward Montagu, his father's first cousin, secured Pepys a clerical post in government, the beginning of a career in public affairs in which Pepys would serve as Clerk of the Privy Seal (1660), Surveyor-General of the navy victualling office (1665), and Secretary of the Admiralty (1672). A brilliant administrator, Pepys has been called "the saviour of the navy" for the economic and logistical reforms he introduced; his work also put him on good terms with the Lord High Admiral, the Duke of York (later James II). In 1679 he was implicated in the "Popish plot" and deprived of office, but was soon set free; he was reinstated to his admiralty position in 1684. In the same year he served as president of The Royal Society, which he had joined shortly after its foundation. He retired after the 1688 Revolution, when his long friendship with the deposed James II made him an object of suspicion.

Pepys kept his diary from 1660 to 1669, stopping only because he feared (unnecessarily, as it turned out) for his eyesight. Written in one of the seventeenth century's several shorthand systems mixed with codes of his own devising, the diary was not transcribed until the early nineteenth century; it has subsequently become not only the best known English diary but also an important source for information about Restoration social life. Always gregarious, an enthusiastic playgoer, amateur musician, and reader (his remarkable library, housed in the original bookcases he designed, remains intact at Magdalene College), Pepys knew and wrote about a wide range of people, from court personalities to local shopkeepers. In the following excerpt, the many names left unannotated are all various business, social, trade, and court acquaintances. For other accounts of the Great Fire, which destroyed much of the central city of London, see the selections from Pepys's friend and fellow diarist John Evelyn and from the Earl of Clarendon.

* * *

The Diary of Samuel Pepys
(excerpt)

The Fire of London

September 2, 1666. Lord's day. Some of our maids sitting up late last night to get things ready against our feast today, Jane called us up, about 3 in the morning, to tell us of a great fire they saw in the city. So I rose, and slipped on my nightgown and went to her window, and thought it to be on the back side of Marke Lane at the furthest; but being unused to such fires as followed, I thought it far enough off, and so went to bed again and to sleep. About 7 rose again to dress myself, and there looked out at the window and saw the fire not so much as it was, and further off. So to my closet to set things to rights after yesterday's cleaning.[1] By and by Jane comes and tells me that she hears that above 300 houses have been burned down tonight by the fire we saw, and that it was now burning down all Fish Street by London Bridge. So I made myself ready presently, and walked to the Tower and there got up upon one of the high places, Sir J. Robinson's little son going up with me;[2] and there

---

[1] closet private (as opposed to public) room; in Pepys's case, a combination of home office and library. The "King's closet" below is a private apartment.

[2] Sir John Robinson was Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

I did see the houses at that end of the bridge all on fire, and an infinite great fire on this and the other side the end of the bridge—which, among other people, did trouble me for poor little Michell and our Sarah on the bridge.[1] So down, with my heart full of trouble, to the Lieutenant of the Tower, who tells me that it begun this morning in the King's baker's house in Pudding Lane, and that it hath burned down St. Magnes Church and most part of Fish Street already. So I down to the waterside and there got a boat and through bridge, and there saw a lamentable fire. Poor Michell's house, as far as the Old Swan, already burned that way and the fire running further, that in a very little time it got as far as the Steel-yard while I was there. Everybody endeavouring to remove their goods, and flinging into the river or bringing them into lighters that lay off.[2] Poor people staying in their houses as long as till the very fire touched them, and then running into boats or clambering from one pair of stair by the waterside to another. And among other things, the poor pigeons I perceive were loath to leave their houses, but hovered about the windows and balconies till they were some of them burned, their wings, and fell down.

Having stayed, and in an hour's time seen the fire rage every way, and nobody to my sight endeavouring to quench it, but to remove their goods and leave all to the fire; and having seen it get as far as the Steel-yard, and the wind mighty high and driving it into the city, and everything, after so long a drought, proving combustible, even the very stones of churches, and among other things, the poor steeple by which pretty Mrs. Horsley lives, and whereof my old school-fellow Elborough is parson, taken fire in the very top and there burned till it fall down—I to Whitehall with a gentleman with me who desired to go off from the Tower to see the fire in my boat—to Whitehall, and there up to the King's closet in the chapel, where people came about me and I did give them an account dismayed them all; and word was carried in to the King, so I was called for and did tell the King and Duke of York what I saw, and that unless his Majesty did command houses to be pulled down, nothing could stop the fire. They seemed much troubled, and the King commanded me to go to my Lord Mayor from him and command him to spare no houses but to pull down before the fire every way. The Duke of York bid me tell him that if he would have any more soldiers, he shall; and so did my Lord Arlington afterward, as a great secret. Here meeting with Captain Cocke, I in his coach, which he lent me, and Creed with me,[3] to Paul's; and there walked along Watling Street as well as I could, every creature coming away loaded with goods to save—and here and there sick people carried away in beds. Extraordinary good goods carried in carts and on backs. At last met my Lord Mayor in Canning Street, like a man spent, with a handkerchief about his neck. To the King's message, he cried like a fainting woman, "Lord, what can I do? I am spent. People will not obey me. I have been pulling down houses. But the fire overtakes us faster than we can do it."[4] That he needed no more soldiers; and that for himself, he must go and refresh himself, having been up all night. So he left me, and I him, and walked home—seeing people all almost distracted and no manner of means used to quench the fire. The houses too, so very thick thereabouts, and full of matter for burning, as pitch and tar, in Thames Street—and warehouses of oil and wines and brandy and other things. Here I saw Mr. Isaccke Houblon, that handsome man—prettily dressed and dirty at his door at Dowgate, receiving some of his brothers' things whose houses were on fire; and as he says, have been removed twice already, and he doubts (as it soon proved) that they must be in a little time removed from his house also—which was a sad consideration. And to see the churches all filling with goods, by people who themselves should have been quietly there at this time.

---

[1] Michael Mitchell kept a local tavern, though Pepys is probably referring to his wife, Betty, an old flame whom he elsewhere in the Diary describes as his "second wife." Sarah was a former servant.

[2] lighters flat-bottomed boats used for loading and unloading ships.

[3] George Cocke, merchant and navy contractor; John Creed, Pepys's principal rival for administrative advancement.

[4] Lord Mayor Sir Thomas Bludworth; he was subsequently much criticized for indecision (see entry for September 7 below).

By this time it was about 12 o'clock, and so home and there find my guests, which was Mr. Wood and his wife, Barbary Shelden, and also Mr. Moone—she mighty fine, and her husband, for aught I see a likely man. But Mr. Moone's design and mine, which was to look over my closet and please him with the sight thereof, which he hath long desired, was wholly disappointed, for we were in great trouble and disturbance at this fire not knowing what to think of it. However, we had an extraordinary good dinner, and as merry as at this time we could be.

While at dinner, Mrs. Batelier came to enquire after Mr. Woolfe and Stanes (who it seems are related to them), whose houses in Fish Street are all burned, and they in a sad condition. She would not stay in the fright.

As soon as dined, I and Moone away and walked through the city, the streets full of nothing but people and horses and carts loaded with goods, ready to run over one another, and removing goods from one burned house to another—they now removing out of Canning Street (which received goods in the morning) into Lumbard Street and further; and among others, I now saw my little goldsmith Stokes receiving some friend's goods, whose house itself was burned the day after. We parted at Paul's, he home and I to Paul's Wharf, where I had appointed a boat to attend me; and took in Mr. Carcasse and his brother, whom I met in the street, and carried them below and above bridge, to and again, to see the fire, which was now got further, both below and above, and no likelihood of stopping it. Met with the King and Duke of York in their barge, and with them to Queen-Hith and there called Sir Rd. Browne to them. Their order was only to pull down houses apace, and so below bridge at the waterside; but little was or could be done, the fire coming upon them so fast. Good hopes there was of stopping it at the Three Cranes above, and at Buttolph's Wharf below bridge, if care be used; but the wind carries it into the city, so as we know not by the waterside what it doth there. River full of lighters and boats taking in goods, and good goods swimming in the water; and only, I observed that hardly one lighter or boat in three that had the goods of a house in, but there was a pair of virginals in it.[1] Having seen as much as I could now, I away to Whitehall by appointment, and there walked to St. James's Park, and there met my wife and Creed and Wood and his wife and walked to my boat, and there upon the water again, and to the fire up and down, it still increasing and the wind great. So near the fire as we could for smoke; and all over the Thames, with one's face in the wind you were almost burned with a shower of firedrops—this is very true—so as houses were burned by these drops and flakes of fire, three or four, nay five or six houses, one from another. When we could endure no more upon the water, we to a little alehouse on the Bankside over against the Three Cranes, and there stayed till it was dark almost and saw the fire grow; and as it grow darker, appeared more and more, and in corners and upon steeples and between churches and houses, as far as we could see up the hill of the city, in a most horrid malicious bloody flame, not like the fine flame of an ordinary fire. Barbary and her husband away before us. We stayed till, it being darkish, we saw the fire as only one entire arch of fire from this to the other side the bridge, and in a bow up the hill, for an arch of above a mile long. It made me weep to see it. The churches, houses, and all on fire and flaming at once, and a horrid noise the flames made, and the cracking of houses at their ruin. So home with a sad heart, and there find everybody discoursing and lamenting the fire; and poor Tom Hater came with some few of his goods saved out of his house, which is burned upon Fish Street Hill. I invited him to lie at my house, and did receive his goods: but was deceived in his lying there,[1] the noise coming every moment of the growth of the fire, so as we were forced to begin to pack up our own goods and prepare for their removal. And did by moonshine (it being brave,[2] dry, and moonshine and warm weather) carry much of my goods into the garden, and Mr. Hater and I did remove my money and iron chests into my cellar—as thinking that the safest place. And got my bags of gold into my office ready to carry away, and my chief papers of accounts also there, and my tallies into a box by themselves. So great was our fear, as Sir W. Batten had carts come out of the country to fetch away his goods this night. We did put Mr. Hater, poor man, to bed a little; but he got but very little rest, so much noise being in my house, taking down of goods.

---

[1] pair of virginals a single instrument, though referred to in the period in the plural; a type of keyboard (OED virginal sb 1b).

SEPTEMBER 3. About 4 o'clock in the morning, my Lady Batten sent me a cart to carry away all my money and plate and best things to Sir W. Rider's at Bednall Green; which I did, riding myself in my nightgown in the cart; and Lord, to see how the streets and the highways are crowded with people, running and riding and getting of carts at any rate to fetch away things. I find Sir W. Rider tired with being called up all night and receiving things from several friends. His house full of goods—and much of Sir W. Batten and Sir W. Penn's. I am eased at my heart to have my treasure so well secured. Then home with much ado to find a way. Nor any sleep all this night to me nor my poor wife. But then, and all this day, she and I and all my people labouring to get away the rest of our things, and did get Mr. Tooker to get me a lighter to take them in, and we did carry them (myself some) over Tower Hill, which was by this time full of people's goods, bringing their goods thither. And down to the lighter, which lay at the next quay above the Tower dock. And here was my neighbour's wife, Mrs. Buckworth, with her pretty child and some few of her things, which I did willingly give way to be saved with mine. But there was no passing with anything through the postern, the crowd was so great.

The Duke of York came this day by the office and spoke to us, and did ride with his guard up and down the city to keep all quiet (he being now General, and having the care of all).

This day, Mercer being not at home, but against her mistress' order gone to her mother's, and my wife going thither to speak with W. Hewer, met her there and was angry; and her mother saying that she was not a prentice girl, to ask leave every time she goes abroad, my wife with good reason was angry, and when she came home, bid her be gone again. And so she went away, which troubled me; but yet less than it would, because of the condition we are in fear of coming into in a little time, of being less able to keep one in her quality. At night, lay down a little upon a quilt of W. Hewer in the office (all my own things being packed up or gone); and after me, my poor wife did the like—we having fed upon the remains of yesterday's dinner, having no fire nor dishes, nor any opportunity of dressing anything.

SEPTEMBER 4. Up by break of day to get away the remainder of my things, which I did by a lighter at the Iron Gate; and my hands so few, that it was the afternoon before we could get them all away.

---

[1] was deceived was mistaken in making the offer.

[2] brave fine (OED brave a 3b).

Sir W. Penn and I to Tower Street, and there met the fire burning three or four doors beyond Mr. Howell's; whose goods, poor man (his trays and dishes, shovels &c., were flung all along Tower Street in the kennels, and people working therewith from one end to the other), the fire coming on in that narrow street, on both sides, with infinite fury. Sir W. Batten, not knowing how to remove his wine, did dig a pit in the garden and laid it in there; and I took the opportunity of laying all the papers of my office that I could not otherwise dispose of. And in the evening Sir W. Penn and I did dig another and put our wine in it, and I my Parmesan cheese as well as my wine and some other things.

The Duke of York was at the office this day at Sir W. Penn's, but I happened not to be within. This afternoon, sitting melancholy with Sir W. Penn in our garden and thinking of the certain burning of this office without extraordinary means, I did propose for the sending up of all our workmen from Woolwich and Deptford yards (none whereof yet appeared), and to write to Sir W. Coventry to have the Duke of York's permission to pull down houses rather than lose this office, which would much hinder the King's business. So Sir W. Penn he went down this night, in order to the sending them up tomorrow morning; and I wrote to Sir W. Coventry about the business, but received no answer.

This night Mrs. Turner (who, poor woman, was removing her goods all this day—good goods, into the garden, and knew not how to dispose of them)—and her husband supped with my wife and I at night in the office, upon a shoulder of mutton from the cook's, without any napkin or anything, in a sad manner but were merry. Only, now and then walking into the garden and saw how horridly the sky looks, all on a fire in the night, was enough to put us out of our wits; and indeed it was extremely dreadful—for it looks just as if it was at us, and the whole heaven on fire. I after supper walked in the dark down to Tower Street, and there saw it all on fire at the Trinity house on that side and the Dolphin tavern on this side, which was very near us—and the fire with extraordinary vehemence. Now begins the practice of blowing up of houses in Tower Street, those next the Tower, which at first did frighten people more than anything; but it stopped the fire where it was done—it bringing down the houses to the ground in the same places they stood, and then it was easy to quench what little fire was in it, though it kindled nothing almost. W. Hewer this day went to see how his mother did, and comes late home, but telling us how he hath been forced to remove her to Islington, her house in Pye Corner being burned. So that it got so far that way and all the Old Bailey, and was running down to Fleet Street. And Paul's is burned, and all Cheapside. I wrote to my father this night; but the post-house being burned, the letter could not go.

SEPTEMBER 5. I lay down in the office again upon W. Hewer's quilt, being mighty weary and sore in my feet with going till I was hardly able to stand. About 2 in the morning my wife calls me up and tells of new cries of "Fire!"—it being come to Barking Church, which is the bottom of our lane. I up; and finding it so, resolved presently to take her away; and did, and took my gold (which was about £2350), W. Hewer, and Jane down by Poundy's boat to Woolwich. But Lord, what a sad sight it was by moonlight to see the whole city almost on fire—that you might see it plain at Woolwich, as if you were by it. There when I came, I find the gates shut, but no guard kept at all; which troubled me, because of discourses now begun that there is plot in it and that the French had done it.[1] I got the gates open, and to Mr. Shelden's, where I locked up my gold and charged my wife and W. Hewer never to leave the room without one of them in it night nor day. So back again, by the way seeing my goods well in the lighters at Deptford and watched well by people. Home, and whereas I expected to have seen our house on fire, it being now about 7 o'clock, it was not. But to the fire, and there find greater hopes than I expected; for my confidence of finding our office on fire was such, that I durst not ask anybody how it was with us, till I came and saw it not burned. But going to the fire, I find, by the blowing up of houses and the great help given by the workmen out of the King's yards, sent up by Sir W. Penn, there is a good stop given to it, as well at Mark Lane end as ours—it having only burned the dial of Barking Church, and part of the porch, and was there quenched. I up to the top of Barking steeple, and there saw the saddest sight of desolation that I ever saw. Everywhere great fires. Oil cellars and brimstone and other things burning. I became afeared to stay there long; and therefore down again as fast as I could, the fire being spread as far as I could see it, and to Sir W. Penn's and there eat a piece of cold meat, having eaten nothing since Sunday but the remains of Sunday's dinner.

---

[1] gates the gates to the dockyard; if French agents were setting fires, the dockyard would provide a significant military target, hence Pepys's worries about the lack of a guard.

Here I met with Mr. Young and Whistler; and having removed all my things, and received good hopes that the fire at our end is stopped, they and I walked into the town and find Fanchurch Street, Gracious Street, and Lumbard Street all in dust. The Exchange a sad sight, nothing standing there of all the statues or pillars but Sir Tho. Gresham's picture in the corner.[1] Walked into Moorfields (our feet ready to burn, walking through the town among the hot coals) and find that full of people, and poor wretches carrying their goods there, and everybody keeping his goods together by themselves (and a great blessing it is to them that it is fair weather for them to keep abroad night and day); drank there, and paid twopence for a plain penny loaf.

Thence homeward, having passed through Cheapside and Newgate Market, all burned—and seen Anthony Joyce's house in fire. And took up (which I keep by me) a piece of glass of Mercer's chapel in the street, where much more was, so melted and buckled with the heat of the fire, like parchment. I also did see a poor cat taken out of a hole in the chimney joining to the wall of the Exchange, with the hair all burned off the body and yet alive. So home at night, and find there good hopes of saving our office—but great endeavours of watching all night and having men ready; and so we lodged them in the office, and had drink and bread and cheese for them. And I lay down and slept a good night about midnight—though when I rose, I hear that there had been a great alarm of French and Dutch being risen—which proved nothing. But it is a strange thing to see how long this time did look since Sunday, having been always full of variety of actions, and little sleep, that it looked like a week or more. And I had forgot almost the day of the week.

SEPTEMBER 6. Up about 5 o'clock, and there met Mr. Gawden at the gate of the office (I intending to go out, as I used every now and then to do, to see how the fire is) to call our men to Bishop's Gate, where no fire had yet been near, and there is now one broke out—which did give great grounds to people, and to me too, to think that there is some kind of plot in this (on which many by this time have been taken, and it hath been dangerous for any stranger to walk in the streets);[2] but I went with the men and we did put it out in a little time, so that that was well again. It was pretty to see how hard the women did work in the canals sweeping of water; but then they would scold for drink and be as drunk as devils. I saw good butts of sugar broke open in the street, and people go and take handfuls out and put into beer and drink it. And now all being pretty well, I took boat and over to Southwark, and took boat on the other side the bridge and so to Westminster, thinking to shift myself, being all in dirt from top to bottom. But could not there find any place to buy a shirt or pair of gloves, Westminster Hall being full of people's goods—those in Westminster having removed all their goods, and the Exchequer money put into vessels to carry to Nonsuch. But to the Swan, and there was trimmed. And then to Whitehall, but saw nobody, and so home. A sad sight to see how the river looks—no houses nor church near it to the Temple—where it stopped. At home did go with Sir W. Batten and our neighbour Knightly (who, with one more, was the only man of any fashion left in all the neighbourhood hereabouts, they all removing their goods and leaving their houses to the mercy of the fire) to Sir R. Ford's, and there dined, in an earthen platter a fried breast of mutton, a great many of us. But very merry; and indeed as good a meal, though as ugly a one, as ever I had in my life. Thence down to Deptford, and there with great satisfaction landed all my goods at Sir G. Carteret's, safe, and nothing missed I could see, or hurt. This being done to my great content, I home; and to Sir W. Batten's, and there with Sir R. Ford, Mr. Knightly, and one Withers, a professed lying rogue, supped well; and mighty merry and our fears over. From them to the office and there slept, with the office full of labourers, who talked and slept and walked all night long there. But strange it was to see Clothworker's Hall on fire these three days and nights in one body of flame—it being the cellar, full of oil.

---

[1] picture statue; Sir Thomas Gresham had founded the Royal Exchange, a meeting place for merchants and bankers.

[2] Many blamed the fire on foreign saboteurs, with suspicion falling on Catholics generally and the French in particular; the fire does, however, appear to have been accidental. Clarendon discusses these fears in more detail.

SEPTEMBER 7. Up by 5 o'clock and, blessed by God, find all well, and by water to Paul's wharf. Walked thence and saw all the town burned, and a miserable sight of Paul's Church, with all the roofs fallen and the body of the choir fallen into St. Faith's—Paul's school also—Ludgate—Fleet Street—my father's house, and the church, and a good part of the Temple the like. So to Creed's lodging near the New Exchange, and there find him laid down upon a bed—the house all unfurnished, there being fears of the fire's coming to them. There borrowed a shirt of him—and washed. To Sir W. Coventry at St. James's, who lay without curtains, having removed all his goods—as the King at Whitehall and everybody had done and was doing. He hopes we shall have no public distractions upon this fire, which is what everybody fears—because of the talk of the French having a hand in it. And it is a proper time for discontents—but all men's minds are full of care to protect themselves and save their goods. The militia is in arms everywhere. Our fleets, he tells me, have been in sight one of another, and most unhappily by foul weather were parted, to our great loss, as in reason they do conclude—the Dutch being come out only to make a show and please their people; but in very bad condition as to stores, victuals, and men. They are at Bullen, and our fleet come to St. Ellen's. We have got nothing, but have lost one ship, but he knows not what.[1]

Thence to the Swan and there drank; and so home and find all well. My Lord Brouncker at Sir W. Batten's, and tells us the General is sent for up to come to advise with the King about business at this juncture, and to keep all quiet—which is great honour to him, but I am sure is but a piece of dissimulation. So home and did give order for my house to be made clean; and then down to Woolwich and there find all well. Dined, and Mrs. Markeham came to see my wife. So I up again, and calling at Deptford for some things of W. Hewer, he being with me; and then home and spent the evening with Sir R. Ford, Mr. Knightly, and Sir W. Penn at Sir W. Batten's. This day our merchants first met at Gresham College, which by proclamation is to be their Exchange. Strange to hear what is bid for houses all up and down here—a friend of Sir W. Rider's having £150 for what he used to let for £40 per annum. Much dispute where the Custom House shall be; thereby the growth of the city again to be foreseen. My Lord Treasurer, they say, and others, would have it at the other end of the town. I home late to Sir W. Penn, who did give me a bed—but without curtains or hangings, all being down. So here I went the first time into a naked bed, only my drawers on—and did sleep pretty well; but still, both sleeping and waking, had a fear of fire in my heart, that I took little rest. People do all the world over cry out of the simplicity of my Lord Mayor in general, and more particularly in this business of the fire, laying it all upon him. A proclamation is come out for markets to be kept at Leaden Hall and Mile-end Green and several other places about the town and Tower hill, and all churches to be set open to receive poor people.

---

[1] The English in fact lost several ships in this encounter.

SEPTEMBER 8. Up, and with Sir W. Batten and Sir W. Penn by water to Whitehall, and they to St. James's. I stopped with Sir G. Carteret, to desire him to go with us and to enquire after money. But the first he cannot do, and the other as little, or says, "When can we get any, or what shall we do for it?" He, it seems, is employed in the correspondence between the city and the King every day, in settling of things. I find him full of trouble to think how things will go. I left him, and to St. James's, where we met first at Sir W. Coventry's chamber and there did what business we can without any books. Our discourse, as everything else, was confused. The fleet is at Portsmouth, there staying a wind to carry them to the Downes or toward Bullen, where they say the Dutch fleet is gone and stays. We concluded upon private meetings for a while, not having any money to satisfy any people that may come to us. I bought two eels upon the Thames, cost me 6*s*.[1] Thence with Sir W. Batten to the Cockpit, whither the Duke of Albemarle is come. It seems the King holds him so necessary at this time, that he hath sent for him and will keep him here. Indeed, his interest in the city, being acquainted, and his care in keeping things quiet, is reckoned that wherein he will be very serviceable. We to him. He is courted in appearance by everybody. He very kind to us. I perceive he lays by all business of the fleet at present and minds the city, and is now hastening to Gresham College to discourse with the Aldermen. Sir W. Batten and I home (where met by my brother John, come to town to see how things are with us). And then presently he with me to Gresham College—where infinite of people; partly through novelty to see the new place, and partly to find out and hear what is become one man of another. I met with many people undone, and more that have extraordinary great losses. People speaking their thoughts variously about the beginning of the fire and the rebuilding of the city. Then to Sir W. Batten and took my brother with me, and there dined with a great company of neighbours, and much good discourse; among others, of the low spirits of some rich men in the city, in sparing any encouragement to the poor people that wrought for the saving their houses. Among others, Alderman Starling, a very rich man, without children, the fire at next door to him in our lane—after our men had saved his house, did give 2*s* 6*d* among 30 of them, and did quarrel with some that would remove the rubbish out of the way of the fire, saying that they came to steal. Sir W. Coventry told me of another this morning in Holborne, which he showed the King—that when it was offered to stop the fire near his house for such a reward, that came but to 2*s* 6*d* a man among the neighbours, he would give but

---

[1] three times the usual price of two shillings.

18*d.* Thence to Bednall Green by coach, my brother with me, and saw all well there and fetched away my journal book to enter for five days past; and then back to the office, where I find Bagwell's wife and her husband come home. Agreed to come [to] their house tomorrow, I sending him away back to his ship today. To the office, and late writing letters; and then to Sir W. Penn, my brother lying with me, and Sir W. Penn gone down to rest himself at Woolwich. But I was much frighted, and kept awake in my bed, by some noise I heard a great while below-stairs and the boys not coming up to me when I knocked. It was by their discovery of people stealing of some neighbour's wine that lay in vessels in the street. So to sleep. And all well all night.

SEPTEMBER 9. Sunday. Up, and was trimmed, and sent my brother to Woolwich to my wife to dine with her. I to church, where our parson made a melancholy but good sermon—and many, and most, in the church cried, especially the women. The church mighty full, but few of fashion, and most strangers. I walked to Bednall Green; and there dined well, but a bad venison pasty, at Sir W. Rider's. Good people they are, and good discourse. And his daughter Middleton, a fine woman and discreet. Thence home, and to church again, and there preached Dean Harding; but methinks a bad poor sermon, though proper for the time—nor eloquent, in saying at this time that the city is reduced from a large folio to a decimo tertio.[1] So to my office, there to write down my journal and take leave of my brother, whom I sent back this afternoon, though rainy—which it hath not done a good while before. But I had no room nor convenience for him here till my house is fitted; but I was very kind to him, and do take very well of him his journey. I did give him 40*s* for his pocket; and so he being gone, and it presently raining, I was troubled for him, though it is good for the fire. Anon to Sir W. Penn to bed, and made my boy Tom to read me asleep.

—(1666)

---

[1] large folio…decimo tertio sizes of books, from the largest to the smallest.

Robert South

1634 – 1716

The son of a London merchant, South was educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford. After receiving his M.A. in 1657, he travelled on the continent where in 1658 he was privately ordained. After the Restoration, South held a succession of offices, becoming public orator of Oxford (1660–1667), domestic chaplain to the Earl of Clarendon (1660), chaplain to the Duke of York (1667), canon of Christ Church (1670), and rector of Islip in Oxfordshire (1668); later in life he turned down the offer of a bishopric.

South was a very popular preacher, known for a witty, pithy, sometimes sarcastic sermon style. Many of his sermons were published separately, and they were gathered in a six-volume collected edition (1679–1715). The following sermon, preached at about the time of the Restoration, draws a parallel between the biblical King Jeroboam and Oliver Cromwell in order to attack the Interregnum Independents and others who argued for the legitimacy of worship outside the established Church. His emphasis on the importance to the state of religious order and ceremony is similar to the pragmatic political advice William Cavendish was privately giving Charles II at the same time. In addition, South's picture of the thankless difficulties of the clerical life echoes Robert Burton's discussion of the melancholy of scholars. The sermon was first published in Interest Deposed, and Truth Restored... Two Sermons (1660).

* * *

Ecclesiastical Policy the Best Policy: or
Religion the Best Reason of State

Preached at Lincoln's Inn
[Before 25 May, 1660]

I Kings 13:33, 34. After this thing Jeroboam returned not from his evil way, but made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places: Whosoever would, he consecrated him, and he became one of the priests of the high places. And this thing became sin unto the house of Jeroboam, even to cut it off, and to destroy it from off the face of the earth.

Jeroboam (from the name of a person become the character of impiety) is reported to posterity eminent, or rather infamous, for two things; usurpation of government, and innovation of religion. 'Tis confessed, the former is expressly said to have been from God; but since God may order, and dispose, what he does not approve; and use the wickedness of men, while he forbids it; the design of the first cause does not excuse the malignity of the second: And therefore, the advancement and sceptre of Jeroboam was in that sense only the work of God, in which it is said, Amos 3:6: "That there is no evil in the city which the Lord has not done." But from his attempts upon the civil power, he proceeds to innovate God's worship; and from the subjection of men's bodies and estates, to enslave their consciences, as knowing that true religion is no friend to an unjust title. Such was afterwards the way of Mahomet, to the tyrant to join the impostor, and what he had got by the sword to confirm by the Alcoran;[1] raising his empire upon two pillars, conquest, and inspiration. Jeroboam being thus advanced, and thinking policy the best piety, though indeed in nothing ever more befooled; the nature of sin being not only to defile, but to infatuate: In [I Kings] the 12th chapter, and the 27th verse, he thus argues: "If this people go up to do sacrifice in the House of the Lord at Jerusalem, then shall the heart of this people turn again unto their Lord, even unto Rehoboam King of Judah, and they shall kill me, and go again unto Rehoboam King of Judah." As if he should have said, the true worship of God, and the converse of those that use it, dispose men to a considerate lawful subjection. And therefore I must take another course: My practice must not be better than my title; what was won by force, must be continued by delusion. Thus sin is usually seconded with sin: And a man seldom commits one sin to please, but he commits another to defend himself. As 'tis frequent for the adulterer to commit murder to conceal the shame of his adultery. But let us see Jeroboam's politic procedure in the next verse. "Whereupon the King took counsel, and made two calves of gold, and said unto them, It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem, behold thy Gods, O Israel." As if he had made such an edict: "I Jeroboam, by the advice of my council, considering the great distance of the temple, and the great charges that poor people are put to in going thither; as also the intolerable burthen of paying the first-fruits and tithes to the priest, have considered of a way that may be more easy, and less burthensome to the people, as also more comfortable to the priests themselves; and therefore strictly enjoin, that none henceforth presume to repair to the temple at Jerusalem, especially since God is not tied to any place or form of worship; as also, because the devotion of men is apt to be clogged by such ceremonies; therefore both for the ease of the people, as well as for the advancement of religion, we require and command, that all henceforth forbear going up to Jerusalem." Questionless these, and such other reasons, the impostor used to insinuate his devout idolatry. And thus the calves were set up, to which oxen must be sacrificed; the God and the sacrifice out of the same herd. And because Israel was not to return to Egypt, Egypt was brought back to them: That is, the Egyptian way of worship, the Apis, or Serapis, which was nothing but the image of a calf or ox, as is clear from most historians. Thus Jeroboam having procured his people Gods, the next thing was to provide priests. Hereupon, to the calves he adds a commission, for the approving, trying, and admitting the rascality and lowest of the people to minister in that service: Such as kept cattle, with a little change of their office, were admitted to make oblations to them. And doubtless, besides the approbation of these, there was a commission also to eject such of the priests and Levites of God, as being too ceremoniously addicted to the temple, would not serve Jeroboam before God, nor worship his calves for their gold, nor approve those two glittering sins for any reason of state whatsoever.

---

[1] Alcoran the usual seventeenth-century spelling for the Qur'an (Koran).

Having now perfected divine worship, and prepared both Gods and priests: In the next place, that he might the better teach his false priests the way of their new worship, he begins the service himself, and so countenances by his example, what he had enjoined by his command, in the 33 v. of this chapter, "And Jeroboam stood by the altar to burn incense." Burning of incense was then the ministerial office amongst them, as preaching is now amongst us. So that to represent to you the nature of Jeroboam's action: It was, as if in a Christian nation the chief governor should authorize and encourage all the scum and refuse of the people to preach,[1] and call them to the Ministry by using to preach, and invade the ministerial function himself. But Jeroboam rested not here, but while he was busy in his work, and a prophet immediately sent by God, declares against his idolatry, he endeavours to seize upon, and commit him; in the 4 v. "He held forth his hand from the altar, and said, Lay hold of him." Thus we have him completing his sin, and by a "strange imposition of hands" persecuting the true prophets, as well as ordaining false. But it was a natural transition, and no ways wonderful to see him, who stood affronting God with false incense in the right hand, persecuting with the left, and abetting the idolatry of one arm with the violence of the other. Now, if we lay all these things together, and consider the parts, rise, and degrees of his sin, we shall find, that it was not for nothing, that the spirit of God so frequently and bitterly in Scripture stigmatizes this person; for it represents him, first encroaching upon the civil government, thence changing that of the church, debasing the office that God had made sacred; introducing a false way of worship, and destroying the true. And in this we have a full and fair description of a foul thing, that is, of an usurper and an impostor: or, to use one word more comprehensive than both, "of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat who made Israel to sin."

---

[1] Cromwell (a lively copy of Jeroboam) did so [note added when the sermon was published in a collected edition].

From the story and practice of Jeroboam, we might gather these observations.

1. That God sometimes punishes a notorious sin, by suffering the sinner to fall into a worse.

Thus God punishes the rebellion of the Israelites, by permitting them to fall into idolatry.

2. There is nothing so absurd, but may be obtruded upon the vulgar under pretence of religion.

Certainly, otherwise, a golden calf could never have been made, either the object, or the means of divine worship.

3. Sin, especially that of perverting God's worship, as it leaves a guilt upon the soul, so it perpetuates a blot upon the name.

Hence nothing so frequent, as for the spirit of God to express wicked, irreligious Kings, by comparing them to Ahab or Jeroboam. It being usual to make the first and most eminent in any kind, not only the standard for comparison, but also the rule of expression.

But I shall insist only upon the words of the text, and what shall be drawn from thence. Here are two things in the words that may seem to require explication.

1. What is meant by the High Places.

2. What by the consecration of the priests.

1. Concerning the High Places. The use of these in the divine worship was general and ancient. And as Dionysius Vossius observes in his notes upon Moses Maimonides, the first way that was used, long before temples were either built, or thought lawful. The reason of this seems to be, because those places could not be thought to shut up, or confine the immensity of God, as they supposed an house did; and withall gave his worshippers a nearer approach to Heaven by their height. Hence we read that the Samaritans worshipped upon Mount Gerizim, Joh. 4:20. And Samuel went up to the High Place to sacrifice, I Sam. 9:14. And Solomon sacrificed at the High Place in Gibeon, I King. 3:4. Yea, the temple itself was at length built upon a Mount or High Place, II Chron. 3:1. You will say then, Why are these places condemned? I answer, that the use of them was not condemned as absolutely and always unlawful in itself, but only after the temple was built, and that God had professed to put his name in that place and no other: Therefore, what was lawful in the practice of Samuel and Solomon before the Temple was in being was now detestable in Jeroboam, since that was constituted by God the only place for his worship. To bring this consideration to the times of Christianity. Because the Apostles and primitive Christians preached in houses, and had only private meetings, in regard they were under persecution, and had no churches; this cannot warrant the practice of those now-a-days, nor a toleration of them, that prefer houses before churches, and a conventicle before the congregation.[1]

---

[1] conventicle a private religious meeting or assembly, particularly of a Nonconformist congregation; John Bunyan was arrested for holding a conventicle.

2. For the second thing, which is the consecration of the priests; it seems to have been correspondent to ordination in the Christian church. Idolaters themselves were not so far gone, as to venture upon the priesthood without consecration and a call. To show all the solemnities of this, would be tedious, and here unnecessary: The Hebrew word which we render to consecrate, signifies "to fill the hand," which indeed imports the manner of consecration, which was done by filling the hand: for the priest cut a piece of the sacrifice, and put it into the hands of him that was to be consecrated; by which ceremony he received right to sacrifice, and so became a priest. As our ordination in the Christian church is said to have been heretofore transacted by the Bishop's delivering of the Bible into the hands of him that was to be ordained, whereby he received power ministerially to dispense the mysteries contained in it, and so was made a presbyter.[1] Thus much briefly concerning consecration.

There remains nothing else to be explained in the words: I shall therefore now draw forth the sense of them into these two propositions:

1. The surest means to strengthen, or the readiest to ruin the civil power, is either to establish, or destroy the worship of God in the right exercise of religion.

2. The next, and most effectual way to destroy religion is to embase the teachers and dispensers of it.

Of both these in their order.

For the prosecution of the former, we are to show,

1. The truth of the assertion, that it is so.

2. The reason of the assertion, why and whence it is so.

1. For the truth of it: It is abundantly evinced from all records both of divine and profane history, in which he that runs may read the ruin of the state in the destruction of the church; and that not only portended by it, as its sign, but also inferred from it, as its cause.

2. For the reason of the point; it may be drawn,

1. From the judicial proceeding of God, the great King of Kings, and supreme ruler of the universe; who for his commands is indeed careful, but for his worship jealous: And therefore in states notoriously irreligious, by a secret and irresistible power, countermands their deepest project, splits their counsels, and smites their most refined policies with frustration and a curse; being resolved that the kingdoms of the world shall fall down before him, either in his adoration, or their own confusion.

2. The reason of the doctrine may be drawn from the necessary dependence of the very principles of government upon religion. And this I shall pursue more fully. The great business of government is to procure obedience, and keep off disobedience: the great springs upon which those two move, are rewards and punishments, answering the two ruling affections of man's mind, hope and fear. For since there is a natural opposition between the judgment and the appetite, the former respecting what is honest, the latter what is pleasing; which two qualifications seldom concur in the same thing, and since withall, man's design in every action is delight; therefore to render things honest also practicable, they must be first represented desirable, which cannot be, but by proposing honesty clothed with pleasure; and since it presents no pleasure to the sense, it must be fetched from the apprehension of a future reward. For questionless duty moves not so much upon command as promise. Now therefore, that which proposes the greatest and most suitable rewards to obedience, and the greatest terrors and punishments to disobedience, doubtless is the most likely to enforce one, and prevent the other. But it is religion that does this, which to happiness and misery joins eternity. And these, supposing the immortality of the soul, which philosophy indeed conjectures, but only religion proves, or (which is as good) persuades: I say these two things, eternal happiness and eternal misery, meeting with a persuasion that the soul is immortal, are, without controversy, of all others, the first the most desirable, and the latter the most horrible to humane apprehension. Were it not for these, civil government were not able to stand before the prevailing swing of corrupt nature, which would know no honesty but advantage, no duty but in pleasure, nor any law but its own will. Were not these frequently thundered into the understandings of men, the magistrate might enact, order, and proclaim; proclamations might be hung upon walls and posts, and there they might hang, seen and despised, more like malefactors, than laws: But when religion binds them upon the conscience, conscience will either persuade or terrify men into their practice. For, put the case, a man knew, and that upon the sure grounds, that he might do an advantageous murder or robbery, and not be discovered; what humane laws could hinder him, which, he knows, cannot inflict any penalty, where they can make no discovery? But religion assures him, that no sin, though concealed from humane eyes, can either escape God's sight in this world, or his vengeance in the other.... If there was not a Minister in every parish, you would quickly find cause to increase the number of constables: And if the churches were not employed to be places to hear God's law, there would be need of them to be prisons for the breakers of the laws of men....

---

[1] a presbyter in this case, a priest in the established Church, not an elder in the Presbyterian Church.

Wherefore, having proved the dependence of government upon religion, I shall now demonstrate, that the safety of government depends upon the truth of religion. False religion is in its nature the greatest bane and destruction to government in the world. The reason is, because whatsoever is false, is also weak. Ens and Verum in philosophy are the same:[1] And so much as any religion has of falsity it loses of strength and existence. Falsity gains authority only from ignorance, and therefore is in danger to be known; for from being false, the next immediate step is to be known to be such. And what prejudice this would be to the civil government, is apparent, if men should be awed into obedience, and affrighted from sin by rewards and punishments, proposed to them in such a religion, which afterwards should be detected, and found a mere falsity and cheat; for if one part be but found to be false, it will make the whole suspicious. And men will then not only cast off obedience to the civil magistrate, but they will do it with disdain and rage, that they have been deceived so long, and brought to do that out of conscience, which was imposed upon them out of design: For though men are often willingly deceived, yet still it must be under an opinion of being instructed; though they love the deception, yet they mortally hate it under that appearance: Therefore it is no ways safe for a magistrate, who is to build his dominion upon the fears of men, to build those fears upon a false religion. 'Tis not to be doubted, but the absurdity of Jeroboam's calves, made many Israelites turn subjects to Rehoboam's government that they might be proselytes to his religion. Herein the weakness of the Turkish religion appears, that it urges obedience upon the promise of such absurd rewards, as, that after death they should have palaces, gardens, beautiful women, with all the luxury that could be: As if those things, that were the occasions and incentives of sin in this world, could be the rewards of holiness in the other. Besides many other inventions, false and absurd, that are like so many chinks and holes to discover the rottenness of the whole fabric, when God shall be pleased to give light to discover, and open their reasons to discern them. But you will say, What government more sure and absolute than the Turkish, and yet what religion more false? Therefore, certainly government may stand sure and strong, be the religion professed never so absurd. I answer, that it may do so indeed by accident, through the strange peculiar temper, and gross ignorance of a people; as we see it happens in the Turks, the best part of whose policy, supposing the absurdity of their religion, is this, that they prohibit schools of learning; for this hinders knowledge and disputes, which such a religion would not bear. But suppose we, that the learning of these Western nations were as great there as here, and the Alcoran as common to them as the Bible to us, that they might have free recourse to search and examine the flaws and follies of it; and withall, that they were of as inquisitive a temper as we: And who knows, but as there are vicissitudes in the government, so there may happen the same also in the temper of a nation? If this should come to pass, where would be their religion? And then let every one judge, whether the Arcana Imperii and Religionis would not fall together.[1] They have begun to totter already; for Mahomet having promised to come and visit his followers, and translate them to Paradise after a thousand years, this being expired, many of the Persians began to doubt and smell the cheat, till the Mufti or Chief Priest told them, that it was a mistake in the figure, and assured them, that upon more diligent survey of the records, he found it two thousand instead of one. When this is expired, perhaps they will not be able to renew the fallacy. I say therefore, that though this government continues firm in the exercise of a false religion, yet this is by accident, through the present genius of the people, which may change; but this does not prove, but that the nature of such a religion (of which we only now speak), tends to subvert and betray the civil power. Hence Machiavel himself, in his animadversions upon Livy,[2] makes it appear, that the weakness of Italy, which was once so strong, was caused by the corrupt practices of the papacy, in depraving and misusing religion to that purpose, which he, though himself a papist, says, could not have happened, had the Christian religion been kept in its first, and native simplicity. Thus much may suffice for the clearing of the first proposition.

---

[1] Ens and Verum being or entity, and truth.

The inferences from hence are two.

1. If government depends upon religion, then this shows the pestilential design of those, that attempt to disjoin the civil and ecclesiastical interest, setting the latter wholly out of the tuition of the former. But 'tis clear that the fanatics know no other step to the magistracy, but through the ruin of the Ministry. There is a great analogy between the body natural and politic; in which the ecclesiastical or spiritual part justly supplies the part of the soul; and the violent separation of this from the other, does as certainly infer death and dissolution, as the disjunction of the body and the soul in the natural; for when this once departs, it leaves the body of the commonwealth a carcass, noisome, and exposed to be devoured by birds of prey. The Ministry will be one day found, according to Christ's word, "the salt of the Earth" [Matthew 5:13], the only thing that keeps societies of men from stench and corruption....

2. If the safety of government is founded upon the truth of religion, then this shows the danger of any thing that may make even the true religion suspected to be false. To be false, and to be thought false is all one in respect of men, who act not according to truth, but apprehension. As on the contrary, a false religion, while apprehended true, has the force and efficacy of truth. Now there is nothing more apt to induce men to a suspicion of any religion, than frequent innovation and change:

---

[1] Arcana Imperii and Religionis mysteries of state and religion.

[2] Machiavelli's Discorsi sopra la prima deca di Tito Livio [Discourses on Livy] was written in 1513 and published in numerous editions and translations, including English.

for since the object of religion, God; the subject of it, the Soul of Man; and the business of it, Truth, is always one and the same: Variety and novelty is a just presumption of falsity. It argues sickness and distemper in the mind, as well as in the body, when a man is continually turning and tossing from one side to the other. The wise Romans ever dreaded the least innovation in religion: Hence we find the advice of Maecenas to Augustus Caesar, in Dion Cassius, in the 52 Book,[1] where he counsels him to detest and persecute all innovators of divine worship, not only as condemners of the Gods, but as the most pernicious disturbers of the state: For when men venture to make changes in things sacred, it argues great boldness with God, and this naturally imports little belief of him: which if the people once perceive, they will take their creed also, not from the magistrate's laws, but his example. Hence in England, where religion has been still purifying, and hereupon almost always in the fire and the furnace; atheists, and irreligious persons have took no small advantage from our changes. For in King Edward the Sixth's time, the divine worship was twice altered in two new liturgies. In the first of Queen Mary, the Protestant religion was persecuted with fire and faggot, by law and public council of the same persons, who had so lately established it. Upon the coming in of Queen Elizabeth, religion was changed again, and within a few days the public council of the nation made it death for a priest to convert any man to that religion, which before with so much eagerness of zeal had been restored. So that it is observed by an author, that in the space of twelve years there were four changes about religion made in England, and that by the public council and authority of the realm, which were more than were made by any Christian state throughout the world, so soon one after another, in the space of fifteen hundred years before. Hence it is, that the enemies of God take occasion to blaspheme, and call our religion Statism. And now adding to the former, those many changes that have happened since, I am afraid we shall not so easily claw off that name: Nor, though we may satisfy our own consciences in what we profess, be able to repel and clear off the objections of the rational world about us, which not being interested in our changes as we are, will not judge of them as we judge; but debate them by impartial reason, by the nature of the thing, the general practice of the church; against which new lights, sudden impulses of the spirit, extraordinary calls,[2] will be but weak arguments to prove anything but the madness of those that use them, and that the church must needs wither, being blasted with such inspirations. We see therefore how fatal and ridiculous innovations in the church are: And indeed when changes are so frequent, it is not properly religion, but fashion. This, I think, we may build upon as a sure ground, that where there is continual change, there is great show of uncertainty, and uncertainty in religion is a shrewd motive, if not to deny, yet to doubt of its truth.

Thus much for the first doctrine. I proceed now to the second, viz. That the next, and most effectual way to destroy religion, is to embase the teachers and dispensers of it. In the handling of this, I shall show,

1. How the dispensers of religion, the Ministers of the Word, are embased or rendered vile.

2. How the embasing or vilifying them is a means to destroy religion.

1. For the first of these, the Ministers and Dispensers of the Word are rendered base or vile two ways:

1. By divesting them of all temporal privileges and advantages, as inconsistent with their calling. It is strange, since the Priest's office heretofore was always splendid, and almost regal, that it is now looked upon as a piece of religion, to make it low and sordid. So that the use of the word Minister is brought down to the literal signification of it, a Servant: for now to serve and to minister, servile and ministerial, are terms equivalent. But in the Old Testament the same word signifies a Priest, and a Prince, or chief ruler: hence, though we translate it Priest of On, Gen. 41:45, and Priest of Midiam, Exod. 3:1, and "as it is with the people so with the priest," Isa. 24:2, Junius and Tremellius render all these places, not by Sacerdos, priest; but by Præses, that is, a prince, or at least a chief counsellor, or Minister of State.[1] And it is strange, that the name should be the same, when the nature of the thing is so exceeding different. The like also may be observed in other languages, that the most illustrious titles are derived from things sacred, and belonging to the worship of God.…

---

[1] in Dio Cassius, Roman History, LII.36.

[2] all terms or phrases associated with Puritan preaching and writing.

But why have I produced all these examples of the heathens? Is it to make these a ground of our imitation? No, but to show that the giving honor to the priesthood, was a custom universal amongst all civilized nations: And whatsoever is universal, is also natural, as not being founded upon compact, or the particular humours of men, but flowing from the native results of reason: and that which is natural, neither does nor can oppose religion. But you will say, this concerns not us, who have an express rule and word revealed. Christ was himself poor, and despised, and withall has instituted such a Ministry. To the first part of this plea I answer, that Christ came to suffer, yet the sufferings and miseries of Christ do not oblige all Christians to undertake the like. For the second, that the Ministry of Christ was low, and despised, by his institution, I utterly deny. It was so, indeed, by the malice and persecution of the heathen princes, but what does this argue or infer for a low, dejected Ministry in a flourishing state, which professes to encourage Christianity? But to dash this cavil, read but the practice of Christian emperors and kings all along, down from the time of Constantine, in what respect, what honor and splendor they treated the Ministers; and then let our adversaries produce their puny, pitiful arguments for the contrary, against the general, clear, undoubted vogue and current of all antiquity. As for two or three little countries about us, the learned and impartial will not value their practice; in one of which places the Minister has been seen, for mere want, to mend shoes on the Saturday, and been heard to preach on the Sunday. In the other place, stating the several orders of the citizens, they place their Ministers after their apothecaries; that is, the physician of the soul after the drugster of the body: a fit practice for those, who if they were to rank things as well as persons, would place their religion after their trade.

And thus much concerning the first way of debasing the Ministers and Ministry.

2. The second way is by admitting ignorant, sordid, illiterate persons to this function. This is to give the royal stamp to a piece of lead. I confess, God has no need of any man's parts, or learning; but certainly then, he has much less need of his ignorance, and ill behaviour. It is a sad thing, when all other employments shall empty themselves into the Ministry: When men shall repair to it, nor for preferment, but refuge; like malefactors, flying to the altar, only to save their lives; or like those of Eli's race, I Sam. 2:36, that should come crouching, and seek to be put into the priest's office, that they might eat a piece of bread. Heretofore there was required splendor of parentage to recommend any one to the priesthood as Josephus witnesses in a treatise which he wrote of his own life; where he says, To have right to deal in things sacred, was, amongst them, accounted an argument of a noble and illustrious descent. God would not accept the offals of other professions. Doubtless many rejected Christ, upon this thought, that he was the carpen-ter's son, who would have embraced him, had they known him to have been the son of David. The preferring undeserving persons to this great service, was eminently Jeroboam's sin, and how Jeroboam's practice and offense has been continued amongst us in another guise, is not unknown: For has not learning unqualified men for approbation to the Ministry? Have not parts and abilities been reputed enemies to grace, and qualities no ways ministerial? While friends, faction, well-meaning, and little understanding have been accomplishments beyond study and the university; and to falsify a story of conversion, beyond pertinent answers and clear resolutions to the hardest and most concerning questions. So that matters have been brought to this pass, that if a man amongst his sons had any blind, or disfigured, he laid him aside for the Ministry; and such an one was presently approved, as having a mortified countenance. In short, it was a fiery furnace, which often approved dross, and rejected gold. But thanks be to God, those spiritual wickednesses are now discharged from their High Places.[1] Hence it was, that many rushed into the Ministry, as being the only calling that they could profess without serving an apprenticeship. Hence also we had those that could preach sermons, but not defend them. The reason of which is clear, because the works and writings of learned men might be borrowed, but not the abilities. Had indeed the old Levitical hierarchy still continued; in which it was part of the ministerial office to slay the sacrifices, to cleanse the vessels, to scour the flesh-forks, to sweep the temple, and carry the filth and rubbish to the brook Kidron,[2] no persons living had been fitter for the Ministry, and to serve in this nature at the altar. But since it is made a labour of the mind; as to inform men's judgments, and move their affections, to resolve difficult places of scripture, to decide and clear off controversies; I cannot see how to be a butcher, scavenger, or any other such trade, does at all qualify, or prepare men for this work. But as unfit as they were, yet to clear a way for such into the Ministry, we have had almost all sermons full of gibes and scoffs at humane learning. Away with vain philosophy, with the disputer of this world, and the enticing words of man's wisdom, and set up the foolishness of preaching, the simplicity of the Gospel. Thus divinity has been brought in upon the ruins of humanity; by forcing the words of the scripture from the sense, and then haling them to the worst of drudgeries, to set a Jus Divinum [divine law] upon ignorance and imperfection, and recommend natural weakness for supernatural grace. Hereupon the ignorant have took heart to venture upon this great calling, and instead of cutting their way to it, according to the usual course, through the knowledge of the Tongues, the study of philosophy, school-divinity, the Fathers and Councils, they have taken another and a shorter cut, and having read perhaps a treatise or two Upon the Heart, The Bruised Reed, The Crumbs of Comfort, Wollebius in English, and some other little authors,[3] the usual furniture of old women's closets, they have set forth as accomplished divines, and forthwith they present themselves to the Service; and there have not been wanting Jeroboam's as willing to consecrate and receive them, as they to offer themselves. And this has been one of the most fatal, and almost irrecoverable blows that has been given to the Ministry.

---

[1] Junius and Tremellius Franciscus Junius (1545–1602) and John Immanuel Tremellius (1510–1580) published (1569–1579) what would become the standard Protestant Latin version of the Bible.

And this may suffice concerning the second way of embasing God's Ministers; namely, by intrusting the Ministry with raw, unlearned, ill-bred persons; so that what Solomon speaks of a proverb in the mouth of a fool, the same may be said of the Ministry vested in them, that it is like a pearl in a swine's snout.

---

[1] referring back to the text that provides the sermon's subject.

[2] brook Kidron a valley outside Jerusalem, often mentioned in the Old Testament.

[3] popular devotional works by Puritan writers: Richard Sibbes, The Bruised Reed (earliest extant edition is the 6th, 1658); Michael Sparke, compiler, Crums of Comfort (earliest extant edition is the 30th, 1642); Johann Wolleb, The Abridgement of Christian Divinity (first pub. 1650). Upon the Heart could be a generic "Puritan" title.

I proceed now to the second thing proposed in the discussion of this doctrine, which is to show, how the embasing of the Ministers tend to the destruction of religion.

This it does two ways.

1. Because it brings them under exceeding scorn and contempt; and then, let none think religion itself secure: For the vulgar have not such logical heads, as to be able to abstract such subtle conceptions, as to separate the man from the Minister, or to consider the same person under a double capacity, and so honour him as a divine, while they despise him as poor. But suppose they could, yet actions cannot distinguish, as conceptions do; and therefore every act of contempt strikes at both, and unavoidably wounds the Ministry through the sides of the Minister. And we must know, that the least degree of contempt weakens religion, because it is absolutely contrary to the nature of it; religion properly consisting in a reverential esteem of things sacred. Now, that which in any measure weakens religion, will at length destroy it: For the weakening of a thing is only a partial destruction of it. Poverty and meanness of condition expose the wisest to scorn, it being natural for men to place their esteem rather upon things great than good; and the poet observes, that this infelix paupertas [unhappy poverty] has nothing in it more intolerable than this, that it renders men ridiculous.[1] And then, how easy and natural it is for contempt to pass from the person to the office, from him that speaks, to the thing that he speaks of, experience proves: Counsel being seldom valued so much for the truth of the thing, as the credit of him that gives it.... [In] our judicatures, take away the trumpet, the scarlet, the attendance, and the Lordship, which would be to make Justice naked, as well as blind; and the Law would lose much of its terror, and consequently of its authority.[2] Let the Minister be abject and low, his interest inconsiderable, the Word will suffer for his sake: The message will still find reception according to the dignity of the messenger. Imagine an ambassador presenting himself in a poor frieze jerkin, and tattered clothes, certainly he would have but small audience, his embassy would speed rather according to the weakness of him that brought, than the majesty of him that sent it. It will fare alike with the ambassadors of Christ, the people will give them audience according to their presence. A notable example of which we have in the behaviour of some to Paul himself, I Cor. 10:10. Hence in the Jewish church it was cautiously provided in the law, that none that was blind or lame, or had any remarkable defect in his body, was capable of the priestly office; because these things naturally make a person contemned, and this presently reflects upon the function. This therefore is the first way by which the low, despised condition of the Ministers, tends to the destruction of the Ministry and religion: namely, because it subjects their persons to scorn, and consequently their calling: and it is not imaginable that men will be brought to obey what they cannot esteem.

2. The second way by which it tends to the ruin of the Ministry is, because it discourages men of fit parts and abilities from undertaking it.[3] And certain it is, that as the calling dignifies the man, so the man much more advances his calling. As a garment, though it warms the body, has a return with an advantage, being much more warmed by it. And how often a good cause may miscarry without a wise manager, and the faith for want of a defender, is, or at least may be known. 'Tis not the truth of an

---

[1] Juvenal, Satires, III. 152–53.

[2] William Cavendish makes the same point in his discussion of "order and ceremony" in his letter of advice to Charles II.

[3] Robert Burton addresses this issue in his discussion of the melancholy of scholars in the Anatomy of Melancholy.

assertion, but the skill of the disputant, that keeps off a baffle; not the justness of a cause, but the valour of the soldiers that must win the field: When a learned Paul was converted, and undertook the Ministry, it stopped the mouths of those that said, None but poor, weak fisher-men preached Christianity, and so his learning silenced the scandal, as well as strengthened the church: Religion, placed in a soul of exquisite knowledge and abilities, as in a castle, finds not only habitation, but defence... What is it that kept the Church of Rome strong, athletic, and flourishing for so many centuries, but the happy succession of the choicest wits engaged to her service by suitable preferments? And what strength, do we think, would that give to the true religion, that is able thus to establish a false? Religion in a great measure stands or falls according to the abilities of those that assert it. And if, as some observe, men's desires are usually as large as their abilities, what course have we took to allure the former, that we might engage the latter to our assistance? But we have took all ways to affright and discourage scholars from looking towards this sacred calling: For will men lay out their wit and judgment, upon that employment, for the undertaking of which, both will be questioned? Would men, not long since, have spent toilsome days, and watchful nights in the laborious quest of knowledge preparative to this work, at length to come and dance attendance for approbation upon a junta of petty tyrants, acted by party and prejudice, who denied fitness from learning, and grace from morality? Will a man exhaust his livelihood upon books, and his health, the best part of his life, upon study, to be at length thrust into a poor village, where he shall have his due precariously, and entreat for his own; and when he has it, live poorly and contemptibly upon it, while the same or less labour, bestowed upon any other calling, would bring not only comfort but splendor, not only maintenance but abundance? 'Tis, I confess, the duty of Ministers to endure this condition; but neither religion nor reason does oblige either them to approve, or others to choose it. Doubtless, parents will not throw away the towardness of a child, and the expense of education, upon a profession, the labour of which is increased, and the rewards of which are vanished: To condemn promising, lively parts to contempt and penury in a despised calling. What is it else but the casting of a Moses into the mud, or offering a son upon the altar, and instead of a Priest to make him a sacrifice? Neither let any here reply that it becomes not a ministerial spirit to undertake such a calling for reward; for they must know, that it is one thing to undertake it for a reward, and not to be willing to undertake it without one. It is one thing to perform good works only that we may receive the recompense of them in Heaven, and another thing not to be willing to follow Christ and forsake the world, if there were no such recompense. But besides, suppose it were the duty of scholars to choose this calling in the midst of all its discouragements: Yet a prudent Governor, who knows it to be his wisdom, as well as his duty, to take the best course to advance religion, will not consider men's duty, but their practice; not what they ought to do, but what they use to do: and therefore draw over the best qualified to his service, by such ways as are most apt to persuade and induce men. Solomon built his temple with the tallest cedars: and surely, when God refused the defective and the maimed for sacrifice, we cannot think that he requires them for the Priesthood. When learning, abilities, and what is excellent in the world, forsake the church, we may easily foretell its ruin, without the gift of prophecy. And when ignorance succeeds in the place of learning, weakness in the room of judgment, we may be sure, heresy and confusion will quickly come in the room of religion. For undoubtedly there is no way so effectual to betray the truth, as to procure it a weak defender.

Well now, instead of raising any particular uses from the point that has been delivered, let us make a brief recapitulation of the whole. Government, we see, depends upon religion, and religion upon the encouragement of those that are to dispense and assert it. For the further evidence of which truths, we need not travel beyond our own borders; but leave it to every one impartially to judge, whether from the very first day that our religion was unsettled, and church government flung out of doors, the civil government has ever been able to fix upon a sure foundation. We have been changing even to a proverb. The indignation of Heaven has been rolling and turning us from one form to another, till at length such a giddiness seized upon government, that it fell into the very dregs of sectaries, who threatened an equal ruin both to Minister and Magistrate; and how the State has sympathized with the Church, is apparent. For have not our princes as well as our priests been of the lowest of the people? Have not cobblers, draymen, mechanics, governed, as well as preached? Nay, have not they by preaching come to govern? Was ever that of Solomon more verified, That servants have rid, while Princes and Nobles have gone on foot? But God has been pleased by a miracle of mercy to dissipate this confusion and chaos, and to give us some openings, some dawnings of liberty and settlement. But now, let not those who are to rebuild our Jerusalem, think that the temple must be built last: For if there be such a thing as a God, and religion, as, whether men believe it or no, they will one day find and feel, assuredly he will stop our liberty, till we restore him his worship. Besides, it is a senseless thing in reason, to think that one of these interests can stand without the other, when in the very order of natural causes, government is preserved by religion. But to return to Jeroboam with whom we first began. He laid the foundation of his government in destroying, though doubtless he coloured it with the name of reforming God's worship: but see the issue. Consider him cursed by God, maintaining his usurped title by continual vexatious wars against the Kings of Judah; smote in his posterity, which was made like the dung upon the face of the earth, as low and vile as those priests whom he had employed. Consider him branded, and made odious to all after-ages. And now, when his kingdom and glory was at an end, and he and his posterity rotting under ground, and his name stinking above it; judge what a worthy prize he made in getting of a kingdom, by destroying the church. Wherefore the sum of all is this; to advise and desire those whom it may concern, to consider Jeroboam's punishment, and then they will have little heart to Jeroboam's sin.

—1660

Mary Rowlandson

ca. 1635 – ca. 1678/9

The autobiographer Mary Rowlandson was the daughter of John White and Joane West of South Petherton, Somersetshire. The White family migrated to Salem, Massachusetts in 1638, and eventually moved to the frontier town of Lancaster. John White was the wealthiest of the original proprietors of Lancaster, his estate being valued at almost £400. In 1656, Mary married Joseph Rowlandson, the first minister of Lancaster. She bore four children, one of whom died in infancy.

Rapid growth in New England over the next two decades resulted in a long series of jurisdictional and property disputes between Native tribes and the English colonizers. By 1675 hostility had peaked between the Wampanoag Chief Metacomet, named King Philip by the English, and the New England colonists. The Wampanoags joined other Algonquian tribes to forge a coalition against the Plymouth Colony. King Philip's War ensued, which commenced with a Wampanoag attack on outlying Plymouth Colony villages on June 20, 1675. Fearing invasion, Rowlandson's husband and her brother-in-law, Lieutenant Henry Kerley, traveled to Boston in search of military aid. During their absence, a contingent of Narragansetts attacked Lancaster on February 10, 1676. Rowlandson and her three children were captured, and forced to wander for eleven weeks through the forests of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Her youngest child did not survive captivity, dying along the way from a gunshot wound and starvation. Rowlandson was ransomed for £20 on May 2, 1676, and the restoration of her surviving children soon followed.

The family lived in Boston until Joseph Rowlandson found a position as minister in Wethersfield, Connecticut in 1677. He died in November, 1678. The last historical document in which Rowlandson is named is dated 1679, and while she is likely to have lived until the publication of her captivity narrative, no record of her death exists. Rowlandson's account of her captivity was published in both Cambridge, New England, and London under the title The Sovereignty and Goodness of God, Together, with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682). This spiritual autobiography chronicles Rowlandson's suffering, celebrates divine Providence in the face of affliction, and offers a colonial view of aboriginal life.

* * *

The Sovereignty and Goodness of God Together, with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson

On the tenth of February 1676 came the Indians with great numbers upon Lancaster: Their first coming was about sunrising; hearing the noise of some guns, we looked out; several houses were burning, and the smoke ascending to heaven. There were five persons taken in one house, the father and the mother and a sucking child they knocked on the head; the other two they took and carried away alive. There were two others, who being out of their garrison upon some occasion were set upon; one was knocked on the head, the other escaped: Another there was who running along was shot and wounded and fell down; he begged of them his life, promising them money (as they told me) but they would not hearken to him but knocked him in [the] head, and stripped him naked, and split open his bowels. Another, seeing many of the Indians about his barn, ventured and went out but was quickly shot down. There were three others belonging to the same garrison who were killed; the Indians, getting up upon the roof of the barn, had advantage to shoot down upon them over their fortification. Thus these murderous wretches went on, burning, and destroying before them.

At length they came and beset our own house, and quickly it was the dolefullest day that ever mine eyes saw. The house stood upon the edge of a hill; some of the Indians got behind the hill, others into the barn, and others behind anything that could shelter them; from all which places they shot against the house, so that the bullets seemed to fly like hail; and quickly they wounded one man among us, then another, and then a third. About two hours (according to my observation, in that amazing time) they had been about the house before they prevailed to fire it (which they did with flax and hemp, which they brought out of the barn, and there being no defense about the house, only two flankers at two opposite corners and one of them not finished).[1] They fired it once, and one ventured out and quenched it, but they quickly fired it again, and that took. Now is that dreadful hour come, that I have often heard of (in time of war as it was the case of others) but now mine eyes see it. Some in our house were fighting for their lives, others wallowing in their blood, the house on fire over our heads, and the bloody heathen ready to knock us on the head, if we stirred out: Now might we hear mothers and children crying out for themselves, and one another, Lord, what shall we do? Then I took my children (and one of my sisters, hers) to go forth and leave the house, but as soon as we came to the door and appeared, the Indians shot so thick that the bullets rattled against the house, as if one had taken an handful of stones and threw them so that we were fain to give back.[2] We had six stout dogs belonging to our garrison, but none of them would stir, though another time, if any Indian had come to the door, they were ready to fly upon him and tear him down. The Lord hereby would make us the more to acknowledge his hand and to see that our help is always in him. But out we must go, the fire increasing and coming along behind us, roaring, and the Indians gaping before us with their guns, spears and hatchets to devour us. No sooner were we out of the house, but my brother-in-law (being before wounded in defending the house, in or near the throat) fell down dead, whereat the Indians scornfully shouted, halloed, and were presently upon him, stripping off his clothes.[3] The bullets flying thick, one went through my side, and the same (as would seem) through the bowels and hand of my dear child in my arms. One of my elder sister's children, named William, had then his leg broken, which the Indians perceiving, they knocked him on the head.[4] Thus were we butchered by those merciless heathen, standing amazed, with the blood running down to our heels. My eldest sister being yet in the house,[5] and seeing those woeful sights, the infidels hailing mothers one way, and children another, and some wallowing in their blood: and her elder son telling her that her son William was dead, and myself was wounded, she said, And, Lord, let me die with them; which was no sooner said, but she was struck with a bullet, and fell down dead over the threshold. I hope she is reaping the fruit of her good labours, being faithful to the service of God in her place. In her younger years she lay under much trouble upon spiritual accounts, till it pleased God to make that precious scripture take hold of her heart, II Cor. 12:9, And he said unto me, my grace is sufficient for thee. More than twenty years after I have heard her tell how sweet and comfortable that place was to her. But to return: The Indians laid hold of us, pulling me one way and the children another, and said, Come go along with us; I told them they would kill me: they answered, if I were willing to go along with them they would not hurt me.

---

[1] flankers a fortification projecting so as to flank or defend another part (OED flanker sb[1] 1).

[2] fain to give back inclined to retreat.

[3] brother-in-law John Divoll, the husband of Rowlandson's younger sister Hannah; halloed shouted in order to incite (OED halloo v 1b).

[4] William William Kerley, son of Elizabeth White Kerley.

[5] eldest sister Elizabeth White Kerley.

Oh, the doleful sight that now was to behold at this house! Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolation he has made in the earth.[1] Of thirty-seven persons who were in this one house, none escaped either present death, or a bitter captivity, save only one, who might say as he, Job 1:15, And I only am escaped alone to tell the news.[2] There were twelve killed, some shot, some stabbed with their spears, some knocked down with their hatchets. When we are in prosperity, oh the little that we think of such dreadful sights, and to see our dear friends and relations lie bleeding out their heart-blood upon the ground. There was one who was chopped into the head with a hatchet, and stripped naked, and yet was crawling up and down. It is a solemn sight to see so many Christians lying in their blood, some here and some there, like a company of sheep torn by wolves, all of them stripped naked by a company of hell-hounds, roaring, singing, ranting and insulting, as if they would have torn our very hearts out; yet the Lord by his almighty power preserved a number of us from death, for there were twenty-four of us taken alive and carried captive.

I had often before this said, that if the Indians should come, I should choose rather to be killed by them than taken alive but when it came to the trial my mind changed; their glittering weapons so daunted my spirit that I chose rather to go along with those (as I may say) ravenous beasts, than that moment to end my days; and that I may the better declare what happened to me during that grievous captivity, I shall particularly speak of the several removes we had up and down the wilderness.

THE FIRST REMOVE

Now away we must go with those barbarous creatures, with our bodies wounded and bleeding, and our hearts no less than our bodies. About a mile we went that night, up upon a hill within sight of the town where they intended to lodge.[3] There was hard by a vacant house (deserted by the English before, for fear of the Indians).[4] I asked them whether I might not lodge in the house that night, to which they answered, What, will you love English men still? This was the dolefullest night that ever my eyes saw. Oh the roaring, and singing and dancing, and yelling of those black creatures in the night, which made the place a lively resemblance of hell. And as miserable was the waste that was there made of horses, cattle, sheep, swine, calves, lambs, roasting pigs, and fowl (which they had plundered in the town), some roasting, some lying and burning, and some boiling to feed our merciless enemies; who were joyful enough though we were disconsolate. To add to the dolefulness of the former day, and the dismalness of the present night, my thoughts ran upon my losses and sad bereaved condition. All was gone, my husband gone (at least separated from me, he being in the Bay;[5] and to add to my grief, the Indians told me they would kill him as he came homeward), my children gone, my relations and friends gone, our house and home and all our comforts within door, and without, all was gone

---

[1] Come behold... in the earth Psalm 46:8.

[2] save only one Ephraim Roper was believed to be the only inhabitant of Lancaster present during the attack to escape death or captivity.

[3] a hill... the town George Hill, the highest elevation in Lancaster.

[4] hard by close by (OED hard by prep A).

[5] he being in the Bay Reverend Joseph Rowlandson had traveled to Boston, the capital of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, in search of military assistance to defend Lancaster.

(except my life), and I knew not but the next moment that might go too. There remained nothing to me but one poor wounded babe, and it seemed at present worse than death that it was in such a pitiful condition, bespeaking compassion, and I had no refreshing for it, nor suitable things to revive it. Little do many think what is the savageness and brutishness of this barbarous enemy, ay, even those that seem to profess more than others among them, when the English have fallen into their hands.[1]

Those seven that were killed at Lancaster the summer before upon a Sabbath day, and the one that was afterward killed upon a week day, were slain and mangled in a barbarous manner, by one-eyed John, and Marlborough's praying Indians, which Capt. Mosely brought to Boston, as the Indians told me.[2]

THE SECOND REMOVE [3]

But now, the next morning, I must turn my back upon the town, and travel with them into the vast and desolate wilderness, I knew not whither. It is not my tongue, or pen can express the sorrows of my heart, and bitterness of my spirit, that I had at this departure: but God was with me, in a wonderful manner, carrying me along, and bearing up my spirit, that it did not quite fail. One of the Indians carried my poor wounded babe upon a horse; it went moaning all along, I shall die, I shall die. I went on foot after it, with sorrow that cannot be expressed. At length I took it off the horse, and carried it in my arms till my strength failed, and I fell down with it: Then they set me upon a horse with my wounded child in my lap, and there being no furniture upon the horse's back,[4] as we were going down a steep hill, we both fell over the horse's head, at which they like inhuman creatures laughed, and rejoiced to see it, though I thought we should there have ended our days, as overcome with so many difficulties. But the Lord renewed my strength still, and carried me along, that I might see more of his power; yea, so much that I could never have thought of had I not experienced it.

After this it quickly began to snow, and when night came on, they stopped:[5] and now down I must sit in the snow, by a little fire, and a few boughs behind me, with my sick child in my lap, and calling much for water, being now (through the wound) fallen into a violent fever. My own wound [was] also growing so stiff that I could scarce sit down or rise up; yet so it must be, that I must sit all this cold winter night upon the cold, snowy ground, with my sick child in my arms, looking that every hour would be the last of its life; and having no Christian friend near me, either to comfort or help me. Oh, I may see the wonderful power of God that my spirit did not utterly sink under my affliction: still the Lord upheld me with his gracious and merciful spirit, and we were both alive to see the light of the next morning.

THE THIRD REMOVE [6]

The morning being come, they prepared to go on their way. One of the Indians got up upon a horse, and they set me up behind him with my poor sick babe in my lap. A very wearisome and tedious day I had of it; what with my own wound, and my child's being so exceeding sick, in a lamentable condition with her wound. It may be easily judged what a poor feeble condition we were in, there being not the least crumb of refreshing that came within either of our mouths, from Wednesday night to Saturday night, except only a little cold water. This day in the afternoon, about an hour by sun, we came to the place where they intended, viz. an Indian town, called Wenimesset, norward of Quabaug. When we were come, oh the number of pagans (now merciless enemies) that there came about me, that I may say as David, Psal. 27:13, I had fainted, unless I had believed, etc. The next day was the Sabbath: I then remembered how careless I had been of God's holy time, how many Sabbaths I had lost and misspent, and how evilly I had walked in God's sight; which lay so close unto my spirit, that it was easy for me to see how righteous it was with God to cut the thread of my life, and cast me out of his presence forever. Yet the Lord still showed mercy to me, and upheld me; and as he wounded me with one hand, so he healed me with the other. This day there came to me one Robert Pepper (a man belonging to Roxbury) who was taken in Captain Beers his fight, and had been now a considerable time with the Indians; and up with them almost as far as Albany to see King Philip, as he told me, and was now very lately come into these parts.[1] Hearing, I say, that I was in this Indian town, he obtained leave to come and see me. He told me, he himself was wounded in the leg at Captain Beers his fight; and was not able some time to go, but as they carried him, and as he took oaken leaves and laid to his wound, and through the blessing of God he was able to travel again. Then I took oaken leaves and laid to my side, and with the blessing of God it cured me also; yet before the cure was wrought, I may say, as it is in Psal. 38:5, 6 My wounds stink and are corrupt, I am troubled, I am bowed down greatly, I go mourning all the day long. I sat much alone with a poor wounded child in my lap, which moaned night and day, having nothing to revive the body, or cheer the spirits of her, but instead of that, sometimes one Indian would come and tell me one hour, that, Your master will knock your child in the head. And then a second, and then a third, Your master will quickly knock your child in the head.

---

[1] to profess to affirm their faith in, or allegiance to, Christianity (OED profess v II.4a).

[2] Those seven…Indians told me These victims were killed during the attack of August 22, 1675 led by the Nashaway chieftain One-eyed John (whose Native names were Apequinsah and Monoco); praying Indians natives who converted to Christianity and adopted British customs; Capt. Mosely Captain Samuel Moseley of Boston was a key leader in the New England forces.

[3] Friday, February 11. The second remove took Rowlandson on a Native trail in the western part of Princeton, Massachusetts.

[4] furniture the harness, housings, trappings, etc. of a horse (OED furniture 4c).

[5] they stopped at Princeton, Massachusetts.

[6] From Saturday, February 12 to Sunday, February 27, Rowlandson traveled to the Native village Wenimesset (typically spelled Menameset).

This was the comfort I had from them, Miserable comforters are ye all, as he said.[2] Thus nine days I sat upon my knees, with my babe in my lap, till my flesh was raw again; my child being even ready to depart this sorrowful world, they bade me carry it out to another wigwam (I suppose because they would not be troubled with such spectacles) whither I went with a heavy heart, and down I sat with the picture of death in my lap. About two hours in the night, my sweet babe, like a lamb departed this life, on Feb. 18, 1676, it being about six years and five months old. It was nine days from the first wounding in this miserable condition, without any refreshing of one nature or other, except a little cold water. I cannot but take notice, how at another time I could not bear to be in the room where any dead person was, but now the case is changed; I must and could lie down by my dead babe, side by side all the night after. I have thought since of the wonderful goodness of God to me, in preserving me in the use of my reason and senses, in that distressed time, that I did not use wicked and violent means to end my own miserable life. In the morning, when they understood that my child was dead they sent for me home to my master's wigwam: (by my master in this writing must be understood Quanopin, who was a sagamore and married [to] King Philip's wife's sister; not that he first took me, but I was sold to him by another Narragansett Indian, who took me when first I came out of the garrison).[1] I went to take up my dead child in my arms to carry it with me, but they bid me let it alone: there was no resisting, but go I must and leave it. When I had been at my master's wigwam, I took the first opportunity I could get, to go look after my dead child: when I came, I asked them what they had done with it. Then they told me it was upon the hill: then they went and showed me where it was, where I saw the ground was newly digged, and there they told me they had buried it: There I left that child in the wilderness, and must commit it, and myself also in this wilderness condition, to him who is above all. God having taken away this dear child, I went to see my daughter Mary, who was at this same Indian town, at a wigwam not very far off, though we had little liberty or opportunity to see one another: she was about ten years old, and taken from the door at first by a praying Indian and afterward sold for a gun. When I came in sight, she would fall a-weeping; at which they were provoked, and would not let me come near her, but bade me be gone; which was a heart-cutting word to me. I had one child dead, another in the wilderness, I knew not where, the third they would not let me come near to: Me (as he said) have ye bereaved of my children, Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin also, all these things are against me.[2] I could not sit still in this condition, but kept walking from one place to another. And as I was going along, my heart was even overwhelmed with the thoughts of my condition, and that I should have children, and a nation which I knew not ruled over them. Whereupon I earnestly entreated the Lord, that he would consider my low estate, and show me a token for good, and if it were his blessed will, some sign and hope of some relief. And indeed quickly the Lord answered, in some measure, my poor prayers: for as I was going up and down mourning and lamenting my condition, my son came to me, and asked me how I did;[3] I had not seen him before, since the destruction of the town, and I knew not where he was, till I was informed by himself, that he was amongst a smaller parcel of Indians, whose place was about six miles off; with tears in his eyes he asked me whether his sister Sarah was dead; and told me he had seen his sister Mary; and prayed me, that I would not be troubled in reference to himself. The occasion of his coming to see me at this time, was this: There was, as I said, about six miles from us, a small plantation of Indians, where it seems he had been during his captivity: and at this time there were some forces of the Indians gathered out of our company, and some also from them (among whom was my son's master) to go to assault and burn Medfield: In this time of the absence of his master, his dame brought him to see me. I took this to be some gracious answer to my earnest and unfeigned desire. The next day, viz. to this, the Indians returned from Medfield, all the company, for those that belonged to the other small company, came through the town that now we were at. But before they came to us, oh! the outrageous roaring and whooping that there was: They began their din about a mile before they came to us. By their noise and whooping they signified how many they had destroyed (which was at that time twenty-three). Those that were with us at home, were gathered together as soon as they heard the whooping, and every time that the other went over their number, these at home gave [such] a shout that the very earth rung again: And thus they continued till those that had been upon the expedition were come up to the sagamore's wigwam; and then, oh, the hideous insulting and triumphing that there was over some Englishmen's scalps that they had taken (as their manner is) and brought with them. I cannot but take notice of the wonderful mercy of God to me in those afflictions, in sending me a Bible. One of the Indians that came from Medfield fight, [who] had brought some plunder, came to me, and asked me, if I would have a Bible; he had got one in his basket. I was glad of it and asked him whether he thought the Indians would let me read. He answered, Yes; so I took the Bible, and in that melancholy time, it came into my mind to read first the 28. chapter of Deut. which I did, and when I had read it, my dark heart wrought on this manner, that there was no mercy for me, that the blessings were gone, and the curses come in their room, and that I had lost my opportunity. But the Lord helped me still to go on reading till I came to chapter 30, the seven first verses, where I found there was mercy promised again, if we would return to him by repentance; and though we were scattered from one end of the earth to the other, yet the Lord would gather us together, and turn all those curses upon our enemies. I do not desire to live to forget this scripture, and what comfort it was to me.

---

[1] Robert Pepper...Captain Beers In September, 1675, as Captain Richard Beers led a party of men to enforce the Northfield garrison, he was confronted by warriors led by Sagamore Sam. Robert Pepper was the only soldier captured. The others were slain alongside Beers or escaped; King Philip the Wampanoag Chief Metacomet, so named by the Plymouth colonists.

[2] Miserable comforters are ye all Job 16:2.

---

[1] sagamore the chief of an American aboriginal tribe (OED sachem 1).

[2] Me...against me Genesis 42:36.

[3] my son Joseph Rowlandson.

Now the Indians began to talk of removing from this place, some one way, and some another. There were now besides myself nine English captives in this place (all of them children, except one woman). I got an opportunity to go and take my leave of them; they being to go one way, and I another; I asked them whether they were earnest with God for deliverance. They told me they did as they were able, and it was some comfort to me, that the Lord stirred up children to look to him. The woman, viz. Goodwife Joslin, told me, she should never see me again, and that she could find in her heart to run away;[1] I wished her not to run away by any means, for we were near thirty miles from any English town and she very big with child, and had but one week to reckon; and another child in her arms, two years old, and bad rivers there were to go over, and we were feeble, with our poor and coarse entertainment.[2] I had my Bible with me; I pulled it out, and asked her whether she would read; we opened the Bible and lighted on Psal. 27, in which psalm we especially took notice of that ver. ult., Wait on the Lord, be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart, wait I say on the Lord.

THE FOURTH REMOVE [3]

And now I must part with that little company I had. Here I parted from my daughter Mary (whom I never saw again till I saw her in Dorchester, returned from captivity) and from four little cousins and neighbours, some of which I never saw afterward: the Lord only knows the end of them. Amongst them also was that poor woman before mentioned, who came to a sad end, as some of the company told me in my travel: She, having much grief upon her spirit, about her miserable condition, being so near her time, she would be often asking the Indians to let her go home; they not being willing to that, and yet vexed with her importunity, gathered a great company together about her, and stripped her naked, and set her in the midst of them; and when they had sung and danced about her (in their hellish manner) as long as they pleased, they knocked her on [the] head, and the child in her arms with her: when they had done that, they made a fire and put them both into it, and told the other children that were with them, that if they attempted to go home, they would serve them in like manner: The children said, she did not shed one tear, but prayed all the while. But to return to my own journey; we travelled about half a day or [a] little more, and came to a desolate place in the wilderness, where there were no wigwams or inhabitants before; we came about the middle of the afternoon to this place, cold and wet, and snowy, and hungry, and weary, and no refreshing, for man, but the cold ground to sit on, and our poor Indian cheer.

---

[1] Goodwife Joslin Ann Joslin, the wife of Abraham Joslin of Lancaster.

[2] entertainment sustenance; treatment (OED entertainment 3,5).

[3] From Monday, February 28, to Friday, March 3, 1676, Rowlandson was at a camp near the Native village of Nichewaug.

Heartaching thoughts here I had about my poor children, who were scattered up and down among the wild beasts of the forest: My head was light and dizzy (either through hunger or hard lodging, or trouble or all together), my knees feeble, my body raw by sitting double night and day, that I cannot express to man the affliction that lay upon my spirit, but the Lord helped me at that time to express it to himself. I opened my Bible to read, and the Lord brought that precious scripture to me, Jer. 31:16, Thus saith the Lord, Refrain thy voice from weeping and thine eyes from tears, for thy work shall be rewarded, and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. This was a sweet cordial to me, when I was ready to faint; many and many a time have I sat down, and wept sweetly over this scripture. At this place we continued about four days.

. . . .

THE EIGHTH REMOVE [1]

.... But to return, we traveled on till night; and in the morning, we must go over the river to Philip's crew. When I was in the canoe, I could not but be amazed at the numerous crew of pagans that were on the bank on the other side. When I came ashore, they gathered all about me, I sitting alone in the midst: I observed they asked one another questions, and laughed, and rejoiced over their gains and victories. Then my heart began to fail: and I fell a-weeping, which was the first time to my remembrance, that I wept before them. Although I had met with so much affliction, and my heart was many times ready to break, yet could I not shed one tear in their sight: but rather had been all this while in a maze, and like one astonished: but now I may say, as Psal. 137:1, By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down: yea, we wept when we remembered Zion. There one of them asked me, why I wept; I could hardly tell what to say: yet I answered, they would kill me: No, said he, none will hurt you. Then came one of them and gave me two spoonfulls of meal to comfort me, and another gave me half a pint of peas; which was more worth than many bushels at another time. Then I went to see King Philip. He bade me come in and sit down, and asked me whether I would smoke it (a usual compliment nowadays amongst saints and sinners) but this no way suited me.[2] For though I had formerly used tobacco, yet I had left it ever since I was first taken. It seems to be a bait the devil lays to make men lose their precious time: I remember with shame, how formerly, when I had taken two or three pipes, I was presently ready for another, such a bewitching thing it is: But I thank God, he has now given me power over it; surely there are many who may be better employed than to lie sucking a stinking tobacco pipe.

Now the Indians gather their forces to go against North-Hampton: overnight one went about yelling and hooting to give notice of the design. Whereupon they fell to boiling of groundnuts and parching of corn (as many as had it) for their provision: and in the morning away they went: During my abode in this place, Philip spoke to me to make a shirt for his boy, which I did, for which he gave me a shilling: I offered the money to my master, but he bade me keep it: and with it I bought a piece of horseflesh. Afterwards he asked me to make a cap for his boy, for which he invited me to dinner. I went, and he gave me a pancake, about as big as two fingers; it was made of parched wheat, beaten and fried in bear's grease, but I thought I never tasted pleasanter meat in my life. There was a squaw who spoke to me to make a shirt for her sannup, for which she gave me a piece of bear.[1] Another asked me to knit a pair of stockings, for which she gave me a quart of peas: I boiled my peas and bear together, and invited my master and mistress to dinner, but the proud gossip, because I served them both in one dish, would eat nothing, except one bit that he gave her upon the point of his knife. Hearing that my son was come to this place, I went to see him and found him lying flat upon the ground: I asked him how he could sleep so. He answered me, that he was not asleep but at prayer; and lay so that they might not observe what he was doing. I pray God he may remember these things now he is returned in safety. At this place (the sun now getting higher) what with the beams and heat of the sun, and the smoke of the wigwams, I thought I should have been blind. I could scarce discern one wigwam from another. There was here one Mary Thurston of Medfield, who seeing how it was with me, lent me a hat to wear: but as soon as I was gone, the squaw who owned that Mary Thurston came running after me, and got it away again. Here was the squaw that gave me one spoonful of meal. I put it in my pocket to keep it safe: yet notwithstanding somebody stole it, but put five Indian corns in the room of it: which corns were the greatest provision I had in my travel for one day.

---

[1] On Wednesday, March 8, 1676, Rowlandson encamped on the west side of the Connecticut River at Coasset, South Vernon, Vermont.

[2] compliment act of courtesy; gift (OED compliment sb 1,3).

The Indians, returning from North-Hampton, brought with them some horses, and sheep, and other things which they had taken: I desired them, that they would carry me to Albany, upon one of those horses, and sell me for powder: for so they had sometimes discoursed. I was utterly hopeless of getting home on foot, the way that I came. I could hardly bear to think of the many weary steps I had taken, to come to this place.

. . . .

THE TWENTIETH REMOVE [2]

.... But to return again to my going home, where we may see a remarkable change of providence: At first they were all against it, except my husband would come for me; but afterwards they assented to it, and seemed much to rejoice in it; some asked me to send them some bread, others some tobacco, others shaking me by the hand, offering me a hood and scarf to ride in; not one moving hand or tongue against it. Thus hath the Lord answered my poor desire, and the many earnest requests of others put up unto God for me. In my travels an Indian came to me, and told me, if I were willing, he and his squaw would run away, and go home along with me: I told him no: I was not willing to run away, but desired to wait God's time, that I might go home quietly, and without fear. And now God has granted me my desire. O the wonderful power of God that I have seen, and the experience that I have had: I have been in the midst of those roaring lions, and savage bears, that feared neither God, nor man, nor the devil, by night and day, alone and in company: sleeping all sorts together, and yet not one of them ever offered me the least abuse of unchastity to me, in word or action. Though some are ready to say, I speak it for my own credit; but I speak it in the presence of God, and to his glory. God's power is as great now, and as sufficient to save as when he preserved Daniel in the lion's den; or the three children in the fiery furnace. I may well say as his Psal. 107:12, Oh give thanks unto the Lord for he is good, for his mercy

---

[1] sannup the husband of a squaw (OED sannup).

[2] Between Friday, April 28 and Tuesday, May 2, 1676, Rowlandson was encamped near the southern end of Wachusett Lake, Princeton, Massachusetts.

endureth for ever. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy, especially that I should come away in the midst of so many hundreds of enemies quietly and peaceably, and not a dog moving his tongue. So I took my leave of them, and in coming along my heart melted into tears, more than all the while I was with them, and I was almost swallowed up with the thoughts that ever I should go home again. About the sun going down, Mr. Hoar, and myself, and the two Indians came to Lancaster, and a solemn sight it was to me.[1] There had I lived many comfortable years amongst my relations and neighbours, and now not one Christian to be seen, nor one house left standing. We went on to a farmhouse that was yet standing, where we lay all night: and a comfortable lodging we had, though nothing but straw to lie on. The Lord preserved us in safety that night, and raised us up again in the morning, and carried us along, that before noon, we came to Concord. Now was I full of joy, and yet not without sorrow: joy to see such a lovely sight, so many Christians together, and some of them my neighbours: There I met with my brother, and my brother-in-law, who asked me, if I knew where his wife was.[2] Poor heart! He had helped to bury her, and knew it not; she being shot down by the house [which] was partly burned: so that those who were at Boston at the desolation of the town, and came back afterward, and buried the dead, did not know her. Yet I was not without sorrow, to think how many were looking and longing, and my own children amongst the rest, to enjoy that deliverance that I had now received and I did not know whether ever I should see them again. Being recruited with food and raiment,[3] we went to Boston that day, where I met with my dear husband, but the thoughts of our dear children, one being dead, and the other we could not tell where, abated our comfort each to other. I was not before so much hemmed in with the merciless and cruel heathen, but now as much with pitiful, tenderhearted, and compassionate Christians. In that poor, and distressed, and beggarly condition I was received in, I was kindly entertained in several houses: so much love I received from several (some of whom I knew, and others I knew not) that I am not capable to declare it. But the Lord knows them all by name: The Lord reward them sevenfold into their bosoms of his spirituals for their temporals. The twenty pounds, the price of my redemption, was raised by some Boston gentlemen, and Mrs. Usher, whose bounty and religious charity, I would not forget to make mention of.[4] Then Mr. Thomas Shepard of Charlestown received us into his house, where we continued eleven weeks; and a father and mother they were to us.[5] And many more tender-hearted friends we met with in that place. We were now in the midst of love, yet not without much and frequent heaviness of heart for our poor children, and other relations, who were still in affliction. The week following, after my coming in, the governor and council sent forth to the Indians again; and that not without success; for they brought in my sister,[6] and Goodwife Kettle:

. . . .

Our family being now gathered together (those of us that were living), the South Church in Boston hired an house for us: Then we removed from Mr.

---

[1] Mr. Hoar John Hoar of Concord had assisted Rowlandson in the ransom negotiations.

[2] my brother and my brother-in-law Josiah White and Lieutenant Henry Kerley.

[3] recruited restored to a normal condition (OED recruit sb 6 and recruited ppl.a).

[4] Mrs. Usher the wife of Hezekiah Usher, a Boston bookseller.

[5] Thomas Shepard the son of the Reverend Thomas Shepard of Cambridge.

[6] my sister Hannah White Divoll.

Shepard's, those cordial friends, and went to Boston, where we continued about three-quarters of a year: Still the Lord went along with us, and provided graciously for us. I thought it somewhat strange to set up housekeeping with bare walls; but as Solomon says, Money answers all things;[1] and that we had through the benevolence of Christian friends, some in this town and some in that, and others, and some from England, that in a little time we might look, and see the house furnished with love. The Lord hath been exceeding good to us in our low estate, in that when we had neither house nor home, nor other necessaries; the Lord so moved the hearts of these and those towards us, that we wanted neither food, nor raiment for ourselves or ours, Prov. 18:24, There is a friend which sticketh closer than a brother. And how many such friends have we found, and now living amongst? And truly such a friend have we found him to be unto us, in whose house we lived, viz. Mr. James Whitcomb, a friend unto us near hand, and afar off.

I can remember the time, when I used to sleep quietly without workings in my thoughts, whole nights together, but now it is other ways with me. When all are fast about me, and no eye open, but his who ever waketh, my thoughts are upon things past, upon the awful dispensation of the Lord towards us; upon his wonderful power and might, in carrying of us through so many difficulties, in returning us in safety, and suffering none to hurt us. I remember in the night season, how the other day I was in the midst of thousands of enemies, and nothing but death before me: It [was] then hard work to persuade myself, that ever I should be satisfied with bread again. But now we are fed with the finest of the wheat, and, as I may say, With honey out of the rock.[2] Instead of the husk, we have the fatted calf: The thoughts of these things in the particulars of them, and of the love and goodness of God towards us, make it true of me, what David said of himself, Psal. 6:5, I watered my couch with my tears.[3] Oh! the wonderful power of God that mine eyes have seen, affording matter enough for my thoughts to run in, that when others are sleeping mine eyes are weeping.

I have seen the extreme vanity of this world: One hour I have been in health, and wealth, wanting nothing: but the next hour in sickness and wounds and death, having nothing but sorrow and affliction.

Before I knew what affliction meant, I was ready sometimes to wish for it. When I lived in prosperity, having the comforts of the world about me, my relations by me, my heart cheerful: and taking little care for anything; and yet seeing many, whom I preferred before myself, under many trials and afflictions, in sickness, weakness, poverty, losses, crosses, and cares of the world, I should be sometimes jealous lest I should have my portion in this life, and that scripture would come to mind, Heb. 12:6, For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. But now I see the Lord had his time to scourge and chasten me. The portion of some is to have their afflictions by drops, now one drop and then another; but the dregs of the cup, the wine of astonishment: like a sweeping rain that leaveth no food, did the Lord prepare to be my portion. Affliction I wanted, and affliction I had, full measure (I thought) pressed down and running over; yet I see, when God calls a person to anything, and through never so many difficulties, yet he is fully able to carry them through and make them see, and say they have been gainers thereby. And I hope I can say in some measure, as David did, It is good for me that I have been afflicted.[1] The Lord hath showed me the vanity of these outward things. That they are the Vanity of vanities and vexation of spirit;[2] that they are but a shadow, a blast, a bubble, and things of no continuance. That we must rely on God himself, and our whole dependence must be upon him. If trouble from smaller matters begin to arise in me, I have something at hand to check myself with, and say, why am I troubled? It was but the other day that if I had had the world, I would have given it for my freedom, or to have been a servant to a Christian. I have learned to look beyond present and smaller troubles, and to be quieted under them, as Moses said, Exod. 14:13, Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord.

---

[1] Money answers all things "A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry: but money answereth all things" (Ecclesiastes 10:19).

[2] finest of... the rock "He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat: and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee" (Psalm 81:16).

[3] Psalm 6:5 actually Psalm 6:6.

—1682

---

[1] It is good…afflicted "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes" (Psalm 119:71).

[2] That they…of spirit "I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and behold all is vanity and vexation of spirit" (Ecclesiastes 1:14; see also 2:11; 4:4, 6:9).

Thomas Sprat

1635 – 1713

In 1651 Sprat entered Wadham College, Oxford, at the time the centre of a scientific circle surrounding its Warden, John Wilkins. Wilkins would become the first Secretary of The Royal Society (founded in 1660, received royal charters in 1662 and 1663), and Sprat was nominated as one of the first members along with such scientific luminaries as Robert Boyle, Robert Hooke, William Petty, John Ray, and Christopher Wren. Sprat was a clergyman, not a scientist, and he appears to have been recruited to act as publicist and polemicist (other literary figures who would become members of the Society include John Aubrey, Abraham Cowley, John Dryden, John Evelyn, and Edmund Waller). In his clerical career, Sprat was a noted preacher who became Dean of Westminster (1680) and Bishop of Rochester (1683). In addition to the History of the Royal Society, first published in 1667, Sprat published poetry and a life of his friend Abraham Cowley.

Written only a few years after The Royal Society had been founded, Sprat's History sought to publicize the Society's goals and to defend its activities from critics, both at home (such as Samuel Butler) and on the continent. His concern for the language used in the Society's deliberations and publications derives ultimately from Sir Francis Bacon, who was the major philosophical inspiration behind the Society (see the selections from Bacon's Aphorisms). In addition, the reformation of language had political implications in the Restoration: many people blamed the civil wars on failures to communicate, or on the misuse of language for political and religious ends. For a philosophical text written in the empiricist mode the Society sought to promote, see the selections from John Locke. For a different kind of Restoration response to the problems of language, see the selection from Roger L'Estrange on censorship.

* * *

The History of The Royal Society of London

(excerpts)

A Proposal for Erecting an English Academy

(extract from pt. i, sect. 20)

But besides, if we observe well the English language; we shall find, that it seems at this time more than others, to require some such aid, to bring it to its last perfection. The truth is, it has been hitherto a little too carelessly handled; and I think, has had less labor spent about its polishing, than it deserves. Till the time of King Henry the Eighth, there was scarce any man regarded it, but Chaucer; and nothing was written in it, which one would be willing to read twice, but some of his poetry. But then it began to raise itself a little, and to sound tolerably well. From that age, down to the beginning of our late civil wars, it was still fashioning, and beautifying itself. In the wars themselves (which is a time, wherein all languages use, if ever, to increase by extraordinary degrees; for in such busy, and active times, there arise more new thoughts of men, which must be signified, and varied by new expressions) then I say, it received many fantastical terms, which were introduced by our religious sects; and many outlandish phrases, which several writers, and translators, in that great hurry, brought in, and made free as they pleased, and with all it was enlarged by many sound, and necessary forms, and idioms, which it before wanted. And now, when men's minds are somewhat settled, their passions allayed, and the peace of our country gives us the opportunity of such diversions: if some sober and judicious men, would take the whole mass of our language into their hands, as they find it, and would set a mark on the ill words; correct those, which are to be retained; admit, and establish the good; and make some emendations in the accent, and grammar: I dare pronounce, that our speech would quickly arrive at as much plenty, as it is capable to receive; and at the greatest smoothness, which its derivation from the rough German will allow it.

THEIR MANNER OF DISCOURSE (PT. 2, SECT. 20)

Thus they [Society members] have directed, judged, conjectured upon, and improved experiments. But lastly, in these, and all other businesses, that have come under their care; there is one thing more, about which the Society has been most solicitous; and that is, the manner of their discourse: which, unless they had been very watchful to keep in due temper, the whole spirit and vigour of their design, had been soon eaten out, by the luxury and redundance of speech. The ill effects of this superfluity of talking, have already overwhelmed most other arts and professions; insomuch, that when I consider the means of happy living, and the causes of their corruption, I can hardly forbear recanting what I said before[1]; and concluding, that eloquence ought to be banished out of all civil societies, as a thing fatal to peace and good manners. To this opinion I should wholly incline; if I did not find, that it is a weapon, which may be as easily procured by bad men, as good: and that, if these should only cast it away, and those retain it; the naked innocence of virtue, would be upon all occasions exposed to the armed malice of the wicked. This is the chief reason, that should now keep up the ornaments of speaking, in any request: since they are so much degenerated from their original usefulness. They were at first, no doubt, an admirable instrument in the hands of wise men: when they were only employed to describe goodness, honesty, obedience; in larger, fairer, and more moving images: to represent truth, clothed with bodies; and to bring knowledge back again to our very senses, from whence it was at first derived to our understandings. But now they are generally changed to worse uses: They make the fancy disgust the best things, if they come found, and unadorned: they are in open defiance against reason; professing, not to hold much correspondence with that; but with its slaves, the passions: they give the mind a motion too changeable, and bewitching, to consist with right practice. Who can behold, without indignation, how many mists and uncertainties, these specious tropes and figures have brought on our knowledge? How many rewards, which are due to more profitable, and difficult arts, have been still snatched away by the easy vanity of fine speaking? For now I am warmed with this just anger, I cannot withhold myself, from betraying the shallowness of all these seeming mysteries; upon which, we writers, and speakers, look so big. And, in few words, I dare say; that of all the studies of men, nothing may be sooner obtained, than this vicious abundance of phrase, this trick of metaphors, this volubility of tongue, which makes so great a noise in the world. But I spend words in vain; for the evil is now so inveterate, that it is hard to know whom to blame, or where to begin to reform. We all value one another so much, upon this beautiful deceit; and labour so long after it, in the years of our education: that we cannot but ever after think kinder of it, than it deserves. And indeed, in most other parts of learning, I look on it to be a thing almost utterly desperate in its cure: and I think, it may be placed amongst those general mischiefs; such, as the dissension of Christian Princes, the want of practice in religion, and the like; which have been so long spoken against, that men are become insensible about them; every one shifting off the fault from himself to others; and so they are only made bare common places of complaint. It will suffice my present purpose, to point out, what has been done by the Royal Society, towards the correcting of its excesses in natural philosophy; to which it is, of all others, a most professed enemy.

---

[1] what I said before in pt. 1, sect. 20, excerpted above.

They have therefore been most rigorous in putting in execution the only remedy that can be found for this extravagance: and that has been, a constant resolution to reject all the amplifications, digressions, and swellings of style: to return back to the primitive purity, and shortness, when men delivered so many things, almost in an equal number of words. They have exacted from all their members, a close, naked, natural way of speaking; positive expressions; clear senses; a native easiness: bringing all things as near the mathematical plainness, as they can: and preferring the language of artisans, countrymen, and merchants, before that of wits, or scholars.

And here, there is one thing, not to be passed by; which will render this established custom of the Society, well nigh everlasting: and that is, the general constitution of the minds of the English. I have already often insisted on some of the prerogatives of England; whereby it may justly lay claim, to be the head of a philosophical league, above all other countries in Europe: I have urged its situation, its present genius, and the disposition of its merchants; and many more such arguments to encourage us, still remain to be used: But of all others, this, which I am now alleging, is of the most weighty, and important consideration. If there can be a true character given of the universal temper of any nation under Heaven: then certainly this must be ascribed to our countrymen: that they have commonly an unaffected sincerity; that they love to deliver their minds with a sound simplicity; that they have the middle qualities, between the reserved subtle southern, and the rough unhewn northern people: that they are not extremely prone to speak: that they are more concerned, what others will think of the strength, than of the fineness of what they say: and that an universal modesty possesses them. These qualities are so conspicuous, and proper to our soil; that we often hear them objected to us, by some of our neighbour satirists, in more disgraceful expressions. For they are wont to revile the English, with a want of familiarity; with a melancholy dumpishness; with slowness, silence, and with the unrefined sullenness of their behaviour. But these are only the reproaches of partiality, or ignorance: for they ought rather to be commended for an honourable integrity; for a neglect of circumstances, and flourishes; for regarding things of greater moment, more than less; for a scorn to deceive as well as to be deceived: which are all the best endowments, that can enter into a philosophical mind. So that even the position of our climate, the air, the influence of the heaven, the composition of the English blood; as well as the embraces of the ocean, seem to join with the labours of the Royal Society, to render our country, a land of experimental knowledge. And it is a good sign, that nature will reveal more of its secrets to the English, than to others; because it has already furnished them with a genius so well proportioned, for the receiving, and retaining its mysteries.

—1667

Thomas Traherne

1637 – 1674

Little is known about Traherne's life. He was the son of a Herefordshire shoemaker, of a Welsh family. He would have been five when the Civil War broke out, and Hereford was in the thick of the conflict, changing hands three times. It is possible that both of Traherne's parents died when he was young; nothing is heard of them, and Traherne and his brother Philip seem to have been adopted by an innkeeper, Philip Traherne senior. Traherne graduated from Brasenose College, one of the more Puritan of the Oxford colleges, in 1656, and was appointed rector of Credenhill near Hereford in 1657. He was ordained as an Anglican priest at the Restoration in 1660, and is known to have been a member of a religious circle centred upon a devout woman, Susanna Hopton. He kept in contact with Oxford, and his work Roman Forgeries, published in 1673, may represent work towards a Bachelor of Divinity degree. He became B.D. in 1669. While he retained his rectorship at Credenhill until his death, in 1669 he moved to London, as private chaplain to Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal. He was buried at Teddington in Middlesex.

The works by which Traherne is now best known, his poems and Centuries of Meditation, were not published in his lifetime. The manuscripts were found on two bookstalls, in different streets, in 1897, by a scholar who recognized that they were the work of the same writer. Many of the poems exist in two versions, one "improved" by Traherne's brother Philip. At first they were thought to be by Vaughan, because of some thematic similarities; but in fact Vaughan and Traherne are stylistically far apart, and Vaughan is by far the better poet, which is not to say that Traherne's work is without interest. The prose work, Centuries of Meditation, is generally considered to be superior to the verse.

There has been a good deal of excitement among scholars and devotees of Traherne in recent years, because manuscripts keep on turning up. In 1967, for example, his Commentaries of Heaven were discovered on a burning trash-heap by a man searching for car parts. He emigrated to Canada, and fifteen years after the discovery the manuscript was identified as Traherne's. Another manuscript of devotional prose was discovered in the late 1990s.

⁂

The Third Century

(excerpt)

1

Will you see the infancy of this sublime and celestial greatness? Those pure and virgin apprehensions I had from the womb, and that divine light wherewith I was born, are the best unto this day, wherein I can see the universe. By the gift of God they attended me into the world, and by his special favor I remember them till now. Verily they seem the greatest gifts his wisdom could bestow, for without them all other gifts had been dead and vain. They are unattainable by book, and therefore I will teach them by experience. Pray for them earnestly: for they will make you angelical, and wholly celestial. Certainly Adam in Paradise had not more sweet and curious apprehensions of the world, than I when I was a child.

2

All appeared new, and strange at the first, inexpressibly rare, and delightful, and beautiful. I was a little stranger which at my entrance into the world was saluted and surrounded with innumerable joys. My knowledge was divine. I knew by intuition those things which since my apostasy,[1] I collected again, by the highest reason. My very ignorance was advantageous. I seemed as one brought into the estate of innocence. All things were spotless and pure and glorious: yea, and infinitely mine, and joyful and precious. I knew not that there were any sins, or complaints, or laws. I dreamed not of poverty's contentions or vices. All tears and quarrels, were hidden from mine eyes. Everything was at rest, free, and immortal. I knew nothing of sickness or death or exaction, in the absence of these I was entertained like an angel with the works of God in their splendor and glory; I saw all in the peace of Eden; Heaven and Earth did sing my creator's praises and could not make more melody to Adam, than to me. All time was eternity, and a perpetual Sabbath. Is it not strange, that an infant should be heir of the world, and see those mysteries which the books of the learned never unfold?

3

The corn was orient and immortal wheat,[2] which never should be reaped, nor was ever sown. I thought it had stood from everlasting to everlasting. The dust and stones of the street were as precious as gold. The gates were at first the end of the world, the green trees when I saw them first through one of the gates transported and ravished me; their sweetness and unusual beauty made my heart to leap, and almost mad with ecstacy, they were such strange and wonderful things: The men! O what venerable and reverend creatures did the aged seem! Immortal cherubims! And young men glittering and sparkling angels and maids strange seraphic pieces of life and beauty! Boys and girls tumbling in the street, and playing, were moving jewels. I knew not that they were born or should die. But all things abided eternally as they were in their proper places. Eternity was manifest in the light of the day, and something infinite behind everything appeared: which talked with my expectation and moved my desire. The city seemed to stand in Eden, or to be built in Heaven. The streets were mine, the temple was mine, the people were mine, their clothes and gold and silver was mine, as much as their sparkling eyes, fair skins and ruddy faces. The skies were mine, and so were the sun and moon and stars, and all the world was mine, and I the only spectator and enjoyer of it. I knew no churlish proprieties,[3] nor bounds nor divisions: but all proprieties and divisions were mine: all treasures and the possessors of them. So that with much ado I was corrupted; and made to learn the dirty devices of this world. Which now I unlearn, and become as it were a little child again, that I may enter into the Kingdom of God.

4

Upon those pure and virgin apprehensions which I had in my infancy, I made this poem.[4]

1

That childish thoughts such joys inspire,
Doth make my wonder, and his glory higher;
His bounty, and my wealth more great:
It shows his Kingdom, and his work complete.
In which there is not any thing,
Not meet to be the joy of cherubim.

2

He in our childhood with us walks,
And with our thoughts mysteriously he talks;
He often visiteth our minds,
But cold acceptance in us ever finds.

---

[1] apostasy his movement away from childhood innocence; see meditation 7 below.

[2] orient bright, glowing, shining (OED orient adj 2b).

[3] proprieties properties, possessions.

[4] this poem found also in manuscripts of Traherne's poems, where it is entitled "The Approach."

We send him often grieved away,
Who else would show us all his kingdom's joy.

3

O Lord I wonder at thy love,
Which did my infancy so early move:
But more at that which did forbear
And move so long, though sleighted many a year:
But most of all, at last that thou
Thy self shouldst me convert, I scarce know how.

4

Thy gracious motions oft in vain
Assaulted me: My heart did hard remain
Long time! I sent my God away
Grieved much, that he could not give me his joy.
I careless was, nor did regard
The end for which he all those thoughts prepared.

5

But now, with new and open eyes,
I see beneath, as if I were above the skies:
And as I backward look again
See all his thoughts and mine most clear and plain.
He did approach, he me did woe.
I wonder that my God this thing would do.

6

From nothing taken first I was;
What wondrous things his glory brought to pass!
Now in the world I him behold,
And me, enveloped in precious gold;
In deep abysses of delights,
In present hidden glorious benefits.

7

Those thoughts his goodness long before
Prepared as precious and celestial store:
With curious art in me inlaid,
That childhood might itself alone be said
My tutor teacher guide to be,
Instructed then even by the deity.

5

Our Savior's meaning, when he said, he must be born again and become a little child that will enter into the Kingdom of Heaven:[1] is deeper far than is generally believed. It is not only in a careless reliance upon divine providence, that we are to become little children, or in the feebleness and shortness of our anger and simplicity of our passions: but in the peace and purity of all our soul. Which purity also is a deeper thing than is commonly apprehended. For we must disrobe ourselves of all false colors, and unclothe our souls of evil habits; all our thoughts must be infant-like and clear: the powers of our soul free from the leaven of this world, and disentangled from men's conceits and customs. Grit in the eye or the yellow jaundice will not let a man see those objects truly that are before it. And therefore it is requisite that we should be as very strangers to the thoughts, customs and opinions of men in this world as if we were but little children. So those things would appear to us only which do to children when they are first born. Ambitions, trades, luxuries, inordinate affections, casual and accidental riches invented since the fall would be gone, and only those things appear, which did to Adam in Paradise, in the same light, and in the same colors. God in his works, glory in the light, love in our parents, men, ourselves, and the face of Heaven. Every man naturally seeing those things, to the enjoyment of which he is naturally born.

6

Every one provideth objects, but few prepare senses whereby, and light wherein to see them. Since therefore we are born to be a burning and shining light, and whatever men learn of others, they see in the light of others' souls: I will in the light of my soul show you the universe. Perhaps it is celestial, and will teach you how beneficial we may be to each other. I am sure it is a sweet and curious light to me: which had I wanted: I would have given all the gold and silver in all worlds to have purchased. But it was the gift of God and could not be bought with money. And by what steps and degrees I proceeded to that enjoyment of all eternity which now I possess I will likewise show you. A clear, and familiar light it may prove unto you.

---

[1] Mark 10:15, Luke 18:17.

7

The first light which shined in my infancy in its primitive and innocent clarity was totally eclipsed: insomuch that I was fain to learn all again. If you ask me how it was eclipsed? Truly by the customs and manners of men, which like contrary winds blew it out: by an innumerable company of other objects, rude, vulgar and worthless things that like so many loads of earth and dung did overwhelm and bury it: by the impetuous torrent of wrong desires in all others whom I saw or knew that carried me away and alienated me from it: by a whole sea of other matters and concernments that covered and drowned it: finally by the evil influence of a bad education that did not foster and cherish it. All men's thoughts and words were about other matters; they all prized new things which I did not dream of. I was a stranger and unacquainted with them; I was little and reverenced their authority; I was weak, and easily guided by their example: ambitious also, and desirous to approve myself unto them. And finding no one syllable in any man's mouth of those things, by degrees they vanished, my thoughts (as indeed what is more fleeting than a thought) were blotted out. And at last all the celestial great and stable treasures to which I was born, as wholly forgotten, as if they had never been.

8

Had any man spoken of it, it had been the most easy thing in the world, to have taught me, and to have made me believe, that Heaven and Earth was God's house, and that he gave it me. That the sun was mine and that men were mine, and that cities and kingdoms were mine also: that earth was better than gold, and that water was, every drop of it, a precious jewel. And that these were great and living treasures: and that all riches whatsoever else was dross in comparison. From whence I clearly find how docile our nature is in natural things, were it rightly entreated. And that our misery proceedeth ten thousand times more from the outward bondage of opinion and custom, than from any inward corruption or depravation of nature: And that it is not our parents' loins, so much as our parents' lives, that enthrals and blinds us, Yet is all our corruption derived from Adam: inasmuch as all the evil examples and inclinations of the world arise from his sin. But I speak it in the presence of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ, in my pure primitive virgin light, while my apprehensions were natural, and unmixed, I can not remember, but that I was ten thousand times more prone to good and excellent things, than evil. But I was quickly tainted and fell by others.

—(ca. 1669–74)

Wonder

1

How like an Angel came I down!
How bright are all things here!
When first among his Works I did appear
O how their GLORY me did crown?
The World resembled his Eternity,
In which my soul did walk;
And ev'ry thing that I did see,
Did with me talk.

2

The skies in their magnificence,
The lively, lovely air;
Oh how divine, how soft, how sweet, how fair!
The stars did entertain my sense,
And all the Works of GOD so bright and pure,
So rich and great did seem,
As if they ever must endure,
In my esteem.[1]

3

A native health and innocence
Within my bones did grow,[2]
And while my GOD did all his glories show,
I felt a vigour in my sense
That was all SPIRIT. I within did flow
With seas of life, like wine;
I nothing in the World did know,
But 'twas divine.

4

Harsh ragged objects were concealed,
Oppressions tears and cries,
Sins, griefs, complaints, dissensions, weeping eyes,
Were hid: and only things revealed,
Which heav'nly spirits, and the Angels prize,
The state of innocence
And bliss, not trades and poverties,
Did fell my sense.

5

The streets were paved with golden stones,
The boys and girls were mine,
Oh how did all their lovely faces shine!
The sons of men were Holy Ones.
Joy, Beauty, Welfare did appear to me,
And ev'ry thing which here I found,
While like an Angel I did see,
Adorned the ground.

6

Rich diamond and pearl and gold
In ev'ry place was seen;
Rare splendors, yellow, blue, red, white and green,
Mine eyes did ev'rywhere behold,
Great wonders clothed with glory did appear,
Amazement was my bliss.
That and my wealth was ev'rywhere:
No joy to this! [3]

7

Cursed and devised proprieties,[4]
With Envy, Avarice
And Fraud, those fiends that spoil even Paradise,[5]
Fled from the splendor of mine eyes.
And so did hedges, ditches, limits, bounds,
I dreamed not ought of those,
But wandered over all men's grounds,
And found repose.

8

Proprieties themselves were mine,
And hedges ornaments;

---

[1] In my esteem in my valuation of them, that is, that they were "divine" (lines 11 and 24).

[2] A native health and innocence in opposition to the Calvinist notion of "original sin," which might be summed up by Psalm 51:5, "Behold, I was shapen in wickedness: and in sin hath my mother conceived me." The theme of the innocence of childhood is one of those common to Vaughan and Traherne.

[3] to this compared to this; a very common idiom of the period.

[4] proprieties properties, here and in line 57. In stanzas seven and eight Traherne is making the point that the child does not understand the commercial notion of "ownership," but enjoys everything just as if it were his own. A twentieth-century author has written that a painting is "really" owned, not by the wealthy person who has been able to buy it, but by those best able to appreciate it.

[5] Envy, Avarice / And Fraud, those fiends that spoil even Paradise Compare the representation of Satan and the rebel angels in Paradise Lost. Fraud involves misrepresentation, and Satan and his followers are frequently represented as liars, for example in Revelation 12:9, "Satan, which deceiveth the whole world," and Paradise Lost 1:367 ("falsities and lies") and 5:243 ("deceit and lies").

Walls, boxes, coffers, and their rich contents
Did not divide my joys, but shine.
Clothes, ribbons, jewels, laces, I esteemed
My joys by others worn;
For me they all to wear them seemed
When I was born.[1]
—1903

Innocence

1

But that which most I wonder at, which most
I did esteem my bliss, which most I boast,
And ever shall enjoy, is that within
I felt no stain, nor spot of sin.

No darkness then did overshade,
But all within was pure and bright,
No guilt did crush, nor fear invade
But all my soul was full of light.

A joyful sense and purity
Is all I can remember.
The very night to me was bright,
'Twas summer in December.

2

A serious meditation did employ
My soul within, which taken up with joy
Did seem no outward thing to note, but fly
All objects that do feed the eye.

While it those very objects did
Admire, and prize, and praise, and love,
Which in their glory most are hid,
Which presence only doth remove.

Their constant daily presence I
Rejoicing at, did see;
And that which takes them from the eye
Of others, offered them to me.

3

No inward inclination did I feel
To avarice or pride: my soul did kneel
In admiration all the day. No lust, nor strife,
Polluted then my infant life.

No fraud nor anger in me moved
No malice jealousy or spite;
All that I saw I truly loved.
Contentment only and delight

Were in my soul. O Heav'n! what bliss
Did I enjoy and feel!
What powerful delight did this
Inspire! for this I daily kneel.

4

Whether it be that Nature is so pure,
And Custom only vicious; or that sure
God did by miracle the guilt remove,
And make my soul to feel his love,

So early: Or that 'twas one day,
Where in this happiness I found;
Whose strength and brightness so do ray,
That still it seemeth to surround.

What ere it is, it is a light
So endless unto me
That I a world of true delight
Did then and to this day do see.

5

The prospect was the gate of Heav'n, that day
The ancient light of Eden did convey
Into my soul: I was an Adam there,
A little Adam in a sphere

---

[1] For me for my sake.

Of joys! O there my ravished sense
Was entertained in Paradise,
And had a sight of Innocence.
All was beyond all bound and price.

An antepast of Heaven sure![1]
I on the earth did reign.
Within, without me, all was pure,
I must become a child again.[2]
—1903

The Preparative[3]

I

My body being dead, my limbs unknown;[4]
Before I skilled to prize
Those living stars mine eyes,[5]
Before my tongue or cheeks were to me shown,
Before I knew my hands were mine,
Or that my sinews did my members join,
When neither nostril, foot, nor ear,
As yet was seen, or felt, or did appear;
I was within
A house I knew not, newly clothed with skin.

2

Then was my soul my only all to me,
A living endless eye,
Far wider than the sky
Whose power, whose act, whose essence was to see.
I was an inward sphere of light,
Or an interminable orb of sight,
An endless and a living day,
A vital Sun that round about did ray
All life and sense,
A naked simple pure Intelligence.

3

I then no thirst nor hunger did conceive,
No dull necessity,
No want was known to me;
Without disturbance then I did receive
The fair ideas of all things,[6]
And had the honey even without the stings,
A meditating inward eye
Gazing at quiet did within me lie,
And ev'ry thing
Delighted me that was their heav'nly king.[7]

4

For sight inherits beauty, hearing sounds,
The nostril sweet perfumes,
All tastes have hidden rooms
Within the tongue; and feeling feeling wounds
With pleasure and delight; but I
Forgot the rest, and was all sight, or eye.

---

[1] An antepast a foretaste.

[2] I must become a child again Compare Matthew 18:3, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." See also John 3:1–8.

[3] The original title of this poem was "The Vision," which was then erased in favour of the present title. There is a subsequent poem called "The Vision," and it has been suggested that Traherne might have intended the two to be a "double poem." The word "preparative" occurs in the first line of "The Vision," and the two poems are linked thematically, dealing with sight as the sense through which we receive divine intimations. Retirement (line 69 of this poem) or "flight" (the first line of "The Vision") are the preparatives for the proper religious understanding of what the eye perceives. Implicit in all this is the concept of the natural or "phenomenal" world as "God's second book."

[4] dead lacking sensation. Traherne is writing, accurately or not, about the earliest state of infancy.

[5] Before I skilled to prize before I understood how to value (OED skill *v*¹ 4).

[6] ideas in the Platonic sense, the "idea" being the eternally existing pattern or archetype of any class of things, of which the individual things in that class are imperfect copies, and from which they derive their existence (OED idea sb 1). Traherne means that he was able to apprehend perfection. Traherne, like many English intellectuals of the time, was much taken with Platonic and neo-Platonic conceptions.

[7] And ev'ry thing / Delighted me that was their heav'nly king This conception of the individual as godlike seems to have been too strong for Traherne's brother Philip; he altered these lines to "And all things fair / Delighted me that was to be their heir." The next stanza might be taken as Traherne's justification of the statement embodied in these lines.

Unbodied and devoid of care,
Just as in Heav'n the holy Angels are,
For simple sense
Is Lord of all created excellence.

5

Being thus prepared for all felicity,
Not prepossessed with dross,
Nor stiffly glued to gross
And dull materials that might ruin me,
Not fettered by an iron fate
With vain affections in my earthy state
To anything that might seduce
My sense, or misemploy it from its use
I was as free
As if there were nor sin, nor misery

6

Pure empty powers that did nothing loath,
Did like the fairest glass,
Or spotless polished brass,
Themselves soon in their object's image clothe.
Divine impressions when they came,
Did quickly enter and my soul inflame.
'Tis not the object, but the light
That maketh Heaven; 'tis a purer sight.
Felicity
Appears to none but them that purely see.[1]

7

A disentangled and a naked sense
A mind that unpossessed,
A disengaged breast,
An empty and a quick intelligence
Acquainted with the Golden Mean,
An even spirit pure and serene,
Is that where Beauty, Excellence,
And Pleasure keep their Court of Residence.
My Soul retire,
Get free, and so thou shalt even all admire.
—1903

The Instruction

Spew out thy filth, thy flesh abjure,
Let not contingents thee defile;
For transients only are impure,
And empty things thy soul beguile.

Unfelt, unseen let those things be,
Which to thy spirits were unknown,
When to thy blessed infancy
The World, thy Self, thy God, was shown.

All that is great and stable stood
Within thy harmless view at first;
All that in visibles is good,
Or pure, or fair, or unaccursed.

Whatever else thou now dost see
In custom, action, or desire,
Is but a part of misery
Wherein all men at once conspire.
—1903

The Demonstration

I

The highest things are easiest to be shown,
And only capable of being known.[2]

---

[1] Felicity / Appears to none but them that purely see Compare Jacob Boehme, "the right man regenerate and renewed in Christ is…in the Paradise of God" (Epistle 25:14). Many of Boehme's works were translated into English in the seventeenth century and had considerable influence. Compare also Blake, "If the doors of perception were cleansed, every thing would appear as it is: infinite" (The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, Plate 14).

[2] The highest things are… / only capable of being known That is, only the highest things are capable of being known. This is a Platonic concept; the "ideas" (see note to previous poem) are accessible to our intellects, but their copies in the phenomenal world are not. Plato's argument was that only the ideas are unchanging; of their embodiments in the phenomenal world we can only have opinion, not knowledge, because we cannot have knowledge of that which is constantly changing.

A mist involves the eye,
While in the middle it doth lie;
And till the ends of things are seen,
The way 's uncertain that doth stand between.
As in the air we see the clouds
Like winding sheets, or shrouds;
Which though they nearer are obscure
The Sun, which higher far, is far more pure.

2

Its very brightness makes it near the eye,
Though many thousand leagues beyond the sky.
Its beams by violence
Invade, and ravish distant sense.
Only extremes and heights are known; [1]
No certainty, where no perfection 's shown.
Extremities of blessedness
Compel us to confess
A GOD indeed, whose excellence,
In all his Works, must needs succeed all sense.

3

And for this cause incredibles alone
May be by demonstration to us shown.
Those things that are most bright
Sun-like appear in their own light.
And nothing 's truly seen that 's mean:
Be it a sand, an acorn, or a bean,
It must be clothed with endless glory,
Before its perfect story
(Be the spirit ne'er so clear)
Can in its Causes and its Ends appear.

4

What can be more incredible then this,
Where may we find a more profound abyss?
What heav'nly height can be
Transcendent to this summity!
What more desirable object can
Be offered to the soul of hungering man!
His gifts as they to us come down
Are infinite, and crown
The soul with strange fruitions; yet
Returning from us they more value get.[2]

5

And what than this can be more plain and clear
What truth then this more evident appear!
The GODHEAD cannot prize
The Sun at all, nor yet the skies,
Or air, or earth, or trees, or seas,
Or stars, unless the soul of man they please.
He neither sees with human eyes
Nor needs himself seas skies
Or Earth, or anything: He draws
No breath, nor eats or drinks by Nature's laws.

6

The joy and pleasure which his soul doth take
In all his Works, is for his creatures' sake.
So great a certainty
We in this holy doctrine see
That there could be no worth at all
In anything material great or small
Were not some creature more alive,
When it might worth derive,
GOD is the spring whence things came forth
Souls are the fountains of their real worth.

7

The joy and pleasure which his soul doth take
In all his Works is for his creatures' sake
Yet doth he take delight

---

[1] No certainty, where no perfection 's known See the previous note.

[2] unless the soul of man they please This idea, that God cannot take pleasure in his Creation unless it pleases human beings, might have been adopted, or adapted, from Boehme. In his philosophy the seventh or final form of Nature is called "figure." In this state Nature has evolved properly, the creatures stand marked with the signature of God, as being to his honour and glory; and mankind's ability to apprehend the creatures as they are marked with God's signature marks the achievement of highest consciousness, regarded as one of the ends of the creative process. Traherne's thinking on this matter is nicely encapsulated in lines 59–60.

That's altogether infinite
In them even as they from him come
For such his love and goodness is, the sum
Of all his happiness doth seem,
At least in his esteem,
In that delight and joy to lie
Which is his blessed creatures' melody.

8

In them he sees, and feels, and smells, and lives,
In them affected is to whom he gives:
In then ten thousand ways,
He all his works again enjoys,
All things from Him to Him proceed
By them; are his in them: as if indeed
His Godhead did itself exceed.
To them He all conveys;
Nay even Himself: He is the End
To whom in them Himself, and all things tend.
—1903

The Anticipation [1]

1

My contemplation dazzles in the End
Of all I comprehend,[2]
And soars above all heights,
Diving into the depths of all delights.
Can He become the End,
To whom all creatures tend?
Who is the Father of all infinites!
Then may He benefit receive from things,
And be not Parent only of all springs.

2

The End doth want the means, and is the cause,
Whose sake, by Nature's laws,
Is that for which they are.[3]
Such sands, such dangerous rocks we must beware
From all eternity
A perfect deity
Most great and blessed he doth still appear.
His Essence Perfect was in all its Features
He ever Blessed in his Joys and Creatures.

3

From everlasting he these joys did need,
And all these joys proceed
From Him eternally.
From everlasting his felicity
Complete and perfect was:
Whose bosom is the glass,
Wherein we all things everlasting see.
His Name is NOW, his Nature is forever.
None can his creatures from their Maker Sever.

4

The End in him from everlasting is
The Fountain of all bliss.
From everlasting it
Efficient was, and influence did emit,[4]
That caused all. Before
The world, we do adore
This glorious End. Because all benefit

---

[1] This poem represents a more philosophical exposition of ideas announced in "The Demonstration." It stands here as a rare representative, in this anthology, of a class of poems quite common in the seventeenth century, that is the attempt to express or explore explicitly philosophical ideas. Henry More, for example, wrote what might be described as a Spenserian epic of philosophical ideas. By contrast, "ideas" in Donne are usually there by way of illustration of arguments about sex or religion, rather than for their own sake. The title of the poem probably refers to its chief idea, that the First Cause is also (and therefore "anticipates") the Final Cause.

[2] the End that is, the "final cause." Traherne's vision is teleological, in the sense that everything is seen as having a divinely implanted purpose, toward which it is pressing.

[3] doth want lacks; Whose sake… / Is that for which they are that is, things exist for the sake of their end, or final cause. The rest of the stanza appears to be rejecting the idea, in that particular form. The burden of the poem is that God is both the beginning and the end of all creatures.

[4] From everlasting it / Efficient was That is, the final cause and the efficient cause are identical; this is clearly stated in line 36: "The End and Fountain differ but in name."

From it proceeds. Both are the very same.
The End and Fountain differ but in name.

5

That so the End should be the very Spring,
Of ev'ry glorious thing;
And that which seemeth last,
The Fountain and the Cause; attained so fast,
That it was first; and moved
The efficient, who so loved
All worlds and made them for the sake of this
It shows the End complete before, and is
A perfect token of his perfect bliss.

6

The End complete, the means must needs be so.
By which we plainly know,
From all Eternity,
The means whereby God is, must perfect be.
God is himself the means,
Whereby he doth exist:
And as the Sun by shining 's clothed with beams,
So from himself to all his glory streams,
Who is a Sun, yet what himself doth list.[1]

7

His endless wants and his enjoyments be
From all eternity;
Immutable in him:
They are his joys before the Cherubim.[2]
His wants appreciate all, [3]
And being infinite,
Permit no being to be mean or small
That he enjoys, or is before his sight.
His satisfactions do his wants delight.

8

Wants are the Fountains of Felicity;
No joy could ever be
Were there no want. No bliss
No sweetness perfect were it not for this.
Want is the greatest pleasure
Because it makes all treasure.
O what a wonderful profound abyss
Is God! In whom eternal wants and treasures
Are more delightful 'cause they both are pleasures.

9

He infinitely wanteth all his joys;
(No want the soul o'er cloys.)
And all those wanted pleasures
He infinitely hath. What endless measures,
What heights and depths may we
In his felicity
Conceive! Whose very wants are endless pleasures,
His life in wants and joys is infinite.
And both are felt as his supreme delight.

10

He 's not like us; possession doth not cloy,
Nor sense of want destroy.
Both always are together:
No force can either from the other sever.
Yet there's a space between
That's endless. Both are seen
Distinctly still, and both are seen for ever.
As soon as e'er he wanteth all his bliss,
His bliss, though everlasting, in him is.

11

His essence is all act: he did, that he
All act might always be.
His Nature burns like fire;
His goodness infinitely doth desire,

---

[1] Who is a Sun, yet what himself doth list That is, God is the Sun, and whatever else he chooses to be. See OED list v^1 and compare John 3:8, "The wind bloweth where it listeth."

[2] his joys before the Cherubim God's joys as shown to the cherubim. The cherubim were the second order of angels according to the pseudo-Dionysius; they excelled especially in knowledge, as here, the knowledge of the joys of God. See OED cherub.

[3] appreciate all are the cause of value in all things.

To be by all possessed;
His love makes others blest.
It is the glory of his high estate,
And that which I forever more admire,
He is an act that doth communicate.

12

From all to all eternity he is
That act: an act of bliss:
Wherein all bliss to all,
That will receive the same, or on him call,
Is freely given: from whence
'Tis easy even to sense,
To apprehend that all receivers are
In him, all gifts, all joys, all eyes, even all
At once, that ever will, or shall appear.

13

He is the means of them, they not of him.
The Holy Cherubim
Souls, Angels from him came
Who is a glorious bright and living flame,
That on all things doth shine,
And makes their face devine.
And Holy, Holy, Holy, is his Name.
He is the means both of himself and all,
Whom we the Fountain, Means and End do call.

14

In whom as in the Fountain all things are,
In whom all things appear
As in the Means, and End
From whom they all proceed, to whom they tend.
By whom they are made ours
Whose souls are spacious bowers
Of all like his. Who ought to have a sense
Of all our wants, of all his excellence,
That while we all, we him might comprehend.
—1903

Charles Sackville, Earl of Dorset

1638 – 1706

A favourite of Charles II, Sackville was noted primarily for the life of dissipation he lived with Sir Charles Sedley and the other rakes of the Restoration court. He withdrew from the court during the reign of James II, but became politically active once more after the Revolution, supporting William and acting as regent several times during the King's absences. He was a friend and patron to poets, and his own poems, published with Sedley's in 1701, were praised by Dryden and Matthew Prior; Dryden also dedicated several poems to him. "My Opinion" reflects the power struggle in the early 1680s between the King's brother, the Catholic James, Duke of York (later James II), and the King's illegitimate eldest son (by his Welsh mistress Lucy Walter), James, Duke of Monmouth. In 1685, Monmouth landed at Lyme Regis with about 150 men, declared his uncle James II a usurper, and claimed the throne for himself; his troops were eventually slaughtered by the Royal army and he was executed on Tower Hill.

* * *

My Opinion

1

After thinking this fortnight of Whig and of Tory,
This to me is the long and the short of the story:
They are all fools or knaves, and they keep up this pother
On both sides, designing to cheat one another.

2

Poor Rowley (whose maxims of state are a riddle)
Has plac'd himself much like the pin in the middle; [1]
Let which corner soever be tumbl'd down first,
'Tis ten thousand to one but he comes by the worst.

3

'Twixt brother and bastard (those Dukes of renown) [2]
He'll make a wise shift to get rid of his crown;
Had he half common sense (were it ne'er so uncivil)
He'd have had 'em long since tipp'd down to the Devil. [3]

4

The first is a Prince well-fashion'd, well-featur'd,
No bigot to speak of, not false, nor ill-natur'd;
The other for government can't be unfit,
He's so little a fop, and so plaguy a wit. [4]

5

Had I this soft son, and this dangerous brother,
I'd hang up the one, then I'd piss upon t'other;
I'd make this the long and the short of the story:
The fools might be Whigs, none but knaves should be Tories.
—(ca. 1681)

---

[1] Rowley Charles II; Rowley was the name of a famously prolific stallion of the period.

[2] the Duke of York (later James II) and James Scott, Duke of Monmouth, Charles II's illegitimate son.

[3] tipp'd a term from the game of skittles (ninepins), a form of bowling; used when one pin knocks down another by falling or rolling against it, as distinguished from being knocked down directly by the ball. The image completes the metaphor introduced in the second stanza of the King as the pin between the two rivals.

[4] The entire stanza is ironic: the Prince (Duke of York) was unattractive and a notorious bigot; Monmouth was considered a dullard.

Sir Charles Sedley

?1639 – 1701

Sir Charles Sedley was the youngest and posthumous son of the Baronet of Southfleet in Kent. His two elder brothers died childless, and Charles inherited the title and estates of his father. He entered Wadham College, Oxford in 1655–56, but did not take a degree. In 1657 Sedley married Catherine Savage, daughter of Earl Rivers. Their daughter, Catherine, was later to become the favourite mistress of Charles II's brother, James. Sedley became a member of Parliament after the Restoration. A number of scandals were associated with him, generally related to his drinking habits. His literary reputation did not suffer, however, and his work was praised by Charles II, Rochester, Buckingham, Dryden and others. Sedley's literary work was highly varied, consisting of essays, speeches, translations, poetry, and tragic and comedic drama. Sedley narrowly escaped death in 1680 when his skull was fractured by the collapsing roof of the tennis-court in the Haymarket. After Charles II died in 1685, Sedley rarely appeared in London. A number of his plays were published in his lifetime, one of his parliamentary speeches appeared in a broadside, and a few of his short works appeared in miscellanies. After his death numerous editions of Sedley's collected works were published. Indeed there were six versions published in the eighteenth century alone.

Young Coridon and Phillis

Young Coridon and Phillis
Sat in a Lovely Grove;
Contriving Crowns of Lilies,
Repeating Tales of Love:
And something else, but what I dare not name.

But as they were a Playing,
She ogled so the Swain;[1]
It sav'd her plainly saying
Let's kiss to ease our Pain:
And something else, but what I dare not name.

A thousand times he kiss'd her,
Laying her on the Green;
But as he farther press'd her,
Her pretty Leg was seen:
And something else, but what I dare not name.

So many Beauties removing,
His Ardour still increas'd;
And greater Joys pursuing,
He wander'd o'er her Breast:
And something else, but what I dare not name.

A last Effort she trying,
His passion to withstand;
Cry'd, but it was faintly crying,
Pray take away your Hand:
And something else, but what I dare not name.

Young Coridon grown bolder,
The Minute would improve;
This is the time he told her,
To shew you how I love;
And something else, but what I dare not name.

The Nymph seem'd almost dying,
Dissolv'd in amorous heat;
She kiss'd and told him sighing,

---

[1] Swain a man, a youth; a boy (OED swain).

My Dear your Love is great:
And something else, but what I dare not name.

But Phillis did recover
Much sooner than the Swain;
She blushing ask'd her Lover,
Shall we not kiss again:
And something else, but what I dare not name.

Thus Love his Revels keeping,
'Til Nature at a stand;
From talk they fell to Sleeping,
Holding each others Hand;
And something else, but what I dare not name.
—1694

Aphra Behn

1640 – 1689

Little is certainly known about the early life of Aphra Behn. There are several biographical accounts, which present conflicting versions of her lineage, birthplace and youth. Within a decade of her death were published: An Account of the Life of the Incomparable Mrs. Behn (1696), Memoirs of the Life of Mrs. Behn (1696) and The History of the Life and Memoirs of Mrs. Behn (1698). These and other early references have led biographers to conclude that Aphra Behn was born in Harbledon near Canterbury on July 10, 1640, daughter to Bartholomew Johnson and Elizabeth Denham. It is believed that she spent several years in her early twenties (ca. 1663–64) in Surinam, where she met William Scot. Some time in 1664, she was married to a Mr. Behn, possibly a city merchant of Dutch extraction, who died of the plague in 1665. In August, 1666, during the Dutch war, she was dispatched as an official government spy to Antwerp, with a mission to persuade William Scot to act as a double agent. She returned to England in 1667 heavily in debt, and was briefly imprisoned in London. Despite repeated petitions, she received no compensation for her services, and undertook to live by the pen, writing at least eighteen plays. While her theatrical career dominated the first decade of her professional writing, Behn also produced translations from Latin and French, and wrote popular verse and prose fiction. As a writer of drama, novels, epistles, and poetry, she explored a variety of highly charged subjects not common in Restoration literature: female sexuality, lust, seduction, incest, rape. The themes upon which she wrote drew criticism from churchmen. Bishop Burnet wrote to Anne Wharton: "she is so abominably vile a woman, and rallies not only all Religion but all Virtue in so odious and obscene a manner, that I am heartily sorry that she has writ any thing in your commendation." Perhaps because of the subversive nature of her drama and prose fiction, Behn's role as Tory apologist most evident in her occasional verse has received less critical attention. Aphra Behn died in London and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Of her life and burial, Virginia Woolf was to write: "All women together ought to let flowers fall upon the tomb of Aphra Behn which is, most scandalously but rather appropriately, in Westminster Abbey, for it was she who earned them the right to speak their minds."

* * *

Song

"I Led my Silvia to a Grove"

I led my Silvia to a grove,
Where all the boughs did shade us
The sun itself, though it had strove
It could not have betrayed us.
The place secured from human eyes
No other fear allows,
But when the winds do gently rise;
And kiss the yielding boughs.

Down there we sat upon the moss,
And did begin to play,
A thousand wanton tricks to pass,
The heat of all the day.
A many kisses I did give,
And she returned the same,
Which made her willing to receive;
That which I dare not name.

My greedy eyes no aids required,
To tell their amorous tale,
On her that was already fired:
'Twas easy to prevail.

I did but kiss and clasp her round,
Whilst they my thoughts expressed,[1]
And laid her gently on the ground:
Oh! who can guess the rest.
—1672

The Golden Age.
A Paraphrase on a Translation out of French[2]

I

Blest age! when ev'ry purling stream
Ran undisturbed and clear,[3]
When no scorned shepherds on your banks were seen,
Tortured by love, by jealousy, or fear;
When an eternal spring dressed ev'ry bough,
And blossoms fell, by new ones dispossessed;
These their kind shade affording all below,
And those a bed where all below might rest.
The groves appeared all dressed with wreaths of flowers,
And from their leaves dropped aromatic showers,
Whose fragrant heads in mystic twines above,
Exchanged their sweets, and mixed with thousand kisses,
As if the willing branches strove
To beautify and shade the grove
Where the young wanton gods of love
Offer their noblest sacrifice of blisses.

II

Calm was the air, no winds blew fierce and loud,
The sky was dark'ned with no sullen cloud;
But all the heav'ns laughed with continued light,
And scattered round their rays serenely bright.
No other murmurs filled the ear
But what the streams and rivers purled,
When silver waves o'er shining pebbles curled;
Or when young Zephyrs fanned the gentle breeze,[4]
Gath'ring fresh sweets from balmy flow'rs and trees,
Then bore 'em on their wings to perfume all the air:
While to their soft and tender play,
The gray-plumed natives of the shades
Unwearied sing till love invades,
Then bill, then sing again, while love and music makes the day.[5]

III

The stubborn plough had then,
Made no rude rapes upon the virgin earth;
Who yielded of her own account her plenteous birth;
Without the aids of men;
As if within her teeming womb,
All nature, and all sexes lay,
Whence new creations every day
Into the happy world did come:
The roses filled with morning dew;
Bent down their loaded heads,
T'adorn the careless shepherds' grassy beds
While still young opening buds each moment grew
And as those withered, dressed his shaded couch anew;
Beneath whose boughs the snakes securely dwelt,
Not doing harm, nor harm from others felt;
With whom the nymphs did innocently play,

---

[1] Whilst original "whose they my"; 1673, 1684 "Whilst those his"; 1707 "And thus his."

[2] an expanded adaptation of the opening chorus from Aminta (1573), a pastoral play by Torquato Tasso (1544–1595). The French version of the play from which Behn worked is not yet known.

[3] purling rippling; murmuring (OED purling ppl.a).

[4] Zephyrs soft, gentle winds (OED zephyr 2).

[5] gray-plumed natives turtle-doves; bill stroke bill with bill; caress (OED bill v^2 2,3).

No spiteful venom in the wantons lay;[1]
But to the touch were soft, and to the sight were gay.

IV

Then no rough sound of war's alarms,
Had taught the world the needless use of arms:
Monarchs were uncreated then,
Those arbitrary rulers over men;
Kings that made laws, first broke 'em, and the gods
By teaching us religion first, first set the world at odds:

Till then ambition was not known,
That poison to content, bane to repose;
Each swain was lord o'er his own will alone,
His innocence religion was, and laws.
Nor needed any troublesome defence
Against his neighbours' insolence.
Flocks, herds, and every necessary good
Which bounteous nature had designed for food,
Whose kind increase o'er-spread the meads and plains,
Was then a common sacrifice to all th'agreeing swains.[2]

V

Right and property were words since made,
When power taught mankind to invade:
When pride and avarice became a trade;
Carried on by discord, noise and wars,
For which they bartered wounds and scars;
And to enhance the merchandise, miscalled it, Fame,
And rapes, invasions, tyrannies,
Was gaining of a glorious name:
Styling their savage slaughters, victories;
Honour, the error and the cheat
Of the ill-natured busy great,
Nonsense, invented by the proud,
Fond idol of the slavish crowd,
Thou wert not known in those blest days
Thy poison was not mixed with our unbounded joys;
Then it was glory to pursue delight,
And that was lawful all, the pleasure did invite,
Then 'twas the amorous world enjoyed its reign;
And tyrant Honour strove t' usurp in vain.

VI

The flow'ry meads the rivers and the groves,
Were filled with little gay-winged loves:[3]
That ever smiled and danced and played,
And now the woods, and now the streams invade,
And where they came all things were gay and glad:
When in the myrtle groves the lovers sat
Oppressed with a too fervent heat;
A thousand Cupids fanned their wings aloft,
And through the boughs the yielded air would waft:[4]
Whose parting leaves discovered all below,
And every god his own soft power admired,
And smiled and fanned, and sometimes bent his bow;
Where e'er he saw a shepherd uninspired.
The nymphs were free, no nice, no coy disdain,
Denied their joys, or gave the lover pain;[5]
The yielding maid but kind resistance makes;
Trembling and blushing are not marks of shame,
But the effect of kindling flame:
Which from the sighing burning swain she takes,
While she with tears all soft, and downcast eyes,
Permits the charming conqueror to win the prize.

---

[1] wantons playful people (OED wanton sb B.2a).

[2] swains shepherds; also, country gallants (OED swain sb 4,5).

[3] gay-winged lovers Cupids.

[4] waft blow softly (OED waft *v*¹ 6c).

[5] nice affectedly modest (OED nice 5a).

VII

The lovers thus, thus uncontrolled did meet,
Thus all their joys and vows of love repeat:
Joys which were everlasting, ever new
And every vow inviolably true;
Not kept in fear of gods, no fond religious cause,
Nor in obedience to the duller laws.
Those fopperies of the gown were then not known,
Those vain, those politic curbs to keep man in;[1]
Who by a fond mistake created that a sin;
Which freeborn we, by right of nature claim our own?[2]
Who but the learned and dull moral fool
Could gravely have foreseen, man ought to live by rule?

VIII

Oh cursed Honour! thou who first didst damn,
A woman to the sin of shame;[3]
Honour! that rob'st us of our gust,
Honour! that hind'red mankind first,
At love's eternal spring to squench his amorous thirst.[4]
Honour! who first taught lovely eyes the art,
To wound, and not to cure the heart:
With love to invite, but to forbid with awe,
And to themselves prescribe a cruel law;
To veil 'em from the lookers on,
When they are sure the slave's undone,
And all the charmingst part of beauty hid;
Soft looks, consenting wishes, all denied.
It gathers up the flowing hair,
That loosely plaid with wanton air.[5]
The envious net, and stinted order hold,
The lovely curls of jet and shining gold,
No more neglected on the shoulders hurled:[6]
Now dressed to tempt, not gratify the world,
Thou miser Honour hord'st the sacred store,
And starv'st thy self to keep thy votaries poor.[7]

IX

Honour! that put'st our words that should be free
Into a set formality.
Thou base debaucher of the generous heart,
That teachest all our looks and actions art;
What love designed a sacred gift,
What nature made to be possessed,
Mistaken Honour, made a theft,
For glorious love should be confessed:
For when confined, all the poor lover gains,
Is broken sighs, pale looks, complaints, and pains.
Thou foe to pleasure, nature's worst disease,
Thou tyrant over mighty kings,
What mak'st thou here in shepherds' cottages;
Why troublest thou, the quiet shades and springs?
Be gone, and make thy famed resort
To princes' palaces;
Go deal and chaffer in the trading court,
That busy market for phantastic things;[8]
Be gone and interrupt the short retreat,
Of the illustrious and the great;
Go break the politician's sleep,
Disturb the gay ambitious fool,
That longs for scepters, crowns, and rule,
Which not his title, nor his wit can keep;
But let the humble honest swain go on,

---

[1] fopperies of the gown absurdities of the law (OED foppery 1b); politic curbs political restraints (OED curb sb I.2; politic A.2b).

[2] fond foolishly credulous (OED fond a 2).

[3] Honour reputation; here the meaning is closest to reputation for chastity (OED honour sb 1c, 3a).

[4] gust relish (OED gust sb^{2} 4); to squench to satisfy; but also to extinguish (OED squench v 3,1).

[5] plaid played (OED plaid); possibly a pun on "plait," a braided tress of hair (OED plait sb 2a).

[6] stinted appointed (OED stinted ppl.a 1).

[7] votaries devout worshippers (OED votary I.2).

[8] chaffer buy or sell (OED chaffer v 1a); phantastic fanciful or illusory (OED fantastic a A.1,.2; phantasm sb I.1b,II.4b).

In the blest paths of the first rate of man;[1]
That nearest were to gods allied,
And formed for love alone, disdained all other pride.

X

Be gone! and let the Golden Age again,
Assume its glorious reign;
Let the young wishing maid confess,
What all your arts would keep concealed:
The mystery will be revealed,
And she in vain denies, whilst we can guess,
She only shows the jilt to teach man how,
To turn the false artillery on the cunning foe.[2]
Thou empty vision hence, be gone,
And let the peaceful swain love on;
The swift paced hours of life soon steal away:
Stint not ye gods his short lived joy.
The spring decays, but when the winter's gone,
The trees and flowers anew come on.[3]
The sun may set, but when the night is fled,
And gloomy darkness does retire,
He rises from his wat'ry bed:
All glorious, gay, all dressed in amorous fire.
But Sylvia when your beauties fade,
When the fresh roses on your cheeks shall die,
Like flowers that wither in the shade,
Eternally they will forgotten lie,
And no kind spring their sweetness will supply.
When snow shall on those lovely tresses lie
And your fair eyes no more shall give us pain,
But shoot their pointless darts in vain.
What will your duller honour signify?
Go boast it then! and see what numerous store
Of lovers, will your ruined shrine adore.
Then let us Sylvia yet be wise,
And the gay hasty minutes prize:
The sun and spring receive but our short light,
Once set, a sleep brings an eternal night.
—1684

Song
"Love Armed"[4]

Love in fantastic triumph sat,
Whilst bleeding hearts around him flowed,
For whom fresh pains he did create,
And strange tyrannic power he showed;
From thy bright eyes he took his fire,
Which round about, in sport he hurled;
But 'twas from mine, he took desire,
Enough to undo the amorous world.

From me he took his sighs and tears,
From thee his pride and cruelty;
From me his languishments and fears,
And every killing dart from thee;
Thus thou and I, the god have armed,
And set him up a deity;
But my poor heart alone is harmed,
Whilst thine the victor is, and free.
—1684

On a Juniper Tree, Cut Down to Make Busks[5]

Whilst happy I triumphant stood,
The pride and glory of the wood;

---

[1] first rate original state.

[2] shows the jilt to play the role of the cheat or harlot (OED jilt v 1; jilt sb 1).

[3] come emended from "comes."

[4] first performed in 1677 as the opening song in Act I of Abdelazer; or, the Moor's Revenge.

[5] On a Juniper Tree…Busks A busk was a strip of wood or other rigid material passed down the front of a corset to stiffen and support it. Formerly and still applied to the whole corset (OED busk sb 1). The juniper tree is a hardy spreading low tree, having awl-shaped prickly leaves and bluish-black berries, with a pungent taste, yielding a volatile oil used in medicine. The seeds and wood of the juniper were formerly burnt as purifiers of the air, and the coal of juniper wood was fabled to have a wonderful power of remaining glowing (OED juniper 1a).

My aromatic boughs and fruit,
Did with all other trees dispute.
Had right by nature to excel,
In pleasing both the taste and smell:
But to the touch I must confess,
Bore an ungrateful sullenness.
My wealth, like bashful virgins, I
Yielded with some reluctancy;
For which my value should be more,
Not giving easily my store.
My verdant branches all the year
Did an eternal beauty wear;
Did ever young and gay appear.
Nor needed any tribute pay,
For bounties from the god of day:
Nor do I hold supremacy,
(In all the wood) o'er every tree.
But even those too of my own race,
That grow not in this happy place.
But that in which I glory most,
And do myself with reason boast,
Beneath my shade the other day,
Young Philocles and Cloris lay,
Upon my root she leaned her head,
And where I grew, he made their bed:
Whilst I the canopy more largely spread.
Their trembling limbs did gently press,
The kind supporting yielding grass:
Ne'er half so blest as now, to bear
A swain so young, a nymph so fair:
My grateful shade I kindly lent,
And every aiding bough I bent
So low, as sometimes had the bliss
To rob the shepherd of a kiss,
Whilst he in pleasures far above
The sense of that degree of love:
Permitted every stealth I made,
Unjealous of his rival shade.
I saw 'em kindle to desire,
Whilst with soft sighs they blew the fire:
Saw the approaches of their joy,
He growing more fierce, and she less coy,
Saw how they mingled melting rays,
Exchanging love a thousand ways.
Kind was the force on every side,
Her new desire she could not hide:
Nor would the shepherd be denied.
Impatient he waits no consent
But what she gave by languishment,
The blessed minute he pursued;
Whilst love, her fear, and shame subdued; [1]
And now transported in his arms,
Yields to the conqueror all her charms,
His panting breast, to hers now joined,
They feast on raptures unconfined;
Vast and luxuriant, such as prove
The immortality of love.
For who but a divinity,
Could mingle souls to that degree;
And melt 'em into ecstasy.
Now like the Phoenix, both expire, [2]
While from the ashes of their fire,
Sprung up a new, and soft desire.
Like charmers, thrice they did invoke,
The god, and thrice new vigour took.
Nor had thy mystery ended there,
But Cloris reassumed her fear,
And chid the swain, for having pressed,
What she alas would not resist:
Whilst he in whom love's sacred flame,
Before and after was the same,
Fondly implored she would forget
A fault, which he would yet repeat.
From active joys with shame they haste,
To a reflection on the past; [3]
A thousand times my covert bless,

---

[1] Whilst...subdued 1680; 1684 omits this line.

[2] Phoenix a mythical bird, fabled to be the only one of its kind, that lives five or six hundred years in the Arabian desert, after which it burns itself on a funeral pyre, only to emerge from its ashes to live through another cycle of years.

[3] shame 1680; "some" in the 1684 edition.

That did secure their happiness:
Their gratitude to every tree
They pay, but most to happy me;
The shepherdess my bark caressed,
Whilst he my root, love's pillow, kissed;
And did with sighs, their fate deplore,
Since I must shelter them no more;
And if before my joys were such,
In having heard, and seen too much,
My grief must be as great and high,
When all abandoned I shall be,
Doomed to a silent destiny.
No more the charming strife to hear,
The shepherd's vows, the virgin's fear:
No more a joyful looker on,
Whilst love's soft battle's lost and won.
With grief I bowed my murmuring head,
And all my crystal dew I shed.
Which did in Cloris pity move,
(Cloris whose soul is made of love;)
She cut me down, and did translate,
My being to a happier state.
No martyr for religion died
With half that unconsidering pride;
My top was on that altar laid,
Where love his softest offerings paid:
And was as fragrant incense burned,
My body into busks was turned:
Where I still guard the sacred store,
And of love's temple keep the door.
—1684

The Disappointment[1]

I

One day the amorous Lysander,
By an impatient passion swayed,
Surprised fair Cloris, that loved maid,
Who could defend herself no longer.
All things did with his love conspire;
That gilded planet of the day,
In his gay chariot drawn by fire,
Was now descending to the sea,
And left no light to guide the world,
But what from Cloris' brighter eyes was hurled.

II

In a lone thicket made for love,
Silent as yielding maid's consent,
She with a charming languishment,
Permits his force, yet gently strove;
Her hands his bosom softly meet,
But not to put him back designed,
Rather to draw 'em on inclined:
Whilst he lay trembling at her feet,
Resistance 'tis in vain to show;
She wants the power to say—Ah! What d' ye do?

III

Her bright eyes sweet, and yet severe,
Where love and shame confus'dly strive,
Fresh vigor to Lysander give;
And breathing faintly in his ear,
She cried—Cease, cease—your vain desire,
Or I'll call out—What would you do?
My dearer honour even to you
I cannot, must not give—retire,
Or take this life, whose chiefest part
I gave you with the conquest of my heart.

IV

But he as much unused to fear,
As he was capable of love,
The blessed minutes to improve,
Kisses her mouth, her neck, her hair;
Each touch her new desire alarms,
His burning trembling hand he pressed
Upon her swelling snowy breast,

---

[1] This poem is loosely based on the first part of de Cantenac's poem "Sur une Impuissance" (Recueil de diverses poesies choisies, Amsterdam, 1661), which was translated into English and included in Wit and Drollery. Jovial Poems (1682) as "The Lost Opportunity Recovered."

While she lay panting in his arms.
All her unguarded beauties lie
The spoils and trophies of the enemy.

V

And now without respect or fear,
He seeks the object of his vows,
(His love no modesty allows)
By swift degrees advancing—where
His daring hand that altar seized,
Where gods of love do sacrifice.
That awful throne, that paradise
Where rage is calmed, and anger pleased,
That fountain where delight still flows,
And gives the universal world repose.

VI

Her balmy lips encount'ring his,
Their bodies, as their souls, are joined;
Where both in transports unconfined
Extend themselves upon the moss.
Cloris half dead and breathless lay;
Her soft eyes cast a humid light,
Such as divides the day and night;
Or falling stars, whose fires decay:
And now no signs of life she shows,
But what in short-breathed sighs returns and goes.

VII

He saw how at her length she lay,
He saw her rising bosom bare;
Her loose thin robes, through which appear
A shape designed for love and play;
Abandoned by her pride and shame,
She does her softest joys dispense,
Off'ring her virgin-innocence
A victim to love's sacred flame;
While the o'er-ravished shepherd lies
Unable to perform the sacrifice.

VIII

Ready to taste a thousand joys,
The too transported hapless swain
Found the vast pleasure turned to pain;
Pleasure which too much love destroys:
The willing garments by he laid,
And heaven all opened to his view,
Mad to possess, himself he threw
On the defenceless lovely maid.
But Oh what envying god conspires
To snatch his power, yet leave him the desire!

IX

Nature's support, (without whose aid
She can no human being give)
Itself now wants the art to live;
Faintness its slack'ned nerves invade:
In vain th' enraged youth essayed
To call its fleeting vigor back,
No motion 'twill from motion take;
Excess of love his love betrayed:
In vain he toils, in vain commands;
The insensible fell weeping in his hand.

X

In this so amorous cruel strife,
Where love and fate were too severe,
The poor Lysander in despair
Renounced his reason with his life:
Now all the brisk and active fire
That should the nobler part inflame,
Served to increase his rage and shame,
And left no spark for new desire:
Not all her naked charms could move
Or calm that rage that had debauched his love.

XI

Cloris returning from the trance
Which love and soft desire had bred,

Her timorous hand she gently laid
(Or guided by design or chance)
Upon that fabulous Priapas,[1]
That potent God, as poets feign;
But never did young shepherdess,
Gath'ring of fern upon the plain,
More nimbly draw her fingers back,
Finding beneath the verdant leaves a snake:

XII

Then Cloris her fair hand withdrew,
Finding that god of her desires
Disarmed of all his awful fires,
And cold as flow'rs bathed in the morning-dew.
Who can the nymph's confusion guess?
The blood forsook the hinder place,
And strewed with blushes all her face,
Which both disdain and shame expressed:
And from Lysander's arms she fled,
Leaving him fainting on the gloomy bed.

XIII

Like lightning through the grove she hies,
Or Daphne from the Delphic god,[2]
No print upon the grassy road
She leaves, t' instruct pursuing eyes.
The wind that wantoned in her hair,
And with her ruffled garments played,
Discovered in the flying maid
All that the gods e'er made, if fair.
So Venus, when her love was slain,[3]
With fear and haste flew o'er the fatal plain.

XIV

The nymph's resentments none but I
Can well imagine or condole:
But none can guess Lysander's soul,
But those who swayed his destiny.
His silent griefs swell up to storms,
And not one god his fury spares;
He cursed his birth, his fate, his stars;
But more the shepherdess's charms,
Whose soft bewitching influence
Had damned him to the hell of impotence.
—1684

On the Death of the late Earl of Rochester[4]

Mourn, mourn, ye Muses, all your loss deplore,[5]
The young, the noble Strephon is no more.
Yes, yes, he fled quick as departing light,
And ne'er shall rise from death's eternal night,
So rich a prize the Stygian gods ne'er bore,[6]
Such wit, such beauty, never graced their shore.
He was but lent this duller world t'improve
In all the charms of poetry, and love;
Both were his gift, which freely he bestowed,
And like a god, dealt to the wond'ring crowd.
Scorning the little vanity of fame,
'Spite of himself attained a glorious name.
But oh! in vain was all his peevish pride,
The sun as soon might his vast lustre hide,
As piercing, pointed, and more lasting bright,
As suffering no vicissitudes of night.
Mourn, mourn, ye Muses, all your loss deplore,
The young, the noble Strephon is no more.

---

[1] Priapus the Greek and Roman god of procreation; hence also of gardens and vineyards; also a representation of the male generative organ—a phallus (OED priapus 1,3a).

[2] Daphne from the Delphic god Daphne, fleeing the sexual advances of Apollo, was turned into a laurel tree in response to her prayer for assistance.

[3] Venus, when her love was slain Adonis was slain by a boar while hunting.

[4] Earl of Rochester John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester (1647–1680); see the headnote to his work.

[5] Muses The nine Muses are the Greek deities who preside over various fields of creative activity.

[6] Stygian gods gods of the underworld (the river Styx was one of the rivers of the underworld).

Now uninspired upon your banks we lie,
Unless when we would mourn his elegy;
His name's a genius that would wit dispense,
And give the theme a soul, the words a sense.
But all fine thought that ravished when it spoke,
With the soft youth eternal leave has took;
Uncommon wit that did the soul o'ercome,
Is buried all in Strephon's worshipped tomb;
Satire has lost its art, its sting is gone,
The fop and cully now may be undone; [1]
That dear instructing rage is now allayed,
And no sharp pen dares tell 'em how they've strayed;
Bold as a god was every lash he took,
But kind and gentle the chastising stroke.
Mourn, mourn, ye youths, whom fortune has betrayed,
The last reproacher of your vice is dead.

Mourn, all ye beauties, put your cyprus on, [2]
The truest swain that e'er adored you's gone;
Think how he loved, and writ, and sighed, and spoke,
Recall his mien, his fashion, and his look. [3]
By what dear arts the soul he did surprise,
Soft as his voice, and charming as his eyes.
Bring garlands all of never-dying flowers,
Bedewed with everlasting falling showers;
Fix your fair eyes upon your victimed slave,
Sent gay and young to his untimely grave.
See where the noble swain extended lies,
Too sad a triumph of your victories;
Adorned with all the graces heaven e'er lent,
All that was great, soft, lovely, excellent
You've laid into his early monument.
Mourn, mourn, ye beauties, your sad loss deplore,
The young, the charming Strephon is no more.

Mourn, all ye little gods of love, whose darts
Have lost their wonted power of piercing hearts;
Lay by the gilded quiver and the bow,
The useless toys can do no mischief now,
Those eyes that all your arrows points inspired,
Those lights that gave ye fire are now retired,
Cold as his tomb, pale as your mother's doves; [4]
Bewail him then oh all ye little loves,
For you the humblest votary have lost [5]
That ever your divinities could boast;
Upon your hands your weeping heads decline,
And let your wings encompass round his shrine;
In stead of flowers your broken arrows strow,
And at his feet lay the neglected bow.
Mourn, all ye little gods, your loss deplore
The soft, the charming Strephon is no more.

Large was his fame, but short his glorious race,
Like young Lucretius and died apace. [6]
So early roses fade, so over all
They cast their fragrant scents, then softly fall,
While all the scattered perfumed leaves declare,
How lovely 'twas when whole, how sweet, how fair.
Had he been to the Roman empire known,

---

[1] fop a conceited person, a pretender to wit, wisdom or accomplishments (OED fop sb 2); cully a simpleton (OED cully sb slang or colloq. 1).

[2] cyprus a light, transparent material (originally transported from or through Cyprus) resembling cobweb lawn or crape much used for habiliments of mourning (OED cypress^3 Obs. 1c).

[3] mien the air, bearing, carriage or manner of a person, as expressive of character or mood (OED mien sb^{1} a).

[4] mother's doves The chariot of Venus is traditionally represented as drawn by doves.

[5] votary a devoted admirer (OED votary sb II.5).

[6] Lucretius poet and philosopher (ca. 94–55 B.C.E.). In De Rerum Natura Lucretius expounded Epicureanism to counter fears about the intervention of gods in this life and the punishment of the soul in the next. St. Jerome alleged that Lucretius was poisoned by a love-philtre, wrote the poem during lucid intervals, and eventually committed suicide. Thomas Creech, a close friend of Aphra Behn to whom she dedicated two poems, produced the first English translation of all six books of De Rerum Natura in 1682.

When great Augustus filled the peaceful throne;[1]
Had he the noble wond'rous poet seen,
And known his genius, and surveyed his mien,
(When wits, and heroes graced divine abodes,)
He had increased the number of their gods;
The royal judge had temples reared to's name,
And made him as immortal as his fame;
In love and verse his Ovid he 'ad outdone,[2]
And all his laurels, and his Julia won.[3]
Mourn, mourn, unhappy world, his loss deplore,
The great, the charming Strephon is no more.

—1685

A Pindaric on the Death of our Late Sovereign: With an Ancient Prophecy on His Present Majesty[4]

I

Sad was the morn', the sadder week began,
And heavily the god of day came on:
From ominous dreams my wondering soul looked out,
And saw a dire confusion round about.
My bed like some sad monument appeared,
Round which the mournful statues wring their hands and weep;
Distracted objects all! with mighty grief, prepared
To rouse me from my painful sleep.
Not the sad bards that wailed Jerusalem's woes,
(With wild neglect throughout the peopled street,
With a prophetic rage affrighting all they meet)[5]
Had mightier pangs of sorrow, mightier throes;
Ah! wretch, undone they cry! awake forlorn,
The king! the king is dead! rise! rise and mourn.

II

Again I bid 'em tell their sorrow's theme,
Again they cry, The king! the king is dead!
Extended, cold and pale, upon the royal bed;
Again I heard, and yet I thought it dream.
Impossible! (I raving cry)
That such a monarch! such a god should die!
And no dire warning to the world be given:
No hurricanes on earth! no blazing fires in heaven!
The sun and tide their constant courses keep:
That cheers the world with its life-giving reign,
This hastes with equal motion to the deep;
And in its usual turns revives the banks again,
And in its soft and easy way,
Brings up no storms or monsters from the sea,
No showers of blood, no temple's vale is rent,
But all is calm, and all is innocent.
When nature in convulsions should be hurled,
And fate should shake the fabric of the world;
Impossible! Impossible I cry!
So great a king! so much a god! so silently should die![6]

---

[1] Augustus C. Octavius (63 B.C.E.–14 C.E.), ruler of Rome and the Roman Empire for over forty years. Virgil, Horace and Ovid were amongst the poets of his reign.

[2] Ovid Publius Ovidius Naso, poet (43 B.C.E.–17 C.E.), was best known in the Restoration for his love poems (Amores) and his poems on seduction and intrigue (Ars Amatoria), although references to his epic poem Metamorphoses were many. The leading poet in Rome by 8 C.E., he was suddenly banished by Augustus for some indiscretion, the specific nature of which is not known.

[3] Julia Julia (39 B.C.E.–14 C.E.), the only daughter of Augustus and Scribonia, was exiled by her father for committing adultery during her third marriage to Tiberius. Macrobius gives an account of her gentle disposition, learning and wit. It was commonly believed that Julia was the model for Corinna, to whom Ovid addressed love poems.

[4] Charles II died February 6, 1685. Despite various attempts to enact the Exclusion Bill (to prevent his brother James's succession), James II succeeded him.

[5] Not the sad bards…all they meet Behn refers to the Old Testament prophets who were called to "proclaim the word" of the Lord. Such proclamations were conventionally oracles of divine destruction and punishment, but a promise of salvation typically followed judgment.

[6] Impossible! (I raving cry)…silently should die (ll. 19–34) It was generally believed that the death of a monarch would be marked by some sign in the natural world (e.g. eclipse, comet), just as Christ's death was marked by an earthquake and the tearing of the veil in the temple (Matthew 27:50–51).

III

True I divined! when lo a voice arrived,
Welcome as that which did the crowd surprise,
When the dead Lazarus from the tomb revived,
And saw a pitying god attend his rise![1]
Our Sovereign lives! it cried! rise and adore!
Our Sovereign lives! Heaven adds one wonder more,
To the miraculous history of his num'rous store:
Sudden as thought, or winged light'ning flies,
This chased the gloomy terrors from our eyes,
And all from sorrows, fall to sacrifice.
Whole hecatombs of vows the altars crown,[2]
To clear our sins that brought this vengeance down;
So the Great Saviour of the world did fall,
A bleeding victim to atone for all!
Nor were the blest apostles more revived,
When in the resurrection they beheld
Their faith established, and their Lord survived,
And all the holy prophecies fulfilled.
Their mighty love, by mighty joy they showed!
And if from feebler faith before,
They did the deity, and man adore:
What must they pay, when He confirmed the God?
Who having finished all His wonders here,
And full instructions given,
To make his bright divinity more clear;
Transfigured all to glory, mounts to heaven!

IV

So fell our earthly god! so loved, so mourned,
So like a god again returned.[3]
For of his message, yet a part was unperformed,
But oh! our prayers and vows were made too late,
The sacred dictates were already past;
And open laid the mighty book of fate,
Where the great MONARCH read his life's short date;
And for eternity prepared in haste.
He saw in th' everlasting chains
Of long past time and numerous things,
The fates, vicissitudes, and pains,
Of mighty monarchies, and mighty kings;
And blest his stars that in an age so vain,
Where zealous mischiefs, frauds, rebellions, reign:
Like Moses, he had led the murm'ring crowd,
Beneath the peaceful rule of his almighty wand;
Pulled down the golden calf to which they bowed,
And left 'em safe, entering the promised land;
And to good JOSHUA, now resigns his sway,
JOSHUA, by heaven and nature pointed out to lead the way.[4]

V

Full of wisdom and the power of God,
The royal PROPHET now before him stood:

---

[1] When the dead Lazarus…attend his rise John 11:1–44.

[2] hecatombs a sacrifice of many victims; a great number of persons, animals or things, presented as an offering, or devoted to destruction; loosely, a large number or quantity (OED hecatomb sb 2).

[3] So like…again returned After his stroke of February 2, 1685, Charles II appeared to have a temporary remission of his illness and hopes of his recovery were made public.

[4] Like Moses…lead the way (ll. 75–80) Behn figures Charles II and James, Duke of York, as antitypes of Moses and Joshua respectively. Moses rescued the Israelites from captivity in Egypt and led them through the wilderness for forty years despite their murmuring. When Moses climbed Mount Sinai to receive the Ten Commandments, the Israelites fell into idolatry, worshiping a golden calf. Angered, Moses smashed the tablets of the Law, and was prevented from entering the Promised Land of Canaan as a result (Exodus 2–32). Behn omits the sin and punishment of Moses in her allusion. After advising Moses on the laws of inheritance (Numbers 27:11), God instructed him to lay hands on Joshua as a sign that he was his heir apparent (Numbers 27:18–23). Joshua was also called directly by God to lead the Israelites into the Promised Land (Joshua 1:1–2).

On whom his hands the dying MONARCH laid,
And wept with tender joy, and blest and said:
To thee, kind aid in all my fates and powers,
Dear partner of my sad and softest hours,
Thy parting king and brother recommends
His frighted nations, and his mourning friends,
Take to thy pious care, my faithful flock.
And though the shelt'ring cedar fade,
Regard said he, regard my tender stock:
The noble stems may shoot and grow
To grace the spacious plains, and bow
Their spreading branches round thee a defensive shade.
The royal SUCCESSOR to all he hears
With sighs assented, and confirming tears.
Much more he spoke! much more he had expressed,
But that the charming accents of his tongue
Flew upwards, to compose a heav'nly song,
And left his speaking eyes to bless and tell the rest,
His eyes so much adored! whose less'ning light
Like setting suns that hasten on the night;
(Lending their glories to another sphere)
Those sacred lights are fading here,
Whilst every beam above informs a star,

VI

Which shall a nobler business know,
And influence his best loved friends below.
But oh!
No human thought can paint the grief and love,
With which the parting heroes strove.
Sad was the scene, soft looks the voice supplies,
Anguish their hearts, and languishment their eyes;
Not god-like Jonathan with greater pain,
Sighed his last farewell to the royal swain; [1]
While awful silence filled the gloomy place,
And death and midnight hung on every face.
And now the fatal hour came on,
And all the blessed powers above,
In haste to make him ALL their own,
Around the royal bed in shining order move.
Once more he longs to see the breaking day,
The last his mortal eyes shall e'er behold,
And oft he asked if no kind ray,
Its near approach foretold.
And when he found 'twas dawning in,
(With the cold tide of death that flowed all o'er)
Draw, draw, said he, this cloud that hangs between,
And let me take my last adieu;
Oh let me take my last—last view,
For I shall never, never see it more.
And now—
Officious angels catch his dying sighs,
And bear 'em up in triumph to the skies,
Each forms a soul! of the divinest dress!
For new-born kings and heroes to possess.
The last, that from the sacred fabric flew,
Made CHARLES a god! and JAMES a monarch too.
—1685

To the fair Clarinda, who made Love to me, imagined more than Woman

Fair lovely maid, or if that title be
Too weak, too feminine for nobler thee,
Permit a name that more approaches truth:
And let me call thee, lovely charming youth.
This last will justify my soft complaint,
While that may serve to lessen my constraint;
And without blushes I the youth pursue,
When so much beauteous woman is in view,
Against thy charms we struggle but in vain
With thy deluding form thou giv'st us pain,
While the bright nymph betrays us to the swain.

---

[1] God-like Jonathan…royal swain Jonathan, the eldest son of King Saul, made a covenant of friendship with David, who was to be the next Israelite king (I Samuel 18), and risked his own life to defend David against the anger of his father (I Samuel 20).

In pity to our sex sure thou wert sent,
That we might love, and yet be innocent:
For sure no crime with thee we can commit;
Or if we should—thy form excuses it.
For who, that gathers fairest flowers believes
A snake lies hid beneath the fragrant leaves.

Thou beauteous wonder of a different kind,
Soft Cloris with the dear Alexis joined;
When e'er the manly part of thee, would plead
Thou tempts us with the image of the maid,
While we the noblest passions do extend
The love to Hermes, Aphrodite the friend.[1]
—1688

Love Letters by Mrs A. Behn[2]

LETTER I

You bid me write, and I wish it were only the effects of complaisance that makes me obey you; I should be very angry with myself, and you, if I thought it were any other motive: I hope it is not, and will not have you believe otherwise. I cannot help however wishing you no mirth, nor any content in your dancing-design; and this unwonted malice in me I do not like, and would have concealed it if I could, lest you should take it for something which I am nor will believe myself guilty of. May your women be all ugly, ill-natured, ill-dressed, ill-fashioned, and unconversable; and, for your greater disappointment, may every moment of your time there be taken up with thoughts of me, (a sufficient curse); and yet you will be better entertained than me, who possibly am, and shall be, uneasy with thoughts not so good. Perhaps you had eased me of some trouble, if you had let me seen, or known you had been well: but these are favours for better friends; and I'll endeavour not to resent the loss, or rather the miss of 'em. It may be, since I have so easily granted this desire of yours, in writing to you, you will fear you have pulled a trouble on—but do not: I do by this send for you.—You know what you gave your hand upon; the date of banishment is already out, and I could have wished you had been so good-natured as to have disobeyed me. Pray take notice therefore I am better natured than you: I am profoundly melancholy since I saw you; I know not why, and should be glad to see you when your occasions will permit you to visit.

Astrea

LETTER II

You may tell me a thousand years, my dear Lycidas, of your unbounded friendship; but after so unkind a departure as that last night, give me leave (when serious) to doubt it; nay, 'tis past doubt: I know you rather hate me; what else could hurry you from me, when you saw me surrounded with all the necessary impossibilities of speaking to you? I made as broad signs as one could do, who durst not speak, both for your sake and my own; I acted even imprudently to make my soul be understood, that was then (if I may say so) in real agonies for your departure. 'Tis a wonder a woman, so violent in all her passions as I, did not (forgetting all prudence, all considerations) fly out into absolute commands, or at least entreaties, that you would give me a moment's time longer. I burst to speak with you, to know a thousand things; but particularly how you came to be so barbarous, as to carry away all that could make my satisfaction: You carried away my letter, and you carried away Lycidas; I will not call him mine, because he has so unkindly taken himself back. 'Twas with that design you came; for I saw all night with what reluctancy you spoke, how coldly you entertained me, and with what pain and uneasiness you gave me the only conversation I value in the world. I am ashamed to tell you this: I know your peevish virtue will misinterpret me: But take it how you will, think of it as you please; I am undone, and will be free; I will tell you, you did not use me well: I am ruined, and will rail at you—Come then, I conjure you, this evening, that after it I may shut those eyes that have been too long waking. I have committed a thousand madnesses in this; but you must pardon the faults you have created. Come and do so; for I must see you tonight, and that in a better humour than you were last night. No more; obey me as you have that friendship for me you profess; and assure yourself, to find a very welcome reception from,

---

[1] Hermes, Aphrodite Hermaphroditus, a bisexual divinity, was the offspring of Hermes (messenger of the gods) and Aphrodite (goddess of love, beauty and fertility).

[2] first published posthumously in The Histories and Novels of the Late Ingenious Mrs. Behn: In One Volume (London, 1696). The present text is taken from Histories and Novels (1700). Behn's biographers have suggested that these letters may have been addressed to John Hoyle, a (bi-sexual) lawyer. A contemporary, Roger Morris, wrote that Hoyle had "kept" Behn as his mistress. Others, however, consider these expressions of desire not to be autobiographical, reading them as eloquent fictional expressions of a tragic, frustrating passion.

Lycidas,
Your Astrea

LETTER III

When shall we understand one another? for I thought, dear Lycidas, you had been a man of your parole:[1] I will as soon believe you will forget me, as that you have not remembered the promise you made me. Confess you are the teasingest creature in the world, rather than suffer me to think you neglect me, or would put a slight upon me, that have chosen you from all the whole creation, to give my entire esteem to. This I had assured you yesterday, but that I dreaded the effects of your censure today; and though I scorn to guard my tongue, as hoping 'twill never offend willingly, yet I can, with much ado, hold it, when I have a great mind to say a thousand things, I know will be taken in an ill sense. Possibly you will wonder what compels me to write, what moves me to send where I find so little welcome; nay, where I meet with such returns, it may be I wonder too. You say I am changed: I had rather almost justify an ill, than repent, maintain false arguments, than yield I am in the wrong. In fine, charming friend Lycidas, whatever I was since you knew me, believe I am still the same in soul and thought; but that is, what shall never hurt you, what shall never be but to serve you; why then did you say, you would not sit near me? Was that, my friend, was that the esteem you profess? Who grows cold first? Who is changed? and who the aggressor? 'Tis I was first in friendship, and shall be last in constancy: You, by inclination, and not for want of friends, have I placed highest in my esteem; and for that reason your conversation is the most acceptable and agreeable of any in the world—and for this reason you shun mine. Take your course; be a friend like a foe, and continue to impose upon me, that you esteem me when you sly me: Renounce your false friendship, or let me see you give it entire to Astrea

LETTER IV

I had rather, dear Lycidas, set myself to write to any man on earth than you, for I fear your severe prudence and discretion, so nice, may make an ill judgment of what I say: Yet you bid me not dissemble; and you need not have cautioned me, who so naturally hate those little arts of my sex, that I often run on freedoms, that may well enough bear a censure from people so scrupulous as Lycidas. Nor dare I follow all my inclinations neither, nor tell all the little secrets of my soul: Why I write them, I can give no account; 'tis but fooling myself, perhaps, into an undoing. I do not (by this soft entertainment) rook in my heart, like a young gamester, to make it venture its last stake:[1] This, I say may be the danger; I may come off unhurt, but cannot be a winner: Why then should I throw an uncertain cast, where I hazard all, and you nothing?[2] Your staunch prudence is proof against love, and all the bank's on my side: You are so unreasonable, you would have me pay where I have contracted no debt; you would have me give, and you, like a miser, would distribute nothing. Greedy Lycidas! Unconscionable! and ungenerous! You would not be in love for all the world, yet wish I were so, Uncharitable!—Would my fever cure you? Or a curse on me make you blessed? Say Lycidas, will it? I have heard, when two souls kindly meet, 'tis a vast pleasure, as vast as the curse must be, when kindness is not equal; and why should you believe that necessary for me, that will be so very incommode for you?[3] Will you, dear Lycidas, allow then, that you have less good-nature than I? Pray be just, till you can give such proofs of the contrary, as I shall be judge of; or give me a reason for your ill-nature. So much for loving.

---

[1] man of your parole man of your word.

Now, as you are my friend, I conjure you to consider what resolution I took up, when I saw you last (which methinks is a long time), of seeing no man till I saw your face again; and when you remember that, you will possibly be so kind as to make what haste you can to see me again: Till then, have thoughts as much in favour of me as you can; for when you know me better, you will believe I merit all. May you be impatient and uneasy till you see me again; and bating that, may all the blessings of heaven and earth light on you, is the continued prayers of,

Dear Lycidas,
Your true Astrea

LETTER V

Though it be very late, I cannot go to bed; but I must tell thee, I have been very good ever since I saw thee, and have been a writing, and perhaps you had eased me of some trouble, if you had let me see, or know you had been well:[4] have seen no face of man, or other body, save my own people. I am mightily pleased with your kindness to me tonight; and 'twas, I hope, and believe, very innocent, and undisturbing on both sides. My Lycidas says, he can be soft and dear when he please to put off his haughty pride, which is only assumed to see how far I dare love him ununited. Since then my soul's delight you are, and may ever be assured I am, and ever will be yours, befall me what will and that all the devils of hell shall not prevail against thee: Show then, I say, my dearest love, thy native sweet temper: Show me all the love thou hast undissembled then, and never till then, shall I believe you love; and deserve my heart, for God's sake, to keep me well: and if thou hast love (as I shall never doubt, if thou art always as tonight) show that love, I beseech thee; there being nothing so grateful to God, and mankind, as plain-dealing. 'Tis too late to conjure thee farther:[5] I will be purchased with softness, and dear words, and kind expressions, sweet eyes, and a low voice.

Farewell; I love thee dearly, passionately, and tenderly, and am resolved to be eternally.

My only dear delight, and
Joy of my life, thy Astrea

LETTER VI

Since you, my dearest Lycidas, have prescribed me laws and rules, how I shall behave myself to please and gain you; and that one of these is not lying or dissembling; and that I had tonight promised you should never have a tedious letter from me more, I will begin to keep my word, and stint my heart and hand. I promised though to write; and though I have no great matter to say more, than the assurance of my eternal love to you, yet to obey you, and not only so, but to oblige my own impatient heart, I must, late as 'tis say something to thee.

---

[1] rook in my heart, like a young gamester cheat my heart, as if it were an inexperienced gambler (OED rook $v^1$1).

[2] an uncertain cast a throw of dice.

[3] incommode inconvenient.

[4] if you had let me see, or know you had been well emended from "seen" and "known."

[5] conjure beseech, implore (OED conjure v II.4a).

I stayed after thee tonight, till I had read a whole act of my new play too; and then he led me over all the way, saying, Gad you were the man: And beginning some rallying love-discourse after supper, which he fancied was not so well received as it ought, he said you were not handsome, and called Philly to own it; but he did not, but was of my side, and said you were handsome: So he went on a while, and all ended that concerned you. And this, upon my word, is all.

Your articles I have read over, and do not like 'em; you have broke one, even before you have sworn or sealed 'em; that is, they are writ with reserves. I must have a better account of your heart tomorrow, when you come. I grow desperate fond of you, and would fain be used well; if not, I will march off: But I will believe you mean to keep your word, as I will forever do mine. Pray make haste to see me tomorrow; and if I am not at home when you come, send for me over the way, where I have engaged to dine, there being an entertainment on purpose tomorrow for me.

For God's sake make no more niceties and scruples than need, in your way of living with me; that is, do not make me believe this distance is to ease you, when indeed 'tis meant to ease us both of love; and for God's sake, do not misinterpret my excess of fondness; and if I forget myself, let the check you give be sufficient to make me desist. Believe me, dear creature, 'tis more out of humour and jest, than any inclination on my side; for I could sit eternally with you, without part of disturbance: Fear me not, for you are (from that) as safe as in heaven itself. Believe me, dear Lycidas, this truth, and trust me. 'Tis late, farewell; and come, for God's sake, betimes tomorrow, and put off your foolish fear and niceties, and do not shame me with your perpetual ill opinion; my nature is proud and insolent, and cannot bear it: I will be used something better, in spite of all your apprehensions falsely grounded. Adieu, keep me as I am ever yours. Astrea.

By this letter, one would think I were the nicest thing on earth;[1] yet I know a dear friend goes far beyond me in that unnecessary fault.

LETTER VII

My charming unkind,

I would have gaged my life you could not have left me so coldly, so unconcerned as you did; but you are resolved to give me proofs of your no love: Your counsel, which was given you tonight, has wrought the effects which it usually does in hearts like yours. Tell me no more you love me; for 'twill be hard to make me think it, though it be the only blessing I ask on earth: But if love can merit a heart, I know who ought to claim yours. My soul is ready to burst with pride and indignation; and at the same time, love, with all his softness assails me, and will make me write: so that, between one and the other, I can express neither as I ought. What shall I do to make you know I do not use to condescend to so much submission, nor to tell my heart so freely? Though you think it use, methinks, I find my heart swell with disdain at this minute, for my being ready to make asseverations of the contrary, and to assure you I do not, nor never did, love, or talk at the rate I do to you, since I was born: I say, I would swear this, but something rolls up my bosom, and checks my very thoughts as it rises. You ought, oh faithless, and infinitely adorable Lycidas! to know and guess my tenderness; you ought to see it grow, and daily increase upon your hands: If it be troublesome, 'tis because I fancy you lessen, whilst I increase, in passion; or rather, that by your ill judgment of mine, you never had any in your soul for me. Oh unlucky, oh vexatious thought! Either let me never see that charming face, or ease my soul of so tormenting an agony, as the cruel thought of not being beloved. Why, my lovely dear, should I flatter you? or, why make more words of my tenderness, than another woman, that loves as well, would do, as once you said? No, you ought rather to believe that I say more, because I love more than any woman can be capable of: My soul is formed of no other material than love; and all that soul of love was formed for my dear, faithless Lycidas—methinks I have a fancy, that something will prevent my going tomorrow morning: However, I conjure thee, if possible, to come tomorrow about seven or eight at night, that I may tell you in what a deplorable condition you left me tonight. I cannot describe it; but I feel it, and with you the same pain, for going so inhumanely: But, oh! you went to joys, and left me to torments! You went to love alone, and left me love and rage, fevers and calentures, even madness itself![1] Indeed, indeed, my soul! I know not to what degree I love you; let it suffice I do most passionately, and can have no thoughts of any other man, whilst I have life. No! Reproach me, defame me, lampoon me, curse me, and kill me, when I do, and let heaven do so too.

---

[1] the nicest thing on earth probably in the sense of "delicate, needing tactful handling" (OED nice a 11b).

Farewell—I love you more and more every moment of my life—know it, and goodnight. Come tomorrow, being Wednesday, to, my adorable Lycidas, your Astrea

LETTER VIII

Why, my dearest charmer, do you disturb that repose I had resolved to pursue, by taking it unkindly that I did not write? I cannot disobey you, because indeed I would not, though 'twere better much for both I had been forever silent: I prophesy so, but at the same time cannot help my fate, and know not what force or credit there is in the virtue we both profess; but I am sure 'tis not good to tempt it: I think I am sure, and I think my Lycidas just; But, oh! to what purpose is all this fooling? You have often wisely considered it; but I never stayed to think till 'twas too late; whatever resolutions I make in the absence of my lovely friend, one single sight turns me all woman, and all his. Take notice then, my Lycidas, I will henceforth never be wise more; never make any vows against my inclinations, or the little-winged deity. I do not only see 'tis all in vain, but I really believe they serve only to augment my passion. I own I have neither the coldness of Lycidas, nor the prudence; I cannot either not love, or have a thousand arts of hiding it; I have nobody to fear, and therefore may have somebody to love: But if you are destined to be he, the Lord have mercy on me; for I am sure you'll have none. I expect a reprimand for this plain confession; but I must justify it, and I will, because I cannot help it: I was born to ill luck; and this loss of my heart is, possibly, not the least part on't.[2] Do not let me see you disapprove it, I may one day grow ashamed on't, and reclaim, but never, whilst you blow the flame, though perhaps against your will. I expect now a very wise answer; and, I believe, with abundance of discretion, you will caution me to avoid this danger that threatens. Do so, if you have a mind to make me launch farther into the main sea of love: Rather deal with me as with a right woman; make me believe myself infinitely beloved. I may chance, from the natural inconstancy of my sex, to be as false as you would wish, and leave you in quiet: For as I am satisfied I love in vain, and without return, I am satisfied that nothing, but the thing that hates me, could treat me as Lycidas does; and 'tis only the vanity of being beloved by me can make you countenance a softness so displeasing to you. How could anything, but the man that hates me, entertain me so unkindly? Witness your excellent opinion of me, of loving others; witness your passing by the end of the street where I live, and squandering away your time at any coffee-house, rather than allow me what you know in your soul is the greatest blessing of my life, your dear dull melancholy company; I call it dull, because you can never be gay or merry where Astrea is. How could this indifference possess you, when your malicious soul knew I was languishing for you? I died, I fainted and pined for an hour of what you lavished out, unregardless of me, and without so much as thinking on me! What can you say, that judgment may not pass? that you may not be condemned for the worst-natured, incorrigible thing in the world? Yield, and at least say, my honest friend Astrea, I neither do love thee, nor can, nor ever will; at least let me say, you were generous, and told me plain blunt truth: I know it; nay worse, you impudently (but truly) told me your business would permit you to come every night, but your inclinations would not: At least this was honest, but very unkind, and not over civil. Do not you, my amiable Lycidas, know I would purchase your sight at any rate; why this neglect then? Why keeping distance? But as much as to say, "Astrea, truly you will make me love you, you will make me fond of you, you will please and delight me with your conversation, and I am a fellow that do not desire to be pleased, therefore be not so civil to me; for I do not desire civil company, nor company that diverts me." A pretty speech this; and yet if I do obey, desist being civil, and behave myself very rudely, as I have done, you say, this two or three days—then, Oh, Astrea! where is your profession? Where your love so boasted? Your good-nature, etc? Why truly, my dear Lycidas, where it was, and ever will be, so long as you have invincible charms, and show your eyes, and look so dearly; though you may, by your prudent counsel, and your wise conduct of absence, and marching by my door without calling in, oblige me to stay my hand, and hold my tongue: I can conceal my kindness, though not dissemble one: I can make you think I am wise, if I list; but when I tell you I have friendship, love and esteem for you, you may pawn your soul upon't: Believe 'tis true, and satisfy yourself you have, my dear Lycidas, in your Astrea all she professes. I should be glad to see you as soon as possible (you say Thursday) you can: I beg you will, and shall, with impatience, expect you betimes. Fail me not, as you would have me think you have any value for Astrea

---

[1] calentures delirium, burning passion (OED calenture 1,2).

[2] possibly emended from "possible"; the latter was used adverbially, but as an intensifer of "can" or "could."

I beg you will not fail to let me hear from you, today, being Wednesday, and see you at night if you can.

—1700

The Dumb Virgin: Or, The Force of Imagination

Rinaldo, a senator of the great city, Venice, by a plentiful inheritance, and industrious acquisitions, was become master of a very plentiful estate; which, by the countenance of his family, sprung from the best houses in Italy, had rendered him extremely popular and honoured; he had risen to the greatest dignities of that state, all which offices he discharged with wisdom and conduct, befitting the importance of his charge, and character of the manager; but this great person had some accidents in his children, sufficient to damp all the pleasure of his more smiling fortunes; he married when young, a beautiful and virtuous lady, who had rendered him the happy father of a son; but his joys were soon disturbed by the following occasion.

There stands an island in the Adriatic Sea, about twenty leagues from Venice, a place wonderfully pleasant in the summer, where art and nature seem to outrival each other, or seem rather to combine in rendering it the most pleasant of their products, being placed under the most benign climate in the world, and situated exactly between Italy and Greece, it appears an entire epitome of all the pleasures in them both; the proper glories of the island were not a little augmented by the confluence of gentlemen and ladies of the chiefest rank in the city, insomuch that this was a greater mart for beauty and gallantry, than Venice for trade. Among others, Rinaldo's lady begged her husband's permission to view this so much celebrated place.

He was unwilling to trust his treasure to the treachery of the watery element; but repeating her request, he yielded to her desires, his love not permitting him the least show of command, and so through its extent, conspiring its own destruction. His lady with her young son, (whom she would not trust from her sight) and a splendid attendance in a barge well fitted, sets out for the island. Rinaldo being detained at home himself about some important affairs relating to the public, committed the care of his dear wife and child to a faithful servant called Gaspar; and for their greater security against pirates, had obtained his brother, who commanded a Venetian galley, to attend them as convoy: in the evening they set out from Venice, with a prosperous gale, but a storm arising in the night, soon separated the barge from her convoy, and before morning drove her beyond the designed port, when instead of discovering the wished for island, they could see a Turkish pirate bearing towards them, with all her sail; their late apprehensions of shipwreck, were drowned in a greater danger of captivity and lasting slavery, their fears drove some into resolutions as extravagant as the terrors that caused them, but the confusion of all was so tumultuous, and the designs so various, that nothing could be put in execution for the public safety; the greatest share of the passengers being ladies, added strangely to the consternation; beauty always adds a pomp to woe, and by its splendid show, makes sorrow look greater and more moving. Some by their piteous plaints and wailings proclaimed their griefs aloud, whilst others bespoke their sorrows more emphatically by sitting mournfully silent; the fears of some animated them to extravagant actions, whilst the terrors of others were so mortifying, that they showed no sign of life, but by their trembling; some mourned the rigour of their proper fate, others conscious of the sorrows of their friends and relations should sustain through their loss, made the griefs of them their own; but the heaviest load of misfortunes lay on Rinaldo's lady, besides the loss of her liberty, the danger of her honour, the separation from her dear husband, the care for her tender infant wrought rueful distractions; she caught her child in her arms, and with tears extorted through fear and affection, she deplored the misfortune of her babe, the pretty innocent smiling in the embraces of its mother, showed that innocence could deride the persecution of fortune; at length she delivered the infant into the hands of Gaspar, begging him to use all endeavours in its preservation, by owning it for his, when they fell into the hands of the enemy.

But Gaspar, who amidst the universal consternation had a peculiar regard to his own safety, and master's interest, undertook a design desperately brave. Two long planks, which lay lengthwise in the barge, as seats, he had tied together with ropes, and taking the infant from the mother, whilst the whole vessel was in a distracted confusion, he fastened it to the planks, and shoving both overboard before him, plunged into the sea after, dragging the planks that bore the infant with one hand, and swimming with t'other, making the next land; he had swam about two hundred paces from the barge before his exploit was discovered, but then the griefs of Rinaldo's lady were doubly augmented, seeing her infant exposed to the fury of the merciless winds and waves, which she then judged more rigorous than the Turks; for to a weak mind, that danger works still the strongest, that's most in view; but when the pirate, who by this time had fetched them within shot, began to fire, she seemed pleased that her infant was out of that hazard, though exposed to a greater. Upon their sign of yielding, the Turk launching out her boat, brought them all on board her; but she had no time to examine her booty, being saluted by a broadside vigorously discharged from a Venetian galley, which bore down upon them, whilst they were taking aboard their spoil; this galley was that commanded by Rinaldo's brother, which cruising that way in quest of the barge, happily engaged the Turk, before they had leisure to offer any violence to the ladies, and plying her warmly the space of two hours made her a prize, to the inexpressible joy of the poor ladies, who all this time under hatches, had sustained the horrors of ten thousand deaths by dreading one.

All the greater dangers over, Rinaldo's lady began to reflect on the strange riddle of her son's fortune, who by shunning one fate, had (in all probability) fallen into a worse, for they were above ten leagues from any land, and the sea still retained a roughness, unsettled since the preceding storm, she therefore begged her brother-in-law, to sail with all speed in search of her son and Gaspar; but all in vain, for cruising that day, and the succeeding night along the coasts, without making any discovery of what they sought, he sent a boat to be informed by the peasants, of any such landings upon their coast; but they soon had a dismal account, finding the body of Gaspar thrown dead on the sand, and near to him the planks, the unhappy occasion of his flight, and the faithless sustainers of the infant. So thinking these mournful objects testimonies enough of the infant's loss, they returned with the doleful relation to their captain and the lady; her grief at the recital of the tragic story, had almost transported her to madness; what account must she now make to the mournful father, who esteemed this child the chief treasure of his life; she feared that she might forfeit the affection of a husband by being the unfortunate cause of so great a loss; but her fears deceived her, for although her husband, received her with great grief, 'twas nevertheless moderated by the patience of a Christian, and the joy for recovering his beloved lady.

This misfortune was soon lessened by the growing hopes of another offspring, which made them divest their mourning, to make preparations for the joyful reception of this new guest into the world; but upon its appearance their sorrows were redoubled, 'twas a daughter, its limbs were distorted, its back bent, and though the face was the freest from deformity, yet had it no beauty to recompense the dis-symmetry of the other parts: Physicians being consulted in this affair, derived the cause from the frights and dismal apprehensions of the mother, at her being taken by the pirates; about which time they found by computation, the conception of the child to be; the mother grew very melancholy, rarely speaking, and not to be comforted by any diversion. She conceived again, but no hopes of better fortune could decrease her grief, which growing with her burden, eased her of both at once, for she died in childbirth, and left the most beautiful daughter to the world that ever adorned Venice, but naturally and unfortunately dumb; which defect the learned attributed to the silence and melancholy of the mother, as the deformity of the other was to the extravagance of her frights.

Rinaldo, waiving all intentions of a second marriage, directs his thoughts to the care of his children, their defects not lessening his inclination, but stirring up his endeavours in supplying the defaults of nature by the industry of art, he accordingly makes the greatest provision for their breeding and education, which proved so effectual in a little time, that their progress was a greater prodigy than themselves.

The eldest called Belvideera, was indefatigably addicted to study, which she had improved so far, that by the sixteenth year of her age, she understood all the European languages, and could speak most of 'em, but was particularly pleased with the English, which gave me the happiness of many hours conversation with her; and I may ingenuously declare, 'twas the most pleasant I ever enjoyed, for besides a piercing wit, and depth of understanding peculiar to herself, she delivered her sentiments with that easiness and grace of speech, that it charmed all her hearers.

The beauties of the second sister, named Maria, grew with her age, every twelve months saluting her with a new year's gift of some peculiar charm; her shapes were fine set off with a graceful and easy carriage, the majesty and softness of her face at once wrought love and veneration; the language of her eyes sufficiently paid the loss of her tongue, and there was something so commanding in her look, that it struck every beholder as dumb as herself; she was a great proficient in painting; which puts me in mind of a notable story I can't omit; her father had sent for the most famous painter in Italy to draw her picture, she accordingly sat for it; he had drawn some of the features of her face, and coming to the eye, desired to give him as brisk and piercing glance as she could; but the vivacity of her look so astonished the painter, that through concern he let his pencil drop and spoiled the picture; he made a second essay, but with no better success, for rising in great disorder, he swore it impossible to draw that which he could not look upon; the lady vexed at the weakness of the painter, took up his pencils and the picture, and sitting down to her glass finished it herself; she had improved her silent conversation with her sister so far, that she was understood by her, as if she had spoke, and I remember this lady was the first I saw use the significative way of discourse by the fingers; I dare not say 'twas she invented it (though it probably might have been an invention of these ingenious sisters) but I am positive none before her ever brought it to that perfection.

In the seventeenth of Belvideera's, and sixteenth year of Maria's age; Francisco, brother to Rinaldo, was made admiral of the Venetian fleet, and upon his first entrance upon his command, had obtained a signal victory over the Turks; he returning to Venice with triumph, applause and spoil, presented to the Great Duke a young English gentleman, who only as a volunteer in the action, had signalized himself very bravely in the engagement, but particularly by first boarding the Turkish admiral galley, and killing her commander hand to hand; the fame of this gentleman soon spread over all Venice, and the two sisters sent presently for me, to give an account of the exploits of my countryman, as their uncle had recounted it to them; I was pleased to find so great an example of English bravery, so far from home, and longed extremely to converse with him, vainly flattering myself, that he might have been of my acquaintance. That very night there was a grand ball and masquerade at the Great Duke's palace, for the more signal joy of the late success, thither Belvideera invited me to accompany her and Maria, adding withal as a motive, that we might there most probably meet and discourse with this young hero; and equipping me with a suit of masquerade, they carried me in their coach to the ball, where we had passed half an hour, when I saw enter a handsome gentleman in a rich English dress; I showed him to Belvideera, who moving towards him, with a gallant air, slaps him on the shoulder with her fan, he turning about, and viewing her person, the defaults of which were not altogether hidden by her disguise; "Sir," (said he) "if you are a man, know that I am one, and will not bear impertinence; but, if you are a lady, Madam, as I hope in heavens you are not, I must inform you, that I am under a vow, not to converse with any female tonight"; "Know, then Sir," (answered Belvideera very smartly) "that I am a female, and you have broke your vow already; but methinks, Sir, the ladies are very little obliged to your vow, which would rob them of the conversation of so fine a gentleman."

"Madam," (said the gentleman) "the sweetness of your voice bespeaks you a lady, and I hope the breaking my vow will be so far from damning me, that I shall thereby merit heaven, if I may be blest in your divine conversation." Belvideera made such ingenious and smart repartees to the gentleman, who was himself a great courtier, that he was entirely captivated with her wit, insomuch, that he could not refrain making protestations of his passion; he talked about half an hour in such pure Italian, that I began to mistrust my Englishman, wherefore taking some occasion to jest upon his habit, I found 'twas only a masquerade to cloak a downright Venetian; in the meantime we perceived a gentleman gallantly attired with no disguise but a Turkish turban on, the richliest beset with jewels I ever saw; he addressed Maria with all the mien and air of the finest courtier; he had talked to her a good while before we heard him, but then Belvideera, knowing her poor sister incapable of any defence, "Sir," (said she) to the Venetian, "yonder is a lady of my acquaintance, who lies under a vow of silence as you were, I must therefore beg your pardon, and fly to her relief"; She can never be conquered, who has such a champion (replied the gentleman), upon which Belvideera turning from him, interposed between the gentleman and her sister, saying, "This lady, Sir, is under an obligation of silence, as a penance imposed by her Father Confessor"; "Madam," (replied the gentleman) "whoever imposed silence on these fair lips, is guilty of a greater offence than any, such a fair creature could commit"; "Why Sir," (said Belvideera) "have you seen the lady's beauty"; "Yes Madam;" (answered he) "for urging her to talk, which I found she declined, I promised to disengage her from any farther impertinence, upon a sight of her face; she agreed by paying the price of her liberty, which was ransom enough for anything under heavens, but her fair company;" he spoke in an accent that easily showed him a stranger; which Belvideera laying hold of, as an occasion of raillery, "Sir," (said she), "your tongue pronounces you a great stranger in this part of the world, I hope you are not what that turban represents; perhaps Sir, you think yourself in the seraglio";[1] "Madam," (replied he,) "this turban might have been in the Turkish seraglio, but never in so fair a one as this; and this turban (taking it off) is now to be laid at the foot of some Christian lady, for whose safety, and by whose protecting influence I had the happiness to win it from the captain of the Turkish admiral galley." We were all surprised, knowing him then the young English gentleman, we were so curious of seeing; Belvideera presently talked English to him, and made him some very pretty compliments upon his victory, which so charmed the young soldier, that her tongue claimed an equal share in his heart with Maria's eyes; "Madam," (said he to her) "if you have the beauty of that lady, or if she has your wit, I am the most happy, or the most unfortunate man alive." "Sir," said the Venetian coming up, "pray give me leave to share in your misfortunes." "Sir" (said Belvideera very smartly) "you must share in his good fortunes, and learn to conquer men, before you have the honour of being subdued by ladies, we scorn mean praises, Sir." "Madam," (said the Venetian in some choler) "perhaps I can subdue a rival." "Pray Sir," (said the stranger) "don't be angry with the lady, she's not your rival I hope, Sir." Said the Venetian, "I can't be angry at the lady, because I love her; but my anger must be levelled at him, who after this declaration dare own a passion for her." "Madam," (said the English gentleman turning from the Venetian) "honour now must extort a confession from me, which the awfulness of my passion durst never have owned": "And I must declare," added he in a louder voice, "to all the world, that I love you, lest this gentleman should think his threats forced me to disown it": "O! then" (said Belvideera) "you're his rival in honour, not in love." "In honourable love I am Madam," answered the stranger. "I'll try," (said the Venetian, going off in choler), he whispered a little to a gentleman, that stood at some distance, and immediately went out; this was Gonzago, a gentleman of good reputation in Venice, his principles were honour and gallantry, but the former often swayed by passions raised by the latter. All this while Maria and I were admiring the stranger, whose person was indeed wonderfully amiable, his motions were exact, yet free and unconstrained; the tone of his voice carried a sweet air of modesty in it, yet were all his expressions manly; and to sum up all, he was as fine an English gentleman, as I ever saw step in the ball.

---

[1] seraglio a harem (OED seraglio I.1a).

Poor Maria never before envied her sister the advantage of speech, or never deplored the loss of her own with more regret, she found something so sweet in the mien, person, and discourse of this stranger, that her eyes felt a dazzling pleasure in beholding him, and like flattering mirrors represented every action and feature, with some heightening advantage to her imagination: Belvideera also had some secret impulses of spirit, which drew her insensibly into a great esteem of the gentleman; she asked him, by what good genius, propitious to Venice, he was induced to live so remote from his country; he said, that he could not employ his sword better than against the common foe of Christianity; and besides, there was a peculiar reason, which prompted him to serve there, which time could only make known. I made bold to ask him some peculiar questions, about affairs at Court, to most of which he gave answers, that showed his education liberal, and himself no stranger to quality; he called himself Dangerfield, which was a name that so pleased me, that being since satisfied it was a counterfeit, I used it in a comedy of mine:[1] we had talked till the greater part of the company being dispersed, Dangerfield begged leave to attend us to our coach, and waiting us to the door, the gentleman whom Gonzago whispered, advanced and offered his service to hand Maria, she declined it, and upon his urging, she turned to the other side of Dangerfield, who by this action of the ladies finding himself entitled to her protection: "Sir," (said he) "favours from great beauties, as from great monarchs, must flow voluntarily, not by constraint, and whosoever would extort from either, are liable to the greatest severity of punishment"; "Oh, Sir," (replied the Venetian very arrogantly) "I understand not your monarchy, we live here under a free state; besides Sir, where there is no punishment to be dreaded, the law will prove of little force; and so, Sir, by your leave"; offering to push him aside, and lay hold on the lady. Dangerfield returned the jostle so vigorously, that the Venetian fell down the descent of some stairs at the door, and broke his sword: Dangerfield leaped down after him, to prosecute his chastisement, but seeing his sword broken, only whispered him, that if he would meet him next morning at six, at the back part of St Mark's Church, he would satisfy him for the loss of his sword; upon which the Venetian immediately went off, cursing his ill fate, that prevented his quarrelling with Dangerfield; to whom he had born a grudging envy ever since his success in the late engagement, and of whom, and his lodgings, he had given Gonzago an account, when he whispered him at the ball. Dangerfield left us full of his praises, and went home to his lodgings, where he found a note directed to him to this effect:

---

[1] Dangerfield...comedy of mine This name would have been familiar to Behn's readers; Thomas Dangerfield was one of the informants in the Meal-Tub Plot, designed to counter the Popish Plot by "exposing" a conspiracy amongst Protestants. Before this involvement, he had published a narrative of his international adventures (Don Tomazo, 1680). He was flogged to death in 1685. The name Dangerfield has not been discovered in any of Behn's extant plays.

Sir,
You declared publicly at the ball, you were my rival in love and honour, if you dare prove it by maintaining it; I shall be tomorrow morning at six, at the back part of St Mark's Church, where I shall be ready to fall a sacrifice to both.

Gonzago

Dangerfield on the perusal of this challenge began to reflect on the strangeness of that evening's adventure, which had engaged him in a passion for two mistresses, and involved him in two duels, and whether the extravagance of his passion, or the oddness of his fighting appointments were most remarkable, he found hard to determine; his love was divided between the beauty of one lady, and wit of another, either of which he loved passionately, yet nothing could satisfy him, but the possibility of enjoying both. He had appointed the gentleman at the ball to meet him at the same time and place, which Gonzago's challenge to him imported; this disturbance employed his thoughts till morning, when rising and dressing himself very richly, he walked to the appointed place. Erizo, who was the gentleman whose sword he had broke, was in the place before him, and Gonzago entered at the same time with him. Erizo was surprised to see Gonzago, as much as he was to find Erizo there. "I don't remember friend" (said Gonzago) "that I desired your company here this morning." "As much as I expected yours," answered Erizo. "Come gentlemen," (said Dangerfield interrupting them) "I must fight you both it seems, which shall I dispatch first." "Sir," (said Erizo) "you challenged me, and therefore I claim your promise." "Sir," (replied Gonzago) "he must require the same of me first, as I challenged him." Said Erizo, "the affront I received was unpardonable, and therefore I must fight him first, lest if he fall by your hands, I be deprived of my satisfaction." "Nay," (replied Gonzago) "my love and honour being laid at stake, first claims his blood; and therefore Sir," (continued he to Dangerfield) "defend yourself." "Hold" (said Erizo) interposing, "if you thrust home, you injure me your friend." "You have forfeited that little," (said Gonzago all in choler) "and therefore if you stand not aside, I'll push at you." "Thrust home then," said Erizo, "and take what follows." They immediately assaulted each other vigorously. "Hold gentlemen" (said Dangerfield striking down their swords) "by righting yourselves you injure me, robbing me of that satisfaction, which you both owe me, and therefore gentlemen you shall fight me, before any private quarrel among yourselves defraud me of my revenge, and so one or both of you," thrusting first at Erizo. "I'm your man," said Gonzago, parrying the thrust made at Erizo.[1] The clashing of so many swords alarmed some gentlemen at their matins in the church among whom was Rinaldo, who since the death of his wife, had constantly attended morning service at that church, wherein she was buried.[2] He with two or three more, upon the noise ran out, and parting the three combatants, desired to know the occasion of their promiscuous quarrel. Gonzago and Erizo knowing Rinaldo, gave him an account of the matter, as also who the stranger was. Rinaldo was overjoyed to find the brave Briton, whom he had received so great a character of, from his brother the admiral, and accosting him very courteously, "Sir," (said he) "I'm sorry for our countrymen should be so ungrateful as to injure any person, who has been so serviceable to the state; and pray gentlemen," (added he, addressing the other two) "be entreated to suspend your animosities, and come dine with me at my house, where I hope to prevail with you to end your resentments." Gonzago and Erizo hearing him compliment the stranger at their expense, told him in a rage, they would choose some other place than his house, to end their resentments in, and walked off. Dangerfield, on Rinaldo's farther request, accompanied him to his house.

---

[1] parrying warding off or turning aside a weapon by opposing one's own weapon (OED parry *v*1).

[2] matins morning prayers.

Maria had newly risen, and with her nightgown only thrown loose about her, had looked out of the window, just as her father and Dangerfield were approaching the gate, at the same instant she cast her eyes upon Dangerfield, and he accidentally looked up to the window where she stood, their surprise was mutual, but that of Dangerfield the greater; he saw such an amazing sight of beauty, as made him doubt the reality of the object, or distrust the perfection of his sight; he saw his dear lady, who had so captivated him the preceding day, he saw her in all the heightening circumstances of her charms, he saw her in all her native beauties, free from the encumbrance of dress, her hair as black as ebony, hung flowing in careless curls over her shoulders, it hung linked in amorous twinings, as if in love with its own beauties; her eyes not yet freed from the dullness of the late sleep, cast a languishing pleasure in their aspect, which heaviness of sight added the greatest beauties to those suns, because under the shade of such a cloud, their lustre could only be viewed; the lambent drowsiness that played upon her face, seemed like a thin veil not to hide, but to heighten the beauty which it covered; her nightgown hanging loose discovered her charming bosom, which could bear no name, but transport, wonder and ecstasy, all which struck his soul, as soon as the object hit his eye; her breasts with an easy heaving showed the smoothness of her soul and of her skin; their motions were so languishly soft, that they could not be said to rise and fall, but rather to swell up towards love, the heat of which seemed to melt them down again; some scattered jetty hairs, which hung confusedly over her breasts, made her bosom show like Venus caught in Vulcan's net, but 'twas the spectator, not she was captivated.[1] This Dangerfield saw, and all this at once, and with eyes that were adapted by a preparatory potion; what must then his condition be? He was stricken with such amazement, that he was forced to support himself, by leaning on Rinaldo's arm, who started at his sudden indisposition. "I'm afraid, Sir," (said he) "you have received some wound in the duel." "Oh! Sir," (said he) "I am mortally wounded"; but recollecting himself after a little pause, "Now I am better." Rinaldo would have sent for a surgeon to have it searched. "Your pardon Sir," (said Dangerfield) "my indisposition proceeds from an inward malady, not by a sword, but like those made by Achilles' spear, nothing can cure, but what gave the wound."[2] Rinaldo guessing at the distemper, but not the cause of it, out of good manners, declined any further enquiry, but conducting him in, entertained him with all the courtesy imaginable; but in half an hour a messenger came from the senate, requiring his immediate attendance; he lying under an indispensable necessity of making his personal appearance, begged Dangerfield's pardon, entreating him to stay, and command his house till his return, and conducting him to a fine library, said he might there find entertainment, if he were addicted to study; added withal, as a farther engagement of his patience, that he should meet the admiral at the senate, whom he would bring home as an addition to their company at dinner. Dangerfield needed none of these motives to stay, being detained by a secret inclination to the place; walking therefore into the library, Rinaldo went to the senate. Dangerfield when alone fell into deep ruminating on his strange condition, he knew himself in the house, with one of his dear charmers, but durst not hope to see her, which added to his torment, like Tantalus removed the farther from happiness, by being nearer to it, contemplated so far on the beauties that dear creature, that he concluded, if her wit were like that of his t'other mistress, he would endeavour to confine his passion wholly to that object.[1]

---

[1] Venus caught in Vulcan's net Vulcan, god of fire and metallurgy, was the lame husband of Venus. Suspecting her infidelity, Vulcan trapped Venus, engaged in sexual intercourse with Mars, by covering the lovers with a net (Odyssey, ix.266–366).

[2] Achilles' spear…gave the wound On their way to Troy, the Greeks mistook Teuthrania for Troy and began an attack; Telephus resisted them and was wounded by Achilles. When the wound would not heal Telephus travelled to the Greek camp and asked Achilles to cure him as an oracle had told him that the wounder would be the healer. Achilles healed him by applying the rust of his spear to the wound.

In the meantime Maria was no less confounded, she knew herself in love with a stranger, whose residence was uncertain, she knew her own modesty in concealing it; and alas! she knew her dumbness incapable of ever revealing it, at least, it must never expect any return; she had gathered from her sister's discourse, that she was her rival; a rival, who had the precedency in age, as the advantage of wit, and intrigue, which want of speech rendered her incapable of; these reflections, as they drew her farther from the dear object, brought her nearer despair; her sister was gone that morning with her uncle the admiral, about two miles from Venice, to drink some mineral waters, and Maria finding nothing to divert her, goes down to her father's library, to ease her melancholy by reading. She was in the same loose habit in which she appeared at the window, her distraction of thought not permitting her care in dressing herself; she entered whilst Dangerfield's thoughts were bent by a full contemplation of her idea, insomuch that his surprise represented her as a phantom only, created by the strength of his fancy; her depth of thought had cast down her eyes, in a fixed posture so low, that she discovered not Dangerfield, till she stood close where he sat, but then so sudden an appearance of what she so loved, struck so violently on her spirits, that she fell in a swoon, and fell directly into Dangerfield's arms; this soon wakened him from his dream of happiness, to a reality of bliss, he found his phantom turned into the most charming piece of flesh and blood that ever was, he found her, whom just now he despaired of seeing; he found her with all her beauties flowing loose in his arms, the greatness of the pleasure raised by the two heightening circumstances of unexpectancy and surprise, was too large for the capacity of his soul, he found himself beyond expression happy, but could not digest the surfeit;[2] he had no sooner leisure to consider on his joy, but he must reflect on the danger of her that caused it, which forced him to suspend his happiness to administer some relief to her expiring senses: he had a bottle of excellent spirits in his pocket, which holding to her nose, soon recovered her; she finding herself in the arms of a man, and in so loose a dress, blushed now more red, than she looked lately pale; and disengaging herself in a confusion, would have flung from him; but he gently detaining her by a precarious hold, threw himself on his knees, and with the greatest fervency of passion cried out: "For heaven's sake, dearest creature, be not offended at the accidental blessing which fortune, not design hath cast upon me"; (she would have raised him up), "No Madam," (continued he) "never will I remove from this posture, till you have pronounced my pardon; I love you Madam to that degree, that if you leave me in a distrust of your anger, I cannot survive it; I beg, entreat, conjure you speak, your silence torments me worse than your reproaches could; am I so much disdained, that you will not afford me one word?" The lamentable plight of the wretched lady every one may guess, but nobody can comprehend; she saw the dearest of mankind prostrate at her feet, and imploring what she would as readily grant as he desire, yet herself under a necessity of denying his prayers, and her own easy inclinations; the motions of her soul, wanting the freedom of utterance, were like to tear her heart asunder by so narrow a confinement, like the force of fire pent up, working more impetuously; till at last he redoubled his importunity, her thoughts wanting conveyance by the lips, burst out at her eyes in a flood of tears, then moving towards a writing desk, he following her still on his knees, amidst her sighs and groans she took pen and paper, writ two lines, which she gave him folded up, then flinging from him ran up to her chamber; he strangely surprised at this odd manner of proceeding, opening the paper read the following words:

---

[1] Tantalus As a punishment for killing and cooking his son Pelops, who was later restored to life, Tantalus was condemned to Hades and compelled for eternity to stand up in water to his chin, with fruit-laden trees over his head; when he attempted to drink, the water disappeared and when he reached for the fruit, the wind blew it out of reach.

[2] surfeit excess (OED surfeit sb I.1).

You can't my pardon, nor my anger move.
For know, alas, I'm dumb, alas I love.

He was wonderfully amazed reading these words. "Dumb," (cried he out) "naturally Dumb? O ye niggard powers, why was such a wondrous piece of art left imperfect?" He had many other wild reasonings upon the lamentable subject, but falling from these to more calm reflections, he examined her note again, and finding by the last words that she loved him, he might presently imagine, that if he found not some means of declaring the continuance of his love, the innocent lady might conjecture herself slighted, upon the discovery of her affection and infirmity: Prompted by which thought, and animated by the emotions of his passion, he ventured to knock at her door; she having by this time dressed herself, ventured to let him in; Dangerfield ran towards her, and catching her with an eager embrace, gave her a thousand kisses, "Madam," said he, "you find that pardoning offences only prepares more, by emboldening the offender; but I hope Madam," showing her the note, "this is a general pardon for all offences of this sort, by which I am so encouraged to transgress, that I shall never cease crimes of this nature"; kissing her again. His happiness was interrupted by Belvideera's coming home, who running up stairs, called "Sister, sister, I have news to tell you": Her voice alarms Maria, who fearing the jealousy of Belvideera, should she find Dangerfield in her bedchamber, made signs that he should run into the closet, which she had just locked as Belvideera came in; "Oh, sister," (said Belvideera) "in a lucky hour went I abroad this morning." In a more lucky hour stayed I at home this morning, thought Maria. "I have," continued she, "been instrumental in parting two gentlemen fighting this morning, and what is more, my father had parted them before, when engaged with the fine English gentleman we saw at the ball yesterday; but the greatest news of all is, that this fine English gentleman is now in the house, and must dine here today; but you must not appear sister, because 'twere a shame to let strangers know that you are dumb." Maria perceiving her jealousy, pointed to her limbs, intimating thereby, that it was as great a shame for her to be seen by strangers; but she made farther signs, that since it was her pleasure, she would keep her chamber all that day, and not appear abroad. Belvideera was extremely glad of her resolution, hoping that she should enjoy Dangerfield's conversation without any interruption. The consternation of the spark in the closet all this while was not little, he heard the voice of the charmer, that had so captivated him, he found that she was sister to that lady, whom he just now was making so many protestations to, but he could not imagine how she was instrumental in parting the two gentlemen, that should have fought with him: the occasion was this.

Gonzago and Erizo parting from Rinaldo and Dangerfield, had walked towards the Rialto, and both exasperated that they had missed their intended revenge against Dangerfield, turned their fury upon each other, first raising their anger by incensed expostulations, then drawing their swords engaged in a desperate combat, when a voice very loud calling ("Erizo hold") stopped their fury to see whence it proceeded; when a coach driving at full flight stopped close by them, and Francisco the Venetian admiral leaped out with his sword drawn, saying, "Gentlemen, pray let me be an instrument of pacification: as for your part, Erizo, this proceeding suits not well with the business I am to move in favour of you in the senate today; the post you sue for claims your blood to be spilt against the common foe, not in private resentment, to the destruction of a citizen; and therefore I entreat you as my friend, or I command you as your officer, to put up." Erizo, unwilling to disoblige his admiral, upon whose favour his advancement depended, told Gonzago, that he must find another time to talk with him. "No, no, gentlemen," (said the admiral) "you shall not part till I have reconciled you, and therefore let me know your cause of quarrel." Erizo therefore related to him the whole affair, and mentioning that Dangerfield was gone home to dine with Rinaldo, ("with Rinaldo? my father") said Belvideera from the coach, overjoyed with hopes of seeing Dangerfield at home. "Yes" (replied Gonzago surprised) "if Rinaldo the Senator be your father Madam." "Yes he is," replied Belvideera. Gonzago then knew her to be the lady he was enamoured of, and for whom he would have fought Dangerfield; and now cursed his ill fate, that he had denied Rinaldo's invitation, which lost him the conversation of his mistress, which his rival would be sure of. "Come, come, gentlemen," (said the admiral) "you shall accompany me to see this stranger at Rinaldo's house, I bear a great esteem for him, and so it behoves every loyal Venetian, for whose service he hath been so signal." Erizo, unwilling to deny the admiral, and Gonzago glad of an opportunity of his mistress's company, which he just now thought lost, consented to the proposal, and mounting all into the coach, the three gentlemen were set down at the senate, and the lady drove home as above mentioned.

Rinaldo in the meantime was not idle in the senate, there being a motion made for election of a captain to the Rialto galleon, made void by the death of its former commander in the late fight, and which was the post designed by the admiral for Erizo. Rinaldo catching an opportunity of obliging Dangerfield, for whom he entertained a great love and respect, proposed him as a candidate for the command, urging his late brave performance against the Turks, and how much it concerned the interest of the state to encourage foreigners. He being the admiral's brother, and being so fervent in the affair, had by an unanimous consent his commission signed just as his brother came into the senate, who fearing how things were carried, comforted Erizo by future preferment; but Erizo, however he stifled his resentment, was struck with envy, that a stranger, and his enemy should be preferred to him, and resolved revenge on the first opportunity. They all went home with Rinaldo, and arrived whilst Belvideera was talking above stairs with her sister. Rinaldo, impatient to communicate his success to Dangerfield, ran into the study, where he left him; but missing him there, went into the garden, and searching all about, returned to the company, telling them he believed Dangerfield had fallen asleep in some private arbor in the garden, where he could not find him, or else impatient of his long stay, had departed; but he was sure, if he had gone, he would soon return: However they went to dinner, and Belvideera came down, making an apology for her sister's absence, through an indisposition that had seized her. Gonzago had his wished for opportunity of entertaining his mistress, whilst she always expecting some news of Dangerfield, sat very uneasy in his company; whilst Dangerfield in the closet, was as impatient to see her. The short discourse she had with her sister, gave him assurance that his love would not be unacceptable. Maria durst not open the closet, afraid that her sister should come up every minute, besides, 'twas impossible to convey him out of the chamber undiscovered, until 'twas dark, which made him wonder what occasioned his long confinement; and being tired with sitting, got up to the window, and softly opening the casement, looked out to take the air; his footman walking accidentally in the court, and casting up his eye that way, spied him, which confirmed his patience in attending for him at the gate; at length it grew dark, and Maria knowing that her sister was engaged in a match at cards with her father, Gonzago and Erizo, the admiral being gone, she came softly to the closet, and innocently took Dangerfield by the hand, to lead him out, he clapped the dear soft hand to his mouth, and kissing it eagerly, it fired his blood, and the unhappy opportunity adding the temptation, raised him to the highest pitch of passion; he found himself with the most beautiful creature in the world, one who loved him, he knew they were alone in the dark, in a bed-chamber, he knew the lady young and melting, he knew besides she could not tell, and he was conscious of his power in moving; all these wicked thoughts concurring, established him in the opinion, that this was the critical minute of his happiness, resolving therefore not to lose it, he fell down on his knees, devouring her tender hand, sighing out in his passion, begging her to crown it with her love, making ten thousand vows and protestations of his secrecy and constancy, urging all the arguments that the subtlety of the devil or man could suggest. She held out against all his assaults above two hours, and often endeavoured to struggle from him, but durst make no great disturbance, through fear of alarming the company below, at last he redoubling his passion with sighs, tears, and all the rest of love's artillery, he at last gained the fort, and the poor conquered lady, all panting, soft, and trembling every joint, melted by his embraces, he there fatally enjoyed the greatest ecstasy of bliss, heightened by the circumstances of stealth, and difficulty in obtaining. The ruined lady now too late deplored the loss of her honour, but he endeavoured to comfort her by making vows of secrecy, and promising to salve her reputation by a speedy marriage, which he certainly intended, had not the unhappy crisis of his fate been so near;[1] the company by this time had gone off, and Belvideera had retired to her chamber, melancholy that she had missed her hopes of seeing Dangerfield. Gonzago and Erizo going out of the gate saw Dangerfield's footman, whom they knew, since they saw him with his master in the morning. Gonzago asked him why he waited there? "For my master, Sir," replied the footman. "Your master is not here sure," said Gonzago. "Yes, but he is Sir," said the servant, "for I attended him hither this morning with Rinaldo, and saw him in the afternoon look out of a window above stairs." "Ha!" said Gonzago, calling Erizo aside, "by heavens, he lies here tonight then, and perhaps with my mistress, I perceived she was not pressing our stay, but rather urging our departure: Erizo, Erizo, this block must be removed, he has stepped between you and a command today, and perhaps may lie between me and my mistress tonight." "By hell" (answered Erizo) "thou hast raised a fury in me, that will not be lulled asleep, but by a portion of his blood, let's dispatch this block-head first": and running at the footman with one thrust killed him. Dangerfield by this time had been let out, and hearing the noise ran to the place: they presently assaulted him; he defended himself very bravely the space of some minutes, having wounded Gonzago in the breast, when Rinaldo hearing the noise came out; but too late for Dangerfield's relief, and too soon for his own fate, for Gonzago exasperated by his wound, ran treacherously behind Dangerfield, and thrust him quite through the body; he finding the mortal wound, and wild with rage, thrust desperately forward at Erizo, when at the instant Rinaldo striking in between to part them, received Dangerfield's sword to his body, which pierced him quite through; he no sooner fell than Dangerfield perceived his fatal error, and the other two fled. Dangerfield cursed his fate, and begged with all the prayers and earnestness of a dying man that Rinaldo would forgive him. "Oh!" said Rinaldo, "you have ill rewarded me for my care in your concerns in the senate today." The servants coming out took up Rinaldo, and Dangerfield leaning upon his sword they led in. Belvideera first heard the noise, and running down first met the horrid spectacle, her dear father breathing out his last, and her lover, whom she had all that day flattered herself with hopes of seeing, she now beheld in streams of his blood; but what must poor Maria's case be; besides the grief for her father's fate, she must view that dear man, lately happy in her embraces, now folded in the arms of death, she finds herself bereft of a parent, her love, her honour, and the defender of it, all at once; and the greatest torment is, that she must bear all this anguish, and cannot ease her soul by expressing it. Belvideera sat wiping the blood from her father's wound, whilst mournful Maria sat by Dangerfield, administering all the help she could to his fainting spirits; whilst he viewed her with greater excess of grief, than he had heretofore with pleasure; being sensible what was the force of her silent grief, and the wrong he had done her, which now he could never redress: he had accidentally dropped his wig in the engagement, and inclining his head over the coach where he lay. Rinaldo casting his eye upon him, perceived the mark of a bloody dagger on his neck under his left ear: "Sir," (said Rinaldo, raising himself up) "I conjure you answer me directly, were you born with the mark of that dagger, or have you received it since by accident." "I was certainly born with it," answered he. "Just such a mark had my son Cosmo, who was lost in the Adriatic": "How" (replied Dangerfield, starting up with a wild confusion) "Lost! sayest thou in the Adriatic? your son lost in the Adriatic?" "Yes, yes," said Rinaldo, "too surely lost in the Adriatic." "O ye impartial powers" (said Dangerfield) "why did you not reveal this before? or why not always conceal it? how happy had been the discovery some few hours ago, and how tragical is it now? For know," continued he, addressing himself to Rinaldo, "know that my supposed father, who was a Turkey merchant, upon his deathbed called me to him, and told me 'twas time to undeceive me, I was not his son, he found me in the Adriatic Sea tied to two planks in his voyage from Smyrna to London;[1] having no children, he educated me as his own, and finding me worth his care, left me all his inheritance with this dying command, that I should seek my parents at Venice." Belvideera hearkening all this while to the lamentable story, then conjectured whence proceeded the natural affection the whole family bore him, and embracing him, cried out, "Oh my unhappy brother." Maria all this while had strong and wild convulsions of sorrow within her, till the working force of her anguish racking at once all the passages of her breast, by a violent impulse broke the ligament that doubled in her tongue, and she burst out with this exclamation; "Oh! incest, incest." Dangerfield echoed that outcry with this, "O! horror, horror, I have enjoyed my sister, and murdered my father." Maria running distracted about the chamber at last spied Dangerfield's sword by which he had supported himself into the house, and catching it up, reeking with the blood of her father, plunged it into her heart, and throwing herself into Dangerfield's arms, calls out, "O my brother, O my love," and expired. All the neighbourhood was soon alarmed by the outcries of the family. I lodged within three doors of Rinaldo's house, and running presently thither, saw a more bloody tragedy in reality, than what the most moving scene ever presented; the father and daughter were both dead, the unfortunate son was gasping out his last, and the surviving sister most miserable, because she must survive such misfortunes, cried to me! "O behold the fate of your wretched countryman." I could make no answer, being struck dumb by the horror of such woeful objects; but Dangerfield hearing her name his country, turning towards me, with a languishing and weak tone, "Madam," said he, "I was your countryman, and would to heavens I were so still; if you hear my story mentioned, on your return to England, pray give these strange turns of my fate not the name of crimes, but favour them with the epithet of misfortunes; my name is not Dangerfield; but Cla———" his voice there failed him, and he presently died; death seeming more favourable than himself, concealing the fatal author of so many misfortunes, for I could never since learn out his name; but have done him the justice, I hope, to make him be pitied for his misfortunes, not hated for his crimes. Francisco being sent for, had Gonzago and Erizo apprehended, condemned, and executed. Belvideera consigned all her father's estate over to her uncle, reserving only a competency to maintain her a recluse all the rest of her life.

---

[1] salve preserve (OED salve v^2 Obs. 4a).

---

[1] a Turkey merchant an English merchant who traveled to Turkey to engage in trade.

—1700

Pierre-Esprit Radisson

ca. 1640 – 1710

Born in France, possibly in the south near Avignon, Radisson emigrated to Trois Rivières in New France as a youth; he might have come to the New World with his half-sister, who married Médard Chouart Des Groseilliers, Radisson's partner in most of his explorations. The mid-seventeenth century was the period of the Huron-Iroquois wars, which scattered the Huron from their settlements in Southern Ontario to territory in Michigan and Wisconsin, ravaged French settlements along the St. Lawrence, and brought the fur trade to a halt. In 1651 Radisson was captured by the Iroquois (the "enemy" in the journal) and adopted into a native family, escaping in 1653 after many adventures. In 1657 his trip to the Jesuit mission at Onondaga (near Syracuse, NY) led to another miraculous escape. In 1659–60, he and his brother-in-law embarked on the year-long journey to Lake Superior described in the following journal. Despite the spectacular cargo of furs with which they returned, the explorers received a cold welcome by the Governor of New France. In the 1660s the two consequently transferred their allegiance to England in search of the patronage with which they and others could begin to exploit the resources of this newly "discovered" land; the result was the founding of the Hudson's Bay Company in 1670. Ever discontented with his masters, Radisson served both English and French during his later travels and adventures, eventually dying in London.

Radisson wrote four journals of his early adventures, all extant in a seventeenth-century English scribal manuscript. While some scholars have speculated that these texts are translations from now lost French originals, their French characteristics (such as spelling and vocabulary) appear to indicate that Radisson wrote them for an English readership using the English he had learned during his three years on the fringes of the Stuart Court.

Travel Journal: Lake Superior, 1659–60

(excerpts)

Radisson and Des Groseilliers are forbidden to travel to the interior

The spring following we were in hopes to meet with some company, having been so fortunate the year before.[1] Now during the winter whether it was that my brother revealed to his wife what we had seen in our voyage and what we further intended,[2] or how it came to pass, it was known, so much that the Father Jesuits were desirous to find out a way how they might get down the castors from the Bay of the North by the Sagnes,[3] and so make themselves masters of that trade. They resolved to make a trial as soon as the ice would permit them. So to discover our intentions they were very earnest with me to engage myself in that voyage, to the end that my brother would give over his: which I utterly denied them knowing that they could never bring it about; because I heard the wildmen say that although the way be easy, the wildmen that are feed at their doors would have hindered them, because they make a livelihood of that trade.

---

[1] the year before probably referring to a journey in 1657–58 to the Jesuit mission in Onondaga.

[2] my brother Médard Chouart Des Groseilliers (1618–1696?), who was married to Radisson's half-sister. His diaries were lost overboard in a canoe spill.

[3] castors beavers; one of the many French usages that suggest that the text is not a translation from a French original but one written in English by a Francophone; Bay of the North by the Sagnes Hudson Bay and the Saguenay river.

In my last voyage I took notice of that that goes to three hands,[1] which is first from the people of the north to another nation, that the French call Squerells, and another nation that they call Porquepicque, and from them to the Montignes and Algonquins that live in or about Quebec; but the greatest hindrance is the scant of water and the horrid torrents and want of victuals, being no way to carry more than can serve fourteen days or three weeks navigation on that river. Nevertheless the Fathers are gone with the Governor's son of the three rivers and six other French and twelve wildmen.

During that time we made our proportion [propositions?] to the governor of Quebec that we were willing to venture our lives for the good of the country,[2] and go to travel to the remotest countries with two Hurons and that made their escape from the Iroquois. They wished nothing more than to be in those parts, where their wives and families were, about the Lake of the stairing haire;[3] to that intent would stay until August to see if anybody would come from thence. My brother and I were of one mind; and for more assurance my brother went to Montreal to bring those two men along. He came back, being in danger. The Governor gives him leave, conditionally that he must carry two of his servants along with him, and give them the moitie of the profit.[4] My brother was vexed at such an unreasonable demand, to take inexperted men to their ruin. All our knowledge and desire depended only of this last voyage; besides that the Governor should compare two of his servants to us, that have ventured our lives so many years and maintained the country with our generosity in the presence of all; neither was there one that had the courage to undertake what we have done. We made the Governor a slight answer, and told him for our part we knew what we were; discoverers before governors. If the wildmen came down, the way [was the same?] for them as for us, and that we should be glad to have the honour of his company, but not of that of his servants, and that we were both masters and servants; the Governor was much displeased at this, and commanded us not to go without his leave.[5] We desired the Fathers to speak to him about it; our addresses were slight because of the shame was put upon them the year before of their return. Besides, they stayed for an opportunity to go there themselves; for their design is to further the Christian faith to the greatest glory of God, and indeed are charitable to all those that are in distress and needy, especially to those that are worthy or industrious in their way of honesty. This is the truth, let who he will speak otherwise, for this really I know myself by experience. I hope I offend none to tell the truth. We are forced to go back without doing anything.

The month of August that brings a company of the Sault,[6] who were come by the river of the three rivers with incredible pains, as they said. It was a company of seven boats, we wrote the news of their arrivement to Quebec. They send us word that they will stay until the two Fathers be turned from Sacquenes, that we should go with them. An answer without reason. Necessity obliged us to go. Those people are not to be enticed, for as soon as they have done their affair they go. The Governor of the place defends us to go.[1] We told him that the offense was pardonable because it was everyone's interest nevertheless we knew what we were to do, and that he should not be blamed for us, we made gifts to the wildmen, that wished with all their hearts that we might go along with them. We told them that the Governor minded to send servants with them, and forbids us to go along with them. The wildmen would not accept of their company, but told us that they would stay for us two days in the Lake of St Peter in the grass some six leagues from the three rivers; but we did not let them stay so long, for that very night my brother having the keys of the borough as being captain of the place, we embarked ourselves.

---

[1] trade that passes through the hands of three Native nations before reaching the French.

[2] Governor Pierre Voyer D'Argenson (1625–1709), governor of New France from 1659 to 1661.

[3] Lake Michigan, where the Ottawa (Odawa) lived; they wore their hair in a brush turned up, and the French called them "cheveux relevés" ("standing hairs").

[4] moitie half.

[5] French law forbade the French from travelling to the interior without permission. De Groseilliers was duly arrested when the two returned.

[6] the Sault the Saulteur, a branch of the Ojibwa.

We made ready in the morning, so that we went, three of us about midnight. Being come opposite to the fort: they ask who is there, my brother tells his name, everyone knows what good services we had done to the country, and loved us, the inhabitants as well as the soldiers. The sentry answers him God give you a good voyage. We went on the rest of that night. At six in the morning we arrived to the appointed place, but found no body. We were well armed, and had a good boat. We resolved to go day and night to the river of the Meddows to overtake them.[2] The wildmen did fear that it was somewhat else, but three leagues beyond that of the fort of Richlieu, we saw them coming to us. We put ourselves upon our guards thinking they were enemy; but were friends, and received us with joy, and said that if we had not come in three days time, they would have sent their boats to know the reason of our delay. There we are in that river waiting for the night. Being come to the river of the Meddows, we did separate ourselves, three into three boats; the man that we have taken with us was put into a boat of three men and a woman, but not of the same nation as the rest, but of one that we call sorcerers. They were going down to see some friends that lived with the Nation of the Fire, that now liveth with the Ponoestigonce or the Sault.[3] It is to be understood that this river is divided much into streams very swift and small, before you go to the river of Canada;[4] [because] of the great game that there is in it, the enemy is to be feared, which made us go through these torrents. This could make anyone afraid, who is inexperted in such voyages....

FRENCH AND HURONS BATTLE AGAINST THE IROQUOIS

The day following we were set upon by a company of Iroquois that fortified themselves in the passage where they waited of Octauack,[5] for they knew of their going down. Our wildmen seeing that there was no way to avoid them resolved to be together, being the best way for them to make a quick expedition, for the season of the year pressed us to make expedition, we resolved to give a combat. We prepared ourselves with targets [shields], now the business was to make a discovery.[6] I doubt not but the enemy was much surprised to see us so in number. The council was held, and resolution taken; I and a wildman were appointed to go and see their fort, I offered myself with a free will, to let them see how willing I was to defend them: that is the only way to gain the hearts of those wildmen. We saw that their fort was environed with great rocks, that there was no way to mine it, because there were no trees near it. The mine was nothing else but to cut the nearest tree, and so by his fall make a bracke, and so go and give an assault.[7] Their fort was nothing but trees one against another in a round, or square without sides.

---

[1] defends French défendre; forbids.

[2] river of the Meddows Rivière des Prairies, the channel running between Montreal Island and Isle Jésus.

[3] sorcerers Nipissings; the Nation of the Fire Algonquian-speaking Mascouten; Ponoestigonce Pawitikong, "of the rapids."

[4] river of Canada the St. Lawrence.

[5] waited of Octauack waited for the Ottawas (Odawa).

[6] make a discovery French se découvrir; to reveal ourselves.

[7] mine French mine, meaning a plot or plan; bracke an obstacle, as in "windbreak."

The enemy seeing us come near, shot at us but in vain, for we have forewarned ourselves before we came there. It was a pleasure to see our wildmen with their guns and arrows, which agreed not together, nevertheless we told them when they received a bracke their guns would be to no purpose, therefore to put them by, and make use of their bows and arrows. The Iroquois saw themselves put to it, and the evident danger that they were in, but too late except they would run away, yet our wildmen were better footmen than they. These were Frenchmen that should give them good directions to overthrow them, resolved to speak for peace,[1] and throw necklaces of porcelaine over the stakes of their fort.[2] Our wildmen were dazzled at such gifts, because that the porcelaine is very rare and costly in their country, and then seeing themselves flattered with fair words, to which they gave ear, we trust them by force to put their first design in execution, but feared their lives and loved the porcelaine, seeing they had it without danger of any life. They were persuaded to stay till the next day, because now it was almost night. The Iroquois makes their escape. This occasion lost, our consolation was that we had that passage free, but vexed for having lost that opportunity, and contrary wise were contented of our side, for doubtless some of us had been killed in the battle.

The day following we embarked ourselves quietly, being upon our guards for fear of any surprise, for that enemy's danger scarcely began, who with his furore made himself so redoubted [dreaded], having been there up and down to make a new slaughter. This morning passes in assurance enough; in the afternoon the two boats that had orders to land some two hundred paces from the landing place. One took only a small bundle very light [and] tends to the other side of the carriage [portage] imagining there to make the kettle boil, having killed two stags two hours ago, and was scarce half way when he meets the Iroquois, without doubt for that same business. I think both were much surprised. The Iroquois had a bundle of castor that he left behind without much ado, our wildmen did the same they both run away to their partners to give them notice. By chance my brothers meets them in the way. The wildmen seeing that they all were frightened and out of breath they asked the matter and was told Nadouuée,[3] and so soon said, he lets fall his bundle that he had upon his back into a bush, and comes back where he finds all the wildmen despaired. He desired me to encourage them, which I performed with all earnestness, we runned to the height of the carriage. As we were agoing they took their arms with all speed; in the way we found the bundle of castors that the enemy had left. By this means we found out that they were in a fright as we, and that they came from the wars of the upper country, which we told the wildmen, so encouraged them to gain the water side to discover their forces, where we no sooner came but two boats were landed and charged their guns, either to defend themselves or to set upon us. We prevented this affair by our diligence and shot at them with our bows and arrows, as with our guns.

They finding such an assault, immediately forsook the place; they would have gone into their boats, but we gave them not so much time. They threw themselves into the river to gain the other side. This river was very narrow, so that it was very violent. We had killed and taken them all, if two boats of theirs had not come to their succour, which made us gave over to follow them, and look to ourselves, for we knew not the number of their men. Three of their men nevertheless were killed; the rest is on the other side of the river where there was a fort which was made long before. There they retired themselves with all speed. We pass our boats to augment our victory,[1] seeing that they were many in number, they did what they could to hinder our passage, but all in vain, for we made use of the bundle of castors that they left, which were to us instead of gabbions,[2] for we put them at the heads of our boats, and by that means got ground in spite of their noses. They killed one of our men as we landed. Their number was not to resist ours; they retired themselves into the fort and brought the rest of their [men?] in hopes to save it. In this they were far mistaken, for we furiously gave an assault, not sparing time to make us bucklers, and made use of nothing else but of castors tied together. So without any more ado we gathered together. The Iroquois spared not their powder, but made more noise than hurt. The darkness covered the earth, which was somewhat favorable for us, but to overcome them the sooner, we filled a barrel full of gun powder, and having stopped the hole of it well and tied it to the end of a long pole, being at the foot of the fort. Here we lost three of our mens; our machine did play with an execution. I may well say that the enemy never had seen the like. Moreover I took three or four pounds of powder, this I put into a rind of a tree, then a fuse to have the time to throw the rind, warning the wildmen as soon as the rind made his execution that they should enter in and break the fort upside down, with the hatchet and the sword in their hands.

---

[1] That is, the French, who should have shown their allies how to defeat the Iroquois, preferred a peaceful solution.

[2] porcelaine made of conch or cowrie shells; a highly valued commodity.

[3] Nadouuée Natowe, meaning "great serpents" (i.e. enemies).

In the meantime the Iroquois did sing, expecting death, or to their heels, at the noise of such a smoke and noise that our machines made with the slaughter of many of them; seeing themselves so betrayed, they let us go free into their fort, that thereby they might save themselves; but having environed the fort, we are mingled pell mell, so that we could not know one another in that skirmish of blows. There was such an noise that should terrify the stoutest men. Now there falls a shower of rain and a terrible storm, that to my thinking there was something extraordinary that the Devil himself made that storm to give those men leave to escape from our hands, to destroy another time more of these innocents. In that darkness everyone looked about for shelter, not thinking of those braves that laid down half dead. To pursue them, it was a thing impossible, yet do believe that the enemy was not far. As the storm was over, we came together, making a noise, and I am persuaded that many thought themselves prisoners that were at liberty. Some sang their fatal song albeit without any wounds,[3] so that those that had the confidence to come near the others were comforted by assuring them the victory and that the enemy was routed. We presently made a great fire, and with all haste make up the fort again for fear of any surprise. We searched for those that were missing. Those that were dead and wounded were visited. We found eleven of our enemy slain and two only of ours, besides seven were wounded, who in a short time passed all danger of life. While some were busy in tying five of the enemy that could not escape, the others visited the wounds of their companions, who for to show their courage sung louder than those that were well. The sleep that we took that night did not make our heads giddy, although we had need of reposing. Many liked the occupation, for they filled their bellies with the flesh of their enemies, we broiled some of it and kettles full of the rest.[4] We burned our comrades, being their custom to reduce such into ashes, being slain in battle. It is an honour to give them such a burial.

---

[1] pass our boats press on in our boats.

[2] gabbions wicker cylinders, filled with earth and used to build fortifications (OED gabion 1).

[3] fatal song death song.

[4] Radisson implies that he participated in the ritual cannibalism; his casualness in this passage may have been deliberate, to shock readers in Europe.

At the break of day we cooked what could accommodate us, and flung the rest away. The greatest mark of our victory was that we had ten heads and four prisoners, whom we embarked in hopes to bring them into our country, and there to burn them at our own leisures for the more satisfaction of our wives. We left that place of massacre with horrid cries. Forgetting the death of our parents, we plagued those unfortunates. We plucked out their nails one after another....

THE ARRIVAL AT LAKE SUPERIOR

Afterwards we entered into a strait which had ten leagues in length full of islands where we wanted not fish. We came after to a rapid, that makes the separation of the lake of the Hurons, that we call Superior or Upper, for that the wildmen hold it to be longer and broader besides a great many islands, which makes appear in a bigger extent. This rapid was formerly the dwelling of those with whom we were, and consequently we must not ask them if they knew where the hare laid.[1] We made cottages at our advantages, and found the truth of what those men had often said, that if once we could come to that place, we should make good cheer of a fish that they call assickmack which signifieth a white fish. The bear, the castors, and the oriniack [moose] showed themselves often but to their loss. Indeed it was to us like a terrestrial paradise after so long fasting, after so great pains that we had taken, to find ourselves so well, by choosing our diet, and resting when we had a mind to it. Tis here that we must taste with pleasure a sweet bit, we do not ask for a good swace [sauce]; it's better to have it naturally it is the way to distinguish the sweet from the bitter.

But the season was far spent, and we use diligence and leave that place so wished, which we shall bewail to the cursed Iroquois; What hath that poor nation done to thee and being so far from thy country? Yet if they had the same liberty that in former days they have had, we poor French should not go further with our heads, except we had a strong army, those great lakes had not so soon come to our knowledge if it had not been for those brutish people; two men had not found out the truth of these seas so cheap; the interest and the glory could not do what terror doth at the end. We are a little better come to ourselves and furnished; we left that inn without reckoning with our host. It is cheap when we are not to put the hand to the purse, nevertheless we must pay out of civility: the one gives thanks to the woods, the other to the river, the third to the earth, the other to the rocks that stays the fish, in a word, there is nothing but kinekoiur of all sorts;[2] the incense of our incense is not spared. The weather was agreeable when we began to navigate upon that great extent of water. Finding it so calm and the air so clear we thwarted in a pretty broad place,[3] came to an isle most delightful for the diversity of its fruits; we called it the isle of the four beggars. We arrived about five of the clock in the afternoon that we came there, we suddenly put the kettle to the fire, we reside there a while, and seeing all this while the fair weather and calm, we went from thence at ten of the clock the same night to gain the firm land, which was six leagues from us, where we arrived before day. Here we found a small river, I was so curious that I inquired my dearest friends the name of that stream, they named me it pauabickkomesibs, which signifieth a small river of copper. I asked him the reason, he told me, Come, and I shall show thee the reason why. I was in a place which was not two hundred paces in the wood, where many pieces of copper were uncovered, further he told me that the mountain I saw was of nothing else. Seeing it so fair and pure, I had a mind to take a piece of it, but they hindered me, telling my brother, there was more where we were to go....

---

[1] His companions were the Saulteur, who had fled west in the early 1650s as a result of the Huron-Iroquois wars. "Where the hare laid" was a proverbial expression meaning "where the secret is"; Radisson appears unwilling to ask the Saulteur for information about their former territory.

[2] kinekoiur meaning unknown; possibly a scribal misreading.

[3] thwarted crossed over (OED thwart 1).

From this place we went along the coasts, which are most delightful, and wondrous for its nature that made it so pleasant to the eye, the spirit, and the belly. As we went along we saw banks of sand so high, that one of our wildmen went up for our curiosity, being there, did show no more than a crow. That place is most dangerous when that there is any storm, being no landing place so long as the sandy banks are under water, and when the wind blows, that sand doth rise by a strange kind of whirling that are able to choke the passengers [travellers], one day you will see fifty small mountains at one side, and the next day, if the wind changes, on the other side. This puts me in mind of the great and vast wildernesses of Turkey land, as the Turks makes their pilgrimages....[1]

After this we came to a remarkable place. It's a bank of rocks that the wildmen made a sacrifice to, they call it Nauitoucksinagoit which signifies the likeness of the Devil, they fling much tobacco and other things in its veneration. It is a thing most incredible that that lake should be so boisterous, that the waves of it should have the strength to do what I have to say by this my discourse, first that it's so high and so deep that it's impossible to claim up to the point. There comes many sort of birds that makes their nest here, the goilants which is a white sea bird, of the bigness of pigeon, which makes me believe what the wildmen told me concerning the sea to be near directly to the point; it's like a great portal, by reason of the beating of the waves, the lower part of that opening is as big as a tower, and grows bigger; in the going up there is I believe six acres of land; above it a ship of five hundred tons could pass by so big is the arch. I gave it the name of the portal of St. Peter, because my name is so called, and that I was the first Christian that ever saw it. There is in that place caves very deep, caused by the same violence. We must look to ourselves, and take time with our small boats, the coast of rocks is five or six leagues and there scarce a place to put a boat in assurance from the waves. When the lake is agitated the waves goeth in these concavities with force, and make a most horrible noise, most like the shooting of great guns. Some days afterwards we arrived to a very beautiful point of sand, where there are three beautiful islands, that we called of the Trinity, there be three in triangle. From this place we discovered a bay very deep, where a river empties itself with a noise for the quantity and depth of the water. We must stay there three days to wait for fair weather to make the carriage which was about six leagues wide, so done, we came to the mouth of a small river, where we killed some oriniacks. We found meadows that were squared, and ten leagues as smooth as a board; we went up some five leagues further, where we found some pools made by the castors, we must break them that we might pass. The sluice being broken what a wonderful thing to see the industry of that animal, which had drowned more than twenty leagues in the grounds, and cut all the trees, having left none to make a fire if the country should be dried up. Being come to the height, we must drag our boats over a trembling ground for the space of an hour. The ground became trembling by this means, the castor drowning great soils with dead water, herein grows moss which is two foot thick or thereabouts, and when you think to go safe and dry, if you take not great care you sink down to your head or to the middle of your body, when you are out of one hole you find yourself in another. This I speak by experience for I myself have been catched often. But the wildmen warned me which saved me, that is that when the moss should break under me I should cast my whole body into the water on sudden. I must with my hands hold the moss, and go so like a frog, then to draw my boat after me there was no danger....

---

[1] Radisson is most likely referring to his memories of reading travel books rather than to personal experience of travelling in Turkey.

THE FORT ON CHEQUAMEGON BAY

...we went on half a day before we could come to the landing place, and were forced to make another carriage a point of two leagues long and some sixty paces broad. As we came to the other side we were in a bay of ten leagues about, if we had gone in. By going about that same point we passed a strait, for that point was very nigh the other side, which is a cape very much elevated like pyramids. That point should be very fit to build and advantageous for the building of a fort, as we did the spring following. In that bay there is a channel where we take great store of fishes, sturgeons of a vast bigness, and pikes of seven foot long. At the end of this bay we landed. The wildmen gave thanks to that which they worship, we to God of Gods to see ourselves in a place where we must leave our navigation and forsake our boats to undertake a harder piece of work in hand, to which we are forced. The men told us that we had five great days' journeys before we should arrive where their wives were. We foresee the hard task that we were to undergo by carrying our bundles upon our backs. They were used to it. Here everyone for himself and God for all.

We finding ourselves not able to perform such a task, and they could not well tell where to find their wives, fearing least the Nadoueceronons had wars against their nation and forced them from their appointed place, my brother and I we consulted what was best to do, and declared our will to them, which was thus: Brethren, we resolve to stay here, being not accustomed to make any carriage on our backs as ye are wont. Go ye and look for your wives; we will build us a fort here. And seeing that you are not able to carry all your merchandise at once, we will keep them for you, and will stay for you fourteen days. Before the time expired you will send to us if your wives be alive, and if you find them they will fetch what you leave here and what we have. For their pains they shall receive gifts of us. So you will see us in your country. If they be dead, we will spend all, to be revenged, and will gather up the whole country for the next spring, for that purpose to destroy those that were the causers of their death, and you shall see our strength and valour. Although there are seven thousand fighting men in one village, you'll see we will make them run away, and you shall kill them to your best liking by the very noise of our arms and our presence, who are the Gods of the earth among those people.

They wondered very much at our resolution. The next day they went their way and we stay, for our assurance in the midst of many nations, being but two almost starved for want of food. We went about to make a fort of stakes, which was in this manner. Suppose that the water side had been in one end; at the same end there should be murderers, and at need we made a bastion in a triangle to defend us from an assault. The door was near the water side, our fire was in the middle, and our bed on the right hand covered. There were boughs of trees all about our fort laid across, one upon another. Besides these boughs we had a long cord tied with some small bells, which were sentries, finally, we made an end of that fort in two days time....

The 12th day we perceived a far off some fifty young men coming towards us, with some of our former companions. We gave them leave to come into our fort, but they are astonied calling us every foot devils to have made such a machine. They brought us victuals, thinking we were half starved, but were mightily mistaken, for we had more for them than they were able to eat, having three score bustards and many sticks where was meat hanged plentifully. They offered to carry our baggage being come a purpose, but we had not so much merchandise as when they went from us, because we hid some of them that they might not have suspicion of us. We told them that for fear of the daily multitude of people that came to see us for to have our goods would kill us. We therefore took a boat and put into it our merchandises, this we brought far into the bay, where we sunk them, bidding our devil not to let them to be wet nor rusted, nor suffer them to be taken away, which he promised faithless that we should return and take them out of his hands; at which they were astonished, believing it to be true as the Christians the Gospel.[1] We hid them in the ground on the other side of the river in a piece of ground. We told them that lie, that they should not have suspicion of us. We made good cheer. They stayed there three days, during which time many of their wives came thither, and we treated them well, for they eat not fowl at all scarce because they know not how to catch them except with their arrows. We put a great many rind about our fort, and broke all the boats that we could have, for the frost would have broken them or wildmen had stolen them away. That rind was tied all in length to put the fire in it, to frighten the more these people for they could not approach it without being discovered. If they ventured at the going out we put the fire to all the torches, showing them how we would have defended ourselves. We were Caesars, being nobody to contradict us, we went away free from any burden, whilst those poor miserables thought themselves happy to carry our equipage, for the hope that they had that we should give them a brass ring, or an awl or an needle.

A CEREMONIAL MEETING WITH THE NATIVES

There came above four hundred persons to see us go away from that place, which admired more our actions [than] the fools of Paris to see enter their King and the infanta of Spain, his spouse, for they cry out, God save the King and Queen.[2] Those made horrid noise, and called Gods and Devils of the earth and heavens. We marched four days through the woods. The country is beautiful, with very few mountains, the woods clear. At last we came within a league of the cabins where we laid that the next day might be for our entry. We two poor adventurers for the honour of our country, or of those that shall deserve it from that day. The nimblest and stoutest went before to warn before the people that we should make our entry tomorrow. Everyone prepares to see what they never before have seen. We were in cottages which were near a little lake some eight leagues in circuit. At the water side there were abundance of little boats made of trees that they have hollowed, and of rind.

The next day we were to embark in them, and arrived at the village by water, which was composed of a hundred cabins without pallasados.[3] There is nothing but cries, the women throw themselves backwards upon the ground thinking to give us tokens of friendship and of welcome. We destinated three presents, one for the men one for the women, and the other for the children, to the end that they should remember that journey, that we should be spoken of a hundred years after, if other Europeans should not come in those quarters and be liberal to them, which will hardly come to pass. The first present was a kettle, two hatchets, and six knives and a blade for a sword, the kettles was to call all nations that were their friends to a feast which is made for the remembrance of the death. That is, they make it once in seven years; it's a renewing of friendship.[1] I will talk further of it in the following discourse. The hatchets were to encourage the young people to strengthen themselves in all places, to preserve their wives, and show themselves men by knocking the heads of their enemies with the said hatchets, the knives were to show that the French were great and mighty and their confederates and friends. The sword was to signify that we would be masters both of peace and wars, being willing to help and relieve them, and to destroy our enemies with our arms. The second gift was of two and twenty awls, fifty needles, two graters of castors,[2] two ivory combs and two wooden ones, with red paint, six looking glasses of tin. The awls signifieth to take good courage, that we should keep their lives, and that they with their husbands should come down to the French when time and season should permit, the needles for to make them robes of castor, because the French loved them. The two graters were to dress the skins; the combs, the paint, to make themselves beautiful; the looking-glasses to admire themselves. The third gift was of brass rings, of small bells, and rasades of divers colours,[3] and given in this manner. We sent a man to make all the children come together. When we were there we throw these things over their heads. You would admire what a beat was among them, everyone striving to have the best. This was done upon this consideration that they should be always under our protection, giving them wherewithal to make them merry and remember us when they should be men.

---

[1] our devil Radisson and Des Groseilliers pretend they have a spirit under their control who guards their possessions.

[2] The royal entry of Louis XIV and his bride, Maria Theresa of Spain, took place in Paris in 1660; Radisson could only have heard about the procession second-hand.

[3] pallasados palisades; surrounding fences.

This done, we are called to the council of welcome and to the feast of friendship, afterwards to the dancing of the heads. But before the dancing, we must mourn for the deceased, and then, for to forget all sorrow to the dance. We gave them four small gifts that they should continue such ceremonies, which they took willingly, and did us good, that gave us authority among the whole nation. We knew their councils, and made them do whatsoever we thought best. This was a great advantage for us, you must think. Amongst such a rawish kind of people a gift is much, and well bestowed, and liberality much esteemed, but prodigality is not in esteem, for they abuse it being brutish. We have been using such ceremonies three whole days, and were lodged in the cabin of the chiefest captains who came with us from the French. We liked not the company of that blind, therefore left him; he wondered at this, but durst not speak because we were demigods. We came to a cottage of an ancient witty man, that had had a great family and many children, his wife old nevertheless handsome. They were of a nation called Malhonmines, that is, the nation of oats, grain that is much in that country. I took this man for my father and the woman for my mother, so the children consequently brothers and sisters; They adopted me. I gave everyone a gift, and they to me.

FAMINE IN THE FOREST (WINTER 1659–60)

Having so disposed of our business: The winter comes on, that warns us the snow begins to fall, so we must retire from this place to seek our living in the woods. Everyone gets his equipage ready, so away we go, but not all to the same place. Two, three at the most, went one way, and so of another. They have so done because victuals were scant for all in a place but let us where we will, we cannot escape the mighty hand of God that disposes as he pleases, and who chastens us as a good and a common loving father and not as our sins do deserve. Finally we depart one from another. As many as we were in number, we are reduced to a small company. We appointed a rendezvous after two months and a half, to take a new road, and an advice what we should do. During the said term we sent messengers everywhere to give special notice to all manner of persons and nation that within five moons the feast of death was to be celebrated, and that we should appear together, and explain what the devil should command us to say, and then present them presents of peace and union; now we must live on what God sends, and war against the bears in the meantime, for we could aim at nothing else, which was the cause that we had no great cheer....

---

[1] the Feast of the Dead; he provides an account below.

[2] graters scrapers for dressing beaver ("castor") skins (OED grater 2).

[3] rasades glass beads (French).

...so the famine was among great many that had not provided before hand, and live upon what they get that day, never thinking for the next. It grows worse and worse daily.

To augment our misery we receive news of the Octauaks, who were about a hundred and fifty with their families. They had a quarrel with the Hurons in the isle where we had come from some years before in the Lake of the stairing hairs,[1] and came purposely to make wars against them the next summer. But let us see if they brought us anything to subsist withal. But are worst provided than we; having no huntsmen, they are reduced to famine. But, O cursed covetousness, what art thou going to do. It should be far better to see a company of rogues perish than see ourselves in danger to perish, by that scourge so cruel. Hearing that they have had knives and hatchets the victuals of their poor children is taken away from them yea what ever they have those dogs must have their share. They are the cursedest, unablest the unfamous and cowardliest people that I have seen amongst four score nations that I have frequented. O ye poor people, you shall have their booty, but you shall pay dearly for it. Everyone cries out for hunger; the women become barren, and dry like wood. You men must eat the cord, being you have no more strength to make use of the bow, children, you must die. French, you called yourselves Gods of the earth that you should be feared, for your interest; notwithstanding you shall taste of the bitterness, and too happy if you escape. Where is the time past? Where is the plentiness that ye had in all places and countries? Here comes a new family of these poor people daily to us, half dead for they have but the skin and bones. How shall we have strength to make a hole in the snow to lay us down seeing we have it not to hale our rackets [snowshoes] after us nor to cut a little wood to make a fire to keep us from the rigour of the cold which is extreme in those countries in its season. Oh! if the music that we hear could give us recreation. We wanted not any lamentable music nor sad spectacle. In the morning the husband looks upon his wife, the brother his sister, the cousin the cousin, the uncle the nephew that were for the most part found dead. They languish with cries and hideous noise that it was able to make the hair stare on the heads that have any apprehension. Good God have mercy on so many poor innocent people, and of us that acknowledge thee, that having offended thee punishes us. But we are not free of that cruel executioner. Those that have any life seeketh out for roots which could not be done without great difficulty, the earth being frozen two or three foot deep and the snow five or six above it. The greatest subsistence that we can have is of rind tree which grows like ivy about the trees,[2] but to swallow it, we cut the stick some two foot long, tying it in faggot [bundles] and boil it, and when it boils one hour or two the rind or skin comes off with ease, which we take and dry it in the smoke and then reduce it into powder betwixt two grainstones, and putting the kettle with the same water upon the fire, we make it a kind of broth, which nourished us, but became thirstier and drier than the wood we eat.

---

[1] the isle Rock Island, at the entrance of Green Bay in Lake Michigan, which Des Groseilliers had visited in 1654.

[2] rind tree possibly wild grape.

The two first weeks we did eat our dogs. As we went back upon our steps for to get anything to fill our bellies, we were glad to get the bones and carcasses of the beasts that we killed; and happy was he, that could get what the other did throw away after it had been boiled three or four times to get the substance out of it. We contrived to another plot, to reduce to powder those bones, the rest of crows and dogs. So put all that together half foot within ground, and so makes a fire upon it. We covered all that very well with earth, so feeling the heat, and boiled them again and gave more froth than before. In the next place, the skins that were reserved to make us shoes, cloth, and stockings, yea, most of the skins of our cottages, the castors' skins, where the children beshit them above a hundred times, we burned the hair on the coals. The rest goes down throats eating heartily these things most abhorred. We went so eagerly to it that our gums did bleed like one newly wounded. The wood was our food the rest of sorrowful time. Finally we became the very images of death. We mistook ourselves very often taking the living for the dead and the dead for the living. We wanted strength to draw the living out of the cabins, or if we did when we could, it was to put them four paces in the snow. At the end the wrath of God begins to appease itself, and pities his poor creatures. If I should express all that befell us in that strange accidents, a great volume would not contain it. Here are above five hundred dead, men, women, and children. It's time to come out of such miseries. Our bodies are not able to hold out any further.

After the storm, calm comes. But storms favoured us, being that calm kills us. Here comes a wind and rain, that puts a new life in us, the snow falls, the forest clears itself, at which sight, those that had strings left in their bows take courage to use it. The weather continued so three days that we needed no rackets more, for the snow hardened much. The small stags are as if they were stakes in it after they made seven or eight capers.[1] It's an easy matter for us to take them and cut their throats with our knives. Now we see ourselves a little furnished, but yet have not paid, for it cost many their lives. Our guts became very straight by our long fasting, that they could not contain the quantity that some put in them. I cannot omit the pleasant thoughts of some of them wildmen. Seeing my brother always in the same condition, they said that some devil brought him wherewithal to eat, but if they had seen his body they should be of another opinion. The beard that covered his face made as if he had not altered his face. For me that had no beard they said I loved them, because I lived as well as they. From the second day we began to walk.

There came two men from a strange country who had a dog, the business was how to catch him cunningly, knowing well those people love their beasts. Nevertheless we offered gifts: but they would not, which made me stubborn. That dog was very lean, and as hungry as we were, but the masters have not suffered so much. I went one night near that same cottage to do what discretion permits me not to speak. Those men were Nadoueserous. They were much respected that nobody durst not offend them: being that we were upon their land with their leave. The dog comes out, not by any smell, but by good likes. I take him and bring him a little way. I stabbed him with my dagger. I brought him to the cottage, where he was broiled like a pig and cut in pieces guts and all, so everyone of the family had his share. The snow where he was killed was not lost, for one of our company, went and got it to season the kettle. We began to look better daily. We gave the rendezvous to the convenientest place to celebrate that great feast....

---

[1] as if they were stakes as if they were stuck fast in the snow.

THE FEAST OF THE DEAD

The time was nigh that we must go to the rendezvous. This was betwixt a small lake and a meadow. Being arrived most of ours were already in their cottages. In three days time, there arrived eighteen several nations, and came privately to have done the sooner. As we became to the number of five hundred we held a council; then the shouts and cries and the encouragements were proclaimed, that a fort should be builded. They went about the work and made a large fort; it was about six hundred and three score paces in length and six hundred in breadth: so that it was a square. There we had a brook that came from the lake and emptied itself in those meadows which had more than four leagues in length. Our fort might be seen afar off, and on that side most delightful: for the great many stags that took the boldness to be carried by quarters where at other times they made good cheer.[1]

In two days this was finished. Soon thirty young men of the nation of the beef arrived there, having nothing but bows and arrows, with very short garments, to be the nimbler in chasing the stags. The iron of their arrows were made of stag's pointed horns very neatly. They were all proper men, and dressed with paint. They were the discoverers and the foreguard. We kept a round place in the middle of our cabin, and covered it with long poles with skins over them that we might have a shelter to keep us from the snow. The cottages were all in good order in each ten, twelve companies or families. That company was brought to that place where there was wood laid for the fires. The snow was taken away, and the earth covered with deal tree boughs.[2] Several kettles were brought there full of meat. They rested and eat above five hours without speaking one to another. The considerablest of our companies went and made speeches to them. After one takes his bow and shoots an arrow, and then cries aloud, there speaks some few words, saying that they were to let them know the elders of their village were to come the morrow to renew the friendship and to make it with the French. And that a great many of their young people came and brought them some part of their ways to take their advice for they had a mind to go against the Christinos who were ready for them:[3] and they in like manner to save their wives and children. They were scattered in many cabins that night expecting those that were to come. To that purpose there was a vast large place prepared some hundred paces from the fort, where every thing was ready for the receiving of those persons. They were to set their tents that they bring upon their backs. The perches [poles or stakes] were put out and planted as we received the news. The snow put aside, and the boughs of trees covered the ground.

The day following they arrived with an incredible pomp. This made me think of the entrance that the Polanders did in Paris:[4] saving that they had not so many jewels, but instead of them they had so many feathers. The first were young people with their bows and arrows and buckler on their shoulders, upon which were represented all manner of figures: according to their knowledge, as of the sun and moon, of terrestrial beasts, about its feathers very artificially [artfully] painted. Most of the men their faces were all over dabbed with several colours. Their hair turned up, like a crown: and were cut very even, but rather so burned for the fire is their scissors. They leave a tuft of hair upon their crown of their heads, tie it, and put at the end of it some small pearls or some turkey stones to bind their heads.[1] They have a roll commonly made of a snake's skin where they tie several bear's paws, or give a form to some bits of buff's [buffalo] horns, and put it about the said roll. They grease themselves with very thick grease and mingle it in reddish earth, which they burn, as we our breeks:[2] With this stuff they get their hair to stand up. They cut some down of swan or other fowl that hath a white feather and cover with it the crown of their heads. Their ears are pierced in five places. The holes are so big that your little finger might pass through. They have yellow ware that they made with copper, made like a star or a half moon, and there hang it. Many have turkeys. They are clothed with oriniack and stag's skins, but very light. Every one had the skin of a crow hanging at their girdles. Their stockings all embroidered with pearls and with their own porkepick work.[3] They have very handsome shoes laced very thick all over with a piece sewn at the side of the heel, which was of a hair of buff, which trailed above half a foot upon the earth, or rather on the snow. They had swords and knives of a foot and a half long, and hatchets very ingeniously done, and clubs of wood made like backswords, some made of a round head that I admired it. When they kill their enemy they cut off the tuft of hair and tie it about their arms. After [over] all, they have a white robe made of castors' skins painted. Those having passed through the middle of ours that were ranged at every side of the way. The elders came with great gravity and modesty covered with buff coats which hung down to the ground. Everyone had in his hand a pipe of council set with precious jewels. They had a sack on their shoulders, and that that holds it grows in the middle of their stomachs, and on their shoulders. In this sack all the world is enclosed.[4] Their face is not painted, but their heads dressed as the foremost. Then the women laden like unto so many mules, their burdens made a greater show than they themselves, but I suppose the weight was not equivalent to its bigness. They were conducted to the appointed place, where the women unfolded their bundles, and flang their skins whereof their tents are made, so that they had houses in less than half an hour.

---

[1] that is, the stags were butchered and carried in pieces to a meal held at a place where the travellers had previously eaten.

[2] deal tree pine or fir.

[3] Christinos the Nahathaway, whom the French called the Cristinaux, hence "Cree." They are the "wandering nation" mentioned below.

[4] In 1573 Prince Albertus Laski came to France with a delegation of Polish ambassadors to offer the throne of Poland to Henri III.

After they rested, they came to the biggest cabin constituted for that purpose. There were fires kindled. Our captain made a speech of thanksgiving, which should be long to writ it. We are called to the council of new come Chiefs: where we came in great pomp, as you shall hear. First they come to make a sacrifice to the French, being Gods and masters of all things as of peace as wars, making the knives the hatchets, and the kettles rattle, etc. That they came purposely to put themselves under their protection: moreover, that they came to bring them back again to their country, having by their means destroyed their enemies abroad and near. So said, they present us with gifts of castors' skins, assuring us that the mountains were elevated, the valleys risen, the ways very smooth, the boughs of trees cut down to go with more ease, and bridges erected over rivers, for not to wet our feet. That the doors of their villages, cottages of their wives and daughters, were upon at any time to receive us, being we kept them alive by our merchandises. The second gift was, that they should die in their alliance, and that to certify to all nations by continuing the peace, and were willing to receive and assist them in their country, being well satisfied they were come to celebrate the feast of the dead. The third gift was for to have one of the doors of the fort opened, if need required, to receive and keep them from the Christinos that come to destroy them. Being always men, and the heavens made them so, that they were obliged to go before to defend their country and their wives, which is the dearest thing they had in the world, and in all times they were esteemed stout and true soldiers, and that yet they would make it appear, by going to meet them, and that they would not degenerate, but show by their actions that they were as valiant as their forefathers. The fourth gift was presented to us, which was of buff skins, to desire our assistance, for being the masters of their lives, and could dispose of them as we would, as well of the peace as of the wars, and that we might very well see that they did well to go defend their own country that the true means to get the victory was to have a thunder. They meant a gun, calling it miniskoick.

---

[1] turkey stones native turquoise.

[2] breeks breeches, greased so they would shed water (OED breek 1).

[3] porkepick porcupine quill embroidery.

[4] sack a medicine bag, containing totems and other objects sacred to the wearer.

The speech being finished, they entreated us to be at the feast. We go presently back again to furnish us with wooden bowls. We made four men to carry our guns afore us, that we charged of powder alone, because of their unskillfulness that they might have killed their fathers. We each of us had a pair of pistols and sword, a dagger; we had a roll of porkepick about our heads, which was as a crown, and two little boys that carried the vessels that we had most need of: this was our dishes and our spoons. They made a place higher and most elevate knowing our customs, in the middle for us to sit where we had the men lay our arms. Presently comes four elders, with the calumet kindled in their hands; they present the candles to us to smoke, and four beautiful maids that went before us carrying bears' skins to put under us. When we were together, an old man rises and throws our calumet at our feet, and bids them, take of the kettles from of the fire, and spoke, that he thanked the sun, that never was a day to him so happy as when he saw those terrible men, whose words made the earth quake, and sang a while, having ended, came and covers us with his vestment and all naked except his feet and legs, he saith, ye are masters over us dead or alive you have the power over us: and may dispose of us as your pleasure. So done, takes the calumet of the feast, and brings it; so a maiden brings us a coal of fire to kindle it. So done, we rose and [one? some?] of us begins to sing: we had the interpreter to tell them we should save and keep their lives, taking them for our brethren, and to testify that, we shot of all our artillery which was of twelve guns. We draw our swords and long knives to our defence if need should require, which put the men in such a terror that they knew not what was best to run or stay. We throw a handful of powder in the fire to make a greater noise, and smoke.

Our songs being finished, we begin our teeth to work. We had there a kind of rice, much like oats.[1] It grows in the water in three or four foot deep. There is a God that shows himself in every country almighty full of goodness and the preservation of those poor people who knoweth him not. They have a particular way to gather up that grain. Two takes a boat and two sticks, by which they get the ear down and get the corn out of it. Their boat being full, they bring it to a fit place to dry it, and that is their food for the most part of the winter, and do dress it thus. For each man a handful of that they put in the pot. That swells so much that it can suffice a man. After the feast was over, there comes two maidens bringing wherewithal to smoke the one the pipes, the other the fire. They offered first to one of the elders, that sat down by us. When he had smoked, he bids them give it us. This being done, we went back to our fort as we came.

The day following, we made the principal persons come together to answer to their gifts. Being come with great solemnity there we made our interpreter tell them, that we were come from the other side of the great salted lake, not to kill them but to make you live, acknowledging you for our brethren and children whom we will love henceforth as our own. Then we gave them a kettle. The second gift, was to encourage them in all their undertakings, telling them that we liked men that generously defended themselves against all their enemies, and as we were masters of peace and wars we are to dispose the affairs. That we would see an universal peace all over the earth and that this time we could not go and force the nations that were yet further to condescend and submit to our will, but that we would see the neighbouring countries in peace and union. That the Christinos were our brethren, and have frequented them many winters; that we adopted them for our children and took them under our protection; that we should send them ambassadors, that I myself should make them come, and conclude a general peace; that we were sure of their obedience to us; that the first that should break the peace, we would be their enemies, and would reduce them to powder with our heavenly fire. That we had the word of the Christinos as well as theirs, and our thunders should serve us to make wars against those that would not submit to our will and desire, which was to see them good friends to go and make wars against the upper nations, that doth not know us as yet. The gift was of six hatchets. The third was to oblige them to receive our propositions, likewise the Christinos to lead them to the dance of union which was to be celebrated at the death's feast, and banquet of kindred. If they would continue the wars, that was not the means to see us again in their country. The fourth was that we thanked them, for making us a free passage through their countries. The gift was of two dozen of knives; the last was of smaller trifles, six graters, two dozen of awls, two dozen of needles, six dozen of looking-glasses made of tin, a dozen of little bells, six ivory combs with a little vermilion. But for to make a recompense to the good old man that spake so favourably we gave him a hatchet and to the elders each a blade for a sword, and to the two maidens that served us two necklaces, which put about their necks, and two bracelets for their arms. The last gift was in general for all the women to love us, and give us to eat when we should come to their cottages. The company gave us great hohoho that is thanks. Our wildmen made others for their interest.[1] [1] a kind of rice wild rice.

---

A company of about fifty were dispatched to warn the Christinos of what we have done: I went myself where we arrived the third day early in the morning. I was received with great demonstration of friendship; all that day we feasted danced and sing. I compared that place before to the Buttery of Paris,[2] for the great quantity of meat that they use to have there, but now will compare it to that of London. There I received gifts of all sorts of meat, of grease more than twenty men could carry. The custom is not to deface anything that they present.[3] There were above six hundred men in a fort with a great deal of baggage on their shoulders, and did draw it upon light sleds made very neatly. I have not seen them at their entrance for the snow blinded me. Coming back, we passed a lake hardly frozen [frozen hard], and the sun [shone upon it?] for the most part, for I looked a while steadfastly on it so I was troubled with this seven or eight days.

The meanwhile that we are there, arrived above a thousand, that had not been therein but for those two redoubted nations that were to see them do what they never before had, a difference:[4] which was executed with a great deal of mirth. I for fear of being envied I will admit, only that there were plays mirths, and bataills for sport, going and coming with cries, each played his part. In the public place the women danced with melody. The young men that endeavoured to get a prize, endeavoured to climb up a great post very smooth and greased with oil of bear and oriniack grease. The stake was at least of fifteen foot high. The prize was a knife or other thing. We laid the stake there, but whoso could catch it should have it. The feast was made to eat all up. To honour the feast many men and women did burst. Those of that place coming back, came in sight of those of the village or fort made postures in similitude of wars. This was to discover the enemy by signs any that should do so we gave orders to take him or kill him and take his head off; the prisoner to be tied, to fight in retreating; to pull an arrow out of the body. To exercise and strike with a club, a buckler to their feet, and take it if need requireth, and defend himself if need requires from the enemy. Being in sentry to hark the enemy that comes near and to hear the better lay him down on the side. These postures are played while the drum beat. This was a serious thing, without speaking, except by nodding or gestures. Their drums were earthen pots full of water, covered with stag's skin. The sticks like hammers for the purpose. The elders have bomkins to the end of the staves, full of small stones, which makes a rattle, to which young men and women go in a cadence. The elders are about these pots beating them and singing. The women also by having a nosegay in their hands, and dance very modestly, not lifting much their feet from the ground, keeping their heads downwards making a sweet harmony. We made gifts for that while fourteen days' time. Everyone brings the most exquisite things to show what his country affords. The renewing of their alliances, the marriages according to their country customs are made; also the visit of the bones of their deceased friends for they keep them and bestow them upon one another. We sang in our language as they in theirs, to which they gave great attention. We gave them several gifts, and received many. They bestowed upon us above 3 hundred robes of castors out of which we brought not five to the French being too far in the country. This feast ended, everyone returns to his country well satisfied....

---

[1] perhaps meaning that the natives accompanying the travellers gave their own gifts.

[2] Buttery of Paris possibly boucherie, stockyards.

[3] deface discredit (French).

[4] a difference an arranged contest between two parties.

RADISSON ALLEGES THAT HE HAS VISITED HUDSON BAY[1]

We went from isle to isle all that summer. We plucked abundance of ducks as of all other sort of fowls; we wanted nor fish nor fresh meat. We were well beloved, and were overjoyed that we promised them to come with such ships as we invented. This place hath a great store of cows [caribou]. The wildmen kill them not except for necessary use. We went further in the bay to see the place that they were to pass that summer. That river comes from the lake and empties itself in the River of Sagnes, called Tadousack, which is a hundred leagues in the great river of Canada, as where we were in the Bay of the North. We left in this place our marks and rendezvous. The wildmen that brought us defended us above all things, if we would come directly to them that we should be no means land, and to go to the river to the other side that is to the north towards the sea, telling us that those people were very treacherous. Now whether they told us this out of policy, lest we should not come to them first, and so be deprived of what they thought to get from us I know not. In that you may see that the envy and envy reigns everywhere amongst poor barbarous wild people as at courts. They made us a map of what we could not see, because the time was nigh to reap among the bustards and ducks....

This is a wandering nation, and containeth a vast country. In winter they live in the land for the hunting sake, and in summer by the water for fishing. They never are many together, for fear of wronging one another. They are of a good nature, and not great whore masters, having but one wife, and are more satisfied than any others that I knew. They clothe themselves all over with castors' skins in winter, in summer of stags' skins. They are the best huntsmen of all America, and scorns to catch a castor in a trap. The circumjacent nations go all naked, when the season permits it. But this have more modesty, for they put a piece of copper made like a finger of a glove, which they use before their nature. They have the same tenets as the nation of the beef, and their apparel from top to toe. The women are tender and delicate, and takes as much pains as slaves. They are of more acute wits than the men for the men are fools, but diligent about their work. They kill not the young castors, but leave them in the water, being that they are sure that they will take him again, which no other nation doth. They burn not their prisoners, but knock them in the head, or slay them with arrows, saying it's not decent for men to be so cruel. They have a stone of turquoise from the nation of the buff and beef, with whom they had wars. They polish them and give them the form of pearl long flat round, and hang them at their nose. They find green stones, very fine, at the side of the same bay of the sea to the northwest. There is a nation called among themselves neuter, they speak the beef and Christinos' speech, being friends to both. Those poor people could not tell what to give us, they were overjoyed when we said, we should bring them commodities. We went up on another river, to the upper lake....

---

[1] Most scholars think that Radisson and Des Groseilliers did not have the time to make this journey, which involved crossing Lake Superior, making their way to the Albany river and following it to James Bay. He is likely retailing second-hand information.

...All the circumjacent neighbours do encourage us, saying that they would venture their lives with us, for which we were much overjoyed to see them so freely disposed to go along with us. Here nothing but courage. Brother, do not lie for the French will not believe thee. All men of courage and valour, let them fetch commodities, and not stand lazing and be a beggar in the cabin. It is the way to be beloved of women, to go and bring them withal to be joyful. We present gifts to one and to another for to warn them to that end that we should make the earth quake, and give terror to the Iroquois if they were so bold as to show themselves....

THE EXPLORERS RETURN TO QUÉBEC

The Governor, seeing us come back with a considerable sum for our own particular [share] and seeing that his time was expired, and that he was to go away, made use of that excuse to do us wrong, and to enrich himself with the goods that we had so dearly bought. And by our means we made the country to subsist, that without us had been I believe oftentimes quite undone and ruined, and the better to say at his last breading, no castors no ship, and what to do without necessary commodities.[1] He made also my brother prisoner for not having observed his orders and to be gone without his leave although one of his letters made him blush for shame not knowing what to say, but that he would have some of them at what price soever, that he might the better maintain his coach and horses at Paris. He fined us four thousand pounds to make a fort at the three rivers, telling us for all manner of satisfaction that he would give us leave to put our coat of arms upon it, and moreover six thousand pounds for the country, saying that we should not take it so strangely and so bad, being we were inhabitants and did intend to finish our days in the same country with our relations and friends.[2] But the bougre did grease his chops with it,[3] and more made us pay a custom which was the 4th part which came to fourteen thousand pounds, so that we had left but forty-six thousand pounds, and took away £24000. Was not he a tyrant to deal so with us after we had so hazarded our lives and having brought in less than two years by that voyage as the factors of the said country said, between forty and fifty thousand pistols.[1] For they spoke to me in this manner, in which country have you been? from whence do you come? For we never saw the like. From whence did come such excellent castors, since your arrival is come into our magazine very near six hundred thousand pounds Tournois,[2] of that filthy stinking merchandise which will be prized like gold in France. And them were the very words that they said to me.

---

[1] the better to say...commodities the reading in the manuscript, but the sense is obscure.

[2] Radisson is offended because the governor assumes they will stay in Canada. While Des Groseilliers likely did remain, Radisson would die in London.

[3] bougre scoundrel.

— (CA. 1659–60)

---

[1] pistols A pistol was a French coin, valued at about 16–18 shillings.

[2] a very large sum; approximately £46,000 in the 1660s.

Bishop Gilbert Burnet

1643 – 1715

The son of a prominent Edinburgh lawyer, Burnet attended Marischal College, Aberdeen, mastered Hebrew in Amsterdam, and became professor of divinity at Glasgow at the age of twenty-six; he refused the offer of several bishoprics—three times before he was thirty years old—before accepting that of Salisbury in 1689. A Whig and a latitudinarian who spoke out against the persecution of Catholics during the Popish Plot, Burnet had influence at both the Scottish and English royal courts and played a significant role in the religious and political life of the nation throughout the Restoration and during the Revolution of 1688. In the early 1670s Burnet was appointed chaplain to Charles II but was dismissed for criticizing the King's profligacy; he could claim better success with the Earl of Rochester, publishing an account of the deathbed repentance Rochester made while Burnet was in attendance (1680). In addition to sermons, religious treatises, biography, and polemical works, Burnet published a three-volume History of the Reformation in England (1679, 1681, 1715); his best-known work, the autobiographical History of My Own Time, was published posthumously in two volumes (1724, 1734). While the History is not always historically accurate, it is an invaluable source for the personalities of the period.

For another account of the Restoration, see the selections from John Evelyn and Anthony à Wood; for another character of the King, see the Marquis of Halifax's Character of Charles II.

◆

History of My Own Time

The Restoration

Upon the dispersing Lambert's army, Monk marched southward, and was now the object of all men's hope.[1] At London all sorts of people began to cabal together, royalists, presbyterians, and republicans. Holles told me,[2] the presbyterians pressed the royalists to be quiet, and to leave the game in their hands; for their appearing would give jealousy, and hurt that which they meant to promote. He and Ashley Cooper, Grimston and Annesley, met often with Manchester, Robarts, and the rest of the presbyterian party:[3] and the ministers of London were very active in the city: so that when Monk came up, he was pressed to declare himself. At first he would only declare for the parliament that Lambert had forced. But there was then a great fermentation all over the nation. Monk and the parliament grew jealous of one another, even while they tried who could give the best words, and express their confidence in the highest terms of one another. I will pursue the relation of this transaction no further: for this matter is well known.

The king had gone in autumn 1659 to the meeting at the Pyrenees, where Cardinal Mazarin and Don Louis de Haro were negotiating a peace.[1] He applied himself to both sides, to try what assistance he might expect upon their concluding the peace. It was then known that he went to Mass sometimes, that so he might recommend himself the more effectually to both courts; yet this was carried secretly, and was confidently denied. Mazarin still talked to Lockhart upon the foot of the old confidence:[2] for he went thither to watch over the treaty; though England was now in such convulsions, that no minister from thence could be much considered, unless it was upon his own account. But matters were ripening so fast towards a revolution in England, that the king came back to Flanders in all haste, and went from thence to Breda. Lockhart had it in his power to have made a great fortune, if he had begun first, and had brought the king to Dunkirk. As soon as the peace of the Pyrenees was made, he came over and found Monk at London, and took all the pains he could to penetrate into his designs. But Monk continued still to protest to him in the solemnest manner possible that he would be true to the commonwealth, and against the royal family. Lockhart went away, persuaded that matters would continue still in that state: so that when his old friend Middleton writ to him desiring him to make his own terms,[3] if he would invite the king to Dunkirk, he said, he was trusted by the commonwealth, and could not betray them.

---

[1] Lambert's army, Monk John Lambert (1619–1683), Major-General of the army sent unsuccessfully to oppose the march south from Scotland of the army led by George Monck (or Monk), first Duke of Albemarle (1608–1670). For more on these events, see the account of the Restoration in John Evelyn's diary.

[2] Holles Denzil Holles, first Baron Holles of Ifield (1599–1680), statesman; sided with Parliament until the mid-1640s; made a peer and a member of the Council of State at the Restoration.

[3] Anthony Ashley Cooper, first Earl of Shaftesbury (1621–1683); Sir Harbottle Grimston (1603–1685); Arthur Annesley, first Earl of Anglesey (1614–1686); Edward Montagu, second Earl of Manchester (1602–1671); Sir John Robartes (1606–1685).

The house of commons put Monk on breaking the gates of the city of London, not doubting but that would render him so odious to them, that it would force him to depend wholly on themselves. He did it: and soon after he saw how odious he was become by it. So conceiving a high indignation at those who had put him on such an ungracious piece of service, he sent about all that night to the ministers and other active citizens, assuring them that he would quickly repair that error, if they would forgive it. So the turn was sudden: for the city sent and invited him to dine the next day at Guildhall: and there he declared for the members whom the army had forced away in 1647 and 1648, who were known by the name of "the secluded members." And some happening to call the body that then sat at Westminster, the "Rump of a Parliament," a sudden humour run like a madness through the whole city of roasting the rump of all sorts of animals; and thus the city expressed themselves sufficiently. Those at Westminster had now no support: so they fell unpitied and unregarded. The secluded members came, and sat down among them; but all they would do was to give orders for the summoning a new parliament to meet the first of May: and so they declared themselves dissolved.[4]

There was still a murmuring in the army; so great care was taken to scatter them in wide quarters, and not to suffer too many of those who were still for the old cause to lie near one another.[5] The well and the ill affected were so mixed, that in case of any insurrection some might be ready at hand to resist them. They changed the officers that were ill affected, who were not thought fit to be trusted with the commanding those of their own stamp: and so created a mistrust between the officers and the soldiery. And above all they took care to have no more troops than was necessary about the city: and these were the best affected. This was managed with great diligence and skill: and by this conduct was that great turn brought about without the least tumult or any bloodshed; which was beyond what any person could have imagined. Of all this Monk had both the praise and the reward; though I have been told a very small share of it belonged to him. Admiral Montague was then in the chief command at sea, newly returned from the Sound, where he and De Ruyter, upon the orders they received from their masters, had brought the two northern kings to a peace;[1] the king of Sweden dying as it was a making up. He was soon gained to be for the king; and he dealt so effectually with the whole fleet, that the turn there was as silently brought about, without any revolt or opposition, as it had been in the army. The republicans went about as madmen, to rouse up their party; but their time was past. All were either as men amazed or asleep: they had neither the skill nor the courage to make any opposition. The elections of parliament men ran all the other way. So they saw their business was quite lost, and they felt themselves struck as with a spirit of giddiness; and then every man thought only how to save or secure himself. And now they saw how deceitful the argument was from success, which they had used so oft, and triumphed so much upon. For whereas success in the field, which was the foundation of their argument, depended much upon the conduct and courage of armies, in which the will of man had a large share, here was a thing of another nature. Their union was broke, and their courage sank, without any visible reason for either; and a nation that had run on long in such a fierce opposition to the royal family was now turned as one man to call home the king.

---

[1] Cardinal Jules Mazarin (1602–1661), first minister of France, and Luis Méndez de Haro (1598–1661), chief minister of Spain, negotiated a peace between their two countries in November 1659.

[2] Lockhart Sir William Lockhart (1621–1676) began the civil wars on the Royalist side, but served as Cromwell's Ambassador to Paris during the second half of the 1650s.

[3] Middleton John Middleton, first Earl of Middleton (1619–1674).

[4] This was the formal ending of the "Long Parliament" after twenty years (November 1640–February 1660).

[5] old cause republicanism.

The nation had one great happiness during the long course of the civil wars, that no foreigners had got footing among them. Spain was sinking to nothing: France was under a base spirited minister:[2] and both were in war all the while. Now a peace was made between them, and very probably, according to what is in Mazarin's letters, they would have joined forces to have restored the king. The nation was by this means entirely in its own hands: and now, returning to its wits, was in a condition to put every thing in joint again: whereas, if foreigners had been possessed of any important place, they might have had a large share of the management, and would have been sure to have taken care of themselves. Enthusiasm was now languid: for that, owing its mechanical force to the liveliness of the blood and spirits, men in disorder and depressed could not raise in themselves those heats with which they were formerly wont to transport both themselves and others.[3] Chancellor Hyde was all this while very busy:[4] he sent over Dr. Morley,[5] who talked with the presbyterians much of great moderation in general, but would enter into no particulars: only he took care to let them know he was a Calvinist: and they had the best opinion of such of the Church of England as were of that persuasion. Hyde wrote in the king's name to all the leading men, and got the king himself to write a great many letters in a very obliging manner. Some that had been faulty sent over considerable presents, with assurances that they would redeem all that was past with their zeal for the future. These were all accepted of: their money was also very welcome; for the king needed money when his matters were on that crisis, and he had many tools at work, the management of which was so entirely the chancellor's single performance that there was scarce any other that had so much as a share in it with him. He kept a register of all the king's promises, and of his own; and did all that lay in his power afterwards to get them all to be performed. He was also all that while giving the king many wise and good advices; but he did it too much with the air of a governor, or of a lawyer. Yet then the king was wholly in his hands.

---

[1] Edward Montagu, first Earl of Sandwich (1625–1672) and the patron of Samuel Pepys; Michiel Adriaanszoon de Ruyter (1607–1676), the brilliant Dutch admiral who would lead his navy against the English during the Anglo-Dutch wars of the 1660s and 1670s. The treaty of Copenhagen (1660) confirmed the peace between Sweden and Denmark, the two "northern kings." The Sound or Ørsund is the narrow strait separating Denmark and Sweden.

[2] a base spirited minister Cardinal Mazarin.

[3] Enthusiasm religious enthusiasm, specifically the more "inspired" devotional practices that arose during the Interregnum; see the discussion by John Locke.

[4] Hyde Edward Hyde, later made the first Earl of Clarendon (1609–1674), Lord Chancellor (since 1658) and Charles II's chief advisor.

[5] Morley George Morley (1597–1684), later made Bishop of Winchester; he would preach Charles II's coronation sermon.

I need not open the scene of the new parliament, or convention, as it came afterwards to be called, because it was not summoned by the king's writ. Such an unanimity appeared in their proceedings, that there was not the least dispute among them, but upon one single point: yet that was a very important one. Hale, afterwards the famous chief justice,[1] moved that a committee might be appointed to look into the propositions that had been made, and the concessions that had been offered by the late king during the war, particularly at the treaty of Newport,[2] that from thence they might digest such propositions as they should think fit to be sent over to the king. This was well seconded, but I do not remember by whom. It was foreseen that such a motion might be set on foot: so Monk was instructed how to answer it, whensoever it should be proposed. He told the house, that there was yet, beyond all men's hopes, an universal quiet all over the nation; but there were many incendiaries still at work, trying where they could first raise the flame. He said, he had such copious informations sent him of these things, that it was not fit they should be generally known: he could not answer for the peace, either of the nation or of the army, if any delay was put to the sending for the king: what need was there of sending propositions to him? Might they not as well prepare them, and offer them to him, when he should come over? He was to bring neither army nor treasure with him, either to fright them or to corrupt them. So he moved, that they would immediately send commissioners to bring over the king: and said, that he must lay the blame of all the blood or mischief that might follow on the heads of those that should still insist on any motion that might delay the present settlement of the nation. This was echoed with such a shout over the house, that the motion was no more insisted on.

This was indeed the great service that Monk did. It was chiefly owing to the post he was in, and to the credit he had gained: for as to the restoration itself, the tide made so strong that he only went into it so dexterously as to get much fame and great rewards for that which will have still a great appearance in history. If he had died soon after, he might have been more justly admired, because less known, and seen only in one advantageous light: but he lived long enough to have his stupidity and his other ill qualities be well known: so false a judgment are men apt to make upon outward appearances. To the king's coming in without conditions may be well imputed all the errors of his reign: and therefore when the earl of Southampton came to see and feel what he was like to prove,[3] he said once in great wrath to chancellor Hyde, it was to him they owed all they either felt or feared; for if he had not possessed them in all his letters with such an opinion of the king, they would have taken care to have put it out of his power either to do himself or them that mischief that was like to be the effect of their trusting him so entirely. Hyde answered, that he thought he had so true a judgment, and so much good nature, that when the age of pleasure should be over, and the idleness of his exile, which made him seek new pleasures for want of other employment, was turned to an obligation to mind affairs, then he would have shaken off those unhappy entanglements. I must often put my reader in mind, that I leave all common transactions to ordinary books. If at any time I say things that occur in other books, it is partly to keep the thread of the narration in an unintangled method, and partly because I either have not read these things in books, or, at least, I do not remember to have read them so clearly and particularly as I have related them. I now leave a mad and confused scene, to open a more august and splendid one....

---

[1] Hale Sir Matthew Hale (1609–1676), made Lord Chief Justice in 1671.

[2] the treaty of Newport negotiated between Charles I and the Parliamentary "peace" party in 1648.

[3] Southampton Thomas Wriothesley, fourth Earl of Southampton (1607–1667), Lord High Treasurer (1660–1667).

REIGN OF KING CHARLES II

With the restoration of the king a spirit of extravagant joy being spread over the nation, that brought on with it the throwing off the very professions of virtue and piety: all ended in entertainments and drunkenness, which overran the three kingdoms to such a degree, that it very much corrupted all their morals. Under the colour of drinking the king's health, there were great disorders and much riot everywhere: and the pretences to religion, both in those of the hypocritical sort, and of the more honest but no less pernicious enthusiasts, gave great advantages, as well as they furnished much matter, to the profane mockers at all true piety. Those who had been concerned in the former transactions thought they could not redeem themselves from the censures and jealousies that these brought on them by any method that was more sure and more easy, than by going in to the stream, and laughing at all religion, telling or making stories to expose both themselves and their party as impious and ridiculous.

The king was then thirty years of age, and, as might have been supposed, past the levities of youth and the extravagance of pleasure. He had a very good understanding: he knew well the state of affairs both at home and abroad. He had a softness of temper, that charmed all who came near him, till they found how little they could depend on good looks, kind words, and fair promises, in which he was liberal to excess, because he intended nothing by them but to get rid of importunity, and to silence all further pressing upon him. He seemed to have no sense of religion: both at prayers and sacrament he, as it were, took care to satisfy people that he was in no sort concerned in that about which he was employed: so that he was very far from being an hypocrite, unless his assisting at those performances was a sort of hypocrisy, as no doubt it was; but he was sure not to increase that by any the least appearance of devotion. He said once to my self, he was no atheist, but he could not think God would make a man miserable only for taking a little pleasure out of the way. He disguised his popery to the last: but when he talked freely, he could not help letting himself out against the liberty that under the Reformation all men took of inquiring into matters: for from their inquiring into matters of religion, they carried the humour further, to inquire into matters of state. He said often, he thought government was a much safer and easier thing where the authority was believed infallible, and the faith and submission of the people was implicit: about which I had once much discourse with him. He was affable and easy, and loved to be made so by all about him. The great art of keeping him long was, the being easy, and the making every thing easy to him. He had made such observations on the French government, that he thought a king who might be checked, or have his ministers called to an account by a parliament, was but a king in name. He had a great compass of knowledge, though he was never capable of great application or study. He understood the mechanics and physic: and was a good chemist, and much set on several preparations of mercury, chiefly the fixing it. He understood navigation well: but above all he knew the architecture of ships so perfectly, that in that respect he was exact rather more than became a prince. His apprehension was quick, and his memory good; and he was an everlasting talker. He told his stories with a good grace: but they came in his way too often. He had a very ill opinion both of men and women; and did not think there was either sincerity or chastity in the world out of principle, but that some had either the one or the other out of humour or vanity. He thought that nobody served him out of love: and so he was quits with all the world, and loved others as little as he thought they loved him. He hated business, and could not be easily brought to mind any: but when it was necessary, and he was set to it, he would stay as long as his ministers had work for him. The ruin of his reign, and of all his affairs, was occasioned chiefly by his delivering himself up at his first coming over to a mad range of pleasure. One of the race of the Villiers, then married to Palmer, a papist, soon after made earl of Castlemaine, who afterwards, being separated from him, was advanced to be duchess of Cleveland, was his first and longest mistress, by whom he had five children.[1] She was a woman of great beauty, but most enormously vicious and ravenous, foolish but imperious, ever uneasy to the king, and always carrying on intrigues with other men, while yet she pretended she was jealous of him. His passion for her, and her strange behaviour towards him, did so disorder him, that often he was not master of himself, nor capable of minding business, which, in so critical a time, required great application: but he did then so entirely trust the earl of Clarendon that he left all to his care, and submitted to his advices as to so many oracles.

—1724

---

[1] Barbara Villiers, Countess of Castlemaine and Duchess of Cleveland (1641–1709); her complaisant husband was Roger Palmer, created Earl of Castlemaine in 1661 to propitiate his wife's jealousy over Charles' marriage to Catharine of Braganza. The King was not her only lover. In 1667 she played a significant role in the campaign that led to the downfall of the Earl of Clarendon.

John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester

1647 – 1680

Though born into the nobility, Rochester inherited little, but he could call upon the goodwill of Charles II, at first because his father had helped the King after the Royalist defeat at the battle of Worcester, and later because the King found him amusing. At Wadham College, Oxford, he began to demonstrate poetic ability, and contributed to a university collection on the restoration of Charles II, and to another on the death of Princess Mary of Orange (1661). On leaving Oxford he went on an extended journey through France and Italy with a tutor, returning in 1664. In 1665 he volunteered for service on the Royal Katherine, and took part in an attack on Dutch ships in the Danish harbour of Bergen. On more than one occasion he exhibited bravery under fire.

The court of Charles II was not distinguished for adherence to puritan morality, and Rochester soon became known for drunkenness and sexual profligacy. Towards the end of his life, when ill health occasioned by his excesses brought him to a more thoughtful frame of mind, he declared that at one period he had been constantly drunk for five years together. Nevertheless, he retained his considerable poetic ability. Rochester's verse is textually complex: while he did publish a few poems in his lifetime, his work circulated primarily in manuscript and was shaped by the fluidity of manuscript transmission. A professionally produced scribal anthology was the source behind the printed editions that appeared shortly after his death. Though much of his verse might be thought offensive, to suppress it is to suppress a source of insight into an aspect of Charles II's court which occasioned racy contemporary memoirs and has inspired historical novelists and popularizing historians ever since. In his own time, it was not only the "official" puritans who disapproved of the licentiousness of the court of Charles II; it caused distress to a good many Royalists, even those like Pepys whose own lives were not beyond reproach. During his final illness, Rochester sent for Gilbert Burnet to come and hear his confession. Burnet's Some Passages on the Life and Death of John, Earl of Rochester (1680) has been popular reading for students of the period ever since.

Song[1]

Quoth the Duchess of Cleveland to counselor Knight,[2]
"I'd fain have a prick, knew I how to come by 't.
I desire you'll be secret and give your advice:
Though cunt be not coy, reputation is nice."

"To some cellar in Sodom Your Grace must retire[3]
Where porters with black-pots sit round a coal-fire;
There open your case, and Your Grace cannot fail
Of a dozen of pricks for a dozen of ale."

"Is 't so?" quoth the Duchess. "Aye, by God!" quoth the whore.
"Then give me the key that unlocks the back door,

---

[1] The dates given for this and the following poems are those of the earliest printed texts. For more complete information see David M. Vieth, ed., Complete Poems (New Haven: Yale U P, 1968), 171–220; Peter Beal, Index of English Literary Manuscripts vol. 2, pt. 2 (London: Mansell, 1993), 225–87; and the textual apparatus in Harold Love, ed., Works (Oxford: Oxford U P, 1998).

[2] Duchess of Cleveland Barbara Palmer, formerly Countess of Castlemaine. One of the most important mistresses of Charles II in the decade after the Restoration, she had several other lovers; Knight Mary Knight, singer and minor mistress of Charles II.

[3] Sodom in reference to a disreputable district of London.

For I'd rather be fucked by porters and car-men [1]
Than thus be abused by Churchill and Jermyn." [2]
—1680

Upon His Leaving His Mistress

'Tis not that I am weary grown
Of being yours, and yours alone;
But with what face can I incline
To damn you to be only mine?
You, whom some kinder power did fashion,
By merit and by inclination,
The joy at least of one whole nation.

Let meaner spirits of your sex
With humbler aims their thoughts perplex,
And boast if by their arts they can
Contrive to make one happy man;
Whilst, moved by an impartial sense,
Favors like nature you dispense
With universal influence.

See, the kind seed-receiving earth
To every grain affords a birth.
On her no showers unwelcome fall
Her willing womb retains 'em all.
And shall my Celia be confined?
No! Live up to thy mighty mind,
And be the mistress of mankind.
—1680

A Satire Against Reason and Mankind

Were I (who to my cost already am
One of those strange, prodigious creatures, man)
A spirit free to choose, for my own share,
What case of flesh and blood I pleased to wear,
I'd be a dog, a monkey, or a bear,
Or anything but that vain animal
Who is so proud of being rational.
The senses are too gross, and he'll contrive
A sixth, to contradict the other five,
And before certain instinct, will prefer
Reason, which fifty times for one does err;
Reason, an ignis fatuus in the mind, [3]
Which, leaving light of nature, sense, behind,
Pathless and dangerous wandering ways it takes
Through error's fenny bogs and thorny brakes;
Whilst the misguided follower climbs with pain
Mountains of whimseys, heaped in his own brain;
Stumbling from thought to thought, falls headlong down
Into doubt's boundless sea, where, like to drown,
Books bear him up awhile, and make him try
To swim with bladders of philosophy;
In hopes still to o'ertake th' escaping light,
The vapor dances in his dazzling sight
Till, spent, it leaves him to eternal night.
Then old age and experience, hand in hand,
Lead him to death, and make him understand,
After a search so painful and so long,
That all his life he has been in the wrong.
Huddled in dirt the reasoning engine lies,
Who was so proud, so witty, and so wise.
Pride drew him in, as cheats their bubbles catch,
And made him venture to be made a wretch.
His wisdom did his happiness destroy,
Aiming to know that world he should enjoy.
And wit was his vain, frivolous pretense
Of pleasing others at his own expense,
For wits are treated just like common whores:
First they're enjoyed, and then kicked out of doors.
The pleasure past, a threatening doubt remains
That frights th' enjoyer with succeeding pains.

---

[1] car-men drivers of horse-drawn carts.

[2] Churchill and Jermyn John Churchill, who later became the Duke of Marlborough; Henry Jermyn, Master of the Horse to the Duke of York. On July 30, 1667, Pepys goes into some detail on the King quarrelling with her on Jermyn's account.

[3] ignis fatuus a thing that misleads by means of fugitive appearances (OED will o' the wisp fig 1).

Women and men of wit are dangerous tools,
And ever fatal to admiring fools:
Pleasure allures, and when the fops escape,
'Tis not that they're belov'd, but fortunate,
And therefore what they fear at heart, they hate.
But now, methinks, some formal band and beard[1]
Takes me to task. Come on, sir; I'm prepared.
"Then, by your favor, anything that's writ
Against this gibing, jingling knack called wit
Likes me abundantly; but you take care
Upon this point, not to be too severe.
Perhaps my muse were fitter for this part,
For I profess I can be very smart
On wit, which I abhor with all my heart.
I long to lash it in some sharp essay,
But your grand indiscretion bids me stay
And turns my tide of ink another way.
"What rage ferments in your degenerate mind
To make you rail at reason and mankind?
Blest, glorious man! to whom alone kind heaven
An everlasting soul has freely given,
Whom his great Maker took such care to make
That from himself he did the image take
And this fair frame in shining reason dressed
To dignify his nature above beast;
Reason, by whose aspiring influence
We take a flight beyond material sense,
Dive into mysteries, then soaring pierce
The flaming limits of the universe,
Search heaven and hell, find out what's acted there,
And give the world true grounds of hope and fear."
Hold, mighty man, I cry, all this we know
From the pathetic pen of Ingelo,
From Patrick's Pilgrim, Sibbes' soliloquies,[2]
And 'tis this very reason I despise:
This supernatural gift, that makes a mite
Think he's the image of the infinite,
Comparing his short life, void of all rest,
To the eternal and the ever blest;
This busy, puzzling stirrer-up of doubt
That frames deep mysteries, then finds 'em out,
Filling with frantic crowds of thinking fools
Those reverend bedlams, colleges and schools;
Borne on whose wings, each heavy sot can pierce
The limits of the boundless universe;
So charming ointments make an old witch fly
And bear a crippled carcass through the sky.
'Tis this exalted power, whose business lies
In nonsense and impossibilities,
This made a whimsical philosopher
Before the spacious world, his tub prefer,[3]
And we have modern cloistered coxcombs who
Retire to think, 'cause they have nought to do.
But thoughts are given for action's government;
Where action ceases, thought's impertinent.
Our sphere of action is life's happiness,
And he who thinks beyond, thinks like an ass.
Thus, whilst against false reasoning I inveigh,
I own right reason, which I would obey:
That reason which distinguishes by sense
And gives us rules of good and ill from thence,
That bounds desires with a reforming will
To keep 'em more in vigor, not to kill.
Your reason hinders, mine helps to enjoy,
Renewing appetites yours would destroy.
My reason is my friend, yours is a cheat;
Hunger calls out, my reason bids me eat;
Perversely, yours your appetite does mock:
This asks for food, that answers, "What's o'clock?"
This plain distinction, sir, your doubt secures:
'Tis not true reason I despise, but yours.
Thus I think reason righted, but for man,
I'll ne'er recant; defend him if you can.

---

[1] some formal band and beard some pedantic scholar or clergyman.

[2] From the pathetic pen...Sibbes' soliloquies Nathaniel Ingelo (ca. 1621–1683), author of sermons, poetry and a religious romance; Simon Patrick (1626–1707), author of The Parable of the Pilgrim; Richard Sibbes (1577–1635), Puritan divine who published sermons and verse.

[3] a whimsical philosopher Diogenes the Cynic.

For all his pride and his philosophy,
'Tis evident beasts are, in their degree,
As wise at least, and better far than he.
Those creatures are the wisest who attain,
By surest means, the ends at which they aim.
If therefore Jowler finds and kills his hares
Better than Meres supplies committee chairs, [1]
Though one's a statesman, th' other but a hound,
Jowler, in justice, would be wiser found.
You see how far man's wisdom here extends;
Look next if human nature makes amends:
Whose principles most generous are, and just,
And to whose morals you would sooner trust.
Be judge yourself, I'll bring it to the test:
Which is the basest creature, man or beast?
Birds feed on birds, beasts on each other prey,
But savage man alone does man betray.
Pressed by necessity, they kill for food;
Man undoes man to do himself no good.
With teeth and claws by nature armed, they hunt
Nature's allowance, to supply their want.
But man, with smiles, embraces, friendship, praise,
Inhumanly his fellow's life betrays;
With voluntary pains works his distress,
Not through necessity, but wantonness.
For hunger or for love they fight and tear,
Whilst wretched man is still in arms for fear.
For fear he arms, and is of arms afraid,
By fear to fear successively betrayed;
Base fear, the source whence his best passions came:
His boasted honor, and his dear-bought fame;
That lust of power, to which he's such a slave,
And for the which alone he dares be brave;
To which his various projects are designed;
Which makes him generous, affable, and kind;
For which he takes such pains to be thought wise,
And screws his actions in a forced disguise,
Leading a tedious life in misery
Under laborious, mean hypocrisy.
Look to the bottom of his vast design,
Wherein man's wisdom, power, and glory join:
The good he acts, the ill he does endure,
'Tis all from fear, to make himself secure.
Merely for safety, after fame we thirst,
For all men would be cowards if they durst.
And honesty's against all common sense:
Men must be knaves, 'tis in their own defence.
Mankind's dishonest; if you think it fair
Amongst known cheats to play upon the square,
You'll be undone.
Nor can weak truth your reputation save:
The knaves will all agree to call you knave.
Wronged shall he live, insulted o'er, oppressed,
Who dares be less a villain than the rest.
Thus, sir, you see what human nature craves:
Most men are cowards, all men should be knaves.
The difference lies, as far as I can see,
Not in the thing itself, but the degree,
And all the subject matter of debate
Is only: Who's a knave of the first rate?

All this with indignation have I hurled
At the pretending part of the proud world,
Who, swollen with selfish vanity, devise
False freedoms, holy cheats, and formal lies
Over their fellow slaves to tyrannize.
But if in Court so just a man there be
(In Court a just man, yet unknown to me)
Who does his needful flattery direct,
Not to oppress and ruin, but protect (Since flattery, which way soever laid,
Is still a tax on that unhappy trade);
If so upright a statesman you can find,
Whose passions bend to his unbiased mind,
Who does his arts and policies apply
To raise his country, not his family,
Nor, whilst his pride owned avarice withstands,
Receives close bribes through friends' corrupted hands—
Is there a churchman who on God relies;

---

[1] Meres Sir Thomas Meres (1635–1715) was often Chairman when the House of Commons sat as a committee of the whole.

Whose life, his faith and doctrine justifies?
Not one blown up with vain prelatic pride,[1]
Who, for reproof of sins, does man deride;
Whose envious heart makes preaching a pretense,
With his obstreperous, saucy eloquence,
To chide at kings, and rail at men of sense;
None of that sensual tribe whose talents lie
In avarice, pride, sloth, and gluttony;
Who hunt good livings, but abhor good lives;
Whose lust exalted to that height arrives
They act adultery with their own wives,
And ere a score of years completed be,
Can from the lofty pulpit proudly see
Half a large parish their own progeny;
Nor doting bishop who would be adored
For domineering at the council board,
A greater fop in business at fourscore,
Fonder of serious toys, affected more,
Than the gay, glittering fool at twenty proves
With all his noise, his tawdry clothes, and loves;
But a meek, humble man of honest sense,
Who, preaching peace, does practice continence;
Whose pious life's a proof he does believe
Mysterious truths, which no man can conceive.
If upon earth there dwell such God-like men,
I'll here recant my paradox to them,
Adore those shrines of virtue, homage pay,
And, with the rabble world, their laws obey.
If such there be, yet grant me this at least:
Man differs more from man, than man from beast.
—1679 (ll. 1–173), 1680

The Disabled Debauchee[2]

As some brave admiral, in former war
Deprived of force, but pressed with courage still,
Two rival fleets appearing from afar,
Crawl to the top of an adjacent hill;

From whence, with thoughts full of concern, he views
The wise and daring conduct of the fight,
Whilst each bold action to his mind renews
His present glory and his past delight;

From his fierce eyes flashes of fire he throws,
As from black clouds when lightning breaks away;
Transported, thinks himself amidst the foes,
And absent, yet enjoys the bloody day;

So, when my days of impotence approach,
And I'm by pox and wine's unlucky chance
Forced from the pleasing billows of debauch
On the dull shore of lazy temperance,

My pains at least some respite shall afford
While I behold the battles you maintain
When fleets of glasses sail about the board,
From whose broadsides volleys of wit shall rain.

Nor let the sight of honorable scars,
Which my too forward valor did procure,
Frighten new-listed soldiers from the wars:
Past joys have more than paid what I endure.

Should any youth (worth being drunk) prove nice,
And from his fair inviter meanly shrink,
'Twill please the ghost of my departed vice
If, at my counsel, he repent and drink.

Or should some cold-complexioned sot forbid,
With his dull morals, our bold night-alarms,
I'll fire his blood by telling what I did
When I was strong and able to bear arms.

I'll tell of whores attacked, their lords at home;
Bawds' quarters beaten up, and fortress won;

---

[1] prelatic A prelate is a high-ranking church dignitary.

[2] The verse-form of this poem is that of the heroic stanza, that is, an iambic pentameter quatrain, rhyming abab. Here used satirically, it was commonly used in the period for serious works.

Windows demolished, watches overcome;
And handsome ills by my contrivance done.

Nor shall our love-fits, Chloris, be forgot,
When each the well-looked linkboy strove t' enjoy,[1]
And the best kiss was the deciding lot
Whether the boy fucked you, or I the boy.

With tales like these I will such thoughts inspire
As to important mischief shall incline:
I'll make him long some ancient church to fire,
And fear no lewdness he's called to by wine.

Thus, statesmanlike, I'll saucily impose,
And safe from action, valiantly advise;
Sheltered in impotence, urge you to blows,
And being good for nothing else, be wise.
—1680

Song

By all love's soft, yet mighty powers,
It is a thing unfit
That men should fuck in time of flowers,[2]
Or when the smock's beshit.

Fair nasty nymph, be clean and kind,
And all my joys restore
By using paper still behind
And sponges for before.

My spotless flames can ne'er decay
If after every close,
My smoking prick escape the fray
Without a bloody nose.

If thou wouldst have me true, be wise
And take to cleanly sinning;
None but fresh lovers' pricks can rise
At Phyllis in foul linen.
—1680

The Imperfect Enjoyment[3]

Naked she lay, clasped in my longing arms,
I filled with love, and she all over charms;
Both equally inspired with eager fire,
Melting through kindness, flaming in desire.
With arms, legs, lips close clinging to embrace,
She clips me to her breast, and sucks me to her face.
Her nimble tongue, Love's lesser lightning, played
Within my mouth, and to my thoughts conveyed
Swift orders that I should prepare to throw
The all-dissolving thunderbolt below.
My fluttering soul, sprung with the pointed kiss,
Hangs hovering o'er her balmy brinks of bliss.
But whilst her busy hand would guide that part
Which should convey my soul up to her heart,
In liquid raptures I dissolve all o'er,
Melt into sperm, and spend at every pore.
A touch from any part of her had done 't:
Her hand, her foot, her very look's a cunt.
Smiling, she chides in a kind murmuring noise,
And from her body wipes the clammy joys,
When, with a thousand kisses wandering o'er
My panting bosom, "Is there then no more?"
She cries. "All this to love and rapture's due;
Must we not pay a debt to pleasure too?"
But I, the most forlorn, lost man alive,
To show my wished obedience vainly strive:
I sigh, alas! and kiss, but cannot swive.
Eager desires confound my first intent,
Succeeding shame does more success prevent,

---

[1] linkboy a boy employed to carry a link (a torch made of tow and pitch) to light passengers along the street (OED link-boy sb 3).

[2] flowers the menstrual discharge (OED flower sb 2b).

[3] Rochester's contribution to a group of contemporary poems treating sexual disappointment, all loosely inspired by Ovid, Amores, III.vii; see Aphra Behn's "The Disappointment."

And rage at last confirms me impotent.
Ev'n her fair hand, which might bid heat return
To frozen age, and make cold hermits burn,
Applied to my dead cinder, warms no more
Than fire to ashes could past flames restore.
Trembling, confused, despairing, limber, dry,
A wishing, weak, unmoving lump I lie.
This dart of love, whose piercing point, oft tried,
With virgin blood ten thousand maids have dyed;
Which nature still directed with such art
That it through every cunt reached every heart—
Stiffly resolved, 'twould carelessly invade
Woman or man,[1] nor ought its fury stayed:
Where'er it pierced, a cunt it found or made—
Now languid lies in this unhappy hour,
Shrunk up and sapless like a withered flower.
    Thou treacherous, base deserter of my flame,
False to my passion, fatal to my fame,
Through what mistaken magic dost thou prove
So true to lewdness, so untrue to love?
What oyster-cinder-beggar-common whore
Didst thou e'er fail in all thy life before?
When vice, disease, and scandal lead the way,
With what officious haste dost thou obey!
Like a rude, roaring hector in the streets
Who scuffles, cuffs, and justles all he meets,
But if his King or country claim his aid,
The rakehell villain shrinks and hides his head;
Ev'n so thy brutal valor is displayed,
Breaks every stew,[2] does each small whore invade,
But when great Love the onset does command,
Base recreant to thy price, thou dar'st not stand.
Worst part of me, and henceforth hated most,
Through all the town a common fucking post,
On whom each whore relieves her tingling cunt
As hogs on gates do rub themselves and grunt,
Mayst thou to ravenous chancres be a prey,
Or in consuming weepings waste away;
May strangury and stone thy days attend;[3]
May'st thou ne'er piss, who didst refuse to spend
When all my joys did on false thee depend.
    And may ten thousand abler pricks agree
    To do the wronged Corinna right for thee.[4]
—1680

A Ramble in St. James's Park[5]

Much wine had passed, with grave discourse
Of who fucks who, and who does worse[6]
(Such as you usually do hear
From those that diet at the Bear),[7]
When I, who still take care to see
Drunkenness relieved by lechery,
Went out into St. James's Park
To cool my head and fire my heart.
But though St. James has th' honor on 't,
'Tis consecrate to prick and cunt.
There, by a most incestuous birth,
Strange woods spring from the teeming earth;
For they relate how heretofore,
When ancient Pict began to whore,
Deluded of his assignation
(Jilting, it seems, was then in fashion),
Poor pensive lover, in this place
Would frig upon his mother's face;
Whence rows of mandrakes tall did rise
Whose lewd tops fucked the very skies.[8]
Each imitative branch does twine

---

[1] or man Some manuscripts read "Woman, nor man" (the heterosexual reading); another, less textually reliable group offers "or boy."

[2] stew (more often stews) brothel.

[3] strangury and stone diseases of the urinary tract.

[4] Corinna Ovid's principal mistress in Amores.

[5] Ramble defined by Samuel Johnson as "to rove loosely in lust"; the "ramble poem" was a popular satirical sub-genre in the period.

[6] For a contemporary poem that takes this kind of "grave discourse" for its subject, see "Court Satire."

[7] the Bear a tavern.

[8] ancient Pict…very skies This passage parodies Edmund Waller's "On the Park at St. James's" (1660), which celebrated the planting of new trees in the park by Charles II.

In some loved fold of Aretine, [1]
And nightly now beneath their shade
Are buggeries, rapes, and incests made.
Unto this all-sin-sheltering grove
Whores of the bulk and the alcove, [2]
Great ladies, chambermaids, and drudges,
The ragpicker, and heiress trudges.
Car-men, divines, great lords, and tailors,
Prentices, poets, pimps, and jailers,
Footmen, fine fops do here arrive,
And here promiscuously they swive.
Along these hallowed walks it was
That I beheld Corinna pass.
Whoever had been by to see
The proud disdain she cast on me
Through charming eyes, he would have swore
She dropped from heaven that very hour,
Forsaking the divine abode
In scorn of some despairing god.
But mark what creatures women are:
How infinitely vile, when fair!
Three knights o' th' elbow and the slur [3]
With wriggling tails made up to her.
The first was of your Whitehall blades,
Near kin t' th' Mother of the Maids; [4]
Graced by whose favor he was able
To bring a friend t' th' Waiters' table, [5]
Where he had heard Sir Edward Sutton
Say how the King loved Banstead mutton; [6]
Since when he'd ne'er be brought to eat
By 's good will any other meat.
In this, as well as all the rest,
He ventures to do like the best,
But wanting common sense, th' ingredient
In choosing well not least expedient,
Converts abortive imitation
To universal affectation.
Thus he not only eats and talks
But feels and smells, sits down and walks,
Nay looks, and lives, and loves by rote,
In an old tawdry birthday coat.
The second was a Gray's Inn wit, [7]
A great inhabiter of the pit, [8]
Where critic-like he sits and squints,
Steals pocket handkerchiefs, and hints,
From 's neighbor, and the comedy,
To court, and pay, his landlady.
The third, a lady's eldest son
Within few years of twenty-one,
Who hopes from his propitious fate,
Against he comes to his estate,
By these two worthies to be made
A most accomplished tearing blade.
One, in a strain 'twixt tune and nonsense,
Cries, "Madam, I have loved you long since.
Permit me your fair hand to kiss";
When at her mouth her cunt cries, "Yes!"
In short, without much more ado,
Joyful and pleased, away she flew,
And with these three confounded asses
From park to hackney coach she passes.

---

[1] Aretine referring to the illustrations of sexual postures that accompanied sixteenth-century editions of sonnets by Pietro Aretino.

[2] bulk...alcove referring to women of the lowest and highest social standings: bulks were stalls that projected out from shop fronts (OED bulk sb^{2}); the alcove was the part of a room of state in which the monarch's bed was placed.

[3] knights o' th' elbow and the slur gamblers; to slur was to throw dice so that they did not roll (hence, to cheat at dice).

[4] The first Rochester sketches the character of a would-be courtier. Whitehall Palace was the home of the Restoration court, to which this young man has gained entrance by being related to the governess of the Queen's maids of honour.

[5] Waiters' table not the table for those who served food (a position of some honour), but for those who more generally "waited" on the King.

[6] Sutton...mutton Sir Edward Sutton was a Gentleman of the Privy Chamber. Since "mutton" was slang for prostitute, our young man may have misunderstood Sutton's reference to the King's fondness for mutton from Banstead Downs, Surrey.

[7] Gray's Inn one of the Inns of Court, London's centre for legal education and an important site of literary production.

[8] great inhabiter of the pit a frequent theatre-goer.

So a proud bitch does lead about
Of humble curs the amorous rout,
Who most obsequiously do hunt
The savory scent of salt-swoln cunt.
Some power more patient now relate
The sense of this surprising fate.
Gods! that a thing admired by me
Should fall to so much infamy.
Had she picked out, to rub her arse on,
Some stiff-pricked clown or well-hung parson,
Each job of whose spermatic sluice
Had filled her cunt with wholesome juice,
I the proceeding should have praised
In hope sh' had quenched a fire I raised.
Such natural freedoms are but just:
There's something generous in mere lust.
But to turn damned abandoned jade
When neither head nor tail persuade;
To be a whore in understanding,
A passive pot for fools to spend in!
The devil played booty, sure, with thee
To bring a blot on infamy.
But why am I, of all mankind,
To so severe a fate designed?
Ungrateful! Why this treachery
To humble, fond, believing me,
Who gave you privilege above
The nice allowances of love?
Did ever I refuse to bear
The meanest part your lust could spare?
When your lewd cunt came spewing home
Drenched with the seed of half the town,
My dram of sperm was supped up after
For the digestive surfeit water. [1]
Full gorgèd at another time
With a vast meal of nasty slime
Which your devouring cunt had drawn
From porters' backs and footmen's brawn,
I was content to serve you up
My ballock-full for your grace cup, [2]
Nor ever thought it an abuse
While you had pleasure for excuse—
You that could make my heart away
For noise and color, and betray
The secrets of my tender hours
To such knight-errant paramours,
When, leaning on your faithless breast,
Wrapped in security and rest,
Soft kindness all my powers did move,
And reason lay dissolved in love!
May stinking vapors choke your womb
Such as the men you dote upon!
May your depravèd appetite,
That could in whiffling fools delight,
Beget such frenzies in your mind
You may go mad for the north wind,
And fixing all your hopes upon 't
To have him bluster in your cunt,
Turn up your longing arse t' th' air
And perish in a wild despair!
But cowards shall forget to rant,
Schoolboys to frig, old whores to paint;
The Jesuits' fraternity
Shall leave the use of buggery;
Crab-louse, inspired with grace divine,
From earthly cod to heaven shall climb;
Physicians shall believe in Jesus,
And disobedience cease to please us,
Ere I desist with all my power
To plague this woman and undo her.
But my revenge will best be timed
When she is married that is limed. [3]
In that most lamentable state
I'll make her feel my scorn and hate:
Pelt her with scandals, truth or lies,
And her poor cur with jealousies,

---

[1] surfeit water a remedy for overdrinking or overeating.

[2] grace cup a final drink, consumed after grace has been said to end the meal.

[3] limed technical term for the impregnation, or coupling, of a bitch (OED lime v^3).

Till I have torn him from her breech,
While she whines like a dog-drawn bitch;
Loathed and despised, kicked out o' th' Town
Into some dirty hole alone,
To chew the cud of misery
And know she owes it all to me.
And may no woman better thrive
That dares profane the cunt I swive!
—1680

A Song of a Young Lady to her Ancient Lover

Ancient person, for whom I
All the flattering youth defy,
Long be it ere thou grow old,
Aching, shaking, crazy, cold;
But still continue as thou art,
Ancient person of my heart.

On thy withered lips and dry,
Which like barren furrows lie,
Brooding kisses I will pour
Shall thy youthful heat restore
(Such kind showers in autumn fall,
And a second spring recall);
Nor from thee will ever part,
Ancient person of my heart.

Thy nobler part, which but to name
In our sex would be counted shame,
By age's frozen grasp possessed,
From his ice shall be released,
And soothed by my reviving hand,
In former warmth and vigor stand.
All a lover's wish can reach
For thy joy my love shall teach,
And for thy pleasure shall improve
All that art can add to love.
Yet still I love thee without art,
Ancient person of my heart.
—1691

Signior Dildo[1]

You ladies all of merry England
Who have been to kiss the Duchess's hand,
Pray, did you lately observe in the show
A noble Italian called Signior Dildo?

This signior was one of Her Highness's train,
And helped to conduct her over the main;
But now she cries out, "To the Duke I will go!
I have no more need for Signior Dildo."

At the Sign of the Cross in St. James's Street,[2]
When next you go thither to make yourselves sweet
By buying of powder, gloves, essence, or so,
You may chance t' get a sight of Signior Dildo.

You'll take him at first for no person of note
Because he appears in a plain leather coat,
But when you his virtuous abilities know,
You'll fall down and worship Signior Dildo.

My Lady Southesk, heavens prosper her for 't![3]
First clothed him in satin, then brought him to Court;
But his head in the circle he scarcely durst show,
So modest a youth was Signior Dildo.

---

[1] This poem was occasioned by the marriage of James, Duke of York, to Mary of Modena. After a proxy wedding in Italy, the Duchess was met by the Duke at Dover on November 21, 1673, and the marriage ceremony was repeated.

[2] St. James's Street a fashionable street close by St. James's Palace, the Duke's residence.

[3] Lady Southesk Ann Hamilton, wife of the Earl of Southesk, was rumored to be one of the mistresses of the Duke of York.

The good Lady Suffolk, thinking no harm,
Had got this poor stranger hid under her arm.
Lady Betty by chance came the secret to know, [1]
And from her own mother stole Signior Dildo.

The Countess of Falmouth, of whom people tell,
Her footmen wear shirts of a guinea an ell, [2]
Might save the expense if she did but know
How lusty a swinger is Signior Dildo.

By the help of this gallant the Countess of Ralph [3]
Against the fierce Harrys preserved herself safe.
She stifled him almost beneath her pillow,
So closely sh' embraced Signior Dildo.

Our dainty fine duchesses have got a trick
To dote on a fool for the sake of his prick:
The fops were undone, did Their Graces but know
The discretion and vigor of Signior Dildo.

That pattern of virtue, Her Grace of Cleveland,
Has swallowed more pricks than the ocean has sand;
But by rubbing and scrubbing so large it does grow,
It is fit for just nothing but Signior Dildo.

The Duchess of Modena, though she looks high [4]
With such a gallant is contented to lie,
And for fear the English her secrets should know,
For a Gentleman Usher took Signior Dildo.

The countess o' th' Cockpit (Who knows not her name? [5]
She's famous in story for a killing dame),
When all her old lovers forsake her, I trow
She'll then be contented with Signior Dildo.

Red Howard, red Sheldon, and Temple so tall [6]
Complain of his absence so long from Whitehall;
Signior Bernard has promised a journey to go [7]
And bring back his countryman Signior Dildo.

Doll Howard no longer with 's Highness must range, [8]
And therefore is proffered this civil exchange:
Her teeth being rotten, she smells best below,
And needs must be fitted for Signior Dildo.

St. Albans, with wrinkles and smiles in his face, [9]
Whose kindness to strangers becomes his high place,
In his coach and six horses is gone to Borgo [10]
To take the fresh air with Signior Dildo.

Were this signior but known to the citizen fops,
He'd keep their fine wives from the foremen of shops;
But the rascals deserve their horns should still grow
For burning the Pope and his nephew Dildo.

---

[1] Lady Suffolk wife of the Earl of Suffolk; Lady Betty Elizabeth Howard, the daughter of Lady Barbara Suffolk.

[2] The Countess of Falmouth Mary Bagot, widow of the Earl of Falmouth; an ell the English ell was forty-five inches (OED ell 1).

[3] Countess of Ralph Elizabeth, wife of Ralph Montagu, who later became Earl and Duke of Montagu. Rhyming "Ralph" with "safe" is an English upper class pronunciation.

[4] Duchess of Modena Laura d'Este, Regent of Modena and mother of Mary of Modena, the new wife of James, Duke of York.

[5] The countess o' th' Cockpit The reference is uncertain. Some speculate that she was Anna Maria, widow of Francis Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, others that she was Nell Gwyn.

[6] Red Howard, red Sheldon, and Temple so tall Anne Howard, Frances Sheldon and Phillipa Temple, Maids of Honor to the Queen.

[7] Signior Bernard possibly Don Bernardo de Salinas, a Spanish diplomat.

[8] Doll Howard Dorothy Howard, sister to Anne Howard and Maid of Honor to the Queen.

[9] St. Albans Henry Jermyn, Earl of St. Albans. See the notes to the preceding poem.

[10] Borgo an Italian town close to Modena.

Tom Killigrew's wife, north Holland's fine flower, [1]
At the sight of this signior did fart and belch sour,
And her Dutch breeding farther to show,
Says, "Welcome to England, Mynheer Van
 Dildo!"

He civilly came to the Cockpit one night,
And proffered his service to fair Madam Knight. [2]
Quoth she, "I intrigue with Captain Cazzo; [3]
Your nose in mine arse, good Signior Dildo!"

This signior is sound, safe, ready, and dumb
As ever was candle, carrot, or thumb;
Then away with these nasty devices, and show
How you rate the just merits of Signior Dildo.

Count Cazzo, who carries his nose very high,
In passion he swore his rival should die;
Then shut up himself to let the world know
Flesh and blood could not bear it from Signior
 Dildo.

A rabble of pricks who were welcome before,
Now finding the Porter denied 'em the door,
Maliciously waited his coming below
And inhumanly fell on Signior Dildo.

Nigh wearied out, the poor stranger did fly,
And along the Pall Mall they followed full cry;
The women, concerned, from every window
Cried, "Oh! for heavens' sake, save Signior
 Dildo!"

The good Lady Sandys burst into a laughter [4]
To see how the ballocks came wobbling after,
And had not their weight retarded the foe,
Indeed 't had gone hard with Signior Dildo.
—1703

Impromptu on Charles II

God bless our good and gracious King,
 Whose promise none relies on;
Who never said a foolish thing,
 Nor ever did a wise one.
—1707

---

[1] Tom Killigrew's wife Charlotte, wife of Tom Killigrew the playwright, was First Lady of the Queen's Privy Chamber.

[2] Madam Knight Mary Knight; singer and mistress of Charles II.

[3] Cazzo colloquial Italian for "penis."

[4] Lady Sandys Lady Lucy Sandys was an acquaintance of Nell Gwyn and frequently at Court.

Elinor James
pub. 1675 – 1715

The polemical pamphleteer Elinor James was the working partner of her husband Thomas James, a successful London printer. Described by her contemporary John Dunton as a "she-state-politician," James wrote and self-published over twenty-three polemical broadsheets and pamphlets dedicated, for the most part, to the defence of the Anglican Church and conservative politics. Her staunch support of James II and her resistance to the settlement of the Glorious Revolution resulted in a conviction for "dispersing scandalous and reflective papers"; as a result, she was briefly committed to Newgate in December, 1689. While James's publications frequently offer religious and political advice to monarchs and Parliament alike, the substance of her corpus is more varied than is often acknowledged. James offers her opinion on a range of civic matters: taxation, public firework displays and apprenticeship. After her husband's death in 1711, James carried on the printing business. The date of her death is unknown.

* * *

An Injured Prince Vindicated, or, A Scurrilous and Detracting Pamphlet Answered[1]

What none, that dare in hand to take a pen;
And vindicate the most abused of men!
My once dread lord and sovereign, royal James,
So oft by Whigs reduced to hard extremes.[2]
First pluck the beam from thy most cursed eye,
And meddle not with principality:[3]
The mote in his but small, yet big by vogue,
As mountain Alps; cries every rebel rogue.
Valour and conduct his companions were,
Nor did he foreign enemies e'er fear.
But when domestics leave their lord forlorn,
And throw him to a mob's contempt and scorn,[4]
Who robbed and stripped from him his very clothes,[5]
As far from all remorse, as some break oaths.
Then finds an injured prince the greatest woe,
That ever rightful monarch e'er can know.
A king he was, and from a king he came,
A slaughtered king, to Whigs' eternal shame.[6]
Nor can the poison of their lying lips,
His sacred name and harmless life eclipse.
His pious memory will fame outlive;
Justice and truth his character shall give.
Down cursing Shimei and rude Rabshakey,
With false Ahitophel, who would betray
So well as him, even his and future all;[7]

---

[1] This broadsheet was issued in 1688, the year in which James II fled from England to France under the threat of invasion by William of Orange, his son-in-law.

[2] Whigs a name applied to the Exclusioners of 1679 who opposed the succession of James, Duke of York, to the throne, on the grounds of his being a Roman Catholic (OED Whig *sb*² A.3a).

[3] First pluck... cursed eye "Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye" (Matthew 7:5).

[4] leave emended from "leaves"; throw emended from "throws."

[5] stripped from him his very clothes emended from "Who robbed and stripped him from his very clothes."

[6] A slaughtered king Charles I.

[7] Shimei the son of Gera and a kinsman of Saul; he cursed and cast stones at King David, who was in flight from his son Absalom's rebellion (II Samuel 16:5–8); Rabshakey the field commander of the Assyrian army who derided God and berated King Hezekiah (II Kings 18:17–37; Isaiah 36:22); Ahitophel David's counsellor; he conspired with Absalom to usurp his father's throne (II Samuel 16:20–23; 17:1–3). In defences of Charles II and James II, Ahitophel represents

Where Whigs in council sit, there princes fall.
But O you damned rebels, who is it dare,
Assault one single and anointed hair?
The sacred unction by heaven's vicar shed, [1]
Preserves each royal consecrated head.
Long strove ye vipers, as ye once have done,
So well as father, to destroy the son.
Mistaken monsters, heaven did only try,
Whether a king could a good martyr die;
Else had he never come within your claws;
Ye breakers of divine and human laws.
Since such a thing permitted was to be,
'Twas left to a tribe composed of infamy.
The Almighty their great wickedness foreknew,
Had they the King of Heaven, the same they'd do:
Him if they could, they would re-crucify;
And impiously dethrone the deity.
These are the cursed destroying fiends of woe,
These are those thorns, on whom no grapes can grow;
These are those choking thistles bear no figs; [2]
These are Cain's cursed seed, Furies and Whigs. [3]
These are the murderers of our tranquil rest,
These even are those, we all ought to detest.
—1688

Mrs. James's Vindication of the Church of England, in an answer to a pamphlet entitled A New Test of the Church of England's Loyalty [4]

(excerpts)

Sir,

I am very sorry to think that you should be always such a subtle adversary, but you say, you never had an opportunity to show your spite and malice until now. You say you could never find a convincing reason, and what was the cause? Is it not because it doth not consist with your interest;[5] for that is all that you aim at, for that is the god of this world, and he hath blinded your eyes, and stupefied your understanding, and thickened your skull, so that if an angel came to instruct you, you would not be able to receive it, if it did not agree with your interest.[6] I thought liberty of conscience might have changed your disposition,[7] seeing that the king's intention is so gracious, as thinking it is the best the "wicked politician" who schemes to depose the lawful monarch.

---

[1] sacred unction anointing with oil as a symbol of investing with the office of kingship (OED unction 2); heaven's vicar presumably, in this instance, the Archbishop of Canterbury as God's representative on earth, during the Coronation ceremony; see OED vicar 1.

[2] those thorns…no figs "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" (Matthew 7:15–16); bear emended from "bears."

[3] Cain's cursed seed Cain, the firstborn of Adam and Eve, killed his brother Abel because God preferred Abel's offering (Genesis 4:1–17); Furies the avenging deities; generally avenging and tormenting spirits (OED fury sb 5a).

[4] written in response to the anonymous work A New Test of the Church of England's Loyalty (London, 1687). A New Test indicts the Church of England as an institution disloyal to English monarchy, offering as evidence: the attempted exclusion of Mary Tudor from the throne, the crowning of Elizabeth I, the murder of Mary Queen of Scots, the imposition of "universal uniformity" in "liturgy and discipline," the attempted exclusion of James II from the throne, and the failure to support James II in the "repeal of the sanguinary penal laws and the late impious tests." The author desires that the penal laws, the Corporation Act (1661) and the Test Acts (1673, 1678) be repealed so that English Catholics can worship without persecution and participate in English politics.

[5] consist agree (OED consist v 3).

[6] thickened emended from "thickens."

[7] liberty of conscience On April 4, 1687, James II announced a Declaration of Indulgence which suspended the penal laws, the Test Acts and the Corporation Act. Earlier in this pamphlet, Elinor James expresses dissatisfaction with "liberty of conscience": "As for conscience, I do not count it a sufficient guide, because it is not so infallible, but it is subject to err, and therefore it ought to be guided by the Word of God….And therefore I am not so much for liberty of conscience. But since it is the king's pleasure, I rest satisfied."

way to unite our differences, and to heal our breaches, and you know it was the care of the king and parliament, to prevent scandalous pamphlets against the king and government, and therefore it is strange to me how you can print your paper with allowance, when it is of such a pernicious nature, and its whole aim is against the government: surely those gentlemen that had the care of the government, are very negligent, or else you dare not say, with allowance; certainly none that is in authority would grant it you, and if they did, they must be treacherous to their trust, and are no friend to the king and government: for can there be anything of a more pernicious consequence than this, that would destroy the very foundation? How do you think I can bear it, when God hath filled my heart full of love and loyalty, and I know you abuse them, for you have no cause to call their loyalty into question, for I know their loyalty, and have been a labourer with them, therefore I have the greater reason to plead for them: but I know you will say I am a woman, and why should I trouble myself? Why was I not always so, when I pleaded with the parliament about the right of succession, and with Shaftesbury, and Monmouth, and at Guild Hall, and elsewhere;[1]

. . . .

I am sure my sovereign will not allow you to vilify and abuse us; for he is a prince of justice as well as mercy, and hath promised, that he will defend us, and not only so, but will venture as far as any in our vindication, and the king was satisfied with our loyalty, and declared it to the world, and how dare you condemn the king's judgment, and scandalize the Church; for all that knows her, knows her to be the only Church for loyalty: for doth any of you own the king to be supreme head and governor but she? And for your part, all the world knows what you own; so that my sovereign cannot be your supreme governor, and therefore is no comparison to be made, I myself can weigh you all down for loyalty; and if I can do so much for that am but one, what shall we all do? Therefore I know the king will not be angry with me if I vindicate the Church of England, for in [the] vindicating of her, I vindicate His Majesty, which I have always done; for when the peer's speech abused my sovereign, I answered him for I hate rebellion, and the Church doth not hinder anyone from that singular gift of loyalty, for her desire is, That all should fear God and honour the king;[2] and she is the spouse of Christ, and He will own her for His mystical body, and everyone that truly believes in Christ, is a member of that body, and all the members make the whole, and her doctrine is holy:[3] I wish those that own her, would live according to her doctrines, for then they would be safe and happy: She hath been infallible in her duty to her king, which her discontented brethren know full well,[4] for that was the only thing that they laid to her charge, that she would not be treacherous to her prince, nor side with his enemies; for if she had, you would not have been so great as you are now, though she was not for Popery as some thought, for indeed she hath always been the bulwark against it; and that makes you envy her so: for you think if you can but bring her down, you shall do well enough with the brats whom you begot, though your infallible belief in them may deceive you; for though you made them enemies to the Church of England, yet I find they will prove no friends to the Church of Rome; for indeed every good soul will rather endure anything than to be enslaved with Popery: And as for the Church of England, she never lived under the slavish fear of it, as the dissenters did, but doth trust God withal, and desires nothing else but to serve God truly, and the king rightly: And as for her revelations, as you say are peculiar to herself, is a clear mistake, and yet her Lord and Head hath promised, That the gates of hell shall not prevail against her.[1] And what is the gates of hell? But all those things that lead us to darkness and ignorance, and to fling down God's holy will, and to set up the will of men, and secretly make us to be an enemy to Christ, and a friend to Anti-Christ?[2] But Christ is able to save HIS OWN, and that you shall know, for He hath His chosen people amongst all, and I really do believe He hath His saints and servants in the Church of Rome as well as any other and I hope (out of His infinite mercy) He will reconcile our differences, and make us happy: And as for those that envy our happiness, they shall not be able to stand before the Almighty in the day of His anger, for His power is able to disperse them, and to blow them away in a minute, as his divine power did the locusts.[3] Therefore I would advise all the enemies of the Church of England to be quiet and amend for the time to come, for while we are contriving the ruin of one another, God may justly destroy us all, and bring in the heathens, who may bring forth better fruits than we: And for your allowing our loyalty to King Charles I, I do not thank you, for it is well known, or else you would not have owned it;[4] for that destruction of three kingdoms, and the death of the best of princes, is writ in God's book, and who shall be called to an account for it, God Almighty knows, but I am sure you cannot be acquitted....[5] And for your loyalty to King Charles I, was it not for your own protection? For the wrath of God was so upon you for your sins and iniquities, that you might very well have the fear of Cain upon you: And as for the liturgy and discipline, what made it so hateful, but because we had complied as near as we could to you for unity's sake. And the occasion of the war, and of that good prince losing his life and crown, might be (for ought I know) for sheltering such unfortunate men as you are, for you were not so sensible nor so honest as Jonah was, for he declared the truth, that he was the man that had offended, and by his counsel the ship was saved;[6] but you are of a contrary nature, for you do not care if you perish yourselves, for others perish with you; but the saints and servants of God are not of that nature, as Abraham, Moses, David, and Christ Himself; for He undertook death that we might live; and poverty, that through Him we might be made rich; but you are an enemy, for you would have none rich but yourselves, thinking thereby to enslave us and triumph over us. Therefore I find you have the nature of Cain, who envied his brother, because his own deeds were evil. For my part, I can call God to witness I have been always for the peace of the king and kingdom, and there is nothing in the world that is dearer to me than the king's life and happiness;

---

[1] Shaftesbury Anthony Ashley Cooper, first Earl of Shaftesbury (1621–1683); Monmouth James Scott, first Duke of Monmouth and Buccleuch (1649–1685), was the natural son of Charles II by Lucy Walter. He plotted against his father and led an armed rebellion against James II, for which he was executed.

[2] That all…the king "Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the King" (I Peter 2:17).

[3] make emended from "makes"; mystical body…the whole In I Corinthians 12, Paul argues that the Church, like the body, is a single entity made up of many members with different functions.

[4] know emended from "knows."

---

[1] are peculiar emended from "is peculiar"; gates of hell... against her "And I say also unto thee, That thou are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matthew 16:18).

[2] make emended from "makes."

[3] envy emended from "envies"; They shall...His anger "who can stand before his indignation? and who can abide in the fierceness of his anger?" (Nahum 1:6); as his divine...locusts "And the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red sea" (Exodus 10:19).

[4] And for...owned it "We will allow them, however (and that's the only thing in my opinion, they can value themselves upon), that most of the members of this communion have been faithful and serviceable to K. Ch. I. during the unhappy commotions in his reign" (A New Test 3).

[5] three kingdoms England, Scotland and Ireland.

[6] honest as Jonah Jonah resisted the divine call by fleeing on a ship to Tarshish. When the ship was battered by winds, he admitted that his disobedience caused the storm and told the mariners to cast him into the sea (Jonah 1).

and if I had a thousand lives, I could sacrifice them all in vindication of His Sacred Majesty, without the hope of rewards of gain; and there is none of my enemies can object anything against me, but being overzealous for my sovereign lord: For my blessed Saviour hath taught me, That I cannot serve two masters, and the primitive Christians were always obliged to be for the interest of the prince in whose dominions they lived;[1] so that it is our Christian duty to love and pray for our own prince, but we have nothing to do with any other; and whoever is for the interest of another, cannot be a true subject to their own: Therefore my resolution is, that I will be true to my God, my king, and my country, and I am resolved (by the blessing of Almighty God) never to change if I were to suffer a thousand deaths, because God hath instructed me in that way from my infancy, and I find it most agreeable to the Word of God and my temper, for I am naturally inclined to love kingly authority: And as for my faith, it is to believe sincerely in Christ, and there is no other faith whereby anyone can be saved; for I am sure He is the infallible rock, and I have always kept to that from the beginning, and I hope I will continue so to the end:[2] And as for the changes of religious worship, that is not anything as to matter of faith, for prayers may be altered according to people's occasions, for they were never designed to be infallible and if the common prayer hath been altered, I did not care if it had been altered again, and again, rather than it should be a stumbling block to any (though there is not anything but what I like and love) and I think there is no good Christian but may say Amen to them, and I could wish our hearts were as holy as the prayers are good, then I am sure there is nobody would be weary of them: But hath not such as you put the people out of love with them, in saying, they came out of your mass book, and this you did to wound the Church of England, for her good will towards you;

. . . .

Sir, I wonder how you dare condemn the Church of England (I mean that part of it, which is for the king, common prayer and bishops) for her faith teaches her piety to her God, and loyalty to her prince; therefore she may appropriate to herself alone, The principles of true loyalty above all; for her doctrine is true, and exhorts all to repentance and good works, and teaches a true faith in Christ, and doth not judge any heretics that differs with her, but owns that whoever truly believes in Christ and works righteousness, may be in a state of salvation: and she is Christ's beloved spouse, and He will own her, and I doubt not but her faith is great enough (with God's help) to stand against all her opposers, for Christ will beautify her for His Word's sake; for though she doth not teach us that presumption as to think that any man is infallible, yet she owns God's Word to be infallible, and eternal, and a perfect guide to salvation. I wonder how anyone can be her enemy, but why should I? Was it not so from the beginning, for was not Cain envious against Abel, and were not brave and renowned men in their generations enemies to Moses,[3] and did not the high priests plot against my blessed Saviour? And did not Christ tell his disciples, That the time would come, that they should think they did God good service to destroy them?[4] They were not heathens that did it, but those mistaken Christians that thought they should merit by it; for I find all along that Satan hath made use of those that ought to be the greatest friends, to be the most inveterate enemies, as when he made use of a disciple to betray his Lord, and that great disciple that declared most love to his Lord, was the first that disowned Him.[1] This is the spite of our spiritual adversary; and the wisdom of God suffered it so to be, that we should not trust in anything, but in the most high God, that always takes care of them that trust in Him, and none can prevent the providential care that God takes of His; and Christ's Church must look to be persecuted by the enemies of her Lord, but through Him she shall be more than a conqueror.[2] Who is he that is so presumptuous to brand her with killing of kings? She abhors such doctrines, for she is a preserver of kings and princes, and makes more of her word than the enemies doth of their infallible promise, and I doubt not but it will pass current.[3] Hath not you been angry with her kings for her sake, and for what reason, only because she owned the Word of God in sincerity: And out of envy you sent men to divide her members, and destroy her government, and have you not been contriving her ruin all along, and transforming yourselves into all shapes to bring it to pass? And who begins all quarrels but you? And do you say, That the Church is a viper? No, no, it is such as you are; for you envy our happiness, and would hurry us into a confusion, because you think the king loves us too well, and stands in the gap to hinder your intentions, and is like an angel to keep peace amongst us, that every man should enjoy his right and property: But this is contrary to your temper, for you long to enjoy what other men have; and therefore the Church of England is the great eyesore: And since the king hath been so gracious to give liberty of conscience, you think that all the dissenters should be against the Church to devour her: but God knows it was for your sakes that the laws were put against dissenters, and how many good souls were against it, but dare not speak for fear of being counted Whigs;[4] but for my part, I made application to the late king, that the laws should not be put against them, not that I loved them so well, but I knew their nature, and don't delight that any should be afflicted; no not the Roman Catholics:

---

[1] That I…two masters "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other" (Matthew 6:24).

[2] He is the infallible rock In the Old Testament, God is figured as a rock (e.g. Psalm 18:2, 62:2, 71:3), as is Christ in the New (e.g. I Corinthians 10:4). Christ is also figured as a stone (e.g. I Peter 2:4–8).

[3] were emended from "was."

[4] That the…destroy them? "They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service" (John 16:2).

. . . .

I know you would unthrone my sovereign, for to make yourselves lords and princes over us, but I hope God will never suffer it: for I know you are like the wheedling dissenters, that would not trust the king with his own power, but pretended they would employ it, and make him a glorious prince; but it was to destroy him: so you would wheedle the Church to take away her power, and then you think to do well enough with my sovereign, when you have got the power, and then you'll show your loyalty: but I hope the king will keep his power, and trust to none of you; for you will all prove treacherous if you can but make any advantage of it; for you cannot but know the sinking condition of your kingdom, and that makes you so busy; therefore you don't care who sinks, so you swim: But what is it that can hinder God's intentions, but repentance and amendment of life, for that is the glory that God desires; for that end Christ came into the world, that God might be all in all, and there is no doubt but God makes the angels ministering spirits, but they cannot do anything of themselves, for they continually wait upon the Almighty;[1] for when He moves they flee, and what injury can it be to you to pray to God that moves all things? I think it is the greatest favour that can be given to mortals, but you say, you are not worthy; and pray what is the reason of that? For did not Christ die for all that would lay hold of Him? But I find you have not attained to that excellent perfection to have a true faith in Christ, for if you had, you would never have brought your false accusations against us; for what do we do, that you find so much fault with us? for I am sure all condemn us for doing so much.[2] And as for the Dissenting Parliament, I was as much against them as any, but I wondered that they did do no more, when the late king said, he would establish the Protestant religion to the end of the world; but they were so factious they could not agree; for there was a duke stood in their way; but did not we stand for him, and overthrow all their doings? And did not we value the king's life (that now is) above our own: We could not adhere to their fair pretences, to do evil that good might come of it, neither to hurt him in the least, but trusted God with all; and if he was a king (as he is) we would lie at his mercy: And what made the dissenters to be so much against us, but because we were so much for His Majesty? And how dare any to abuse us? I have not patience to bear it, for if I let it alone, the very stones would speak in vindication of us.[3] And as for the parliament that now is, it is a very honest parliament, and I love them, and wish them all well, and they are knaves and fools that speak against them;[4] for they have established the king in his throne, and beat down his enemies, and have supplied his wants; and what is it we have not done for our sovereign? For we love him above all things in this world, for we acknowledge him to be Christ's vice-gerent, and therefore we own none (for our governor on earth) but he; and I do not doubt but our loyalty will outdo all upstart loyalty: for ours doth not proceed from Shaftesbury, but it proceeds from God: Therefore the Church of England needs not change her loyalty, neither will the king doubt it; for he is assured of her fidelity long ago; therefore she need not learn of her Catholic neighbours, for she is able to teach the world loyalty to princes. And as for the king's persuasions, he hath manifested to the world, he is a Christian Catholic and no Roman Catholic; for he doth not tie up conscience in such a narrow compass, as to think none are Christians but those that own Rome; and he hath declared, that it hath always been his opinion, and that His Majesty calls God to witness:[5]

---

[1] a disciple...his Lord Judas Iscariot; for thirty pieces of silver, he led a band of Roman soldiers to arrest Jesus (Matthew 26:15), great discipline...disowned Him Simon Peter adamantly declared his love to Jesus only to renounce him three times after Jesus's capture (Matthew 26:69–75).

[2] more than a conqueror "Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us" (Romans 8:37).

[3] pass current pass for authentic currency.

[4] were against emended from "was against."

. . . .

Do not disturb the king's peace, but rest contented, lest God clips your wings, and if you fall, I hope you will have no more resurrections in this part of the world. And though others may prompt you, to be an enemy to the Church of England, yet their fall would be your ruin. But God be thanked we have no need to fear, for the king will not withdraw his favour from us, neither shall men or devils prevent it.

And so GOD save the KING.

—1687

---

[1] That God… in all "And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all" (I Corinthians 15:28).

[2] condemn emended from "condemns."

[3] the very stones… of us When the Pharisees tell Jesus to rebuke his disciples for calling him "the King that cometh in the name of the Lord," Jesus replies: "I tell you that, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out" (Luke 19:40).

[4] speak emended from "speaks."

[5] own emended from "owns."

Thomas Wharton

1648 – 1715

In January 1687, James II appointed his friend and fellow Roman Catholic Richard Talbot, Earl and Duke of Tyrconnel (1630–91), to the position of Lord Deputy of Ireland. Tyrconnel was also general of the Irish army, a force with which he was now expected to protect James II and the Catholic cause in England. Thomas Wharton, a staunch Whig and supporter of the Protestant William of Orange, wrote Lilli Burlero shortly after the much-opposed appointment, adopting a pseudo-Irish brogue to present a conversation between two Irishmen celebrating Tyrconnel's appointment. Set to a tune by Henry Purcell, the song became popular only after it was revived in October 1688, when Irish troops entered England to bolster James's weakening position. The lyrics fit well in their new context: while the "Protestant wind" of line 18 referred originally to the storms which delayed Tyrconnel's arrival in Ireland, for example, it could now stand for William and his approaching fleet. Wharton later boasted that the song "sung a deluded Prince out of three kingdoms"; Gilbert Burnet wrote that Lilli Burlero "Made an impression on the army that cannot be imagined by those who saw it not. The whole army and at last the people, both in city and country, were singing it perpetually." A host of new songs were set to the tune, including one written by the government of James II, hoping to capitalize on the popularity of the original.

Thomas Wharton, later made Marquis of Wharton, corresponded with William of Orange in 1688 and joined him in Exeter; he would go on to an active political career and would himself become Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in 1708. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu described him as "the most profligate, impious, and shameless of men." Henry Purcell (?1658–1695) began his career as a choirboy in the Chapel Royal, and was made the organist at Westminster Abbey in 1679. One of the greatest of English composers, he wrote for the opera and the theatre as well as composing popular songs, sacred music, and instrumental music.

◆

Lilli Burlero

Ho, brother Teague, dost hear de decree, [1]
    Lilli burlero, bullen a-la;
Dat we shall have a new debittie,
    Lilli burlero bullen a-la,
    Lero lero, lero lero, lilli burlero, bullen a-la;
    Lero lero, lero lero, lilli burlero, bullen a-la. [2]

Ho, by my shoul, it is a Talbot,
And he will cut de Englishman's troat.
Though, by my shoul, de English do prat,
De law's on dare side, and Chreist knows what.

But if dispense do come from de Pope,
Weel hang Magno Cart and demselves on a rope. [3]

And the good Talbot is made a lord,
And he with brave lads is coming aboard.

Who'll all in France have taken a swear,
Dat day will have no Protestant heir.

Oh, but why does he stay behind,
Ho, by my shoul, 'tis a Protestant wind.

---

[1] Teague cant nickname for an Irishman (OED).

[2] The phrases in the refrain, parodies of Irish, are probably meaningless.

[3] Magno Cart Magna Carta, signed in 1215, guaranteed justice and security from illegal interference.

Now Tyrconnel is come a-shore,
And we shall have commissions gillore.

And he dat will not go to mass,
Shall turn out and look like an ass.

Now, now, de heretics all go down,[1]
By Chreist and St. Patrick, the nation's our own!
—1687

Ho Brother Teague doſt hear de Decree, Lil - li Burlero Bullen a - la, Dat we ſhall have a new Debittie, Lil - li Bur - le - ro Bullen a - la, Le-ro, La-ro, La-ro Le-ro, Lil-li Bur - le - ro, Bullen a la, Le - ro, La - ro, La - ro, Le - ro, Lil - li Burlero Bullen a la,

A New SONG.

Ho by my Shoul it is a T——t,
Lilli Burlero, &c.
And he will Cut all de Engliſh Troat,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

Though by my ſhoul de Ingliſh do Prat,
Lilli, &c.
De Law's on Dare ſide, and Chreiſt knows what,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

But if Diſpence do Come from de Pope,
Lilli, &c.
Weel hang Magna Carta & demſelves in a Rope,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

And the good T——t is made a Lord,
Lilli, &c.
And he with brave Lads is coming aboard,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

Who'! all in France have taken a ſwear,
Lilli, &c.
Dat day will have no Proteſtant h——r
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

O but why does he ſtay behind,
Lilli &c.
Ho by my ſhoul 'tis a Proteſtant wind,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

Now T——l is come a-ſhore,
Lilli, &c.
And we ſhall have Commiſſions gillore,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c:
Lero, Laro, &c.

And he dat will not go to M——ſs,
Lilli, &c.
Shall turn out and look like an Aſs,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

Now now de Hereticks all go down,
Lilli, &c.
By Chreiſt and St. Patrick the Nation's our own,
Lilli, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.
Lero, Laro, &c.

Lilli Burleo, with Purcell's music, as printed in a 1688 broadsheet.

---

[1] heretics Protestants.

Jane Barker

1652 – 1732

Jane Barker, who wrote verse, prose fiction and essays, was born in Blatherwicke, Northamptonshire, on May 17, 1652 to Thomas Barker and Anne Connock. Thomas Barker, a Royalist, had served as Secretary to the Great Seal of England in the court of Charles I. By 1662, Barker had moved with her family to Wilsthorpe, Lincolnshire, where her father held a lease on a manor house and sizable agricultural property owned by John Cecil, fourth Earl of Exeter. Barker's "autobiographical novels" suggest that after the death of her father and elder brother, she and her mother left Wilsthorpe for London, where she became intimate with Royalist sympathizers and converted to Roman Catholicism. After the Revolution of 1688, Barker followed the Stuarts into exile in France and lived in St. Germain-en-Laye. In 1688 Barker published Poetical Recreations, a collection of her poems followed by the verses of Cambridge students, friends of her late brother Edward. Panegyrics to virginity are scattered throughout this collection; these may reflect a defence of female independence, though they should also be considered within the broader discourse of Catholic polemics. While living in France, Barker wrote several poems in honour of the royal family and in 1700 presented a manuscript book of her poems to the Prince of Wales. Barker returned to England in 1704 to live on her farm at Wilsthorpe, where she resided with her niece Mary Barker and subsequently with Mary's two daughters. Barker paid an annual rent of £47 10s for the land at Wilsthorpe, and because she was a Roman Catholic, her leasehold property was subject to double taxation. Economic straits may have required Barker to write for profit. Between 1713 and 1726, she published five works of prose fiction and a translation of Bishop Fénelon's Lenten meditations. In 1726, Barker was near death and received the last rites. She recovered, however, and traveled to France in May, 1727. Barker attributed her survival to the miraculous curative powers of a cloth dipped in the blood of the dying James II, reporting that a touch of this cloth cured her niece's diseased eye and a cancerous tumor on her breast. There is a record of Barker's death on March 29, 1732 in the parish register of St. Germain-en-Laye.

* * *

An Invitation to my Friends at Cambridge

If, friends, you would but now this place accost,
Ere the young spring that epithet has lost,
And of my rural joys participate;
You'd learn to talk at this distracted rate.[1]

Hail, solitude, where innocence does shroud
Her unveiled beauties from the cens'ring crowd;
Let me but have her company, and I
Shall never envy this world's gallantry:
We'll find out such inventions to delude
And mock all those that mock our solitude,
That they for shame shall fly for their defence
To gentle solitude and innocence:
Then they will find how much they've been deceived,
When they the flatt'ries of this world believed.
Though to few objects here we are confined,
Yet we have full enlargement of the mind.
From varying modes, which do our lives enslave, [2]
Lo here a full immunity we have.
For here's no pride but in the sun's bright beams,
Nor murmuring, but in the crystal streams.

---

[1] accost approach (OED accost v 5); epithet an adjective indicating some quality characteristic of the thing described (OED epithet sb 1a).

[2] modes fashions, customs (OED mode II.7).

No avarice is here, but in the bees,
Nor is ambition found but in the trees. [1]
No wantonness but in the frisking lambs,
Nor luxury but when they suck their dams.
Nor are there here contrivances of states,
Only the birds contrive to please their mates;
Each minute they alternately improve
A thousand harmless ways their artless love.
No cruel nymphs are here to tyrannize,
Nor faithless youths their scorn to exercise;
Unless Narcissus be that sullen he
That can despise his am'rous talking she. [2]
No emulation here does interpose,
Unless betwixt the tulip and the rose; [3]
But all things do conspire to make us blessed,
(Yet chiefly 'tis contentment makes the feast)
'Tis such a pleasing solitude as yet
Romance ne'er found, where happy lovers met:
Yea such a kind of solitude it is,
Not much unlike to that of paradise,
Where all things do their choicest good dispense,
And I too here am placed in innocence.
I should conclude that such it really were,
But that the Tree of Knowledge won't grow here: [4]
Though in its culture I have spent some time,
Yet it disdains to grow in our cold clime,
Where it can neither fruit nor leaves produce
Good for its owner, or the public use.
How can we hope our minds then to adorn
With anything with which they were not born;
Since we're denied to make this small advance,
To know their nakedness and ignorance? [5]
For in our Maker's laws we've made a breach,
And gathered all that was within our reach,
Which since we ne'er could touch; Although our eyes
Do serve our longing souls to tantalize,
Whilst kinder fate for you does constitute
Luxurious banquets of this dainty fruit.
Whose tree most fresh and flourishing does grow,
E'er since it was transplanted amongst you; [6]
And you in wit grow as its branches high,
Deep as its root too in philosophy;
Large as its spreading arms your reasons grow,
Close as its umbrage does your judgments show;
Fresh as its leaves your sprouting fancies are,
Your virtues as its fruits are bright and fair.
—1688

A Virgin Life

Since, O ye powers, ye have bestowed on me
So great a kindness for virginity,
Suffer me not to fall into the powers
Of men's almost omnipotent amours;
But in this happy life let me remain,
Fearless of twenty five and all its train,
Of slights or scorns, or being called old maid,
Those goblings which so many have betrayed: [7]
Like harmless kids, that are pursued by men,

---

[1] ambition the ardent desire to rise (OED ambition sb 1).

[2] Narcissus In classical mythology, a young man who died of self-love after seeing his reflection in water; he was transformed into a flower; am'rous talking she Echo. In love with Narcissus, Echo (who could only repeat what others said) tried to attract Narcissus with fragments of his own speech, but was rejected and wasted away with grief, leaving nothing but her voice.

[3] emulation ambitious rivalry for power or honours (OED emulation 2).

[4] Tree of Knowledge The tree of the knowledge of good and evil was planted in the Garden of Eden. Adam and Eve were prohibited from eating its fruit: "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Genesis 2:17).

[5] to know…ignorance Before eating fruit from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, Adam and Eve were innocent in their nakedness and without sin: "And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed" (Genesis 2:25). After eating the fruit, "the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked: and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons" (Genesis 3:7).

[6] you her friends at Cambridge.

[7] goblings goblins.

For safety run into a lion's den.
Ah lovely state how strange it is to see,
What mad conceptions some have made of thee,
As though thy being was all wretchedness,
Or foul deformity i'th'ugliest dress;
Whereas thy beauty's pure, celestial,
Thy thoughts divine, thy words angelical:
And such ought all thy votaries to be, [1]
Or else they're so, but for necessity.
A virgin bears the impress of all good,
In that dread name all virtue's understood:
So equal all her looks, her mien, her dress, [2]
That nought but modesty seems in excess.
And when she any treats or visits make,
'Tis not for tattle, but for friendship's sake;
Her neighb'ring poor she does adopt her heirs,
And less she cares for her own good than theirs;
And by obedience testifies she can
Be's good a subject as the stoutest man.
She to her church such filial duty pays,
That one would think she'd lived i'th pristine days.
Her closet, where she does much time bestow, [3]
Is both her library and chapel too,
Where she enjoys society alone,
I'th'Great Three-One—
She drives her whole life's business to these ends,
To serve her God, enjoy her books and friends.
—1688

The Prospect of a Landscape, Beginning with a Grove [4]

Well might the ancients deem a grove to be
The sacred mansion of some deity;
For it our souls insensibly does move,
At once to humble piety and love,
The choicest blessings heaven to us has given,
And the best offering we can make to heaven;
These only poor mortality make blessed,
And to inquietude exhibit rest;
By these our rationality is shown,
The cognisance by which from brutes we're known.
For who themselves of piety divest,
Are surely but a mortal kind of beasts;
But those whom gentle laws of love can't bind,
Are savages of the most sordid kind.
But none like these do in our shades obtrude,
Though scornfully some needs will call them rude.
Yet Nature's culture is so well expressed,
That Art herself would wish to be so dressed:
For here the sun conspires with every tree,
To deck the earth with landscape-tapestry.
Then through some space his brightest beams appear,
Which does erect a golden pillar there.
Here a close canopy of bows is made,
There a soft grassy cloth of state is spread,
With gems and gayest flowers embroidered o'er,
Fresh as those beauties honest swains adore.
Here plants for health, and for delight are met,
The cephalic cowslip, cordial violet.
Under the diuretic woodbine grows
The splenetic columbine, scorbutic rose; [5]

---

[1] votaries devout worshippers (OED votary sb I.1b, 2b).

[2] mien the air, bearing, carriage, or manner of a person (OED mien sb^{1} a).

[3] closet a room for privacy or retirement, especially a place of private devotion (OED closet sb 1a, b).

[4] This belongs to a three-poem series celebrating the natural landscape, taking for their subjects a grove, a rivulet, and a hill. The third poem remained unfinished.

[5] cephalic cowslip…scorbutic rose Cowslip was believed to relieve disorders of the head (OED cephalic a 2). Violet was a remedy for invigorating the heart (OED cordial a 2). Columbine was thought to

The best of which, some gentle nymph doth take,
For faithful Corydon a crown to make; [1]
Whilst on her lap the happy youth's head lies,
Gazing upon the aspects of her eyes,
The most unerring, best astronomy,
Whereby to calculate his destiny;
Whilst o'er their heads a pair of turtles coo, [2]
Which with less zeal and constancy do woo;
And birds around, through their extended throats,
In careless consort chant their pleasing notes;
Than which, no sweeter music strikes the ear,
Unless when lovers' sighs each other hear;
Which are more soft than austral breezes bring, [3]
Although they say they're harbingers of th'spring.
Ah silly town! wil't thou ne'er learn to know,
What happiness in solitude does grow?
But as a hardened sinner for's defence,
Pleads the insipidness of innocence;
Of some whom virtue due respect would grant,
But that they feign they're of her ignorant:
Yet blindness is not laudable to plead,
When we're by wilfull ignorance misled.
Should some, who think't a happiness to get
Crowds of acquaintance, to admire their wit;
Resolve their sins and follies to discard,
Their cronies quickly would them disregard.
'Tis hard we must (the world's so wicked grown)
Be complaisant in sin, or live alone:
For those who now with virtue are endued,
Do live alone, though in a multitude.
Retire then all, whom fortune don't oblige,
To suffer the distresses of a siege.
Where strong temptation virtue does attack,
'Tis not ignoble an escape to make:
But where no conquest can be hoped by fight,
'Tis honourable, sure, to 'scape by flight.
Fly to some calm retreat, where you may spend
Your life in quietude with some kind friend;
In some small village, and adjacent grove,
At once your friendship and your wit improve;
Free from those vile, opprobrious, foolish names,
Of Whig or Tory, and from sordid aims
Of wealth, and all its train of luxuries;
From wit sophisticate, with fooleries.
From beds of lust, and meals o'ercharged with wine,
Here temperately thou may'st on one dish dine:
In wholesome exercise thou may'st delight
Thyself, and make thy rest more sweet at night.
And if thy mind to contemplation leads,
Who God and Nature's books has, surely needs
No other object to employ his thought,
Since in each leaf such mysteries are wrought;
That whoso studies most, shall never know
Why the straight elm's so tall, the moss so low.
Oh now, I could enlarge upon this theme,
But that I'm unawares come to the stream,
Which at the bottom of this grove does glide;
And here I'll rest me by its flowery side.
—1688

To My Young Lover

Incautious youth, why do'st thou so misplace
Thy fine encomiums on an o'erblown face; [4]
Which after all the varnish of thy quill,
Its pristine wrinkles show apparent still:
Nor is it in the power of youth to move
An age-chilled heart to any strokes of love.
Then choose some budding beauty, which in time
May crown thy wishes in thy blooming prime:
For nought can make a more preposterous show, relieve the "spleen," a disorder caused by melancholy or depression of the spirits (OED splenetic a A.2b, 5). The rose was believed to cure scurvy (OED scorbutic a A.2).

---

[1] Corydon a generic proper name for a rustic in pastoral poetry (OED).

[2] turtles turtle doves.

[3] austral breezes the south wind, warm and moist (OED).

[4] encomiums formal or high-flown expressions of praise (OED encomium).

Than April flowers stuck on St. Michael's brow. [1]
To consecrate thy first-born sighs to me
A superannuated deity; [2]
Makes that idolatry and deadly sin,
Which otherwise had only venial been.
—1688

To My Friends Against Poetry

Dear friends, if you'll be ruled by me,
Beware o'th'charms of poetry;
And meddle with no fawning Muse,
They'll but your harmless loves abuse.
Though to Orinda they were tied, [3]
That nought their friendship could divide;
And Cowley's Mistress had a flame [4]
As pure and lasting as his fame:
Yet now they're all grown prostitutes,
And wantonly admit the suits
Of any fop, that will pretend
To be their servant or their friend.
Though they to wit no homage pay,
Nor yet the laws of verse obey,
But ride poor six-foot out of breath, [5]
And wrack a metaphor to death;
Who make their verse imbibe the crimes;
And the lewd follies too o'th'times; [6]
Who think all wit consists in ranting,
And virtuous love in wise gallanting:
And thousand sorts of fools, like these,
Make love and virtue what they please:
And yet as silly as they show,
Are favourites o'th' Muses now,
Who then would honour such a she,
Where fools their happier rivals be?
We, surely, may conclude there's none,
Unless they're drunk with Helicon, [7]
Which is a liquor that can make
A dunce set up for rhyming quack:
A liquor of so strange a temper,
As can our faculties all hamper;
That whoso drinks thereof is cursed
Unto a constant rhyming thirst;
I know not by what spell of witch,
It strikes the mind into an itch;
Which being scrubbed by praise, thereby
Becomes a spreading leprosy;
As hard to cure as dice or whore,
And makes the patient too as poor;
For poverty's the certain fate
Which attends a poet's state.
—1688

---

[1] St. Michael's brow emended from "bow," which makes no iconographic sense since St. Michael is portrayed with a sword; show/brow is a possible rhyme at this period. Note the rhyme show/now in "To All My Friends Against Poetry." The Feast of St. Michael the Archangel is on September 29; the poet is contrasting the spring of her young lover with her own autumn.

[2] superannuated old and infirm (OED superannuated ppl.a 1).

[3] Orinda The poet and translator Katherine Philips (1631–1664) was known as "the matchless Orinda."

[4] Cowley's Mistress Cowley's poem The Mistress was published in 1647.

[5] poor six-foot the hexameter line.

[6] imbibe absorb; take into one's mind or moral system (OED imbibe v II.2. trans.).

[7] Helicon the largest mountain in Boeotia, sacred to the Muses. The spring Hippocrene, the inspiration of poets, is a little below the summit.

John Oldham

1653 – 1683

Oldham was born in Gloucestershire, the son and grandson of ministers. He was educated first by his father and then at Tetbury grammar school, where he is also believed to have worked as a private tutor. Oldham then entered St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and received his B.A. in 1674. Shortly thereafter, he took the position of usher at the Whitgift school at Croydon, a position he held for three years. He composed a number of works at this time, one of which, Satire Against Virtue, seems to have attracted the attention of the Earl of Rochester. From 1678 until 1681 he was tutor to the grandsons of Sir Edward Thurland. During this time he began to publish his works. The first of his Satires upon the Jesuits and the Satire against Virtue were published for the first time in 1679 (perhaps piratically); both were republished in 1681 along with other pieces. Oldham's work exhibits a variety of styles, including odes, and paraphrases of biblical and classical poetry, but much of it is satirical, in imitation of the Roman satirists Juvenal and Horace. At the end of 1681, Oldham became tutor to the son of Sir William Hickes, and through him met Dr. Richard Lower, who apparently encouraged him to study medicine, which he seems to have done for about a year. He made some influential acquaintances during this time, including William Pierrepont, Earl of Kingston, who became his patron, and Dryden. Oldham died of smallpox. Although his life was short, his influence reached forward to Pope and other eighteenth-century satirists.

* * *

An Imitation of Horace [1]

BOOK I. SATIRE IX

Ibam fortè viâ sacrâ, &c.[2]

As I was walking in the Mall of late, [3]
Alone, and musing on I know not what;
Comes a familiar fop, whom hardly I
Knew by his name, and rudely seizes me: [4]
"Dear Sir, I'm mighty glad to meet with you:
And pray, how have you done this Age, or two?"
"Well I thank God" (said I) "as times are now:
I wish the same to you." And so past on
Hoping with this the Coxcomb would be gone. [5]
But when I saw I could not thus get free;
I ask'd, what business else he had with me?
"Sir" (answer'd he) "if learning, parts, or sense Merit your friendship; I have just pretense."
"I honor you" (said I) "upon that score,
And shall be glad to serve you to my power."
Mean time, wild to get loose, I try all ways
To shake him off: Sometimes I walk apace,
Sometimes stand still: I frown, I chafe, I fret,
Shrug, turn my back, as in the Bagnio, sweat: [6]
And show all kind of signs to make him guess
At my impatience and uneasiness.
"Happy the folk in Newgate!" (whisper'd I) [7]
"Who, tho' in chains are from this torment free:

---

[1] Horace (65–8 B.C.E.) Roman poet, contemporary of Virgil, known for his Epistles, Odes and Satires.

[2] Ibam fortè viâ sacrâ, &c I was walking by chance along the Sacred Way.

[3] the Mall a walk bordered by trees in St. James's Park, London, which was a fashionable promenade (OED mall [1] 4a).

[4] fop a conceited person, a pretender to wit, wisdom or accomplishments (OED fop sb 2).

[5] Coxcomb a foolish, conceited, showy person, vain of his accomplishments, appearance, or dress (OED coxcomb 3).

[6] Bagnio a bathing house; especially one with hot baths, vapour baths, and appliances for sweating (OED bagnio 1).

[7] Newgate a London prison.

Would I were like rough Manly in the play, [1]
To send impertinents with kicks away!"
He all the while baits me with tedious chat,
Speaks much about the drought, and how the rate
Of hay is rais'd, and what it now goes at:
Tells me of a new comet at the Hague,
Portending God knows what, a dearth, or plague:
Names every wench, that passes through the park,
How much she is allow'd, and who the spark
That keeps her: points, who lately got a clap, [2]
And who at the Groom-Porters had ill hap [3]
Three nights ago in play with such a Lord:
When he observ'd, I minded not a word,
And did no answer to his trash afford;
"Sir, I perceive you stand on thorns" (said he)
"And fain would part: but, faith, it must not be:
Come, let us take a bottle." (I cried) "No;
Sir, I am in a course, and dare not now." [4]
"Then tell me whither you design to go:
I'll wait upon you." "Oh! Sir, 'tis too far:
I visit cross the water: therefore spare
Your needless trouble." "Trouble! Sir, 'tis none:
'Tis more by half to leave you here alone.
I have no present business to attend,
At least which I'll not quit for such a friend:
Tell me not of the distance: for I vow,
I'll cut the Line, double the Cape for you,
Good faith, I will not leave you: make no words:
Go you to Lambeth? Is it to my Lord's? [5]
His steward I most intimately know,
Have often drunk with his Comptroller too."
By this I found my wheedle would not pass,
But rather serv'd my suff'rings to increase:
And seeing 'twas in vain to vex, or fret,
I patiently submitted to my fate.
Strait he begins again: "Sir, if you knew
My worth but half so throughly as I do;
I'm sure, you would not value any friend,
You have, like me: but that I won't commend
My self, and my own talents; I might tell
How many ways to wonder I excel.
None has a greater gift in Poetry,
Or writes more verses with more ease than I:
I'm grown the envy of the men of wit,
I kill'd ev'n Rochester with grief and spite: [6]
Next for the dancing part I all surpass,
St. André never mov'd with such a grace: [7]
And 'tis well known, when e'r I sing, or set,
Humphreys, nor Blow could ever match me yet." [8]
Here I got room to interrupt: "Have you
A mother, Sir, or kindred living now?"
"Not one: they are all dead." "Troth, so I guessed:
The happier they" (said I) "who are at rest.
Poor I am only left unmurder'd yet:
Haste, I beseech you, and dispatch me quite:
For I am well convinc'd, my time is come:
When I was young, a gypsy told my doom:"
"This Lad" (saith she, and look'd upon my hand)
"Shall not by sword, or poison come to's end,
Nor by the fever, dropsy, gout, or stone, [9]
But he shall die by an eternal tongue:
Therefore, when he's grown up, if he be wise,

---

[1] Manly the hero of William Wycherley's play, The Plain Dealer.

[2] clap gonorrhoea (OED clap sb^2).

[3] Groom-Porters officers of the Royal Household, whose principal function was to regulate all matters connected with gaming within the precincts of the court (OED groom-porter 1). The reference is to a gaming establishment; see Pepys, Diary, January 1, 1668, for a vivid account of his visit; hap chance or fortune; luck (OED hap $sb^1$1).

[4] in a course under a course of treatment by a physician.

[5] Lambeth the residence of the Archbishop of Canterbury; the "My Lord" the speaker refers to.

[6] Rochester The Earl of Rochester had died shortly before this poem was written.

[7] St. André the French choreographer of dance in Thomas Shadwell's tragedy, Psyche.

[8] Humphreys, nor Blow Pelham Humfrey was Master of the Children at the Chapel Royal. Dr. John Blow, organist and prominent English composer, was his successor.

[9] dropsy a morbid condition characterized by the accumulation of watery fluid in the serous cavities or the connective tissue of the body (OED dropsy sb (a.) 1).

Let him avoid great talkers, I advise."
By this time we were got to Westminster, [1]
Where he by chance a Trial had to hear,
And, if he were not there, his cause must fall:
"Sir, if you love me, step into the hall
For one half hour." "The Devil take me now,"
(Said I) "if I know any thing of law:
Besides I told you whither I'm to go."
Here at he made a stand, pull'd down his hat
Over his eyes, and mus'd in deep debate:
"I'm in a strait" (said he) "what I shall do:"
"Whether forsake my business, Sir, or you."
"Me by all means" (says I). "No" (says my sot) [2]
"I fear you'll take it ill, if I should do't:
I'm sure, you will." "Not I, by all that's good.
But I've more breeding, than to be so rude.
Pray, don't neglect your own concerns for me:
Your Cause, good Sir!" "My Cause be damn'd" (says he)
"I value't less than your dear company."
With this he came up to me, and would lead
The way; I sneaking after hung my head.
Next he begins to plague me with the plot, [3]
Asks, whether I were known to Oates or not?
"Not I, thank Heaven! I no priest have been:
Have never Douai nor St. Omers seen." [4]
"What think you, Sir? will they Fitz-Harris try? [5]
Will he die, think you?" "Yes, most certainly."
"I mean, be hang'd." "Would thou wert so"
(wish'd I).
Religion came in next; though he'd no more
Than the French King, his punk, or confessor. [6]
"Oh! the sad times, if once the King should die!
Sir, are you not afraid of Popery?" [7]
"No more than my superiors: why should I?
I've no estate in Abbey-lands to lose."
"But fire and faggot, Sir, how like you those?"
"Come Inquisition, anything" (thought I)
"So Heav'n would bless me to get rid of thee:
But 'tis some comfort, that my Hell is here:
I need no punishment hereafter fear."
Scarce had I thought, but he falls on anew
"How stands it, Sir, betwixt his Grace, and you?" [8]
"Sir, he's a man of sense above the crowd,
And shuns the converse of a multitude."
"Ay, Sir," (says he) "you're happy, who are near
His Grace, and have the favour of his ear:
But let me tell you, if you'll recommend
This person here, your point will soon be gain'd.
Gad, Sir, I'll die, if my own single wit
Don't fob his minions, and displace 'em quite, [9]
And make your self his only Favourite."
"No, you are out abundantly" (said I)
"We live not, as you think: no family
Throughout the whole three Kingdoms is more free
From those ill customs, which are us'd to swarm
In great men's houses; none e'r does me harm,
Because more learned, or more rich, than I:
But each man keeps his place, and his degree."
"'Tis mighty strange" (says he) "what you relate,"
"But nothing truer, take my word for that."
"You make me long to be admitted too

---

[1] Westminster location of the law courts.

[2] sot a foolish or stupid person (OED sot sb[1] A1).

[3] the plot The Popish Plot of 1678 was fabricated by Titus Oates, who claimed that Catholics were planning to assassinate Charles II and place his Catholic brother James, Duke of York, on the throne. Some thirty-five people were executed in the frenzy that followed.

[4] Douai…St. Omers seminaries at which priests were trained. Oates was expelled from St. Omers shortly before he perpetrated the Popish Plot.

[5] Fitz-Harris a Catholic, arrested for treasonous libel in 1681, who claimed to have extensive information regarding the Popish Plot, and unsuccessfully tried to use this information to avoid execution.

[6] the French King, his punk the French King is Louis XIV; punk prostitute, strumpet, harlot (OED punk sb[1]).

[7] the sad times….are you not afraid of Popery referring to the possibility that the Catholic James would succeed his brother as King.

[8] his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury.

[9] fob his minions deceive his favored followers; fob cheat, deceive, delude (OED fob v[1]).

Amongst his creatures: Sir, I beg, that you
Will stand my friend: Your interest is such,
You may prevail, I'm sure, you can do much.
He's one, that may be won upon, I've heard,
Though at the first approach access be hard.
I'll spare no trouble of my own, or friends,
No cost in fees and bribes to gain my ends:
I'll seek all opportunities to meet
With him, accost him in the very street:
Hang on his coach, and wait upon him home,
Fawn, scrape and cringe to him, nay to his Groom.
Faith, Sir, this must be done, if we'll be great:
Preferment comes not at a cheaper rate.”[1]
While at this savage rate he worried me;
By chance a Doctor, my dear friend, came by,[2]
That knew the fellow's humor passing well:
Glad of the sight, I join him; we stand still:
“Whence came you, Sir? and whither go you now?”
And such like questions past betwixt us two:
Straight I begin to pull him by the sleeve,
Nod, wink upon him, touch my nose, and give
A thousand hints, to let him know, that I
Needed his help for my delivery:
He, naughty wag, with an arch fleering smile[3]
Seems ignorant of what I mean the while:
I grow stark wild with rage. “Sir, said not you,
You'd somewhat to discourse, not long ago,
With me in private? I remember't well:”
“Some other time, be sure, I will not fail:
Now I am in great haste upon my word:
A messenger came for me from a Lord,
That's in a bad condition, like to die.”
“Oh! Sir, he can't be in a worse, than I:
Therefore for God's sake do not stir from hence.”
“Sweet Sir! your pardon: 'tis of consequence:
I hope you're kinder than to press my stay,
Which may be Heav'n knows what out of my way.”
This said, he left me to my murderer:
Seeing no hopes of my relief appear;
“Confounded be the stars” (said I) “that sway'd
This fatal day! would I had kept my bed
With sickness, rather than been visited
With this worse plague! what ill have I e'r done
To pull this curse, this heavy judgment down?”
While I was thus lamenting my ill hap,
Comes aid at length: a brace of bailiffs clap[4]
The rascal on the back: “Here take your fees,
Kind gentlemen” (said I) for my release.”
He would have had me bail. “Excuse me, Sir,
I've made a vow ne're to be surety more:[5]
My father was undone by't heretofore.”
Thus I got off, and blest the fates that he Was Pris'ner made, I set at liberty.
—1681

Upon a Bookseller,
that expos'd him by printing a piece of his grossly mangled, and faulty

CHRISTMAS 1680 REIGATE

Dull and unthinking! had'st thou none but me
To plague and urge to thine own infamy?
Had I some tame and sneaking Author been,
Whose muse to love and softness did incline,
Some small adventurer in song, that whines
Phyllis and Chloris out in charming lines[6]
Fit to divert mine Hostess, and mislead
The heart of some poor tawdry waiting-maid;
Perhaps I might have then forgiven thee,
And thou had'st scap'd from my resentments free.

---

[1] Preferment advancement or promotion in condition, status, or position in life (OED preferment I 2).

[2] a Doctor, my dear friend, came by Richard Lower, with whom Oldham had studied medicine.

[3] wag a mischievous person, a joker (OED wag sb^{2}2); fleering grinning, grimacing (OED fleering ppl.a).

[4] brace a pair, a couple of persons (chiefly used with a touch of humour) (OED brace sb^{2} III 15d).

[5] surety one who makes himself liable for the default or miscarriage of another (OED surety sb II. 7).

[6] Phyllis and Chloris names common in pastoral verse.

But I, whom spleen, and manly rage inspire,[1]
Brook no affront, at each offence take fire:
Born to chastise the vices of the age,
Which pulpits dare not, nor the very stage,
Sworn to lash knaves of all degrees, and spare
None of the kind, however great they are:
Satire's my only province and delight,
For whose dear sake alone I've vow'd to write:
For this I seek occasions, court abuse,
To show my parts, and signalize my muse:[2]
Fond of a quarrel as young bullies are
To make their mettle and their skill appear.
And didst thou think, I would a wrong acquit,
That touch'd my tenderst part of honour, wit?
No Villain, may my sins ne'r pardon'd be
By Heav'n it self, if e'er I pardon thee.
Members from breach of privilege deter
By threatning Topham and a messenger:[3]
Scroggs and the Brothers of the Coif oppose
The force and dint, of statutes and the laws:[4]
Strumpets of Billingsgate redress their wrongs
By the sole noise and foulness of their tongues:
And I go always arm'd for my defence,
To punish and revenge an insolence:
I wear my Pen, as others do their Sword,
To each affronting sot, I meet, the word
Is satisfaction; straight to thrusts I go
And pointed satire runs him through and through.
Perhaps thou hop'dst that thy obscurity
Should be thy safeguard, and secure thee free:
No, wretch, I mean from thence to fetch thee out,
Like sentenc'd felons to be dragged about.
Torn, mangled, and expos'd to scorn and shame
I mean to hang and gibbet up thy name:[5]
If thou to live in satire so much thirst;
Enjoy thy Wish and Fame, till envy burst,
Renown'd as he, whom banish'd Ovid cursed,[6]
Or he, whom old Archilochus so stung[7]
In verse, that he for shame and madness hung:
Deathless in infamy do thou so live,
And let my rage like his to halters drive.[8]
Thou thoughtst perhaps my gall was spent and gone
My venom drain'd, and I a senseless drone:
Thou thoughtst I had no curses left in store,
But to thy sorrow know and find, I've more:
More, and more dreadful yet, able to scare
Like Hell, and urge to daggers and despair:
Such, thou shalt feel, are still reserv'd by me
To vex and force thee to thy destiny:
Since thou hast brav'd my vengeance thus, prepare
And tremble from my pen thy doom to hear.
Thou, who with spurious nonsense durst profane
The genuine issue of a poet's brain,
May'st thou hereafter never deal in verse,

---

[1] spleen hot or proud temper (OED spleen sb 5).

[2] signalize distinguish, render noteworthy (OED signalize v 1).

[3] Members from breach of privilege... Topham and a messenger After passing a bill in a parliamentary session in May 1679 which excluded James from succeeding his brother as King because of his Catholic faith, the Whigs, who favoured exclusion, frequently petitioned Charles II to recall Parliament in order to push the matter further. The Tories, who opposed exclusion, countered these requests with their own positions "abhorring" those of the Whigs. When the Parliament was finally assembled, it determined that abhorring was a breach of parliamentary privilege. Those who committed the offence were arrested by John Topham, the Sergeant at Arms, and his messenger, meaning officer.

[4] Scroggs and the Brothers of the Coif Sir William Scroggs, the Lord Chief Justice at the trials of those said to be involved in the Popish Plot, had a reputation of being unfair. Brothers of the Coif those who wear the coif, the white cap formerly worn by lawyers, and especially by serjeants-at-law, as a mark of their profession (OED coif sb 3).

[5] gibbet to hold up to infamy or public contempt (OED gibbet v 3).

[6] he, whom banished Ovid cursed In his poem, Ibis, the exiled Ovid curses an unnamed enemy.

[7] he, whom old Archilochus so stung When Lycambes rescinded on a promise to Archilochus to allow him to marry his daughter Neobule, Archilochus took revenge by writing a satire that was so cutting that Lycambes and his daughters committed suicide. See Horace, Epistles I.19.23 ff.

[8] halters the gallows (OED halter *sb*¹ 2b).

But what hoarse Bellmen in their walks rehearse, [1]
Or Smithfield audience sung on crickets hears. [2]
Mayst thou print Howard, or some duller ass,
Jordan, or him, that wrote Dutch Hudibras, [3]
Or next vile scribbler of the house, whose play
Will scarce for candles and their snuffing pay.
May you each other curse; thy self undone,
And he the laughing-stock of all the town.
Mayst thou ne'er rise to history, but what
Poor Grubstreet penny chronicles relate, [4]
Memoirs of Tyburn and the mournful state [5]
Of cutpurses in Holborn cavalcade, [6]
Till thou thy self be the same subject made.
Compell'd by want, mayst thou print Popery,
For which be the cart's arse and pillory [7]
Turnips and rotten eggs thy destiny,
Maul'd worse than Reading, Christian, or Cellier, [8]
Till thou daubed o'er with loathsome filth appear
Like brat of some vile drab, in privy found,
Which there has lain three months in ordure drown'd.
The plague of poets, rags and poverty,
Debts, writs, arrests, and serjeants light on thee;
For others bound, mayst thou to durance go, [9]
Condemn'd to scraps and begging with a shoe.
And mayst thou never from the gaol get free,
Till thou swear out thy self by perjury.
Forlorn, abandon'd, pitiless, and poor
As a pawn'd cully, or a mortgag'd whore, [10]
Mayst thou an halter want for thy redress, [11]
Forc'd to steal hemp to end thy miseries, [12]
And damn thy self to balk the Hangman's fees:
And may no saucy fool have better fate
That dares pull down the vengeance of my hate.
—1681

---

[1] Bellmen town criers (OED bellman 1).

[2] Smithfield audience sung on crickets hears Bartholomew Fair, which took place in Smithfield, featured crickets singing.

[3] Mayst thou print Howard... or him, that wrote Dutch Hudibras Edward Howard, a much ridiculed playwright; Thomas Jordan, city poet of London, denigrated by Oldham elsewhere; Dutch Hudibras was published anonymously.

[4] Grubstreet penny chronicles brief accounts of the crimes and execution of criminals produced by hack writers.

[5] Tyburn where convicted criminals were executed.

[6] Holborn cavalcade Holborn Hill was part of the journey prisoners undertook on their way from imprisonment at Newgate to execution at Tyburn.

[7] pillory a contrivance for the punishment of offenders, consisting of a wooden framework erected on a post or pillar, and formed of two moveable boards, which, when brought together, leave holes through which the head and hands of an offender were thrust, in which state he was exposed to public ridicule, insult, and molestation (OED pillory sb).

[8] Reading, Christian, or Cellier Nathanial Reading was a lawyer for Catholic lords implicated in the Popish Plot. He was sent to the pillory for attempting to bribe a witness to change his evidence. Edward Christian was pilloried for a conspiracy against the Duke of Buckingham. Elizabeth Cellier was a Catholic midwife involved in Catholic attempts to discredit Oates's tale of the Popish Plot. She was acquitted of high treason, but after publishing an account of her imprisonment and release, was pilloried for libel.

[9] durance forced confinement, imprisonment, constraint (OED durance 5).

[10] cully one who is cheated or imposed upon (OED cully sb 1).

[11] halter a rope with a noose for hanging malefactors (OED halter *sb*¹ 2a).

[12] hemp a rope for hanging (OED hemp sb 3).

Anne Killigrew

1660 – 1685

The poet and painter Anne Killigrew had a brief but celebrated life. She was born in St. Martin's Lane, London, the daughter of the theologian and dramatist Dr. Henry Killigrew, who served as Chaplain to the Duke of York, later James II. Her father arranged for her service as Maid of Honour to Mary of Modena, Duchess of York. Killigrew's paintings, which included portraits of James II and his Queen, were admired by her contemporaries as was her verse by Dryden himself. Anthony à Wood describes Killigrew as one who had "A Grace for beauty, and a Muse for wit." In 1685, Anne died suddenly of smallpox, and a small volume of her collected poems was published by her father simply under the title Poems by Mrs. Anne Killigrew (1686). Dryden's Ode, To the Pious Memory of the Accomplished Young Lady Mistress Anne Killigrew, Excellent in the Two Sister Arts of Poesy and Painting, was described by Dr. Johnson as "the noblest Ode that our language ever has produced." Like many young poets, Killigrew experimented with literary genre and theme, writing pastoral verse, sombre meditations, bitter satire, moral epigrams, biblical paraphrase and political panegyric.

* * *

A Farewell to Worldly Joys

Farewell ye unsubstantial joys,
Ye gilded nothings, gaudy toys,
Too long ye have my soul misled,
Too long with airy diet fed:
But now my heart ye shall no more
Deceive, as you have heretofore:
For when I hear such Sirens sing,
Like Ithaca's forewarned king, [1]
With prudent resolution I
Will so my will and fancy tie,
That stronger to the mast not he, [2]
Than I to reason bound will be:
And though your witchcrafts strike my ear,
Unhurt, like him, your charms I'll hear.
—1686

The Complaint of a Lover

Seest thou yonder craggy rock,
Whose head o'erlooks the swelling main,
Where never shepherd fed his flock,
Or careful peasant sowed his grain.

No wholesome herb grows on the same,
Or bird of day will on it rest;
'Tis barren as the hopeless flame,
That scorches my tormented breast.

Deep underneath a cave does lie,
Th'entrance hid with dismal yew, [3]
Where Phoebus never showed his eye, [4]
Or cheerful day yet pierced through.

In that dark melancholy cell,
(Retreat and solace to my woe)

---

[1] Like Ithaca's forewarned king Odysseus had to pass the island of the Sirens, who enchanted unsuspecting sailors with their song, causing them to land and perish. Odysseus, warned by Circe of their powers and following her advice, passed the island safely (Odyssey, Book XII).

[2] That stronger to the mast not he On Circe's advice Odysseus, who wished to enjoy the Sirens' melody without risk, instructed his men (who plugged their ears with wax) to bind him to the mast of their ship so that he could not compel them to change course to the Sirens' meadow of death (Odysseus, Book XII).

[3] dismal yew The yew tree, often planted in churchyards, was regarded as symbolic of sadness (OED yew sb 1)

[4] Phoebus a name of Apollo, god of the sun; the sun personified (OED Phoebus).

Love, sad despair, and I, do dwell,
The springs from whence my griefs do flow.

Treacherous love that did appear,
(When he at first approached my heart)
Dressed in a garb far from severe,
Or threatening ought of future smart.

So innocent those charms then seemed,
When Rosalinda first I spied,
Ah! Who would them have deadly deemed?
But flowers do often serpents hide.

Beneath those sweets concealed lay,
To love the cruel foe, disdain,
With which (alas) she does repay
My constant and deserving pain.

When I in tears have spent the night,
With sighs I usher in the sun,
Who never saw a sadder sight,
In all the courses he has run.

Sleep, which to others ease does prove,
Comes unto me, alas, in vain:
For in my dreams I am in love,
And in them too she does disdain.

Some times t'amuse my sorrow, I[1]
Unto the hollow rocks repair,
And loudly to the echo cry,
Ah! gentle nymph come ease my care.

Thou who, times past, a lover wert
Ah! pity me, who now am so,
And by a sense of thine own smart,
Alleviate my mighty woe.

Come flatter then, or chide my grief;
Catch my last words, and call me fool;
Or say, she loves, for my relief;
My passion either soothe, or school.
—1686

On a Picture Painted by Herself, Representing Two Nymphs of Diana's, One in a Posture to Hunt, the Other Bathing

We are Diana's virgin-train,[2]
Descended of no mortal strain;
Our bows and arrows are our goods,
Our palaces, the lofty woods,
The hills and dales, at early morn,
Resound and echo with our horn;
We chase the hind and fallow-deer,
The wolf and boar both dread our spear;
In swiftness we outstrip the wind,
An eye and thought we leave behind;
We fawns and shaggy satyrs awe;
To sylvan powers we give the law:[3]
Whatever does provoke our hate,
Our javelins strike, as sure as fate;
We bathe in springs, to cleanse the soil,
Contracted by our eager toil;
In which we shine like glittering beams,
Or crystal in the crystal streams;
Though Venus we transcend in form,
No wanton flames our bosoms warm!
If you ask where such wights do dwell,[4]

---

[1] amuse direct attention away from; beguile (OED amuse v 4).

[2] Diana the moon goddess, patroness of virginity and of hunting.

[3] sylvan powers powers belonging to or situated in a wood or woods (OED sylvan adj B.1). A sylvan was an imaginary being supposed to haunt the woods or groves.

[4] wights While the term can denote living beings in general, it is chiefly applied to supernatural, preternatural, or unearthly beings (OED wight sb arch. 1b).

In what blessed clime, that so excel?
The poets only that can tell.
—1686

Upon the Saying that my Verses were Made by Another

Next heaven my vows to thee (O sacred Muse!)
I offered up, nor didst thou them refuse.

O Queen of Verse, said I, if thou'lt inspire,
And warm my soul with thy poetic fire,
No love of gold shall share with thee my heart,
Or yet ambition in my breast have part,
More rich, more noble I will ever hold
The muse's laurel, than a crown of gold.
An undivided sacrifice I'll lay
Upon thine altar, soul and body pay;
Thou shalt my pleasure, my employment be,
My all I'll make a holocaust to thee. [1]

The deity that ever does attend
Prayers so sincere, to mine did condescend.
I writ, and the judicious praised my pen:
Could any doubt ensuing glory then?
What pleasing raptures filled my ravished sense?
How strong, how sweet, fame, was thy influence?
And thine, false hope, that to my flattered sight
Didst glories represent so near, and bright?
By thee deceived, methought, each verdant tree,
Apollo's transformed Daphne seemed to be; [2]
And every fresher branch, and every bough
Appeared as garlands to impale my brow.
The learned in love say, thus the winged boy [3]
Does first approach, dressed up in welcome joy;
At first he to the cheated lover's sight
Nought represents, but rapture and delight,
Alluring hopes, soft fears, which stronger bind
Their hearts, than when they more assurance find.

Emboldened thus, to fame I did commit,
(By some few hands) my most unlucky wit.
But, ah, the sad effects that from it came!
What ought t'have brought me honour, brought me shame!
Like Aesop's painted jay I seemed to all, [4]
Adorned in plumes, I not my own could call:
Rifled like her, each one my feathers tore,
And, as they thought, unto the owner bore.
My laurels thus another's brow adorned,
My numbers they admired, but me they scorned: [5]
Another's brow, that had so rich a store
Of sacred wreaths, that circled it before;
Where mine quite lost, (like a small stream that ran Into a vast and boundless ocean)
Was swallowed up, with what it joined and drowned,
And that abyss yet no accession found.

Orinda (Albion's and her sex's grace) [6]
Owed not her glory to a beauteous face,
It was her radiant soul that shone within,
Which struck a lustre through her outward skin;

---

[1] holocaust a sacrifice wholly consumed by fire; a whole burnt offering (OED holocaust sb 1).

[2] Apollo's transformed Daphne The nymph Daphne, fleeing the unwelcome advances of Apollo, prayed for help and was turned into a laurel tree.

[3] winged boy Cupid.

[4] Aesop's painted jay The fables of Aesop (d. 564 B.C.E.) were translated by Roger L'Estrange in 1693. In his translation, we find written of the jay: he "tricked himself up with all the gay-feathers he could muster together: and upon the credit of these stolen, or borrowed ornaments, he valued himself above all the birds in the air beside."

[5] numbers metrical periods or feet; hence, lines, verses (OED numbers sb IV.18b).

[6] Orinda the pseudonym of the poet and translator Katherine Philips (1632–1664).

That did her lips and cheeks with roses dye,
Advanced her height, and sparkled in her eye.
Nor did her sex at all obstruct her fame,
But higher 'mong the stars it fixed her name;
What she did write, not only all allowed,
But every laurel, to her laurel, bowed!

Th'envious age, only to me alone,
Will not allow, what I do write, my own,
But let 'em rage, and 'gainst a maid conspire,
So deathless numbers from my tuneful lyre
Do ever flow; so Phoebus I by thee [1]
Divinely inspired and possessed may be;
I willingly accept Cassandra's fate,
To speak the truth, although believed too late. [2]
—1686

The Discontent

I

Here take no care, take here no care, my Muse,
Nor ought of art or labour use:
But let thy lines rude and unpolished go,
Nor equal be their feet, nor numerous let them flow.
The ruggeder my measures run when read,
They'll livelier paint th'unequal paths fond mortals tread.
Who when they're tempted by the smooth ascents,
Which flattering hope presents,
Briskly they climb, and great things undertake;
But fatal voyages, alas, they make:
For 'tis not long before their feet,
Inextricable mazes meet,
Perplexing doubts obstruct their way,
Mountains withstand them of dismay;
Or to the brink of black despair them lead,
Where's nought their ruin to impede,
In vain for aid they then to reason call,
Their senses dazzle, and their heads turn round,
The sight does all their powers confound,
And headlong down the horrid precipice they fall:
Where storms of sighs forever blow,
Where rapid streams of tears do flow,
Which drown them in a briny flood.
My Muse pronounce aloud, there's nothing good,
Nought that the world can show,
Nought that it can bestow.

II

Not boundless heaps of its admired clay,
Ah, too successful to betray,
When spread in our frail virtue's way:
For few do run with so resolved a pace,
That for the golden apple will not lose the race. [3]
And yet not all the gold the vain would spend,
Or greedy avarice would wish to save;
Which on the earth refulgent beams doth send, [4]
Or in the sea has found a grave,
Joined in one mass, can bribe sufficient be,
The body from a stern disease to free,
Or purchase for the mind's relief
One moment's sweet repose, when restless made by grief,
But what may laughter, more than pity, move:

---

[1] Phoebus Apollo as the god of poetry and music, presiding over the Muses (OED Phoebus b).

[2] Cassandra's…too late Cassandra was given the gift of prophecy by Apollo; when she refused his advances, he turned the blessing into a curse by causing her accurate predictions to be disbelieved.

[3] For few…the race a reference to Atalanta, who would marry no one who could not beat her in a foot-race; Melanion, or Hippomenes, got three golden apples from Aphrodite and delayed her by throwing them, thus winning the race (OCD).

[4] refulgent shining with, or reflecting, light (OED refulgent a).

When some the price of what they dearest love
Are masters of, and hold it in their hand,
To part with it their hearts they can't command:
But chose to miss, what missed does them torment,
And that to hug, affords them no content.
Wise fools, to do them right, we these must hold,
Who love depose, and homage pay to gold.

III

Nor yet, if rightly understood,
Does grandeur carry more of good;
To be o'th'number of the great enrolled,
A scepter o'er a mighty realm to hold.
For what is this?
If I judge not amiss.
But all th'afflicted of a land to take,
And of one single family to make?
The wronged, the poor, th'oppressed, the sad,
The ruined, malcontent, and mad?
Which a great part of every empire frame,
And interest in the common father claim.
Again what is't, but always to abide
A gazing crowd? Upon a stage to spend
A life that's vain, or evil without end?
And which is yet nor safely held, nor laid aside?
And then, if lesser titles carry less of care,
Yet none but fools ambitious are to share
Such a mock-good, of which 'tis said, 'tis best,
When of the least of it men are possessed.

IV

But, O, the laurelled fool! that dotes on fame,
Whose hope's applause, whose fear's to want a name;
Who can accept for pay
Of what he does, what others say;
Exposes now to hostile arms his breast,
To toilsome study then betrays his rest;
Now to his soul denies a just content,
Then forces on it what it does resent;
And all for praise of fools: for such are those,
Which most of the admiring crowd compose.
O famished soul, which such thin food can feed!
O wretched labour crowned with such a meed! [1]
Too loud, O Fame! thy trumpet is too shrill,
To lull a mind to rest,
Or calm a stormy breast,
Which asks a music soft and still.
'Twas not Amalek's vanquished cry,
Nor Israel's shout of victory,
That could in Saul the rising passion lay,
'Twas the soft strains of David's lyre the evil spirit chased away. [2]

V

But friendship fain would yet itself defend, [3]
And mighty things it does pretend,
To be of this sad journey, life, the bait,
The sweet reflection of our toilsome state.
But though true friendship a rich cordial be,
Alas, by most 'tis so allayed, [4]
Its good so mixed with ill we see,
That dross for gold is often paid.
And for one grain of friendship that is found,
Falsehood and interest do the mass compound,
Or coldness, worse than steel, the loyal heart doth wound.
Love in no two was ever yet the same,
No happy two e'er felt an equal flame.

---

[1] meed reward (OED meed sb 1).

[2] Twas not Amalek's…chased away Saul, King of Israel, captured Agag the King of Amalek, and destroyed the Amalekites. He did not, however, despoil their property as instructed by God. As a result, God rent the kingdom of Israel from Saul, and sent an evil spirit to trouble him. Only David, Saul's successor, could refresh his tormented spirit by playing his harp (I Samuel 15 and 16).

[3] fain gladly, willingly, with pleasure (OED fain adv B).

[4] allayed debased (OED allayed ppl.a 1).

VI

Is there that earth by human foot ne'er pressed?
That air which never yet by human breast
Respired, did life supply?
Oh, thither let me fly!
Where from the world at such a distance set,
All that's past, present, and to come I may forget:
The lover's sighs, and the afflicted's tears,
What e'er may wound my eyes or ears.
The grating noise of private jars,
The horrid sound of public wars,
Of babbling fame the idle stories,
The short-lived triumph's noisy glories,
The curious nets the subtle weave,
The word, the look that may deceive.
No mundane care shall more affect my breast,
My profound peace shake or molest:
But stupor, like to death, my senses bind,
That so I may anticipate that rest,
Which only in my grave I hope to find.
—1686?

Cloris' Charms Dissolved by Eudora

I

Not that thy fair hand
Should lead me from my deep despair,
Or thy love, Cloris, end my care,
And back my steps command:
But if hereafter thou retire,
To quench with tears, thy wandering fire,
This clue I'll leave behind,
By which thou may'st untwine
The saddest way,
To shun the day,
That ever grief did find.

II

First take thy hapless way
Along the rocky northern shore,
Infamous for the matchless store
Of wracks within that bay.
None o'er the cursed beach e'er crossed,
Unless the robbed, the wracked, or lost
Where on the strand lie spread,
The skulls of many dead.
Their mingled bones,
Among the stones,
Thy wretched feet must tread.

III

The trees along the coast,
Stretch forth to heaven their blasted arms,
As if they plained the north-wind's harms,
And youthful verdure lost.
There stands a grove of fatal yew,[1]
Where sun ne'er pierced, nor wind e'er blew.
In it a brook doth fleet,
The noise must guide thy feet,
For there's no light,
But all is night,
And darkness that you meet.

IV

Follow th'infernal wave,
Until it spread into a flood,
Poisoning the creatures of the wood,
There twice a day a slave,
I know not for what impious thing,
Bears thence the liquor of that spring.
It adds to the sad place,
To hear how at each pace,
He curses God,

---

[1] fatal yew The yew was associated with death because it was commonly planted in churchyards; it was doubly fatal as being poisonous and as providing the wood from which long-bows were made; see OED yew sb 1b. Compare Shakespeare, Richard II, III.ii.117 "their bows / of double-fatal yew."

Himself, his load,
For such his forlorn case.

V

Next make no noise, nor talk,
Until th'art past a narrow glade,
Where light does only break the shade;
'Tis a murderer's walk.
Observing this thou need'st not fear,
He sleeps the day or wakes elsewhere.
Though there's no clock or chime,
The hour he did his crime,
His soul awakes,
His conscience quakes
And warns him that's the time.

VI

Thy steps must next advance,
Where horror, sin, and spectres dwell,
Where the wood's shade seems turned hell;
Witches here nightly dance,
And sprights join with them when they call, [1]
The murderer dares not view the ball.
For snakes and toads conspire,
To make them up a quire.
And for their light,
And torches bright,
The fiends dance all on fire.

VII

Press on till thou descry
Among the trees, sad, ghastly, wan,
Thin as the shadow of a man,
One that does ever cry,
She is not; and she ne'er will be,
Despair and death, come swallow me,
Leave him; and keep thy way,
No more thou now canst stray;
Thy feet do stand,
In sorrow's land,
Its kingdoms every way.

VIII

Here gloomy light will show
Reared like a castle to the sky,
A horrid cliff there standing nigh
Shading a creek below. [2]
In which recess there lies a cave,
Dreadful as hell, still as the grave.
Sea-monsters there abide,
The coming of the tide,
No noise is near,
To make them fear,
God-sleep might there reside.

IX

But when the boisterous sea,
With roaring waves resumes this cell,
You'd swear the thunders there did dwell.
So loud he makes his plea;
So tempests bellow under ground,
And echoes multiply the sound!
This is the place I chose,
Changeable like my woes,
Now calmly sad,
Then raging mad,
As move my bitter throes.

X

Such dread besets this part,
That all the horror thou has passed,
Are but degrees to this at last.
The sight must break thy heart:
Here bats and owls that hate the light
Fly and enjoy eternal night.
Scales of serpents, fish-bones,
Th'adder's eye, and toad-stones
Are all the light

---

[1] spright spirits; supernatural beings, goblins, fairies, etc. (OED spright sb^{1} 1b,2).

[2] horrid bristling, shaggy, rough (OED horrid a 1). A secondary meaning (terrible, dreadful, frightful) is also relevant.

Hath blest my sight,
Since first began my groans.

XI

When thus I lost the sense
Of all the healthful world calls bliss,
And held it joy, those joys to miss,
When beauty was offence:
Celestial strains did rend the air,
Shaking these mansions of despair;
A form divine and bright,
Struck day through all that night,
As when heaven's queen
In hell was seen,
With wonder and affright!

XII

The monsters fled for fear,
The terrors of the cursed wood
Dismantled were, and where they stood,
No longer did appear.
The gentle power, which wrought this thing,
Eudora was, who thus did sing: [1]
Dissolved is Cloris' spell,
From whence thy evils fell,
Send her this clue,
'Tis there most due
And thy phantastic hell.

—1686

---

[1] Eudora The name "Eudora" means good gift.

John Tutchin

?1661 – 1707

A Whig poet and pamphleteer, Tutchin participated in the Monmouth rebellion (1685), which sought to place a Protestant candidate on the throne instead of James II. He was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment but successfully bribed his way to a pardon. In 1695 he was deprived of a minor post in the navy victualling office, and then subsequently failed to win a post in the customs office; he recorded his resentment in a later autobiographical account in which he complained of his "13 or 14 years in a fruitless attendance upon an ungrateful court."

The power of the foreign-born members of William's court roused considerable resentment in England, a xenophobia exploited for political purposes by both Tories and Jacobites. But while The Foreigners does display republican tendencies, Tutchin saw himself as a Whig martyr, so his motivations for attacking the Whig junto and the "upstart foreigners" of William's court differed from those of the political opposition. Tutchin was charged with libel for writing The Foreigners, but his use of allegory or "covert names" saved him. Dryden and Swift were using the same technique, and Tutchin seems to have borrowed some of the biblical parallels Dryden used in Absalom and Achitophel (e.g., Israel for England, Hebron for Scotland, Sanhedrin for Parliament). The Foreigners provoked several answering poems, including Daniel Defoe's The True-Born Englishman (1700–01); Tutchin and Defoe would later become allies, though quarrelling frequently.

The Foreigners

Long time had Israel been disus'd from rest,
Long had they been by tyrants sore oppressed;
Kings of all sorts they ignorantly crav'd,
And grew more stupid as they were enslav'd;
Yet want of grace they impiously disown'd,
And still like slaves beneath the burden groan'd:
With languid eyes their race of kings they view,
The bad too many, and the good too few;
Some robb'd their houses, and destroy'd their lives,
Ravish'd their daughters, and debauch'd their wives;
Profan'd the altars with polluted loves,
And worship'd idols in the woods and groves.
To foreign nations next they have recourse;
Striving to mend, they made their state much worse.
They first from Hebron all their plagues did bring,
Cramm'd in the single person of a King; [1]
From whose base loins ten thousand evils flow,
Which by succession they must undergo. [2]
Yet sense of native freedom still remains,
They fret and grumble underneath their chains;
Incens'd enrag'd, their passion does arise,
Till at his palace-gate their monarch dies. [3]
This glorious feat was by the fathers done,
Whose children next depos'd his tyrant son, [4]
Made him, like Cain, a murd'rous wanderer,
Both of his crimes, and of his fortunes share.
But still resolv'd to split on foreign shelves,
Rather than venture once to trust themselves,

---

[1] a King James VI of Scotland, proclaimed James I of England, Scotland, and Ireland in 1603.

[2] James was the father of Charles I, grandfather of Charles II and James II, and great-grandfather of William III.

[3] Charles I, executed in front of his palace of Whitehall in January 1649.

[4] James II, who left London in December 1688.

To foreign courts and councils do resort,
To find a king their freedoms to support: [1]
Of one for mighty actions fam'd they're told,
Profoundly wise, and desperately bold,
Skilful in war, successful still in fight,
Had vanquish'd hosts, and armies put to flight;
And when the storms of war and battles cease,
Knew well to steer the ship of state in peace.
Him they approve, approaching to their sight,
Lov'd by the Gods, of mankind the delight.
The numerous tribes resort to see him land,
Cover the beach, and blacken all the strand; [2]
With loud huzza's they welcome him on shore,
And for their blessing do the Gods implore.
The Sanhedrin conven'd, at length debate [3]
The sad condition of their drooping state
And sinking Church, just ready now to drown;
And with one shout they do the hero crown.
Ah Happy Israel! had there never come
Into his councils crafty knaves at home, [4]
In combination with a foreign brood,
Sworn foes to Israel's rights and Israel's good;
Who impiously foment intestine jars,
Exhaust our treasure, and prolong our wars;
Make Israel's people to themselves a prey,
Mislead their King, and steal his heart away:
United interests thus they do divide,
The State declines by avarice and pride;
Like beasts of prey they ravage all the land,
Acquire preferments, and usurp command:
The foreign inmates the housekeepers spoil,
And drain the moisture of our fruitful soil.
If to our Monarch there are honours due,
Yet what with Gibeonites have we to do? [5]
When foreign states employ 'em for their food,
To draw their water, and to hew their wood.
What mushroom honours does our soil afford!
One day a beggar, and the next a Lord. [6]
What dastard souls do Jewish nobles wear!
The Commons such affronts would never bear.
Let no historian the sad stories tell
Of thy base sons, Oh servile Israel!
But thou, my Muse, more generous and brave,
Shalt their black crimes from dark oblivion save;
To future ages shalt their sins disclose,
And brand with infamy thy Nation's foes.
A country lies, due east from Judah's shore, [7]
Where stormy winds and noisy billows roar;
A land much differing from all other soils,
Forc'd from the sea, and buttress'd up with piles.
No marble quarries bind the spongy ground,
But loads of sand and cockle-shells are found:
Its natives void of honesty and grace,
A boorish, rude, and an inhumane race;
From nature's excrement their life is drawn,
Are born in bogs, and nourish'd up from spawn.
Their hard-smok'd beef is their continual meat,
Which they with rusk, their luscious manna, eat; [8]
Such food with their chill stomachs best agrees,
They sing Hosannah to a mare's milk cheese.
To supplicate no God, their lips will move,
Who speaks in thunder like Almighty Jove,
But wat'ry deities they do invoke,
Who from the marshes most divinely croak.
Their land, as if asham'd their crimes to see,
Dives down beneath the surface of the sea.

---

[1] William of Orange (William III), crowned in April 1689.

[2] Since William's landing was witnessed by only a few fishermen, these lines might be ironic.

[3] Sanhedrin the supreme council at Jerusalem in New Testament times; here, allegorically the English Parliament.

[4] crafty knaves the Whig junto that controlled political affairs under William and Anne; its members included John Somers, Baron Somers; Thomas Wharton, first Baron Wharton; Charles Montagu, first Earl of Halifax; Charles Spencer, third Earl of Sunderland; and Sir Robert Walpole, first Earl of Orford.

[5] Gibeonites the Dutch.

[6] William raised a number of foreigners to English peerages.

[7] A country the Netherlands.

[8] rusk pieces of bread rebaked and sometimes sweetened to form a light biscuit; much used on board ships (OED).

Neptune, the God who does the seas command,
Ne'er stands on tip-toe to descry their land;
But seated on a billow of the sea,
With ease their humble marshes does survey.
These are the vermin do our state molest;
Eclipse our glory, and disturb our rest.
Bentir in the inglorious roll the first, [1]
Bentir to this and future ages cursed,
Of mean descent, yet insolently proud,
Shunn'd by the great, and hated by the crowd;
Who neither blood nor parentage can boast,
And what he got the Jewish nation lost:
By lavish grants whose provinces he gains,
Made forfeit by the Jewish people's pains;
Till angry Sanhedrins such grants resume,
And from the peacock take each borrow'd plume. [2]
Why should the Gibeonites our land engross,
And aggrandize their fortunes with our loss?
Let them in foreign states proudly command,
They have no portion in the promis'd land,
Which immemorially has been decreed
To be the birthright of the Jewish seed.
How ill does Bentir in the head appear
Of warriors, who do Jewish ensigns bear? [3]
By such we're grown e'en scandalous in war.
Our fathers' trophies wore, and oft could tell
How by their swords the mighty thousands fell;
What mighty deed our grandfathers had done,
What battles fought, what wreaths of honour won:
Through the extended orb they purchas'd fame,
The nations trembling at their awful name:
Such wondrous heroes our fore-fathers were,
When we, base souls! but pygmies are in war:
By foreign chieftains we improve in skill; [4]
We learn how to intrench, not how to kill:
For all our charge are good proficients made
In using both the pickax and the spade.
But in what field have we a conquest wrought?
In ten years' war what battle have we fought? [5]
If we a foreign slave may use in war,
Yet why in council should that slave appear? [6]
If we with Jewish treasure make him great,
Must it be done to undermine the state?
Where are the ancient sages of renown?
No Magi left, fit to advise the crown?
Must we by foreign councils be undone?
Unhappy Israel, who such measures takes,
And seeks for statesmen in the bogs and lakes;
Who speak the language of most abject slaves,
Under the conduct of our Jewish knaves.
Our Hebrew's murder'd in their hoarser throats; [7]
How ill their tongues agree with Jewish notes!
Their untun'd prattle does our sense confound,
Which in our princely palaces does sound;
The self-same language the old serpent spoke,
When misbelieving Eve the apple took:
Of our first mother why are we asham'd,
When by the self-same rhetoric we are damn'd?
But Bentir, not content with such command,
To canton out the Jewish nation's land; [8]
He does extend to other coasts his pride,
And other kingdoms into parts divide: [9]

---

[1] Bentir Hans Willem Bentinck, first Earl of Portland (1649–1709), William's most trusted advisor on foreign policy.

[2] Parliament revoked William's grants of forfeited Irish lands in 1700.

[3] Bentinck was commissioned Lieutenant-General of the English army in 1690.

[4] foreign chieftains William appointed several foreign-born members of his court to high military position.

[5] ten years' war When William entered England, Louis XIV responded by invading the Palatinate; the ensuing War of the Grand Alliance (1689–97) pitted England, the Netherlands, Spain, Austria, and a number of German states against France.

[6] William's privy council included two naturalized foreigners in 1700.

[7] Our Hebrew's murdered referring to the accented English spoken by the Dutch members of William's court.

[8] To canton out to subdivide (OED canton v 1).

[9] Bentinck signed the first and second partition treaties (1698, 1700) that allocated various Spanish territories to England, France, the Netherlands, and the Holy Roman Empire.

Unhappy Hiram! dismal is thy song; [1]
Though born to Empire, thou art ever young!
Ever in nonage, canst no right transfer:
But who made Bentir thy executor?
What mighty power does Israel's land afford?
What power has made the famous Bentir Lord?
The people's voice, and Sanhedrin's accord?
Are not the rights of people still the same?
Did they e'er differ in or place or name?
Have not mankind on equal terms still stood,
Without distinction, since the mighty flood?
And have not Hiram's subjects a free choice
To choose a king by their united voice?
If Israel's people cou'd a monarch choose,
A living king at the same time refuse;
That Hiram's people, shall it e'er be said,
Have not the right of choice when he is dead?
When no successor to the crown's in sight,
The crown is certainly the people's right.
If kings are made the people to enthral,
We had much better have no king at all:
But kings, appointed for the common good,
Always as guardians to their people stood.
And Heaven allows the people sure a power
To choose such kings as shall not them devour:
They know full well what best will serve themselves,
How to avoid the dang'rous rocks and shelves.
Unthinking Israel! Ah henceforth beware
How you entrust this faithless wanderer!
He who another Kingdom can divide,
May set your Constitution soon aside,
And o'er your liberties in triumph ride.
Support your rightful monarch and his crown,
But pull this proud, this croaking mortal down.
Proceed, my Muse; the story next relate
Of Keppech the imperious chit of state, [2]
Mounted to grandeur by the usual course
Of whoring, pimping, or a crime that's worse; [3]
Of foreign birth, and undescended too,
Yet he, like Bentir, mighty feats can do.
He robs our treasure, to augment his state,
And Jewish nobles on his fortunes wait:
Our ravish'd honours on his shoulder wears, [4]
And titles from our ancient rolls he tears. [5]
Was e'er a prudent people thus befool'd,
By upstart foreigners thus basely gull'd?
Ye Jewish nobles, boast no more your race,
Or sacred bays that did your Fathers grace!
In vain is blood, or parentages, when
Ribbons and garters can ennoble men. [6]
To chivalry you need have no recourse,
The gaudy trappings make the ass a horse.
No more, no more your ancient honours own,
By slavish Gibeonites you are outdone:
Or else your ancient courage reassume,
And to assert your honours once presume;
From off their heads your ravish'd laurels tear,
And let them know what Jewish nobles are.
—1700

---

[1] Hiram Carlos II of Spain (1661–1700), whose death without an heir sparked the partitioning of Spanish territory that Bentinck helped negotiate.

[2] Keppech Arnold Joost van Keppel, first Earl of Albemarle (1669–1718).

[3] a crime that's worse likely sodomy.

[4] Knights of the Bath wore their insignia on the left shoulder.

[5] The earldom of Albemarle (or Aumerle) was a thirteenth-century title.

[6] Ribbons and garters insignia of Knights of the Bath and Knights of the Garter respectively.

Cotton Mather

1663 – 1728

Born in Boston, where he would live his entire life, and educated at Harvard, Mather was a third-generation member of a prominent New England family of preachers and intellectuals. Mather began preaching in 1680 and was ordained formally in 1685; he shared the pulpit of Boston's Old North Church with his father, the minister and Harvard president Increase Mather. Mather published over four hundred books in his lifetime and left extensive work in manuscript, including his Diary and a translation of the entire Bible, the "Biblia Americana." Like his father, Mather believed in the reality of witches and in the necessity of punishing witchcraft, but he opposed the use of certain kinds of evidence instrumental in trials of the time. A life-long interest in science, which led him to correspond with Robert Boyle and argue on behalf of inoculation against smallpox, would win him membership in The Royal Society of London in 1713. His works include Memorable Providences Relating to Witchcrafts and Possessions (1689); The Wonders of the Invisible World (1693); an ecclesiastical history of New England, Magnalia Christi Americana (1702); and a blank verse translation of the Psalms, the Psalterium Americanum (1718).

Mather began his Diary in 1681 at the age of eighteen, and kept it until 1725; twenty-six manuscript volumes, each covering a single year, are extant, the rest being either lost or destroyed. Mather described his life as "a continual conversation with Heaven"; his diary is a record less of daily events than of the faith and sense of purpose that sustained him through a life of spiritual leadership and personal losses (only two of his fifteen children by three wives would survive him). Mather's Diary therefore shares more with John Bunyan's spiritual autobiography Grace Abounding than it does with other seventeenth-century diaries such as those by Samuel Pepys, John Evelyn, William Laud, or Lady Margaret Hoby.

* * *

Diary of Cotton Mather

(excerpts)

1681 1 d. 8 m. [October.][1] After my rising thoughts had been employed on Psal. 126:5,[2] I spent this day in sowing the tears of repentance and supplication; with desires to humble myself before God for my old sins, and for my late ones; especially my exceeding sluggishness and laziness, and woeful dulness, in the service of God, and obtain his mercy in the pardoning and subduing of my sins, and my enjoyment of his presence with me, in my ministry.

My spirit was in agonies this day, when after my confession of sin I found my heart yet unbroken. I cried unto God, that he would embitter sin to me, and give me a just sorrow for my being so sinfully sorrowless as I am. I concluded,

"And, Lord, I hope thou hast now taken away my delight in sin. My heart would abhor it, and resist it. My soul does not like it. I think it is thus with me. If it be not thus, Lord, let me know it. Search me, try me, see if there be any way of wickedness in me. If I have done iniquity, or if I delight in doing it, show it me, and I will do so no more. I would give thee my heart and love, and soul, and all that I have, or am, or can. I am, like the man with a withered hand, essaying to do it. O my Lord, help me, in this my resignation."

---

[1] Mather began each year's record on his birthday in February; March was therefore the first month.

[2] "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy."

Afterwards, I made these attempts at closing with the Lord Jesus Christ.

"I have plunged my soul down into an horrible pit of sin and woe; but I cannot think of lying there. Salvation, I must, I must be made partaker of. And what shall I do? I am utterly unable to save myself. But there is one mighty to save, one whom God has laid help upon; him, him would I look unto. O my Lord Jesus Christ! Tho' I may be still as wretched and sinful as ever, yet is it not, is it not, as much my duty to come unto thee as ever! Art thou not able to save me? Lord, I will never dispute that; I know thou art, be my sins never so many, and never so horrid, and be my heart never so hard, and my state never so sad. And art thou not willing to save me? Indeed, I am unworthy; and I have nothing in me to move thee unto any saving notice of me. Yea, I have rejected thee, and therefore thou mayst reject me; and then I am in a forlorn condition indeed! But, Lord, it repents me that I have rejected thee, I will never, never, never do so again. My soul now followeth hard after thee. I see my need of thee; and an excellent beauty in thee. Oh! Surely thou art willing to undertake in the work of my salvation. Didst thou put away those that came unto thee, for the healing of their bodily diseases, when thou wast visibly incarnate here in this lower world? Art not those things recorded, as an intimation of what method I should use, and what success I should find, in my addressing of thee for the healing of my soul? Yea, which is a word full of life and Heaven! Tis one thing in the faith required of me, to believe thy willingness to accept of miserable sinners when they come unto thee; so that if I doubt thy willingness, I shall be guilty of a very criminal unbelief. Oh! therefore I look up unto thee. Wilt thou pass by me, now thou seest me in my blood; and shall it not be a time of love? Wilt thou not say unto me, live? O, let me now, believing, rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory! The Lord Jesus Christ, will be my priest, prophet, king. He will engage for my good. He will take away my sins. He will bring me safe home to his father's house forever!"

☞ Towards the close of the day, I could not but use these words; "Lord, I know thou wilt be with me. Lord, I know thou wilt improve me in eminent services for thy name. Lord, I know thou will signalize me, as thou hast my father, my grandfathers, and my uncles before me. Hallelujah."

. . . .

1683 5 d. 3 m. [May.] Upon many calls thereunto I spent this day in secret prayer with fasting, before the Lord.

And I will, to give one instructive instance unto my few friends, with whom I leave these papers, particularly recite the method of my proceedings, from the beginning, to the conclusion, of the day.

1. I began the day with expressing before the Lord my belief of his being a rewarder of them which diligently seek him, and my request that he would now strengthen me to seek him.

2. I then read the chapters of the Bible, which occurred unto me in my course of reading; and those chapters, I largely turned into prayers before the Lord.

3. Afterwards, I essayed in meditation to affect my own heart with a sense of the manifold vileness wherewith I have provoked God: My old sins, and my late sins; especially my woeful unfruitfulness, under my marvellous enjoyments, privileges and advantages.

All which, I then confessed, and bewailed, upon my knees, before God.

4. This done; I sang unto the Lord, that hymn of Barton's, which is called, Confession of Sin.[1]

5. Hereupon, I spent some time in pondering of a profitable and a seasonable question; and then in forming of some occasional reflections.

---

[1] Barton's William Barton, author of a popular verse translation of the Psalms first published in 1645.

6. I then went again unto my supplications; wherein I considered, that after all my vileness, the Lord is willing to deal with me in the way of the covenant of grace; and for that end, offered unto me such a surety and a saviour, as the blessed Jesus. Wherefore, I now stirred up myself to take hold of him, earnestly putting my soul into the hands of the mediator, and crying to him that he would convey unto me, not only pardon of sin, but also power against it, and make me an happy subject of all his redeeming works.

7. Now, I sang unto the Lord that hymn in Barton's which is entitled, Humble Confessions and Supplications. And I set myself, by further meditation, to establish myself in the use of such rules of speech as might render me a perfect man.

8. From which, I betook myself unto prayer. And my prayer now was, especially for such a door of utterance, as from time to time in my ministry I might have occasion for. ☞ And I had a full assurance that I was heard in this petition.

9. I then sang part of the 51st Psalm.

And so proceeded unto another prayer, wherein I presented before the Lord the desire of Solomon for wisdom; and for the presence of God with me, in all the concerns of my ministry.

10. Which being finished, I sang part of the 103d. Psalm. And then I examined myself by the signs of a state of nature, and a state of grace, given in Mr N. Vincent's, True Touchstone;[1] and found joyful cause to hope.

11. In the next place, I made another prayer; to recommend unto the blessing of God my particular friends, and all his people.

12. So I went unto a meeting of Christians, that were preparing for the Communion tomorrow and prayed and preached with them.

13. Leaving them I visited a sick neighbour and prayed with him.

14. And last of all, I shut up the day, renouncing all apprehension of merit in my duties, and relying upon the Lord Jesus Christ alone for acceptance and salvation.

. . . .

1692 [May.] In the spring of this year, I preached, on the lecture, to the country, a sermon upon temptations; and now, behold my poor country entered quickly into temptation.

The rest of the summer was a very doleful time, unto the whole country.

The devils, after a most preternatural manner, by the dreadful judgment of Heaven took a bodily possession of many people in Salem, and the adjacent places; and the houses of the poor people began to be filled with the horrid cries of persons tormented by evil spirits. There seemed an execrable witchcraft in the foundation of this wonderful affliction, and many persons of diverse characters were accused, apprehended, prosecuted, upon the visions of the afflicted.

For my own part, I was always afraid of proceeding to convict and condemn any person as a confederate with afflicting demons, upon so feeble an evidence as a spectral representation.[2] Accordingly, I ever testified against it, both publicly and privately; and in my letters to the judges, I particularly besought them that they would by no means admit it; and when a considerable assembly of ministers gave in their advice about that matter, I not only concurred with their advice, but it was I who drew it up.

Nevertheless, on the other side, I saw in most of the judges a most charming instance of prudence and patience, and I knew their exemplary piety, and the agony of soul with which they sought the direction of Heaven; above most other people, whom I generally saw enchanted into a raging, railing, scandalous and unreasonable disposition, as the distress increased upon us: For this cause tho' I could not allow the principles that some of the judges had espoused, yet I could not but speak honourably of their persons on all occasions; and my compassion, upon the sight of their difficulties, raised by my journeys to Salem, the chief seat of these diabolical vexations, caused me yet more to do so. And merely, as far as I can learn, for this reason, the mad people thro' the country, under a fascination on their spirits, equal to what our energumens had on their bodies,[1] reviled me, as if I had been the doer of all the hard things that were done in the prosecution of the witchcraft.

---

[1] Nathaniel Vincent (?1639–1697), a London minister ejected for Nonconformity, published The True Touchstone in 1681.

[2] spectral representation the testimony of a victim who claimed to have been attacked by a spectre bearing the appearance of a person he or she knew.

In this evil time, I offered, at the beginning, that if the possessed people might be scattered far asunder, I would singly provide for six of them; and we would see whether without more bitter methods, prayer with fasting would not put an end unto these heavy trials: But my offer (which none of my revilers would have been so courageous or so charitable as to have made) was not accepted.

. . . .

1693 On March 28, Tuesday, between 4 and 5 a.m. God gave to my wife a safe deliverance of a son. It was a child of a most comely and hearty look, and all my friends entertained his birth with very singular expressions of satisfaction. But the child was attended with a very strange disaster; for it had such an obstruction in the bowels, as utterly hindered the passage of its ordure from it. We used all the methods that could be devised for its ease; but nothing we did could save the child from death. It languished, in its agonies, till Saturday, April 1, about 10 p.m. and so died, unbaptised. There was a conjunction of many and heavy trials in this dispensation of God; but God enabled me to bear them all with an unexpected measure of resignation unto his holy will. I did not suffer such a discomposure in my thoughts, as to hinder me from preaching both parts of the day following; in the forenoon on Heb. 11:17; in the afternoon, on Job. 2:10, and to exemplify unto my congregation, a little of the faith, patience, thankfulness, which I then preached unto them.[2] On the Monday, the child was buried, with a very numerous and honourable attendance of my neighbours; and on one of the gravestones, I wrote only that Epitaph, RESERVED FOR A GLORIOUS RESURRECTION.

When the body of the child was opened, we found that the lower end of the rectum intestinum, instead of being musculus, as it should have been, was membranous, and altogether closed up. I had great reason to suspect a witchcraft in this preternatural accident; because my wife, a few weeks before her deliverance, was affrighted with an horrible spectre in our porch, which fright caused her bowels to turn within her; and the spectres which both before and after tormented a young woman in our neighbourhood bragged of their giving my wife that fright, in hopes, they said, of doing mischief unto her infant at least, if not unto the mother: and besides all this, the child was no sooner born, but a suspected woman sent unto my father a letter full of railing against myself, wherein she told him, He little knew, what might quickly befall some of his posterity. However I made little use of, and laid little stress on, this conjecture; desiring to submit unto the will of my heavenly Father without which, not a sparrow falls unto the ground.

. . . .

[October 1693.] Among other things which entertained me at Salem, one was a discourse with one

---

[1] energumens people possessed by a spirit or devil (OED). Mather is saying that the "mad people" who criticized him for approving of the trials seemed to him as irrational mentally as those he believed were possessed physically.

[2] The biblical passages he preached on are, respectively, "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son"; "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?"

Mrs. Carver, who had been strangely visited with some shining spirits, which were good angels, in her opinion of them.

She intimated several things unto me whereof some were to be kept secret. She also told me that a new storm of witchcraft would fall upon the country; to chastise the iniquity that was used in the wilful smothering and covering of the last; and that many fierce opposites to the discovery of that witchcraft would be thereby convinced.

Unto my surprise, when I came home, I found one of my neighbours horribly arrested by evil spirits. I then begged of God, that he would help me wisely to discharge my duty upon this occasion, and avoid gratifying of the evil angels in any of their expectations. I did then concern myself to use and get as much prayer as I could for the afflicted young woman; and at the same time, to forbid either her from accusing any of her neighbours, or others from enquiring any thing of her. Nevertheless, a wicked man wrote a most lying libel to revile my conduct in these matters; which drove me to the blessed God, with my supplications that he would wonderfully protect me, as well from unreasonable men acted by the devils, as from the devils themselves. I did at first it may be too much resent the injuries of that libel; but God brought good out of it; it occasioned the multiplication of my prayers before him; it very much promoted the works of humiliation and mortification in my soul. Indeed, the devil made that libel an occasion of those paroxysms in the town, that would have exceedingly gratified him, if God had not helped me to forgive and forget the injuries done unto me, and to be deaf unto the solicitations of those that would have had me so to have resented the injuries of some few persons, as to have deserted the lecture at the old meeting house.

When the afflicted young woman had undergone six weeks of preternatural calamities and when God had helped me to keep just three days of prayer on her behalf, I had the pleasure of seeing the same success, which I used to have, on my third fast, for such possessed people as have been cast into my cares. God gave her a glorious deliverance; the remarkable circumstances whereof, I have more fully related in an history of the whole business.[1]

As for my missing notes,[2] the possessed young woman, of her own accord, enquired whether I missed them not? She told me, the spectres bragged in her hearing, that they had robbed me of them; she added, "Be not concerned; for they confess, they can't keep them always from you; you shall have them all brought you again." (They were notes on Ps. 119:9 and Ps. 90:12 and Hag. 1:7–9. I was tender of them and often prayed unto God, that they might be returned.) On the fifth of October following, every leaf of my notes again came into my hands, tho' they were in eighteen separate quarters of sheets. They were found dropped here and there, about the streets of Lynn; but how they came to be so dropped I cannot imagine; and I as much wonder at the exactness of their preservation.

It pleased God, that on October 3 my daughter Mary was taken very dangerously sick of a fever, with a vomiting, and with worms. I was by a stranger diversion upon my spirit hindered from importunate prayers for the life of the sick child; but at length, on October 5 in the evening, I had my heart wonderfully melted in prayers at my father[-in-law] Philip's where the child lay sick: I demanded not the life of the child, but I resigned it unto the mercy of God, in Jesus Christ; with such rapturous assurances of the divine love unto me and mine, as would richly have made amends for the death of more children, if God had then called for them. ☞ I was unaccountably assured, not only that this child shall be happy forever, but that I never should have any child, except what should be an everlasting temple to the spirit of God: Yea, that I and mine should be together in the Kingdom of God, world without end.

---

[1] The young woman's name was Margaret Rule. The account was pirated and printed in Robert Calef, More Wonders of the Invisible World (1700), a book hostile to Mather.

[2] Notes for sermons he had intended to preach at Salem, "stolen from me, with such circumstances, that I am somewhat satisfied the spectres, or agents in the invisible world, were the robbers."

About six o'clock in the morning following, it being the sixth day of the month, and the sixth day of the week, the child near a month short of two years old, expired.

The next day it was buried in Boston, with an honourable attendance at the funeral.

On one of the gravestones, I wrote, GONE, BUT NOT LOST.

[October 10, 1693.] On this day, I also visited a possessed young woman in the neighbourhood,[1] whose distresses were not the least occasion of my being thus before the Lord. I wrestled with God for her: and among other things, I pleaded that God had made it my office and business to engage my neighbours in the service of the Lord Jesus Christ; and that this young woman had expressed her compliance with my invitations unto that service; only that the evil spirits now hindered her from doing what she had vowed: and therefore that I had a sort of right to demand her deliverance from these invading devils, and to demand such a liberty for her as might make her capable of glorifying my glorious Lord; which I did accordingly. In the close of this day, a wonderful spirit, in white and bright raiment, with a face unseen, appeared unto this young woman, and bid her, count me her father, and regard me and obey me as her father; for he said, the Lord had given her to me; and she should now within a few days be delivered. It proved, accordingly.

. . . .

1696 Memorandum. About fifteen years ago, I bought a Spanish Indian, and bestowed him for a servant on my father. About three years ago, Sir William Phips, our Governor, bestowed a Spanish Indian for a servant on myself. My servant affecting the sea, I permitted him to go to sea; and being an ingenuous fellow, I gave him an instrument for his freedom, if he served me till the end of the year 1697. Two years ago, the French took him, and I lost him. The loss occasioned me to make a cheerful resignation, unto the will of God. But I was hereupon persuaded and often expressed my persuasion, that my servant would be returned unto me. In the beginning of the year, an English man of war, by taking the vessel wherein my servant was, retook him. Nevertheless, the captain of the man of war being a fellow that had no principles of honour or honesty in him, I could by no means recover my servant out of his hands, who intended to make a perpetual slave of him. So, I gave over my endeavours to recover him; chiefly troubled for the condition of the poor servant. But then a strange conjunction of circumstances fell out, that the churlish captain was compelled without any consideration, but what I should please, to restore him. And my servant being so strangely returned, I set myself to make him a servant of the Lord.

. . . .

1698 [June.] I have again, and again, received assurances from the Lord, which I have sometimes also in a convenient manner uttered, that the Lord was going to do an astonishing work in France, for the reviving of his holy religion there.[2] Behold, the whole principality of Orange, which is in the bowels of France, has had an astonishing work done upon it:[3] Its pastors being restored, the holy religion of Christ is restored with them, and the poor Protestants, who had been dragooned into a sad apostasy,[1] are all, with transports of joy, recovered.

---

[1] Margaret Rule again.

[2] holy religion Protestantism.

[3] As a consequence of the Treaty of Ryswick (see note below). Louis XIV had conquered the principality of Orange, located in present-day Provence, in the 1670s. The Princes of Orange, however, had long been based in the Netherlands.

Briefly, I have many years ago published it, as my opinion, that the antichrist entered his last half-time at the half-Reformation in the former century, and that about an hundred and eighty years from thence would bring us to a new Reformation, vastly exceeding the former. Now, I live to see in 1697 greater tendencies to the new Reformation, than there were to be seen in 1517 for the half-Reformation, then begun.

O my Lord Jesus Christ, accept of me, the vilest of men, to do some great things for thee, in the approaching Reformation. Thou wilt accept of me! But, oh! make me a very holy, prayerful, watchful, and prudent man, that I may be fit for my master's use.

This day, both in my study, and in the public, I did, in imitation of the angels, in the first chapter of Zechariah, present this report before the Lord; that much of the earth sits still, and is at rest; thro' the peace lately ratified among the nations of Europe;[2] only Jerusalem is yet in its ruins; the French churches are dissipated, the Hungarian churches are desolated, the Piemontese churches are again afflicted: and I cried unto Heaven, for a marvellous redemption to be wrought for them. It will be done! It will shortly and surely be done!....

[July.] This day, when I was pouring out my prayers unto the Lord, I mentioned the prolongation of my life, to enjoy and improve more opportunities of glorifying him. In my prayers, I humbly represented unto the Lord that there were two objections against dying, which flesh would be ready to make; but thro' his grace I had conquered them. First, my flesh pleaded that the comforts of earth were too agreeable things to be easily forsaken. But my faith is persuaded and satisfied that the delights of Heaven are sweeter than the comforts of earth; and I can freely leave all the entertainments of this evil world, that I may be with Christ, where to be is by far the best of all. Secondly, my flesh pleaded, what will become of my poor offspring, when I am gone? But my faith is persuaded and satisfied, that God will be a father to my fatherless offspring; and my Lord Jesus Christ, whom I have served, without seeking, as many others would have done, to enrich myself with a portion for my children, will marvellously become such a guardian to my orphans, that they shall never want any good thing. My mind being on these two accounts thus easy, and ready to die, I then besought of the Lord, nevertheless, that he would yet spare my life, to work for him, a little more, among his people.

. . . .

1699 [January.] About this time, understanding that the way for our communication with the Spanish Indies opens more and more, I set myself to learn the Spanish language. The Lord wonderfully prospered me in this undertaking; a few leisure minutes in the evening of every day, in about a fortnight, or three weeks time, so accomplished me, I could write very good Spanish. Accordingly, I composed a little body of the Protestant religion, in certain articles, backed with irresistible sentences of Scripture. This I turned into the Spanish tongue; and am now printing it, with a design to send it by all the ways that I can into the several parts of the Spanish America; as not knowing, how great a matter a little fire may kindle, or, whether the time for our Lord Jesus Christ to have glorious churches in America, be not at hand. The title of my composure is, La Religion Pura, En Doze palabras Fieles, dignas de ser recebidas de Todos.[1]

---

[1] dragooned a policy directed by Louis XIV against the French Protestants in which Catholic soldiers were quartered in Protestant houses.

[2] The Treaty of Ryswick (October 1697) ended the War of the Grand Alliance (1689–1697), which had pitted England, Spain, the Dutch Republic, and the Holy Roman Empire against France.

Oh! how happy shall I be, if the God of Heaven will prosper this my poor endeavour to glorify my Lord Jesus Christ.

But these my studies, in conjunction with some other inconveniences, raised the vapours of my spleen into my head. A grievous, painful, wasting headache seized me. In a few days, I was enfeebled with it into deplorable circumstances. I cried, unto the Lord, that for the sake of what my Lord Jesus Christ endured in his holy head, I might receive some ease of the pains in my sinful one. He heard my cry; and by the method of cupping,[2] he sent me relief. I was disabled from going abroad on the Lord's-day, 22 d. 11 m. [January.] But according to my poor strength, I spent part of it at home, on my knees, in prayers, with tears, lamenting my horrible filthiness, unthankfulness, and unfruitfulness, and imploring pardon, thro' the blood of Jesus.

I was able, on the Wednesday following, to discourse unto a great company of Christians at my house, above an hour, on the apostle's thorn in the flesh;[3] which I find some of the ancients, expound of a troublesome headache.

Nevertheless, my health is overthrown, and my spleen especially so disordered, that Satan gets into it: And now my mind is horribly buffeted with temptations, which tell me, that being unable to do any further service, and unworthy that God should help me to do any, I shall fall into an unserviceable old age, before I am forty years old. It is impossible for me to express the sad thoughts which now distress me, and confound me, and how much I am unhinged with them. Lord, pity thy poor servant; and tho' I am exceedingly vile, yet, O let me not be a cast away!

Under these grievous buffetings, I had no remedy, but earnest cries to Heaven. I had not health and strength enough in my frail body, to set apart whole days for prayer with fasting, as otherwise I would have done. But I took only my daily opportunities to plead the righteousness of my Lord Jesus Christ, who suffered wonderful temptation from Satan, without being betrayed into any sin, for the pardon of all the sin, which I discover under my temptation; and for my obtaining from heaven assistance against all temptation, and at length deliverance from temptation.

Some light, at last, began to appear unto me; and I begun to consider, whether these buffetings from Satan may not be permitted by Heaven to annoy me, because I am about a special piece of work, whereby the Kingdom of Satan may receive a more than ordinary blow; or, that so I may be prepared for some special mercy or service near unto me!

—(1681–99)

---

[1] "Pure religion, in twelve true articles, worthy of being received by all." Published with another Spanish text by Mather, La Fe del Christiano (Boston, 1699).

[2] cupping a procedure for drawing blood by applying a heated cup to the skin.

[3] apostle's thorn Paul, in II Corinthians 12:7.

Elizabeth Johnson

dates unknown

The following essay, prefaced to Elizabeth Singer Rowe's Poems on Several Occasions. Written by Philomela (1696), is remarkable for its radical, if brief, defence of women. Nothing is known of its author Elizabeth Johnson, who identifies herself as a friend to Rowe and her publisher John Dunton (Philaret). We know only that she wrote the Preface in Harding-Rents, May 10, 1696. Like Bathsua Makin and Margaret Fell, Johnson challenges the construction of the female as cognitively inferior and spiritually inadequate. This Preface is, in fact, a declaration of female constitutional independence in the face of attempts to dispossess women of mind and soul.

* * *

Preface to the Reader

The occasion of this preface is, to give the world some account of the author of these Poems, as far as I'm permitted to do it: an employment I the more willingly choose, because our sex has some excuse for a little vanity, when they have so good reason for't, and such a champion among themselves, as not many of the other can boast of. We are not unwilling to allow mankind the brutal advantages of strength, they are superior to ours in force, they have custom on their side, and have ruled, and are like to do so, and may freely do it without disturbance or envy; at least they should have none from us, if they could but keep quiet among themselves. But when they would monopolize sense too, when neither that, nor learning, nor so much as wit must be allowed us, but all overruled by the tyranny of the prouder sex; nay, when some of 'em won't let us say our souls are our own, but would persuade us we are no more reasonable creatures than themselves, or their fellow animals; we then must ask their pardons if we are not yet so completely passive as to bear all without so much as a murmur. We complain, and we think with reason, that our fundamental constitutions are destroyed; that here's a plain and an open design to render us mere slaves, perfect Turkish wives, without properties, or sense, or souls; and are forced to protest against it, and appeal to all the world, whether these are not notorious violations on the liberties of freeborn Englishwomen? This makes the meekest worm amongst us all, ready to turn again when we are thus trampled on. But alas! What can we do to right ourselves? Stingless and harmless as we are, we can only kiss the foot that hurts us. However, sometimes it pleases heaven to raise up some brighter genius then ordained to succour a distressed people: an Epaminondas in Thebes; a Timoleon for Corinth (for you must know we read Plutarch now 'tis translated); and a Nassau for all the world.[1] Nor is our defenceless sex forgotten—we have not only Bunducas and Zenobias, but Sapphos, and Behns, and Schurmans, and Orindas, who have humbled the most haughty of our antagonists, and made 'em do homage to our wit, as well as our beauty.[2] 'Tis true, their mischievous and envious sex have made it their utmost endeavours to deal with us, as Hannibal was served at Capua, and to corrupt that virtue which they can no otherwise overcome: and sometimes they prevailed:[1] But, if some angels fell, others remained in their innocence and perfection, if there were not also some addition made to their happiness and glory, by their continuing steadfast. Angels love, but they love virtuously and reasonably, and neither err in the object, nor the manner: And if all our poetesses had done the same, I wonder what our enemies could have found out to have objected against us. However, here they are silenced; and I dare be bold to say, that whoever does not come extremely prejudiced to these Poems, will find in 'em that vivacity of thought, that purity of language, that softness and delicacy in the love-part, that strength and majesty of numbers almost everywhere, especially on heroical subjects, and that clear and unaffected love to virtue; that height of piety and warmth of devotion in the Canticles, and other religious pieces; which they will hardly find exceeded in the best authors on those different kinds of writing, much less equalled by any single writer.

---

[1] Epaminondas...Corinth Epaminondas (d. 362 B.C.E.) co-operated in the restoration of Theban power (379–371) and was celebrated for defeating the Spartan army at Leuctra. Timoleon (d. ca. 334 B.C.E.), a Corinthian, liberated Greek Sicily from military dictators and Carthaginian invaders; Plutarch...translated Plutarch's Parallel Lives of Greeks and Romans was translated into English by Thomas North in 1579. John Dryden headed a company of translators of the Lives and completed the task in 1683. Johnson likely refers to Dryden's translation; Nassau William III (1650–1702), King of England.

[2] Bunducas...Orindas Bunduca is another name for Boadicea (first century C.E.), the queen of ancient Britain who led a revolt against the Roman army, sacking and destroying Verulamium. Zenobia (third century C.E.), the wife of Odaenathus, secured power for herself in the name of her infant son after her husband's death. She controlled Syria,

And now I have nothing more, I think, lies upon my hands, but to assure the reader, that they were actually writ by a young lady (all, but some of the "Answers," as is well-known to some persons of quality and worth), whose name had been prefixed, had not her own modesty absolutely forbidden it.

The way of thinking and writing is all along the same, only varying with the subject; and the whole so very agreeable a mixture, that unless Philaret and myself, who have the honour to be her friends, and who persuaded her to publish this first volume, are very partial, 'tis more than probable, they will meet with so favourable a reception with the pious and ingenious reader, that we may ere long prevail with her to oblige the world with a second part, no way inferior to the former.[2]

Hardings-Rents,
MAY 10TH 1696.

Elizabeth Johnson

---

devastated Bostra, conquered Egypt and overran Asia Minor. Sappho, born in Lesbos (b. ca. 612 B.C.E.), was a Greek poet whose work was collected in nine books. Aphra Behn (1640–1689) was a dramatist, novelist and poet. Anna Maria van Schurman (1607–1678) was a Dutch theologian, philosopher, and educational reformer. Orinda was the pseudonym of Katherine Philips (1632–1664), the poet and translator.

[1] Hannibal was served at Capua Hannibal (247–183/2 B.C.E.) was the great Carthaginian general of the Second Punic War between Rome and Carthage. In Plutarch's Lives, he and his men are described as a "great horde of robbers" who managed to bring almost all of Italy under their sway. The people of Capua were persuaded to come over to him "of their own accord" and to attach themselves firmly to his cause.

[2] Philaret John Dunton, the friend and publisher of Elizabeth Singer Rowe.

Elizabeth Singer Rowe
“Philomela”
1674 – 1737

Elizabeth Singer Rowe was born in Ilchester, Somersetshire, the eldest of three daughters of Walter Singer, a clothier and dissenting preacher, and Elizabeth Portnell. When her mother died (ca. 1692), the family left Ilchester for Frome. She was tutored in Italian and possibly Latin by Henry Thynne, the son of Lord Weymouth. Her letters reveal that she was well read in poetry, drama, romance, and devotional and philosophical prose. At nineteen, she began a correspondence with John Dunton, the London bookseller, printer, and founder of the “Athenian Society.” The Society was comprised of the editors of the Athenian Mercury, a weekly journal dedicated to "raise the Soul, as it were, into Daylight, and restore the knowledge of Truth and Happiness, that had wandered so long unknown, and found out by few" (Dunton, Life and Errors, 1705).[1] Between 1691 and 1697, Singer Rowe anonymously contributed a series of poems to the Athenian Mercury. In 1696, Dunton published a collection of her poems under the title Poems on Several Occasions. Written by Philomela.[2] This volume included a selection of pastorals, Pindaric odes, panegyrics, biblical paraphrase, eulogies and songs. Singer Rowe’s two Latin translations were included in Tonson’s Poetic Miscellanies (vol. 5) in 1704. At the age of thirty-six, she married the poet and scholar Thomas Rowe, and established a home in London. After her husband’s death of consumption in 1715, she lived a reclusive life with her father in Frome.

Singer Rowe is best known as a representative of eighteenth-century Pietism. In 1728, nine years after her father’s death, she published the highly popular prose epistles: Friendship in Death, or Letters from the Dead to the Living and Letters Moral and Entertaining. Two more books of Letters Moral and Entertaining, The History of Joseph, and Devout Exercises of the Heart followed in subsequent years. After her death, her brother-in-law, Theophilus Rowe, edited The Miscellaneous Works in Prose and Verse of Mrs. Singer Rowe, which was issued in 1739. Her posthumous popularity was such that more than eighty editions of her poetry and prose were issued well into the nineteenth century and her poems, translated into German, were lavishly praised by the German poets Klopstock and Wieland.

⁂

Platonic Love

I

So angels love and all the rest is dross,
Contracted, selfish, sensitive and gross.[3]
Unlike to this, all free and unconfined,
Is that bright flame I bear thy brighter mind.

II

No straggling wish, or symptom of desire,
Comes near the limits of this holy fire;
Yet ’tis intense and active, though so fine,
For all my pure immortal part is thine.

III

Why should I then the heav’nly spark control,
Since there’s no brighter ray in all my soul?
Why should I blush to indulge the noble flame,
For which even friendship’s a degrading name?[4]

---

[1] the Athenian Mercury formerly named The Athenian Gazette.

[2] Singer Rowe published under the names Philomela (“the nightingale”) and the Pindaric Lady.

[3] dross dreggy, impure matter, (OED dross sb 2).

[4] indulge give oneself up to (OED indulge v I.3).

IV

Nor is the greatness of my love to thee,
A sacrilege unto the deity.
Can I th'enticing stream almost adore,
And not respect its lovely fountain more?
—1696

A Poetical Question concerning the Jacobites, sent to the Athenians [1]

'Twas nobly thought, and worthy-still;
So I resolve t' employ my loyal quill.
Virtue, and our unequalled hero's praise!
What themes more glorious can exact my lays?
William! A name my lines grow proud to bear!
A prince as great, and wondrous good, as e'er
The sacred burden of a crown did wear.
Resolve me, then, Athenians, what are those,
(Can there be any such?) you call his foes?
His foes, cursed word, and why they'd pierce his breast, [2]
Ungrateful vipers! where they warmly rest?
—1696

The Athenians' Answer [3]

Their name is Legion, grinning from afar
Against the throne, who wage unequal war; [4]
Though nearer, on perpetual guard, attends
A far more numerous host of brighter friends:
Around our prince, heav'n's care, the sacred band
With fiery arms in firm battalia stand: [5]
To him mild light, and lambent beams they show, [6]
But wrath and terror to his hardened foe.
See the black phalanx melt, they melt away,
As guilty ghosts slink from approaching day, [7]
Behold their leaders, decked in horrid state, [8]
Nor wonder why they heaven and Caesar hate.
First mark their haughty general, armed complete
In plates of glowing steel! 'tis Lucifer the great! [9]
See his proud standard o'er his tent enlarged!
With bloated toads, an odious bearing, charged. [10]
The ancient arms which once his shield adorned,
Though 'tis of late to Fleur-de-Lis's turned. [11]
Blasphemous Belial! next thy squadrons stand!
Lawless and lewd, a baffled blasted band,
Each holds a kindled pamphlet in his hand.
These make the gross, the rest we may despise, [12]
(Retailers they of treason, and of lies)
Lucifer's friends, and Caesar's enemies.
Ah were there none but these, who would not be

---

[1] Jacobites adherents of James II of England after his "abdication," or of his son, the Pretender.

[2] pierce his breast The enemies of William III are equated with those of Jesus: "But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his [Jesus's] side and forthwith came there out blood and water" (John 19:34).

[3] This poem cannot be attributed to Singer Rowe with certainty. A longer version of the poem first appeared with A Poetical Question in Vol.13, No.3 of the Athenian Mercury (May 29, 1694).

[4] Their name is Legion "And when he [Jesus] went forth to land, there met him out of the city a certain man, which had devils [a] long time....And Jesus asked him, saying, What is thy name? And he said, Legion: because many devils were entered into him" (Luke 8:27–30; see also Mark 5:9); grinning displaying the teeth threateningly as an indication of anger (OED grin v^2 1).

[5] battalia battle array (OED battalia arch or Obs 1).

[6] lambent shining with a soft clear light and without fierce heat (OED lambent a 1).

[7] phalanx a line or array of battle (OED phalanx 1).

[8] horrid state dreadful pomp (OED horrid a A.2; OED state sb II.17a).

[9] Lines 1-21 are indebted to Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel and Milton's depiction of Satan and the fallen angels; haughty general James II; Lucifer Satan, Devil (Latin "light bearer").

[10] bloated toads The toad was a type of anything hateful or loathsome (OED toad sb 1b,3).

[11] Fleur-de-Lis the heraldic lily, borne upon the royal arms of France under the old monarchy; hence also the French royal family, flag or nation. James II fled to France for political support after his "abdication."

[12] gross the greater part; also the dregs, dross (OED gross sb^4 B4,B3).

Proud and ambitious of their enmity!
There’s one small party, near, too near their line, [1]
Which hover yet, and scarce know which to join.
No black, no ugly marks of sin disgrace
Their nobler forms, no malice in their face:
A duskier gleam they wear than ere they fell,
Their plumes just scorched, too near allied to hell.
What mad mistaken bravery draws ’em in,
Where constancy’s no virtue but a sin?
How can they still their fallen prince esteem?
When false to heaven, why are they true to him?
O! must they sink! a glorious starry race!
They are almost too good, for that sad place
That waits their fall: It must not, cannot be,
If err we do, we’ll err with charity,
Father! they may be saved! we’ll join with Thee!
—1696

A Pindaric, to the Athenian Society

I

I’ve touched each string, each muse I have invoked, [2]
Yet still the mighty theme,
Copes my unequal praise; [3]
Perhaps, the God of Numbers is provoked. [4]
I grasp a subject fit for none but him,
Or Dryden’s sweeter lays;
Dryden! A name I ne’er could yet rehearse,
But straight my thoughts were all transformed to verse.

II

And now methinks I rise;
But still the lofty subject baulks my flight, [5]
And still my muse despairs to do great Athens right;
Yet takes the zealous tribute which I bring,
The early products of a female muse;
Until the God into my breast shall mightier thoughts infuse.
When I with more command, and prouder voice shall sing;
But how shall I describe the matchless men?
I’m lost in the bright labyrinth again.

III

When the lewd age, as ignorant as accursed,
Arrived in vice and error to the worst, [6]
And like Astrea banished from the stage, [7]
Virtue and truth were ready stretched for flight;
Their numerous foes,
Scarce one of either’s champions ventured to oppose;
Scarce one brave mind durst openly engage,
To do them right.
Till prompted with a generous rage;
You coped with all th’abuses of the age; [8]
Unmasked and challenged its abhorred crimes,
Nor feared to lash the darling vices of the times.

IV

Successfully go on,
T’inform and bless mankind as you’ve begun,
Till like yourselves they see;
The frantic world’s imagined joys to be,
Unmanly, sensual and effeminate,

---

[1] one small party either the Tories who remained in contact with James II, or the country Whigs and the Tories who allied to oppose the “new” or “Junto” Whigs who were influential in William III’s government.

[2] each muse an allusion to the nine Muses, the Greek deities who preside over music, poetry, the arts and sciences.

[3] Copes silences; literally to tie or sew up the mouth of (OED cope v^5).

[4] God of Numbers Apollo, patron of music and poetry; numbers metrical periods or feet; hence, lines, verses (OED number sb IV 18b.)

[5] baulks hinders (OED balk v^1 III. 5a).

[6] worst worst age.

[7] And like Astrea…the stage Astrea, a personification of justice, left the earth at the inception of the Iron Age to live amongst the stars until the reappearance of the Golden Age (Ovid, Metamorphoses).

[8] coped contended (OED cope v^2 II.4a). The reference is to the Athenian Society .

Till they with such exalted thoughts possessed;
As you've inspired into my willing breast,
Are charmed, like me, from the impending fate.

V

For ah! Forgive me heaven, I blush to say't,
I with the vulgar world thought irreligion great,
Though fine my breeding, and my notions high;
Though trained in the bright tracts of strictest piety,[1]
I like my splendid tempters soon grew vain,
And laid my slighted innocence aside;
Yet oft my nobler thoughts I have belied,
And to be ill was even reduced to feign.

VI

Until by you,
With more heroic sentiments inspired,
I turned and stood the vigorous torrent too,
And at my former weak retreat admired;[2]
So much was I by your example fired,[3]
So much the heavenly form did win:
Which to my eyes you'd painted virtue in.

VII

Oh, could my verse;
With equal flights, to after times rehearse,
Your fame: It should as bright and deathless be;
As that immortal flame you've raised in me.
A flame which time,
And death itself, wants power to control,[4]
Not more sublime,
Is the divine composure of my soul;
A friendship so exalted and immense,
A female breast did ne'er before commence.
—1696

To Celinda

I

I can't, Celinda, say I love,
But rather I adore,
When with transported eyes I view,
Your shining merits o'er.[5]

II

A fame so spotless and serene,
A virtue so refined;
And thoughts as great, as e'er was yet
Grasped by a female mind.

III

There love and honour dressed, in all,
Their genuine charms appear,
And with a pleasing force at once
They conquer and endear.

IV

Celestial flames are scarce more bright,
Than those your worth inspires,
So angels love and so they burn
In just such holy fires.

V

Then let's my dear Celinda thus
Blessed in ourselves contemn
The treacherous and deluding arts,
Of those base things called men.
—1696

The Reply to Mr.——

No: I'm unmoved: nor can thy charming muse
One tender thought into my breast infuse.
I am from all those sensual motions free;
And you, in vain, speak pretty things to me:
For through the splendid gallantries of love,

---

[1] tracts possibly books (OED tract sb^{1} I.2); more likely courses, paths (OED tract sb ^{3}9).

[2] stood withstood; admired felt surprise (OED admire v 1).

[3] fired inspired with passion (OED fired v^{1}3a).

[4] wants lacks (OED want v 2).

[5] transported enraptured (OED transported ppl.a 2).

Untouched, and careless, now I wildly rove,
From all th'attacks of those proud darts secure,
Whose trifling force too tamely you endure;
Nor ought, on earth's, so delicate to move
My nicer spirit, and exact my love: [1]
Even Theron's lovely and enticing eyes,
Though armed with flames, I can at last despise;
With all the genuine charms and courtly arts,
By which your treacherous sex invade our hearts:
No more those little things contract my breast
By a diviner excellence possessed;
And, should I yield again, it dear must cost
My victor ere he shall the conquest boast;
For the mad venom's quite expelled my veins,
And calmer reason now triumphant reigns:
No more the dearest object of my sight
Can move a soft sensation of delight;
Or force my lingering blood a swifter pace,
Or paint new smiles and blushes on my face.
I've rent the charming idol from my heart, [2]
And banished all from thence that took his part.
No more the smiling beaux shall tempt me on
To gaze, and sigh, and think myself undone;
Whilst love, like some fierce torrent unconfined,
Breaks in, o'er-spreads, and swallows up my mind;
And with its black ungrateful streams control
All the diviner rays within my soul.
No, no: I will, I will no more admire,
And urge the sparks of the now dormant fire:
Nor for a wild fantastic ecstasy,
Change the dear joys of this blest liberty;
Free, as a wandering zephyr, through the air,
Methinks I range, and hate my former sphere. [3]
I meet the noblest forms, yet scorn to pay
A fond devotion to well-molded clay:
Nor would I even for my late splendid chain
Forgo this charming liberty again;
Which with so sweet a calmness fills my breast
As cannot be in words, no not in thine expressed.
—1696

---

[1] nicer tender; also reluctant (OED nice a 4c, 5b).

[2] rent torn (OED rent v^2 2).

[3] zephyr butterfly (OED zephyr sb 4).

A MISCELLANY

Letters

Oliver Cromwell to Colonel Valentine Walton
(July 5, 1644)

Writing from his field camp at York, Oliver Cromwell sends his brother-in-law Valentine Walton news of a Parliamentary victory and condolences for the death in battle of Walton's eldest son, also named Valentine. At the time Governor of King's Lynn, Walton (1594–1661?) was a member of the Long Parliament, the Colonel of a regiment of foot, and was later one of the regicides. The battle of Marston Moor, fought near York on July 2, 1644, was one of the major Parliamentary victories of the wars. The Royalist forces were commanded by Prince Rupert, the King's nephew (see the letter following).

Dear Sir,

It's our duty to sympathize in all mercies; that we may praise the Lord together in chastisements or trials, that so we may sorrow together.

Truly England and the Church of God hath had a great favour from the Lord, in this great victory given unto us, such as the like never was since this war began. It had all the evidences of an absolute victory obtained by the Lord's blessing upon the godly party principally. We never charged but we routed the enemy. The left wing, which I commanded, being our own horse, saving a few Scots in our rear, beat all the Prince's horse. God made them as stubble to our swords, we charged their regiments of foot with our horse, routed all we charged. The particulars I cannot relate now, but I believe, of twenty-thousand the Prince hath not four-thousand left.[1] Give glory, all the glory, to God.

Sir, God hath taken away your eldest son by a cannon-shot. It brake his leg. We were necessitated to have it cut off, whereof he died.

Sir, you know my trials this way:[2] but the Lord supported me with this, That the Lord took him into the happiness we all pant after and live for. There is your precious child full of glory, to know sin nor sorrow any more. He was a gallant young man, exceeding gracious. God give you his comfort. Before his death he was so full of comfort that to Frank Russel and myself he could not express it, it was so great above his pain. This he said to us. Indeed it was admirable. A little after, he said, one thing lay upon his spirit. I asked him, what that was. He told me that it was, that God had not suffered him to be no more the executioner of his [God's] enemies. At his fall, his horse being killed with the bullet, and as I am informed three horses more, I am told he bid them open to the right and left, that he might see the rogues run. Truly he was exceedingly beloved in the Army, of all that knew him. But few knew him, for he was a precious young man, fit for God. You have cause to bless the Lord. He is a glorious saint in heaven, wherein you ought exceedingly to rejoice. Let this drink up your sorrow; seeing these are not feigned words to comfort you, but the thing is so real and undoubted a truth. You may do all things by the strength of Christ. Seek that, and you shall easily bear your trial. Let this public mercy to the Church of God make you to forget your private sorrow. The Lord be your strength: so prays

---

[1] Marston Moor was the bloodiest battle of the civil wars: about 4000 Royalists and 2000 Parliamentarians were killed; another 1500 men were captured. Cromwell is likely referring not only to casualties but also to the number of men he thought Rupert would be able to regroup after they had been dispersed by the rout.

[2] Cromwell's eldest surviving son, also named Oliver and like Walton's son a young soldier fighting in the Parliamentary army, had died of smallpox in March 1644.

Your truly faithful and loving brother,
OLIVER CROMWELL

My love to your daughter, and to my Cousin Percevall, Sister Desbrowe and all friends with you.

Charles I to Prince Rupert
(September 14, 1645)

The King, writing from Hereford, strongly reproves his nephew Rupert for surrendering Bristol to Thomas Fairfax and the New Model Army. Bristol was the last important city remaining in Royalist hands, particularly because it was the King's only valuable seaport; its loss marked the end of Royalist hopes in the south of England. Rupert had promised to hold the town for four months, but his position was untenable. Fairfax began the siege on September 4, and stormed through to capture one of the town's main forts six days later on September 10; Rupert had little choice but to surrender that day, but his uncle saw this decision as bordering on treachery. The King's spelling has not been modernized.

Hereford 14: Sep. 1645

Nepueu/though the losse of Bristol be a great blow to me, yet your surrendering it as you did, is of so much Affliction to me, that it makes me forget, not only, the consideration of that place, but is lykewais the greatest tryall of my constancy that hath yet befalen me; for, what is to be done? after one, that is so neer me as you ar, both in Blood & Friendship, submits himselfe to so meane an Action (I give it the easiest Terme) such; I have so much to say, that I will say no more of it; only, least rasheness of Judgement be layed to my Charge, I must remember you of your letter of the 12: of Aug: wherby you asseured me, (that if no Muteny hapned) you would keepe Bristol for fower Monthes; did you keepe it fower Dayes? was there anything lyke a Muteny? more Questions might be asked but now, I confesse, to litle purpose: my Conclusion is, to desyre you to seeke your subsistance (untill it shall please God to determine of my Condition) somewhere beyond Sease, to which end, I send you heerewith a Passe, & I pray God to make you sencible, of your present Condition, & give you meanes, to redime what you have lost; for I shall have no greater Joy in a Victory, then a just occasion, without blushing, to asseure you of my being

Your loving Oncle & most faithfull frend
CHARLES R

Eleanor Gwynne to Laurence Hyde
(1678, probably May or June)

Nell Gwynne or Gwyn (1650–1687), a well-known actress and mistress to the King, writes a "Mr. Hyde" with the latest news and gossip from court. The recipient is almost certainly Laurence Hyde, second son of the Earl of Clarendon; the letter was likely sent while Hyde was in The Hague on diplomatic business. Gilbert Burnet described the popular and vivacious Gwynne as "the indiscreetest and wildest creature that ever was in a court." The people she mentions were all fixtures of the Restoration court: Sir Carr Scrope (1649–1680), minor poet, man of fashion, and one of the King's witty companions; Mrs. Moll Knight, "the famous singer" (in the words of John Evelyn), and one of Gwynne's rivals for the King's attentions; Catherine Pegge, Lady Green ("Lady grin" in the letter), a former royal mistress; John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester (1647–1680), the poet (see the introduction to the selection of his works); Henry Savile (1642–1687), diplomat and soon to be Vice-Chamberlain; Charles Sackville, Earl of Dorset (1638–1706), poet and Gwynne's former lover (see the introduction to the selection from his work); Thomas Shadwell (1642?–1692), the dramatist and poet whom Dryden targeted in "MacFlecknoe"; Joseph Harris (fl. 1661–1681), a celebrated actor; her two children by the King, Charles Beauclerk, at the time Earl of Burford and later Duke of St. Albans (1670–1726), and James, Lord Beauclerk (1671–1680); and Lady Elizabeth Harvey, an organizer of court intrigue. The letter was likely dictated, as Gwynne implies near its end ("I cant make her write um"); the spelling (including the occasional doubled word) of the original has been retained.

Pray Deare Mr. Hide forgive me for not writeing to you before now for the reasone is I have bin sick thre months & sinse I recoverd I have had nothing to intertaine you withall nor have nothing now worth writing but that I can holde no longer to let you know I never have ben in any companie wethout drinking your health for I loue you with all my soule. the pel mel is now to me a dismale plase sinse I have uterly lost S^r^ Car Scrope never to be recovred agane for he tould me he could not live allwayes at this rate & so begune to be a littel uncivil, which I could not sufer from an uglye baux garscon.[1] M^s^ Knights Lady mothers dead & she has put up a scutchin no beiger then my Lady grins scunchis.[2] My lord Rochester is gon in the cuntrei. M^r^ Savil has got a misfortune, but is upon recovery & is to mary an hairres,[3] who I thinke wont wont have an ill time ont if he holds up his thumb. My lord of Dorscit apiers wonse in thre munths, for he drinkes aile with Shadwell & M^r^ Haris at the Dukes house all day long. my Lord Burford remimbers his sarvis to you. my Lord Bauclaire is is goeing into france. we are a goeing to supe with the king at whithall & my lady Harvie. the King remember his sarvis to you. now lets talke of state affairs, for we never caried things so cunningly as now for we dont know whether we shall have pesce or war, but I am for war and for no other reason but that you may come home. I have a thousand merry conseets, but I cant make her write um & therfore you must take the will for the deed. god bye. your most loveing obedunt faithfull & humbel sarvant

E.G.

John Evelyn to Sir Christopher Wren
(April 4, 1665)

John Evelyn (1620–1706), diarist, writer, and virtuoso, to Sir Christopher Wren (1632–1723), architect. Evelyn's son, also named John, was born in 1655, making him ten years old when this letter was written. Ralph Bohun, a Fellow of New College, Oxford, was appointed his tutor in 1665. Bohun had scientific interests: he would publish A Discourse Concerning the Origin and Properties of Wind in 1671. For more on Evelyn, see the introduction to the selection from his Diary.

Sir,

You may please to remember that some time since I begged a favour of you in behalf of my little boy: he is now susceptible of instruction, a pleasant, and (though I speak it) a most ingenious and pregnant child.[4] My design is to give him good education; he is past many initial difficulties, and conquers all things with incredible industry: do me that eternal obligation, as to enquire out and recommend me some young man for a preceptor. I will give him £20 per annum salary, and such other accommodations as shall be no ways disagreeable to an ingenious spirit; and possibly I may do him other advantages: in all cases he will find his condition with us easy, his scholar a delight, and the conversation not to be despised: this obliges me to wish he may not be a morose, or severe person, but of an agreeable temper. The qualities I require are, that he be a perfect Grecian, and if more than vulgarly mathematical, so much the more accomplished for my design: mine own defects in the Greek tongue and knowledge of its usefulness, obliges me to mention that particular with an extraordinary note: in sum I would have him as well furnished as might be for the laying of a permanent and solid foundation: the boy is capable beyond his years; and if you encounter one thus qualified, I shall receive it amongst the great good fortunes of my life that I obtained it by the benefit of your friendship,[1] for which I have ever had so perfect an esteem. There is no more to be said, but that when you have found the person, you direct him immediately to me, that I may receive, and value him.

---

[1] pel mel Pall Mall, the highly fashionable street on which Gwynne lived (spelled as it is pronounced).

[2] scutchin…scunchis scutcheon; a heraldic panel mounted to display the coat of arms of a recently deceased person (the final "s" in the second instance of the word is a slip for "n").

[3] The projected marriage did not take place.

[4] pregnant imaginative, inventive, teeming with ideas.

Sir, I am told by Sir John Denham that you look towards France this summer:[2] be assured I will charge you with some addresses to friends of mine there, that shall exceedingly cherish you; and though you will stand in no need of my recommendations, yet I am confident you will not refuse the offer of those civilities which I shall bespeak you.

There has lain at Dr. Needham's a copy of the Parallel bound up for you,[3] and long since designed you, which I shall entreat you to accept; not as a recompense of your many favours to me, much less a thing in the least assistant to you (who are yourself a master), but as a token of my respect, as the book itself is of the affection I bear to an art which you so happily cultivate.

Dear Sir, I am
Yr &c.

Says-Court, 4 Apr. 1665

---

[1] The tutor Evelyn eventually hired was recommended not by Wren but by Dr. John Wilkins, Bishop of Chester.

[2] Denham Sir John Denham (1615–1669), the poet; see the introduction to the selection from his works.

[3] a copy of the Parallel a book by Evelyn, A Parallel of the Antient Architecture with the Modern (1664), a translation of a treatise by Roland Fréart, sieur de Chambray. Dr. Jasper Needham (d. 1679) was an eminent physician and close friend of Evelyn's.

Ballads

Tom o' Bedlam

From the hag and hungry goblin
That into rags would rend ye
And the spirit that stan' by the naked man
In the Book of Moons defend ye!
That of your five sound senses
You never be forsaken
Nor travel from yourselves with Tom
Abroad to beg your bacon.
Nor never sing "Any food, any feeding,
Money, drink or clothing":
Come dame or maid, be not afraid,
Poor Tom will injure nothing.

Of thirty bare years have I
Twice twenty been enraged
And of forty been three times fifteen
In durance soundly caged
In the lordly lofts of Bedlam
On stubble soft and dainty,
Brave bracelets strong, sweet whips ding dong,
With wholesome hunger plenty.
And now I sing &c.

With a thought I took for maudlin
With a cruse of cockle pottage [1]
With a thing thus—tall, (sky bless you all),
I fell into this dotage.
I slept not since the conquest,
Till then I never wakéd
Till the roguish boy of love where I lay
Me found and stripped me naked.
And made me sing &c.

When short I have shorn my sow's face
And swigged my hornéd barrel [2]
In an oaken inn do I pawn my skin
As a suit of gilt apparel.
The moon's my constant mistress
And the lonely owl my marrow
The flaming drake and the night-crow make
Me music to my sorrow.
While there I sing &c.

The palsy plague these pounces, [3]
When I prig your pigs or pullen, [4]
Your culvers take, or mateless make [5]
Your chanticlere, and sullen. [6]
When I want provant with Humfrey [7]
I sup, and when benighted
To repose in Paul's with waking souls
I never am affrighted.
But still do I sing &c.

I know more than Apollo,
For oft when he lies sleeping
I behold the stars at mortal wars
And the wounded welkin weeping; [8]
The moon embrace her shepherd

---

[1] cruse a small pot, jar, or bottle (OED); cockle a bivalve mollusc, common on sandy coasts and much used for food (OED cockle sb^2 1); pottage a dish composed of vegetables alone, or along with meat; soup, especially a thick soup (OED pottage 1).

[2] hornéd provided, fitted, or ornamented with horn (OED horned a 7).

[3] pounces possibly a variant of ponce, which may be derived from the verb "pounce." This in its strict sense means a pimp, but it is used commonly as a term of contempt; or perhaps we should emend to pouncer, meaning one who pounces, in this context presumably a gamekeeper.

[4] prig steal (OED prig v^1 1); pullen poultry (OED pullen 1).

[5] culvers doves or pigeons (OED culver 1).

[6] chanticlere an appellation applied to a cock (OED chanticleer).

[7] provant food (OED provant); "dining with Duke Humphrey" was a proverbial expression for going hungry.

[8] welkin considered the abode of the Deity, or of the gods of heathen mythology: the celestial regions, heaven (OED welkin 2 b).

And the queen of love her warrior,[1]
While the first doth horn the star of the morn
And the next the heavenly Farrier.[2]
While I do sing &c.

The Gipsy Snap and Tedro
Are none of Tom's comrados.
The punk I scorn and the cutpurse sworn[3]
And the roaring-boys bravadoes.
The sober, white, and gentle,
Me trace, or touch, and spare not;
But those that cross Tom's Rhinoceros
Do what the panther dare not.
Although I sin &c.

With an host of furious fancies
Whereof I am commander
With a burning spear, and a horse of air,
To the wilderness I wander.
By a knight of ghosts and shadows
I summoned am to tourney[4]
Ten leagues beyond the wide world's end.
Me thinks it is no journey.
All while I sing &c.

A sweet and pleasant Sonnet, entitled: My mind to me a kingdom is

To the tune of, In Creet, &c.

1

My mind to me a Kingdom is,
such perfect joys therein I find,
It far exceeds all earthly bliss
that world affords, or grows by kind:
Though much I want that most men have,
Yet doth my mind forbid me crave.

2

Content I live, this is my stay,
I seek no more than may suffice,
I press to bear no haughty sway,
look what I lack my mind supplies:
Lo, thus I triumph like a King,
Content with that my mind doth bring.

3

I see how plenty surfeits oft,
and hasty climbers oft do fall,
I see how those that sit aloft,
mishap doth threaten most of all,
They get, they toil, they spend with care,
Such cares my mind could never bear.

4

I laugh not at another's loss,
I grudge not at another's gain,
No worldly way my mind can toss,
I brook that is another's bane:
I fear no foe, I scorn no friend,
I dread no death, I fear no end.

5

Some have too much, yet still they crave,
I little have, yet seek no more,
They are but poor, though much they have,

---

[1] The moon…her warrior Diana, goddess of the moon, having fallen in love with a handsome young shepherd, Endymion, while he was sleeping on Mount Latmos, made him sleep everlastingly so that she could gaze on him forever. Venus is the queen of love, and Mars, the warrior, is her lover.

[2] horn to "give horns to": to cuckold (OED horn v 2); farrier one who shoes horses (OED farrier sb 1). This is a reference to Vulcan, the god of fire and especially the smithy fire. Vulcan was the husband of Venus, goddess of love, beauty and fertility. Venus is said to have cuckolded her husband with the warrior Mars.

[3] punk a prostitute, strumpet, harlot (OED punk sb^{1}).

[4] tourney to take part in a tournament (OED tourney v).

And I am rich with little store,
They poor, I rich, they beg, I give,
They lack, I lend, they pine, I live.

6

My wealth is health and perfect ease,
my conscience clear, my chief defence:
I never seek by bribes to please,
nor by desert to give offence:
Lo thus I lie, thus will I die,
Would all did so as well as I.

7

No princely pomp, no wealthy store,
no force to get the victory,
No wily wit to salve a sore,
no shape to win a Lover's eye,
To none of these I yield as thrall,
For why my mind despiseth all.

8

I joy not at an earthly bliss,
I weigh not Croesus' wealth a straw,[1]
For Care, I care not what it is,
I fear not Fortune's fatal law:
My mind is such as may not move,
For beauty bright or force of love:

9

I wish not what I have at will,
I wander not to seek for more,
I like the plain, I climb no hill,
in greatest storm I sit on shore,
And laugh at those that toil in vain,
To get that must be lost again.

10

I kiss not where I wish to kill,
I fain no love where most I hate,
I break no sleep to win my will,
I wait not at the mighties' gate,
I scorn no poor, I fear no rich,
I feel no want, nor have too much.

11

The Court, ne Cart, I like, ne loath, extremes are counted worst of all,
The golden mean betwixt them both,
doth surest sit, and fears no fall:
This is my choice, for why I find,
No wealth is like a quiet mind.

Ditties Lamentation for the Cruelty of this Age

To the tune of Packentons pound.

1

Well worth Predecessors, and Fathers by name,
That lived in England long times ago:
Whose wondrous deeds were done for their fame,
Which now here in England breedeth our woe:
Then Pity did rest,
In every man's breast:
And Cruelty had no place
To make his nest
Oh happy England that lived in that state,
When Pity was Porter at every mans gate.

2

But Pity (alack) 'tis quite fled and gone,
True friendship and love is banished away:
Plain dealing now walketh mourning alone,
And no man relieves him by night nor by day:
No Pity we see,
In any degree,
But fraud and deceit,
And vile butchery.

---

[1] Croesus the last king of Lydia, who reigned in the sixth century B.C.E., was renowned for his great wealth.

Oh happy England that lived in that state,
When Pity was Porter at every man's gate.

3

Oh what is there now in this wicked age,
That man will not do to accomplish the end,
Which he hath intended in malice and rage,
Though half that he hath in his mischief he spend
Man wanting the grace,
That love to embrace.
Which in former times,
Had eminent place:
Oh happy England that lived in that state,
When Pity was Porter at every man's gate.

4

Now grudging and envy once bred in the heart,
Abates not by reason but still doth increase,
Till it bring into action some tragical part,
By stabbing or poisoning and never will cease,
Till he have his due,
That this is too true,
Know some that the poison,
Of enough do rue,
Oh [happy] England that lived in that state, &c.

5

Now under a color of kindness and love,
In Purges and Potions such cunning is known,
A man unsuspected a murder may prove.
But God will have mischief and villainy shown.
Tho God for a time,
May wink at a crime,
Yet he can discover,
When sins in the prime.
Be happy Oh England to live in that state,
Let Pity be Porter still at thy gate.

6

Look in the Scriptures and there you may read,
That Murder, Adultery had never good end,
I never read yet that well they did speed,
As late hath been seen in this our good land.
But God turn their hearts,
That thus play such parts,
For Poisons and potions,
Will turn to their smarts.
O would that good Conscience did live in these days
Then such kind of people would take better ways.

7

Poor ragged Conscience, where dost thou live?
Banished (I doubt me) from Town and from City:
Poverty beggeth yet few men will give,
And plenty is sparing the more is the pity,
For gorgeous array,
Now beareth such sway
That by her continuance,
All things decay,
O happy England that lived in that state, &c.

8

Good house keeping now is quite laid aside,
No Butler stands ready to do an alms deed,
And all to maintain fond fashions of pride,
A thousand good fellows do stand in great need,
Most fair to the eye,
Are houses built high,
Only for pleasure
Of them that pass by.
But Oh happy England to live in that state,
Let Pity be Porter still at thy gate.

THE SECOND PART OF DITTIES COMPLAINT TO THE SAME TUNE.

9

Since Coaches here flourished so much in this Land,
One servant or two now serveth the turn:
Forty good Geldings were else at command,
As many good fellows uprising each morn;

Then Tables were spread,
With good beef and bread,
But now this good order,
From England is fled,
Be happy, O England, [to live in that state,]
When Pity was Porter at every man's gate.

10

Whole Farms are consumed in pride for the back,
In Shoe-strings and Garters of silver or gold:
Which well might suffice to feed them that lack.
And keep the poor widow from hunger and cold.
But hardness of heart,
Hath so played his part,
That Pity now weepeth,
To hear of our smart,
Oh happy England that lived in that state,
Let Pity be Porter still at thy gate.

11

Yea happy was England before it did know,
Such pride in apparel as many do wear:
In warm russet clothing our Gallants did go,
And kersies were garments for Ladies most faire: [1]
Then malice and spite,
Did live with no wight, [2]
True love and friendship,
Was each man's delight.
Oh happy England, &c.

12

A bushel of wheat for six pence was sold,
An Ox for a Mark fat from the stall: [3]
A score of fat Lambs for an Angel was told, [4]
With heart and good will in payment with all:
And then at each door,
Sat feasting the poor:
The like to that time,
Will never come more.
Oh happy England, &c.

13

When such a good world was here in this Land,
Neighbor with neighbor did fall at no strife,
Then needless were bonds and bills of their hands,
Men's words were not broken but kept as their life.
But now in these days,
All credit decays,
Truth is not used,
We see any ways.
Oh happy England, &c.

14

The time is quite changed we find it by proof,
Poor Conscience a begging now walks in the field:
And Charity blinded, keeps her aloof,
And cannot find where her house for to build,
No Pity we see,
In any degree,
But fraud and deceit,
A vile usury.
Oh happy England, [&c.]

15

If this happy world would once again more,
Return to her former virtue and grace:
All men with bounty would part with their store,
To build up poor Pity a perpetual place:
So Pity will rest,
In every man's breast:
And Cruelty find no place,
To make his nest.

---

[1] kersies a kind of coarse narrow cloth, woven from long wool and usually ribbed (OED).

[2] wight a human being, man or woman, person (OED wight sb 2).

[3] Mark 13 shillings and four pence, that is, two-thirds of a pound sterling (OED mark sb^2 2a).

[4] Angel an old English gold coin, having as its device the archangel Michael standing upon, and piercing the dragon (OED Angel 6).

Be happy O England to live in that state,
When Pity was Porter at every man's gate.

The King's Last Farewell to the World, Or The Dead King's Living Meditations, at the approach of Death denounced against him

1

Through fear of sharp and bitter pain,
by cutting off my days,
No pleasure in my Crown I take,
Nor in my Royal Rayes. [1]
I shall descend with grieved heart,
(for none my life can save)
Unto the dismal gates of death,
to molder in the Grave.

2

Farewell my Wife, and Children all,
wipe off my brinish tears.
I am deprived of my Throne,
and from my future years.
Farewell my people every one,
for I no more shall see
The wonders of the Lord on earth,
nor with you shall I be.

3

Mine eyes do fail, and to the earth
to worms I must be hurled:
Henceforth no more shall I behold
the people of the world.
My Crown and Scepter I must leave,
my glory, and my Throne:
Adieu my fellow Princes all,
I from the earth am gone.

4

Mine Age (which did approach to me)
departed is away;
And as a Shepherd's tent removed,
and I returned to clay;
And as a Weaver doth cut off his thrum, even so my life, [2]
Must be cut off, from people and from Children, and from Wife.

5

In sighs by day, and groans by night
with bitterness I moan,
And do consume away with grief,
my end to think upon.
Fear in the morning me assails,
Death lion-like I see,
Even all the day (till night) to roar
to make an end of me.

6

I chattered as the shrieking Crane,
or Swallow that doth fly:
As Dove forlorn, in pensiveness,
doth mourn, even so do I,
I looked up to thee, O Lord,
but now mine eyes do fail.
Oh ease my sad oppressed soul,
for death doth now prevail.

7

What shall I say, to God's Decree, if he would speak, I then should live; it is a work for God,
I find no help from men.
Yet if my life prolonged was,
my sins for to repent,
Then softly I would go and mourn,
until my life was spent.

---

[1] Rayes form of array, dress (OED array sb 3).

[2] thrum each of the ends of the warp-threads left unwoven and remaining attached to the loom when the web is cut off (OED).

8

And all my years, that I should live,
for mine offences foul,
I would passe o'er in bitterness,
of my distressed soul.
O Lord, thou hast discovered to me, that by these things
Men live; through thee, Princes do reign, thou swayest over Kings.

9

In all things here God's Providence,
and will alone commands,
The life of my poor spirit sad,
is only in his hands,
Oh, that the Lord would me restore.
my strength then I would give,
To serve my God in humbleness
whilst he would let me live.

10

Behold, O Lord, when I in peace,
did look to be restored,
Then was my soul in bitterness,
cast off, and I abhorred,
Yet in the love of God most good,
his righteousness most just Hath thrown me down into the pit,
and to corrupted dust.

11

Because that I have gone astray,
and cherished war and strife,
My days are now cut off, and I am quite bereft of life,
Oh cast my sins behind thy back,
good God, I humbly pray,
And my offences with the blood of Christ wash clean away.

12

When my dead body is interred,
I cannot praise thee there,
Death cannot celebrate the Lord,
my God, most good, most dear;
They that go down into the pit
destructions them devour:
For in thy truth they cannot hope.
but perish by thy power.

13

The living, Lord, the living, they shall praise thy holy name.
With all the glorious host above,
and I shall do the same.
The father to his children here,
that are of tender youth,
Shall them forewarn, and unto them make known thy glorious truth.

14

Forgive my sins, and save my soul
O Lord, I thee entreat,
And blot out mine offences all,
for they are very great:
Receive my soul for Christ his sake,
my Prophet, Priest, and King,
That I with Saints and Angels may eternal praises sing.
—1648

The Royal health to the Rising Sun

To the tune of, O my pretty little winking, &c.

1

As I was walking forth one day,
I heard distressed people say,
Our Peace and Plenty now is gone,

And we poor people quite undone:
A Royal Health I then begun
Unto the rising of the Sun,
Gallant English Spirits
do not thus complain,
The Sun that sets
may after rise again.

2

The Tempest hath endured long,
We must not say, we suffer wrong,
The Queen of Love sits all alone.
No man is master of his own.

3

We over-whelmed are with grief,
And harbor many a private thief,
Poor house-keepers can hardly live,
Who used in former times to give:

4

The Thistle chokes the Royal Rose,
And all our bosom friends turned foes,
The Irish Harp is out of tune,
And we God knows undone too soon.

THE SECOND PART, TO THE SAME TUNE

5

True love and friendship doth now decay,
Poor people's almost starved they say,
Our trading's spoiled, and all things dear
We may complain, and ne're the near:

6

Though all be true that here is said,
Kind country-men be not dismayed,
For when the worst of harm is past,
We shall have better times at last.

7

When Rulers cast off self-respects,
Then shall our yokes fall from our necks,
Our safeties shall not then depend
On promise of a faithless friend:

8

When as the cloud of war is down
The Royal Sun enjoys the crown,
The lamb shall with the lion feed,
'Twill be a happy time indeed:

9

Let us cheer up each other then,
And shew our selves true English-men,
And not like bloody wolves and bears,
As we have been these many years.

10

The Father of our Kingdom's dead,
His Royal Son from England's fled,
God send all well that wars may cease,
And we enjoy a happy peace;
A Royal Health I then begun
Unto the rising of the Sun,
Gallant English Spirits,
do not thus complain,
The Sun that sets
may after rise again.
—1649

A Looking-Glass for Men and Maids

Being a brief and true Relation of a sad and sorrowful mis-chance, which happened to a Young man and a Maid who both lost their lives, and were scalded to death in a Brewers Meash-Tun,[1] with striving about a kiss: this was done upon Twelfth-day last, near unto Shore-ditch, in the Suburbs of London; the manner

---

[1] Meash-Tun a tub in which malt is mashed (OED mash sb^{1} 5).

how, shall presently be related. Here is also set down the time how long they lived after they were taken out of the scalding Liquor, and of a very godly speech which the Maid made at the hour of death, which is worthy to be kept in memory.

The tune is, the Bride's Burial

1

A Sudden sad mischance,
near Shore-ditch late befell.
Which now with grieved heart & mind
I am prepared to tell:
Even on the last Twelfth-day, [1]
being in the afternoon,
Within a Brew-house certainly there was this mischief done:

2

The manner how was this,
a Maid to the Brew-house came
To fetch hot Liquor for to use, and straight upon the same
The Miller being there,
laid hands upon the Maid,
Intending for to kiss her then,
and would not be denied:

3

The Maid unwilling was that he should kiss her there,
She thrust him back with both her hands
as plainly doth appear:
But he poor wretched man
laid hold on her again,
And swore, before he let her go
he would a kiss obtain.

4

But as they struggled and strived:
so fiercely one with the other,
Their Feet did slip, and so fell in the Meash-Tun both together
Where scalding Liquor was,
a grievous tale to tell,
They of each other had fast hold,
and head-long in they fell.

5

The Liquor was so hot,
and scalded them so sore,
The like I think was never known nor heard of here-to-fore:
At last some people came and helped them out by strength,
And by that means, they pulled from them their garments off at length.

6

A woeful chance it was,
as ever could befall,
For as they stripped their clothing off,
they pulled off skin and all:
From bellies, backs and sides,
and from their private parts,
Which was a sorrowful sight to see,
and terror to Folks' hearts.

7

The people did their best,
the lives of them to save.
But all (alas) it was in vain,
no cure that they could have:
For why? the woeful man
did in a short time die,
The Maid sore sick upon her bed,
a longer time did lie.

---

[1] Twelfth-day the feast of the Epiphany, twelve days after Christmas.

THE SECOND PART TO THE SAME TUNE

8

But e're she did depart
she for her True-love sent,
Who being come into her room,
she prayed him be content:
You are the man, quoth she,
which I did dearly love,
And have as faithful been to you,
as is the Turtle-Dove:

9

When you a promise made that we should married be,
This ring and bobkin both in love [1]
you did bestow on me:
The which in courtesy
from you I did receive,
And now with willing mind again
the same to you I give:

10

Still wishing you good days;
whilst you have breath and life.
I do bequeath these things to her
that you will take to wife:
All that I do request,
of you this present day,
Is only, whilst I am alive,
for my poor soul to pray.

11

And you my Mother dear,
and all my friends so kind,
I am enforced to leave this world,
and leave you all behind:
I have made my peace with God,
the mighty Lord of Heaven,
And this I hope through Jesus Christ
my sins shall be forgiven.

12

My body scalding hot,
like fire doth boil and fry.
Sweet Christ I pray receive my soul
although my body die:
When she these words had spoke,
her woes were soon released,
She died, no doubt, her soul is now with them whom God hath blest.

13

The Miller he likewise,
e're he resigned his breath,
Asked God forgiveness, for his own,
and her untimely death:
Advising all young men
to have a special care
Of rash attempts, and by his fall,
for ever to beware:

14

And to conclude, in brief.
I wish that all man-kind
What-so-ever they do go about,
to have God in their mind:
The Book of Common-Prayer,
though it be laid aside,
Yet every Christian ought to pray
that God may be our guide.

15

From famine, plague, & pestilence, preserve us great and small,
And from thy wrath, and sudden death
good Lord deliver us all.

---

[1] bobkin possibly bodkin, a long pin or pin-shaped ornament used by women to fasten up the hair (OED bodkin 3).

No ring, no Wedding

A merry new Song of the wooing there was,
'Twixt a zealous Young man, and a Cavalier Lass,
He woos (and would wed) she will have no such thing,
Unless she may married be with a King
Have Ribbons, and Globes, Rosemary, and Bays,
And all things that were in her fore-fathers days.

The Tune is, The Parson of the Parish

1 YOUNG-MAN

Sweet-Heart I come unto thee,
hoping thy Love to win,
I mean to try, thy courtesy,
and thus I do begin:
If thou wilt be my Sweeting,
then I will be thy Dear,
What think'st of me, shall I have thee,
thou pretty Cavalier.

2 MAID

Good Sir you do but mock me,
your mind is nothing so,
You'll speak of Love, my thoughts to prove,
and then away you'll go:
For if you be a Round-head, [1]
(as to me it doth appear,)
You cannot (yet,) your fancy set, upon a Cavalier.

3 YOUNG-MAN

Sweet-Heart I speak in earnest,
thy beauty hath me ta'en,
And my true-love, to thee (my Dove,)
for ever shall remain:
My true affections to thee,
such zealous thoughts doth bear,
If thou consent, I am content,
my pretty Cavalier.

4 MAID

Your Sect is bent to false-hood,
and I indeed am jealous,
That this is but, the shell o' th' Nut,
though your pretense be zealous:
You have no cause to blame me,
but I have cause to fear,
'Twould be your sport, to win the Fort,
and spoil the Cavalier.

5 YOUNG-MAN

My dearest do not doubt me,
my Heart and Tongue agree,
Now Cupid's Dart, hath pricked my Heart,
I love no Lass but thee:
Tomorrow we'll be married,
then take it for no jeer,
In word and deed, I am agreed,
to wed my Cavalier.

6 MAID

Sweet Sir you are too hasty,
to speak of such a thing,
If I should yield, to you the Field,
where is your Wedding-Ring:
Your Bride-Gloves & your Ribbons with other things that were,
Fit for a Bride, all things provide,
I'll be your Cavalier.

7 YOUNG-MAN

These are but Ceremonies,
belong to Popery,
Therefore we will, not use them still but all such toys defy,
We'll hand in hand together,
conjoin (with joyful cheer,)
Few words we'll need, I'll do the deed,

---

[1] Round-head a member or adherent of the Parliamentary party in the Civil War, so called from their custom of wearing the hair close cut (OED roundhead 1).

with thee sweet Cavalier.

THE SECOND PART, BEING THE MAIDEN'S ANSWER

8

Sweet-Heart for thy sake,
I will never make,
Choice of any other,
Than by Cupid's Mother,
freely speak,
It's at thy choice my dearest Love,
Either to leave or take

9

I, thy Mary gold,
Wrapped in many fold,
Like the golden client,
To the Sun's suppliant,
show it's gold:
Display thy beams by glorious Sun,
And I'll to thee unfold.

10

Those bright locks of hair,
Spreading o're each ear,
Every crisp and curl,
Far more rich than Pearl,
doth appear:
Then be thou constant in thy love,
And I will be thy Dear.

11

Till I have possessed,
Thee whom I love best,
I have vowed for ever,
In thy absence never,
to take rest:
Deny me not thou pretty little one,
in whom my hopes are blest.

12

If a kiss or two,
Can thee a favor do,
Were it more then twenty,
Love's indued with plenty,
Lovers know:
For thy sweet sake, a thousand take,
For that's the way to woo.

13

It doth grieve my heart,
From thee for to part,
It is to me more pleasant,
Ever to be present,
where thou art:
Yet in the absence of a Friend,
My love shall never start.

14

As to me thou art kind,
Duty shall me bind,
Ever to obey thee,
Reason so doth sway me,
to thy mind,
Thou hast my heart, where ere thou art,
Although I stay behind.

15

In the Bed or Bark,
I will be thy mark,
Couples yet more loving,
Never had their moving,
from the Ark:
Welcome to me my only joy
All times be it light or dark.

Poems on the Duke of Buckingham

“Never any man, in any age, nor, I believe, in any country or nation, rose, in so short a time, to so much greatness of honour, fame and fortune, upon no other advantage or recommendation than of the beauty and gracefulness and becomingness of his person.” With these words the Earl of Clarendon began his character of George Villiers, first Duke of Buckingham (1592–1628), royal favourite to two Kings. The younger son of a Leicestershire knight, Buckingham was sent to France to master the courtly arts of riding, dancing, and duelling. In 1614, shortly after his return, he was introduced to James I, who showered the new favourite with titles and honours over the next few years. Buckingham, who did not lack political talent, soon built up a powerful network based on nepotism and patronage, and he was the leading political figure in the land in the decade before his death. He accompanied Prince Charles on his incognito ride to Spain in hopes of a Spanish bride, and maintained his position after the death of James. In the first two years of Charles' reign Buckingham initiated and then mismanaged scandalously unsuccessful wars against Spain and France, wars which created a great deal of friction between the crown and Parliament. The House of Commons made complaints against the Duke several times in the second half of the 1620s; their animosity toward the favourite probably contributed to Charles's distrust of Parliaments. In August 1628 Buckingham was assassinated in Portsmouth by John Felton, a soldier in Buckingham's expeditions to Cadiz and the Isle of Rhé. Felton had been refused the command of a company and was owed pay; when he read a Parliamentary remonstrance against the Duke he decided to rid the country of him. The murder was cheered in the streets of London, and Felton became a folk hero after he was hanged.

Buckingham had been the target of a great deal of understandably anonymous and surreptitiously circulated manuscript verse throughout the later 1620s. His death brought the expected tributes and complimentary elegies, as well as many satires and mock epitaphs, circulated again in manuscript.

⁂

Upon the Duke of Buckingham

Of British beasts the Buck is king,
His game and fame through Europe ring,
His horn exalted, keeps in awe
The lesser flocks; his will's a law.
Our Charlemagne takes much delight [1]
In this great beast so fair in sight,
With his whole heart affects the same,
And loves too well Buck-King of Game.
When he is chas'd, then 'gins the sport,
When nigh his end, who's sorry for't?
And when he falls the hunter's glad,
The hounds are flesh'd, and few are sad:
The foresters say, while he's alive
The tender thickets ne'er can thrive,
He doth so bark and pill the trees; [2]
Thus we for game our profit lease.
The huntsmen have pursu'd this deer, [3]
And follow'd him with full career,
But such his craft, and such their lot,
They hunt him oft, but take him not.
A Buck's a beast; a King is but a man,
A Game's a pleasure shorter than a span;
A beast shall perish; but a man shall die,
As pleasures fade. This be thy destiny.
—1628

---

[1] Our Charlemagne King Charles I.

[2] pill peel or strip (OED pill v^1 5).

[3] huntsmen Parliament.

Epitaph on the Duke of Buckingham

This little grave embraces,
One duke and twenty places. [1]
—1628

Epitaph

Fortune's darling, king's content,
Vexation of the parliament,
The flatterer's deity of state,
Advancer of each money-mate,
The devil's factor for the purse,
The papist's hope, the common's curse,
The sailor's cross, the soldier's grief,
Commission's blank, and England's thief,
The coward at the Isle of Rhe, [2]
The bane of noble chivalry,
The night-work of a painted dame,
Confederate with doctor Lamb.[3]
All this lies underneath this stone,
And yet, alas! here lies but one.
—1628

---

[1] places income-producing offices or appointments; Buckingham was notorious for the number he held or had in his power to give to others, with his relatives the usual beneficiaries.

[2] Isle of Rhé, off the French coast. Referring to a failed 1627 expedition led by Buckingham to relieve the Huguenots of La Rochelle.

[3] John Lambe, an astrologer indicted for practicing "execrable arts" and protected by Buckingham; he was killed in 1628 by a mob of apprentices who denounced him as "the duke's devil."

Information from the Scottish Nation

1640

The following text, printed originally as a broadsheet, was published in August 1640, just before the Scottish army entered England to take Newcastle. Scottish agents and sympathizers circulated copies among the soldiers of the English army and the citizens of northern towns. Its purpose was to allay fears about the invasion, and to attempt to convince English readers that they shared with the Scots common grievances and a common enemy—the powers in London that sought, the Scots argued, to undermine the religious and political liberties of British subjects. The second Bishops' War ended with the occupation of Newcastle (which gave the Scots control over much of England's coal supply). Charles was compelled to summon Parliament in November 1640, and the public debate over the sources and boundaries of royal authority initiated by the Scottish pamphlet campaign would soon be continued by Parliamentary writers in England. For the King's response to this and other texts the Scots published to justify their actions, see his Proclamation against the Scots.

◆

Information from the Scottish Nation, to all the True English, Concerning the Present Expedition

Our distresses in our religion and liberties being of late more pressing than we were able to bear; our supplications and commissions, which were the remedies used by us for our relief, were after many delays and repulses, answered at last with the terrors of an army coming to our borders; a peace was concluded,[1] but not observed: And when we did complain of the breach, and supplicate for the performance, our commissioners were hardly entreated; new and great preparations were made for war; and many acts of hostility done against us, both by sea and land. In this case to send new commissioners or supplications, were against experience, and hopeless; to maintain an army on the borders is above our strength, and cannot be a safety unto us by sea: To retire homeward, were to call on our enemies to follow us, and to make ourselves and our country, a prey by land, as our ships and goods are made at sea. We are therefore constrained at this time to come into England, not to make war, but for seeking our relief and preservation.

Duty obliges us to love England as ourselves: Your grievances are ours; the preservation or ruin of religion and liberties, is common to both nations: We must now stand or fall together. Suffer not therefore malice and calumny to prevail so far as to persuade, that we come to make war, we call Heaven and Earth to witness, that we are far from such intentions, and that we have no purpose to fight, except we be forced, and in our own defence (as we have more fully expressed in our large Declaration)[2] we come to get assurance of the enjoying of our religion and liberties in peace against invasion: and that the authors of all our grievances and yours being tried in Parliament,[3] and our wrongs redressed, the two kingdoms may live in greater love and unity than ever before, which to our common rejoicing, we may confidently expect from the goodness of God, if the wicked counsels of papists, prelates and other fire-brands their adherents be not more harkened unto, than our true and honest Declarations.

---

[1] a peace The Pacification of Berwick (June 18, 1639) concluded the first Bishops' War, but proved a compromise that satisfied neither the Scots nor the English.

[2] The Intentions of the Army of the Kingdome of Scotland, Declared to their Brethren of England (Edinburgh, 1640).

[3] the authors of all our grievances referring particularly to Archbishop Laud, who would be executed in 1645. See the selections from Laud's Diary.

And where it may be conceived, that an army cannot come into England but they will waste and spoil; we declare, that no soldiers shall be allowed to commit any outrage, or do the smallest wrong, but shall be punished with severity:[1] That we shall take neither meat nor drink, nor anything else, but for our moneys: and when our moneys are spent; for sufficient surety, which by public order shall be given to all such as shall furnish us things necessary. We neither have spared, nor will we spare our pains, fortunes, and lives in this cause of our assurance and your deliverance: and therefore cannot look from any well-affected to truth and peace, to be either opposed by force and unjust violence in our peaceable passage, or to be discouraged by wilful or uncharitable with-holding of means for our sustentation on our way. We are brethren: Your worthy predecessors at the time of Reformation, vouchsafed us their help and assistance.[2] We have for many years lived in love: we have common desires of the purity of religion and quietness of both Kingdoms: our hopes are to see better days in this island: our enemies also are common: Let us not upon their suggestions or our own apprehensions, be friends to them, and enemies to ourselves: We desire nothing but what in the like extremity (which we pray God your nation never find) we would most gladly upon the like Declaration grant unto you, coming with your supplications to the King's Majesty, were he living amongst us, and what ye would we should do unto you, we trust ye will be moved to do even so unto us, that the blessing of God may rest upon both.

—1640

---

[1] Alexander Leslie (ca. 1580–1661), the Scottish general, published Articles of behaviour for his soldiers that stressed the importance of maintaining good relations with the English population.

[2] English intervention helped ensure the victory of the Protestant cause in 1560, the year the Scottish Parliament ended all links with Rome and ushered in the Scottish Reformation.

The Putney Debates

1647

By autumn 1647, the New Model Army was the dominant power in the country, occupying London and holding the King prisoner at Hampton Court. Army, Parliament, and King, each one distrusting the other two, began to negotiate a political and religious settlement. At this point, a new group entered the discussion by publishing its demands: the Levellers. A well-organized party of political radicals, the Levellers asked the Council of the Army to sponsor public debates about the various solutions and plans that had been proposed; the Council agreed, recognizing that the Levellers enjoyed the support of many sympathizers in both the army and the civilian population. Held in Putney church in late October and early November 1647, these debates were recorded by William Clarke, secretary to the Council; the (contemporary) transcription of his shorthand notes constitutes one of the most extraordinary documents to survive from the era. That these debates were held at all is remarkable: for the moment at least, the Levellers were serious participants in the political process, and their rethinking of fundamental political and social principles exemplifies how far radical theory had gone in five years of war. In addition, the Putney debates let us hear the sound of seventeenth-century political discussion.

The following text is the record of the second day of debates, held on October 29. On one side are the army "grandees" Oliver Cromwell, Lieutenant-General of the Army, and Henry Ireton, the Commissary-General of Horse and Cromwell's son-in-law. On the other side are various Leveller spokesmen, army and civilian. The basis of the discussion was the first of several versions of the Leveller Agreement of the People (1647), the earliest attempt in England at a written constitution. Ireton begins the debate by pointing out that the first clause (reproduced below) might imply universal manhood suffrage, and that such an act could lead to an attack on private property and eventually to anarchy. The Levellers, the most influential of whom was Colonel Thomas Rainsborough, respond with a "natural right" argument that all men who live under a political system ought to have a voice in the election of that system's representatives. (It did not seem to occur to even the most radical to extend the vote to women.)

A committee would later agree on a form of the compromise franchise proposed here by Maximilian Petty, which would exclude servants, apprentices, and those living off charity, because their dependence on others made it possible for their vote to be misused. Rainsborough's call for a general rendezvous of the army was also agreed on. But just as the Levellers seemed poised to assume a measure of real influence, Cromwell and Ireton reasserted their control over the army by splitting the rendezvous into three groups. Two regiments attempted to mutiny by attending the first meeting without orders and wearing copies of the Agreement of the People in their hatbands as a sign of allegiance; they were reduced to obedience. Within a week, these struggles for power within the army were overshadowed by the King's escape from Hampton Court, an event that presaged the Second Civil War: political and social revolution was made secondary once more to military considerations.

* * *

The Putney Debates: The Debate on the Franchise

The Paper called the Agreement read.
Afterwards the first Article read by itself.

[From An Agreement of the People (1647): 1. That the people of England, being at this day very unequally distributed by counties, cities, and boroughs for the election of their deputies in Parliament, ought to be more indifferently proportioned, according to the number of the inhabitants; the circumstances whereof, for number, place, and manner, are to be set down before the end of this present Parliament.]

Commissary Ireton:[1] The exception that lies in it is this: it is said, they [votes] are to be distributed according to the number of the inhabitants, "The people of England," etc. And this does make me think, that the meaning is that every man that is an inhabitant is to be equally considered,[2] and to have an equal voice in the election of those representers, the persons that are for the general representative, and if that be the meaning then I have something to say against it. But if it be only that those people that by the civil constitution of this kingdom, which is original and fundamental, and beyond which I am sure no memory of record does go—

[Interjection] Not before the Conquest.

But before the Conquest it was so. If it be intended, that those that by that constitution that was before the Conquest, that has been beyond memory, such persons that have been [the electors] under that constitution should be the electors [still], I have no more to say against it.

Colonel Rainsborough:[3] Moved, that others might have given their hands to it.

Captain Denne:[4] Denied, that those that were set of their regiment, that they were their hands.

Ireton: Whether those men whose hands are to it, or those that brought it, do know so much of the matter as that they mean that all that had a former right of election, or those that had no right before are to come in?

Commissary Cowling:[5] In the time before the Conquest, and since the Conquest, the greatest part of the kingdom was in vassalage.

Mr Pettus [Petty]:[6] We judge that all inhabitants that have not lost their birthright should have an equal voice in elections.

Rainsborough: I desired that those that had engaged in it [might be included], for really I think that the poorest he that is in England has a life to live as the greatest he; and therefore truly, sir, I think it's clear, that every man that is to live under a government ought first by his own consent to put himself under that government; and I do think that the poorest man in England is not at all bound in a strict sense to that government that he has not had a voice to put himself under; and I am confident that, when I have heard the reasons against it, that something will be said to answer those reasons, insomuch that I should doubt whether he was an Englishman or no, that should doubt of these things.

---

[1] Henry Ireton (1611–1651), Commissary-General of Horse and a leader in the negotiations among the army, the King, and the Parliament in the later 1640s.

[2] every man referring to men only when used by speakers on either side of the debate. Captain John Clarke asks later if "every individual person in the kingdom" was to have a vote, but nobody responds in such a way as to imply he has suggested giving the vote to women.

[3] Thomas Rainsborough (d. 1648), Leveller and officer in both the navy and army; he was the most prominent officer to side consistently with radical political and religious causes. His death in October 1648 during a Royalist raid would significantly weaken the Leveller cause in the army.

[4] Probably Henry Denne (d. 1660?), a Baptist clergyman and army officer who would write against the Levellers after being pardoned for his role in the Leveller mutiny in 1649.

[5] Nicholas Cowling, Commissary-General (for Victuals) in the New Model Army. He is referring to the Norman Conquest of 1066. One foundation of Leveller arguments for political change was belief in the "Norman yoke," that is, the post-Conquest legal system that had usurped a (largely mythical) Anglo-Saxon tradition of democracy and freedom.

[6] Maximilian Petty (1617- d. after 1660), Leveller, one of two civilian spokesmen at the debates; he helped write the first two Agreements of the People.

Ireton: That's this [the meaning of the phrase "according to the number of the inhabitants"?]:

Give me leave to tell you, that if you make this the rule, I think you must fly for refuge to an absolute natural right, and you must deny all civil right; and I am sure it will come to that in the consequence. This, I perceive, is pressed as that which is so essential and due, the right of the people of this kingdom, and as they are the people of this kingdom, distinct and divided from other people, as that we must for this right lay aside all other considerations. This is so just; this is so due; this is so right to them; and those that they do thus choose, must have such a power of binding all, and loosing all, according to those limitations. This is pressed as so due, and so just, as is argued that it is an engagement paramount all others, and you must for it lay aside all others; if you have engaged any others, you must break it; so look upon these as thus held out to us; so it was held out by the gentlemen that brought it yesterday.

For my part, I think it is no right at all. I think that no person has a right to an interest or share in the disposing of the affairs of the kingdom, and in determining or choosing those that shall determine what laws we shall be ruled by here, no person has a right to this that has not a permanent fixed interest in this kingdom, and those persons together are properly the represented of this kingdom, and consequently are to make up the representers of this kingdom; who, taken together, do comprehend whatsoever is of real or permanent interest in the kingdom, and I am sure (otherwise I cannot tell what), any man can say why a foreigner coming in amongst us, or as many as will coming in amongst us, or by force or otherwise settling themselves here, or at least by our permission having a being here, why they should not as well lay claim to it as any other.

We talk of birthright. Truly, [by] birthright there is thus much claim: men may justly have by birthright, by their very being born in England, that we should not seclude them out of England. That we should not refuse to give them air and place and ground, and the freedom of the highways and other things, to live amongst us, not any man that is born here, though he in birth or by his birth there come nothing at all that is part of the permanent interest of this kingdom to him. That I think is due to a man by birth. But that by a man's being born here he shall have a share in that power that shall dispose of the lands here, and of all things here, I do not think it a sufficient ground.

But I am sure if we look upon that which is the utmost, within man's view, of what was originally the constitution of this kingdom, upon that which is most radical and fundamental, and which if you take away, there is no man has any land, any goods, you take away any civil interest, and that is this: that those that choose the representers for the making of laws by which this state and kingdom are to be governed are the persons who, taken together, do comprehend the local interest of this kingdom; that is, the persons in whom all land lies, and those in corporations in whom all trading lies. This is the most fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and which if you do not allow, you allow none at all. This constitution has limited and determined it, that only those shall have voices in elections.

It is true, as was said by a gentleman [Rainsborough] near me, "The meanest man in England ought to have [a voice in the election of the government he lives under]." I say this: that those that have the meanest local interest, that man that has but forty shillings a year, he has as great [a] voice in the election of a knight for the shire as he that has ten thousand a year or more, if he had never so much, and therefore there is that regard had to it. But this still the constitution of this government has had an eye to, and what other government has not an eye to this. It does not relate to the interest of the kingdom if it do not lay the foundation of the power that's given to the representers, in those who have a permanent and a local interest in the kingdom, and who, taken altogether, do comprehend the whole, and if we shall go to take away this, we shall plainly go to take away all property and interest that any man has, either in land by inheritance, or in estate by possession, or anything else, if you take away this fundamental part of the civil constitution.

There is all the reason and justice that can be: if I will come to live in a kingdom, being a foreigner to it, or live in a kingdom, having no permanent interest in it, if I will desire as a stranger, or claim as one freeborn here, the air, the free passage of highways, the protection of laws, and all such things, and if I will either desire them or claim them, I (if I have no permanent interest in that kingdom) must submit to those laws and those rules, who taken together do comprehend the whole interest of the kingdom.

Rainsborough: Truly, sir, I am of the same opinion I was, and am resolved to keep it till I know reason why I should not. I confess my memory is bad, and therefore I am fain to make use of my pen. I remember that in a former speech this gentleman brought before this [meeting], he was saying that in some cases he should not value "whether [there were] a king or no king, whether lords or no lords, whether a property or no property." For my part I differ in that. I do very much care whether a king or no king, lords or no lords, property or no property; and I think, if we do not all take care, we shall all have none of these very shortly.

But as to this present business, I do hear nothing at all that can convince me why any man that is born in England ought not to have his voice in election of burgesses.[1] It is said that if a man have not a permanent interest, he can have no claim; and we must be no freer than the laws will let us to be, and that there is no [law in any] chronicle will let us be freer than that we [now] enjoy. Something was said to this yesterday, and I do think that the main cause why Almighty God gave men reason, it was that they should make use of that reason, and that they should improve it for that end and purpose that God gave it them, and truly I think that half a loaf is better than none if a man be an-hungry, yet I think there is nothing that God has given a man that any else can take from him, and therefore I say, that either it must be the law of God or the law of man that must prohibit the meanest man in the kingdom to have this benefit as well as the greatest. I do not find anything in the law of God, that a lord shall choose twenty burgesses, and a gentleman but two, or a poor man shall choose none: I find no such thing in the law of nature, nor in the law of nations. But I do find that all Englishmen must be subject to English laws, and I do verily believe that there is no man but will say that the foundation of all law lies in the people. And if in the people, I am to seek for this exemption.

And truly I have thought something: in what a miserable distressed condition would many a man that has fought for the Parliament in this quarrel be? I will be bound to say that many a man whose zeal and affection to God and this kingdom has carried him forth in this cause, has so spent his estate that, in the way the state, the army are going this way, he shall not hold up his head, and when his estate is lost, and not worth forty shillings a year,[1] a man shall not have any interest. And there are many other ways by which men have estates [which] (if that be the rule which God in his providence does use) do fall to decay; a man, when he has an estate, he has an interest in making laws; when he has none, he has no power in it. So that a man cannot lose that which he has for the maintenance of his family, but he must [also] lose that which God and nature have given him. And therefore I do, and am still of the same opinion, that every man born in England cannot, ought not, neither by the law of God nor the law of nature, to be exempted from the choice of those who are to make laws and for him to live under, and for him (for aught I know) to lose his life under, and therefore I think there can be no great stick in this.

---

[1] burgesses members of Parliament for a borough, corporate town, or university.

Truly, I think that there is not this day reigning in England a greater fruit or effect of tyranny than this very thing would produce. Truly I know nothing free but only the knight of the shire, nor do I know anything in a parliamentary way that is clear from the height and fullness of tyranny. But as for this of corporations, it is as contrary to freedom as may be. For, sir, what is it? The king he grants a patent under the Broad-Seal of England to such a corporation to send burgesses. He grants to a city to send burgesses. When a poor base corporation from the king shall send two burgesses, when five hundred men of estate shall not send one, when those that are to make their laws are called by the king, or cannot act by [i.e. without] such a call, truly I think that the people of England have little freedom.

Ireton: I think there was nothing that I said to give you occasion to think that I did contend for this, that such a corporation should have the electing of a man to the parliament. I think I agreed to this matter, that all should be equally distributed, but the question is whether it should be distributed to all persons, or whether the same persons that are the electors should be the electors still, and it equally distributed amongst them. I do not see anybody else that makes this objection; and if nobody else be sensible of it I shall soon have done. Only I shall a little crave your leave to represent the consequences of it, and clear myself from one misrepresentation of the thing that was misrepresented by the gentleman that sat next me. I think, if the gentleman remember himself, he cannot but remember that what I said was to this effect: that if I saw the hand of God leading so far as to destroy king, and destroy lords, and destroy property, and no such thing at all amongst us, I should acquiesce in it; and so I did not care, if no king, no lords, or no property, how in comparison of the tender care that I have of the honour of God, and of the people of God, whose name is so much concerned in this army. This I did deliver, and not absolutely.

All the main thing that I speak for, is because I would have an eye to property. I hope we do not come to contend for victory, but let every man consider with himself that he do not go that way to take away all property; for here is the case of the most fundamental part of the constitution of the kingdom, which if you take away, you take away all by that. Here are men of this and this quality are determined to be the electors of men to the parliament, and they are all those who have any permanent interest in the kingdom, and who, taken together, do comprehend the whole interest of the kingdom. I mean by permanent, local, that is not anywhere else. As for instance, he that has a freehold, and that freehold cannot be removed out of the kingdom. And so there's a corporation, a place which has the privilege of a market and trading, which if you should allow to all places equally, I do not see how you could preserve any peace in the kingdom, and that is the reason why in the constitution we have but some few market towns. Now those people by the former constitution were looked upon to comprehend the permanent interest of the kingdom, and those are the freemen of corporations; for he that has his livelihood by his trade, and by his freedom of trading in such a corporation, which he cannot exercise in another, he is tied to that place, his livelihood depends upon it; and secondly, that man has an interest, has a permanent interest there, upon which he may live, and live a freeman without dependence. These constitutions this kingdom has looked at.

---

[1] forty shillings the traditional minimum income from land necessary to be eligible to vote.

Now I wish we may all consider of what right you will challenge, that all the people should have right to elections. Is it by the right of nature? If you will hold forth that as your ground, then I think you must deny all property too, and this is my reason. For thus: by that same right of nature, whatever it be that you pretend, by which you can say a man has an equal right with another to the choosing of him that shall govern him, by the same right of nature he has the same right in any goods he sees: meat, drink, clothes, to take and use them for his sustenance; he has a freedom to the land, the ground, to exercise it, till it.[1] He has the freedom to anything that anyone does account himself to have any property in. Why now I say, then, if you will, against the most fundamental part of civil constitution (which I have now declared), will plead the law of nature, that a man should, paramount this, and contrary to this, have a power of choosing those men that shall determine what shall be law in the state, though he himself have no permanent interest in the state, whatever interest he has he may carry about with him, if this be allowed, we are free, we are equal, one man must have as much voice as another. Then show me what step or difference, why, by the same right of necessity to sustain nature, it is for my better being. And possibly not for it neither: possibly I may not have so real a regard to the peace of the kingdom as that man who has a permanent interest in it; but he that has no permanent interest, that is here today and gone tomorrow, I do not see that he has such a permanent interest. Since you cannot plead to it by anything but the law of nature, but for the end of better being, and that better being is not certain, and more destructive to another; upon these grounds, if you do, paramount all constitutions, hold up this law of nature, I would fain have any man show me their bounds, where you will end, and take away all property?

Rainsborough: I shall now be a little more free and open with you than I was before. I wish we were all true-hearted, and that we did all carry ourselves with integrity; if I did mistrust you, I would [not] use such asseverations. I think it does go on mistrust, and things are thought too matters of reflection that were never intended. For my part, as I think, you forgot something that was in my speech, and you do not only yourselves believe that men are inclining to anarchy, but you would make all men believe that; and, sir, to say because a man pleads that every man has a voice, that therefore it destroys [by] the same [argument all property]. That there's a property, the law of God says it, else why God made that law, thou shalt not steal? I am a poor man, therefore I must be pressed; if I have no interest in the kingdom, I must suffer by all their laws, be they right or wrong. Nay thus, a gentleman lives in a county and has three or four lordships, as some men have, God knows how they got them, and when a parliament is called, he must be a parliament-man; and it may be he sees some poor men they live near, this man he can crush them. I have known an evasion to make sure he has turned the poor man out of doors, and I would fain know whether the potency of men do not this, and so keep them under the greatest tyranny that was thought of in the world; and therefore I think that to that it is fully answered. God has set down that thing as to property with this law of his, thou shalt not steal. And for my part I am against any such thought, and I wish you would not make the world believe that we are for anarchy, as for yourselves.

---

[1] Ireton is extrapolating, but this is an argument that Diggers such as Gerrard Winstanley would soon make, at least with respect to commons land; see the selection from Winstanley's work.

Lieutenant-General [Cromwell]:[1] I know nothing but this, that they that are the most yielding have the greatest wisdom; but really, Sir, this is not right as it should be. No man says that you have a mind to anarchy, but the consequence of this rule tends to anarchy, must end in anarchy; for where is there any bound or limit set, if you take away this, that men that have no interest but the interest of breathing [should have no voice in elections]. Therefore I am confident on't, we should not be so hot one with another.

Rainsborough: I know that some particular men we debate with [claim we] are for anarchy.

Ireton: I profess I must clear myself as to that point; I would not desire, I cannot allow myself, to lay the least scandal upon any body. And truly, for that gentleman that did take so much offence, I do not know why he should take it so: we speak to the paper, not to persons, and to the matter of the paper, and I hope that no man is so much engaged to the matter of the paper. I hope our persons, and our hearts, and judgements are not pinned to papers, but that we are ready to hear what good or ill consequence will flow from it.

I have, with as much plainness and clearness of reason as I could, showed you how I did conceive the doing of this takes away that which is the most original, the most fundamental civil constitution of this kingdom, and which is, above all, that constitution by which I have any property. And if you will take away that and set up whatever a man may claim as a thing paramount that by the law of nature, though it be not a thing of necessity to him for the sustenance of nature, if you do make this your rule, I desire clearly to understand where then remains property.

Now then, the answer (I would misrepresent nothing) which had anything of matter in it, the great and main answer upon which that which has been said against this rests, seemed to be: that it will not make the breach of property, [because] there is a law, thou shalt not steal. The same law says, honour thy father, and mother: and that law does likewise hold out that it does extend to all that, in that place where we are in, are our governors, so that by that there is a forbidding of breaking a civil law when we may live quietly under it, and a divine law; and again it is said, indeed before, that there is no law, no divine law, that tells us that such a corporation must have the election of burgesses, of such a shire or the like. Divine law extends not to particular things; and so on the other side, if a man were to demonstrate his property by divine law, it would be very remote, but our property descends from other things, as well as our right of sending burgesses; that divine law does not determine particulars but generals, in relation to man and man, and to property, and all things else. And we should be as far to seek if we should go to prove a property in divine law as to prove that I have an interest in choosing burgesses of the parliament by divine law; and truly under favour I refer it to all whether these be anything of solution to that objection that I made, if it be understood. I submit it to any man's judgement.

---

[1] Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), at the time Lieutenant-General of the army and therefore the highest ranking officer present. In the absence of Thomas Fairfax, the Commander-in-Chief, Cromwell is presiding over the meeting, though he lets Ireton manage the discussion.

Rainsborough: To the thing itself—property—I would fain know how it [the vote] comes to be the property [of some men, and not of others]: as for estates, and those kind of things and other things that belong to men, it will be granted that it is property, but I deny that that is a property, to a lord, to a gentleman, to any man more than another in the kingdom of England. If it be a property, it is a property by a law; neither do I think that there is very little property in this thing by the law of the land, because I think that the law of the land in that thing is the most tyrannical law under heaven, and I would fain know what we have fought for; and this is the old law of England and that which enslaves the people of England, that they should be bound by laws in which they have no voice at all. So the great dispute is who is a right father and a right mother. I am bound to know who is my father and mother, and I take it in the same sense you do. I would have a distinction, a character whereby God commands me to honour. And for my part, I look upon the people of England so, that wherein they have not voices in the choosing of their fathers and mothers, they are not bound to that commandment.[1]

Petty: I desire to add one word, concerning the word property. It is for something that anarchy is so much talked of. For my own part I cannot believe in the least, that it can be clearly derived from that paper. 'Tis true, that somewhat may be derived in the paper against the king, the power of the king, and somewhat against the power of the lords; and the truth is when I shall see God going about to throw down king and lords and property, then I shall be contented; but I hope that they may live to see the power of the king and the lords thrown down, that yet may live to see property preserved. And for this of changing the representative of the nation, of changing those that choose the representative, making of them more full, taking more into the number than formerly, I had verily thought we had all agreed in it, that more should have chosen, all that had desired a more equal representation than now we have. For now those only choose who have forty shillings freehold. A man may have a lease for one hundred pounds a year, a man may have a lease for three lives; but for this, that it destroys all right that every Englishman that is an inhabitant of England should choose and have a voice in the representatives. I suppose it is the only means to preserve all property. For I judge every man is naturally free; and I judge the reason why men [chose representatives] when they are in so great numbers that every man could not give his voice [directly], was that they who were chosen might preserve property; and therefore men agreed to come into some form of government that they might preserve property, and I would fain know, if we were to begin a government [you would say]: "you have not forty shillings a year, therefore you shall not have a voice." Whereas, before there was a government every man had such a voice, and afterwards, and for this very cause, they did choose representatives, and put themselves into forms of government that they may preserve property, and therefore it [giving every man a voice] is not to destroy it.

Ireton: I think we shall not be so apt to come to a right understanding in this business if one man, and another man, and another man do speak their several thoughts and conceptions to the same purpose, as if we do consider what the objection is, and where the answer lies to which it is made; and therefore I desire we may do so too. That which this gentleman spoke last, the main thing that he seemed to answer was this, that he would make it appear that the going about to establish this government, such a government, is not a destruction of property, nor does not tend to the destruction of property, because the people's falling into a government is for the preservation of property. What weight there [is] lies in this: since there is a falling into a government, and government is to preserve property, therefore this cannot be against property. The objection does not lie in that, the making of it more equal, but the introducing of men into an equality of interest in this government who have no property in this kingdom, or who have no local permanent interest in it. For if I had said that I would not wish at all that we should have any enlargement of the bounds of those that are to be the electors, then you might have excepted against it, but that I would not go to enlarge it beyond all bounds, so that upon the same ground you may admit of so many men from foreign states as would outvote you: the objection lies still in this, that I do not mean that I would have it restrained to that proportion, but to restrain it still to men who have a local, a permanent interest in the kingdom, who have such an interest that they may live upon it as free men, and who have such an interest as is fixed upon a place, and is not the same equally everywhere. If a man be an inhabitant upon a rack-rent for a year, for two years, or twenty years, you cannot think that man has any fixed permanent interest;[1] that man, if he pay the rent that his land is worth, and he has no advantage but what he has by his land, that man is as good a man, may have as much interest, in another kingdom. But here I do not speak of an enlarging this at all, but of keeping this to the most fundamental constitution in this kingdom. That is, that no person that has not a local and permanent interest in the kingdom should have an equal dependence in election; but if you go beyond this law, if you admit any man that has a breath and being, I did show you how this will destroy property. It may come to destroy property thus: you may have a major part, you may have such men chosen, or at least the major part of them, why those men may not vote against all property. You may admit strangers by this rule, if you admit them once to inhabit, and those that have interest in the land may be voted out of their land; it may destroy property that way. But here is the rule that you go by: for that by which you infer this to be the right of the people, of every inhabitant, and that because this man has such a right in nature, though it be not of necessity for the preserving of his being; therefore you are to overthrow the most fundamental constitution for this. By the same rule, show me why you will not, by the same right of nature, make use of anything that any man has for the necessary sustenance of me. Show me what you will stop at, wherein you will fence any man in a property by this rule.

---

[1] that commandment The injunction in the fifth commandment to "Honour thy father and thy mother" was generally interpreted as referring to "not only natural parents, but all superiors in age and gifts; and especially such as, by God's ordinance, are over us in place of authority, whether in family, church, or commonwealth" (from the Westminster Assembly's Larger Catechism of 1648).

Rainsborough: I desire to know how this comes to be a property in some men, and not in others.

Colonel Rich:[2] I confess that objection that the Commissary-General last insisted upon; for you have five to one in this kingdom that have no permanent interest. Some men [have] ten, some twenty servants, some more, some less; if the master and servant shall be equal electors, then clearly those that have no interest in the kingdom will make it their interest to choose those that have no interest. It may happen, that the majority may by law, not in a confusion, destroy property. There may be a law enacted, that there shall be an equality of goods and estate[s]. I think that either of the extremes may be urged to inconveniency; that is, men that have no interest as to estate should have no interest as to election. But there may be a more equal division and distribution than that he that has nothing should have an equal voice; and certainly there may be some other way thought of, that there may be a representative of the poor as well as the rich, and not to exclude all. I remember there were many workings and revolutions, as we have heard, in the Roman senate; and there was never a confusion that did appear, and that indeed was come to, till the state came to know this kind of distribution of election: that is how the people's voices were bought and sold, and that by the poor; and thence it came that he that was the richest man, and of some considerable power among the soldiers, and one they resolved on, made himself a perpetual dictator. And if we strain too far to avoid monarchy in kings, [beware] that we do not call for emperors to deliver us from more than one tyrant.

---

[1] rack-rent a property whose rent was nearly equal to the annual income the tenant could obtain from it (OED).

[2] Nathaniel Rich (d. 1701), New Model Army officer; he would spend the later years of the Protectorate in and out of jail for opposition to Cromwell.

Rainsborough: I should not have spoken again. I think it is a fine gilded pill, but there is much danger, and it may seem to some that there is some kind of remedy. I think that we are better as we are, that the poor shall choose many; still the people be in the same case, be over-voted still. And therefore truly, sir, I should desire to go close to the business; and the thing that I am unsatisfied in is how it comes about that there is such a property in some freeborn Englishmen, and not others.

Cowling: Whether the younger son have not as much right to the inheritance as the eldest?

Ireton: Will you decide it by the light of nature?

Cowling: Why election was only forty shillings a year, which was more than forty pounds a year now, the reason was: that the commons of England were overpowered by the lords, who had abundance of vassals. But that still they might make their laws good against encroaching prerogatives; therefore they did exclude all slaves. Now the case is not so; all slaves have bought their freedoms. They are more free that in the commonwealth are more beneficial. [Yet] there are men [of substance] in the country [with no voice in elections]: there is a tanner in Staines worth three thousand pounds, and another in Reading worth three horseskins.[1]

Ireton: In the beginning of your speech you seem to acknowledge by law, by civil constitution, the property of having voices in election was fixed in certain persons. So then your exception of your argument does not prove that by civil constitution they have no such property, but your argument does acknowledge by civil property. You argue against this law, that this law is not good.

Mr Wildman:[2] Unless I be very much mistaken we are very much deviated from the first question. And instead of following the first proposition to inquire what is just, I conceive we look to prophecies, and look to what may be the event, and judge of the justness of a thing by the consequence. I desire we may recall whether it be right or no. I conceive all that has been said against it will be reduced to this, that it is against a fundamental law; and another reason that every person ought to have a permanent interest: because it is not fit that those should choose parliaments that have no lands to be disposed of by parliament.

Ireton: If you will take it by the way, it is not fit that the representees should choose the representers, or the persons who shall make the law in the kingdom, who have not a permanent fixed interest in the kingdom.

---

[1] Staines is a town in Surrey just outside London, a few miles up the Thames from Putney; Reading is in Berkshire.

[2] John Wildman (1623–1693), a civilian Leveller who appears to have had some legal training. He made a fortune speculating in confiscated Royalist estates, and remained a life-long republican.

Wildman: Sir, I do so take it; and I conceive that that is brought in for the same reason, that foreigners might come as well to have a notice in our elections as well as the native inhabitants.

Ireton: That is upon supposition, that these should be all inhabitants.

Wildman: I shall begin with the last first. The case is different from the native inhabitant and foreigner. If a foreigner shall be admitted to be an inhabitant in the nation, he may, so he will submit to that form of government as the natives do; he has the same right as the natives but in this particular. Our case is to be considered thus: that we have been under slavery, that's acknowledged by all. Our very laws were made by our conquerors;[1] and whereas it's spoken much of chronicles, I conceive there is no credit to be given to any of them; and the reason is because those that were our lords, and make us their vassals, would suffer nothing else to be chronicled. We are now engaged for our freedom; that's the end of parliaments, not to constitute what is already, according to the just rules of government. Every person in England has as clear a right to elect his representative as the greatest person in England. I conceive that's the undeniable maxim of government: that all government is in the free consent of the people. If then upon that account, there is no person that is under a just government, or has justly his own, unless he by his own free consent be put under that government. This he cannot be unless he be consenting to it, and therefore, according to this maxim, there is never a person in England [but ought to have a voice in elections]; if, as that gentleman says be true, there are no laws that, in this strictness and rigour of justice, that are not made by those who he does consent to. And therefore I should humbly move, that if the question be stated, which would soonest bring things to an issue, it might rather be this: whether any person can justly be bound by law not by his own consent, who does not give his consent that such persons shall make laws for him.

Ireton: Let the question be so: whether a man can be bound to any law that he does not consent to? And I shall tell you, that he may and ought to be, [despite the fact] that he does not give a consent to, nor does not choose any; and I will make it clear. If a foreigner come within this kingdom, if that stranger will have liberty who has no local interest here: he is a man, it's true, has air, that, by nature, we must not expel our coasts, give him no being amongst us, nor kill him because he comes upon our land, comes up our stream, arrives at our shore. It is a piece of hospitality, of humanity, to receive that man amongst us. But if that man be received to a being amongst us, I think that man may very well be content to submit himself to the law of the land; that is, the law that is made by those people that have a property, a fixed property in the land. I think, if any man will receive protection from this people, though he nor his ancestors, not any between him and Adam, did ever give concurrence to this constitution, I think this man ought to be subject to those laws, and to be bound by those laws, so long as he continues amongst them; that is my opinion. A man ought to be subject to a law, that did not give his consent. But with this reservation, that if this man do think himself unsatisfied to be subject to this law, he may go into another kingdom; and so the same reason does extend in my understanding, that a man that has no permanent interest in the kingdom, if he has money, his money is as good in another place as here; he has nothing that does locally fix him to this kingdom. If that man will live in this kingdom, or trade amongst us, that man ought to subject himself to the law made by the people who have the interest of this kingdom in us. And yet I do acknowledge that which you take to be so general a maxim, that in every kingdom, within every land, the original of power, of making laws, of determining what shall be law in the land, does lie in the people that are possessed in the permanent interest in the land. But whoever is extraneous to this, that is, as good a man in another land, that man ought to give such a respect to the property of men that live in the land. They do not determine, why should I [i.e. they] have any interest of determining, what shall be the law of this land.

---

[1] our conquerors the Normans.

Major [William] Rainsborough:[1] I think if it can be made to appear that it is a just and reasonable thing, and that it is for the preservation of all the freeborn men, I think it ought to be made good unto them; and the reason is, that the chief end of this government is to preserve persons as well as estates, and if any law shall take hold of my person, it is more dear than my estate.

Colonel Rainsborough: I do very well remember that the gentleman in the window [said] that if it were so, there were no property to be had, because a fifth [five?] part[s] of the poor people are now excluded and would then come in.[2] So one on the other side said, if otherwise, then rich men shall be chosen; then, I say, the one part shall make hewers of wood and drawers of water of the other five, and so the greatest part of the nation be enslaved. And truly I think we are where we were still; and I do not hear any argument given but only that it is the present law of the kingdom. I say what shall become still of those many that have laid out themselves for the Parliament of England in this present war, that have ruined themselves by fighting, by hazarding all they had. They are Englishmen. They have now nothing to say for themselves.

Rich: I should be very sorry to speak anything here that should give offence, or that may occasion personal reflection that we spoke against just now. I did not urge any thing so far as was represented, and I did not at all urge that there should be a consideration [of rich men], and that man that is [poor], shall be without consideration, [or that] he deserves to be made poor and not to live at all. But all that I urged was this: that I think it worthy consideration, whether they should have an equality in their interest. But however, I think we have been a great while upon this point, and if we be as long upon all the rest, it were well if there were no greater difference than this.

Mr Peters:[3] I think that this may be easily agreed on, that is, there may be a way thought of; but I would fain know whether that will answer the work of your meeting. I think you should do well to sit up all night, but I think that three or four might be thought of in this company. You will be forced to put characters upon electors or elected. Therefore I do suppose that if there be any here that can make up a representative to your mind, the thing is gained. But the question is, whether you can state any one question for the present danger of the kingdom, if any one question or no will dispatch the work.

Sir, I desire, that some question may be stated to finish the present work, to cement us wherein lies the distance; and if the thoughts [be] of the commonwealth, the people's freedom, I think that's soon cured. But I desire that all manner of plainness may be used, that we may not go on with the lapwing and carry one another off the nest. There is something else in that, must cement us where the awkwardness of our spirits lies.

---

[1] William Rainsborough (fl. 1638–1673), younger brother of Thomas Rainsborough; an army officer and later a Ranter sympathizer connected with Lawrence Clarkson.

[2] Colonel Rich had said that "you have five to one in this kingdom that have no permanent interest," that is, five without permanent interest to every one that has. The confusion here is likely the transcriber's rather than Rainsborough's.

[3] Hugh Peter or Peters (1598–1660), Independent minister and army chaplain, famous for sermons of revolutionary zeal; in the 1630s, he had spent some time in New England as pastor of the congregation in Salem, Massachusetts.

Rainsborough: For my part, I think we cannot engage one way or other in the army if we do not think of the people's liberties; if we can agree where the liberty and freedom of the people lies, that will do all.

Ireton: I cannot consent so far before. As I said before, when I see the hand of God destroying king, and lords, and commons too, any foundation of human constitution, when I see God has done it, I shall, I hope, comfortably acquiesce in it; but first, I cannot give my consent to it, because it is not good, and secondly, as I desire that this army should have regard to engagements, wherever they are lawful, so would I have them have regard to this: that they should not bring that scandal upon the name of God, that those that call themselves by that name, those whom God has owned and appeared with, that we should not represent ourselves to the world as men so far from being of that peaceable spirit which is suitable to the Gospel, as we would have bought peace of the world upon such terms. We would not have peace in the world but upon such terms as should destroy all property, if the principle upon which you move this alteration, or the ground upon which you press that we should make this alteration, do destroy all kind of property or whatsoever a man has by human constitution. The law of God does not give me property, nor the law of nature, but property is of human constitution. I have a property and this I shall enjoy. Constitution founds property. If either the thing itself that you press or the consequence that you press [abolishes property], though I shall acquiesce in having no property, yet I cannot give my heart or hand to it; because it is a thing evil in itself, and scandalous to the world, and I desire this army may be free from both.

Mr Sexby:[1] I see that though it [liberty?] were our end, there is a degeneration from it. We have engaged in this kingdom and ventured our lives, and it was all for this: to recover our birthrights and privileges as Englishmen; and by the arguments urged there is none. There are many thousands of us soldiers that have ventured our lives; we have had little property in the kingdom as to our estates, yet we have had a birthright; but it seems now, except a man has a fixed estate in this kingdom, he has no right in this kingdom. I wonder we were so much deceived. If we had not a right to the kingdom, we were mere mercenary soldiers. There are many in my condition, that have as good a condition; it may be little estate they have at present, and yet they have as much a right as those too who are their lawgivers, as any in this place. I shall tell you in a word my resolution. I am resolved to give my birthright to none, whatsoever may come in the way; and be thought that I will give it to none, if this thing that with so much pressing after [be denied]. There was one thing spoken to this effect: "that if the poor and those in low condition […]". I think this was but a distrust of providence. I do think the poor and meaner of this kingdom, I speak as in that relation in which we are, have been the means of the preservation of this kingdom. I say, in their stations, and really I think that to their utmost possibility; and their lives have not been dear for purchasing the good of the kingdom. Those that act to this end are as free from anarchy or confusion as those that oppose it, and they have the law of God and the law of their conscience. But truly, I shall only sum up this in all: I desire that we may not spend so much time upon these things. We must be plain. When men come to understand these things, they will not lose that which they have contended for. That which I shall beseech you is to come to a determination of this question.

---

[1] Edward Sexby (ca. 1616–1658), soldier, Leveller, and secret agent, one of the most outspoken and active Leveller spokesmen. He would spend two years in France (1651–52), publicizing Leveller ideas (and translating the Agreement of the People into French); in the later 1650s he was involved in various plots to assassinate Cromwell, and published Killing Noe Murder (1657) to justify these plans.

Ireton: I am very sorry we are come to this point, that from reasoning one to another we should come to express our resolutions. I profess for my part what I see is good for the kingdom, and becoming a Christian to contend for. I hope through God I shall have strength and resolution to do my part towards it, and yet I will profess direct contrary in some kind to what that gentleman said. For my part, rather than I will make a disturbance to a good constitution of a kingdom wherein I may live in godliness and honesty, and peace and quietness, I will part with a great deal of my birthright. I will part with my own property rather than I will be the man that shall make a disturbance in the kingdom for my property; and therefore if all the people in this kingdom, or representative[s] of them all together, should meet and should give away my property, I would submit to it, I would give it away. But that gentleman, and I think every Christian spirit, ought to bear that, to carry that in him, that he will not make a public disturbance upon a private prejudice.

Now let us consider where our difference lies. We all agree that you should have a representative to govern, but this representative to be as equal as you can; but the question is, whether this distribution can be made to all persons equally, or whether amongst those equals that have the interest of England in them? That which I have declared my opinion, I think we ought to keep to; that, both because it is a civil constitution, it is the most fundamental constitution that we have, and there is so much justice and reason and prudence, as I dare confidently undertake to demonstrate, as that there are many more evils that will follow in case you do alter than there can in the standing of it. But I say but this in the general, that I do wish that they that talk of birthrights, we any of us when we talk of birthrights, would consider what really our birthright is. If a man mean by birthright whatsoever he can challenge by the law of nature, suppose there were no constitution at all, supposing no civil law and civil constitution, that that I am to contend for against constitution, [then] you leave no property, nor no foundation for any man to enjoy anything. But if you call that your birthright which is the most fundamental part of your constitution, then let him perish that goes about to hinder you or any man of the least part of your birthright, or will do it. But if you will lay aside the most fundamental constitution, and I will give you consequence for consequence, of [i.e. as] good upon constitution as you for your birthright, which is as good for aught you can discern as anything you can propose. At least it is a constitution; and if you were merely upon pretence of a birthright, of the right of nature, which is only true as for your better being, if you will upon that ground pretend that this constitution, the most fundamental constitution, the thing that has reason and equity in it, shall not stand in your way, is the same principle to me (say I), but for your better satisfaction you shall take hold of anything that a man calls his own.

Rainsborough: Sir, I see that it is impossible to have liberty but all property must be taken away. If it be laid down for a rule, and if you will say it, it must be so, but I would fain know what the soldiers have fought for all this while; he has fought to enslave himself, to give power to men of riches, men of estates, to make him a perpetual slave. We do find in all presses that go forth none must be pressed that are freehold men.[1] When these gentlemen fall out among themselves, they shall press the poor shrubs to come and kill them.[2]

Ireton: I must confess I see so much right in the business that I am not easily satisfied with flourishes. If you will lay the stress of the business upon the consideration of reason, or right relating to anything of human constitution, or anything of that nature, but will put it upon consequences, I will show you greater ill consequences; I see enough to say that, to my apprehensions, I can show you greater ill consequences to follow upon that alteration which you would have, by extending to all that have a being in this kingdom, than that by this a great deal. This is a particular ill consequence. This is a general ill consequence, and that is as great as this or any else, though I think you will see that the validity of that argument must lie, that for one ill lies upon that which now is, and I can show you a thousand upon this.

Give me leave but this one word. I tell you what the soldier of the kingdom has fought for. First, the danger that we stood in was that one man's will must be a law. The people of the kingdom must have this right at least, that they should not be concluded [but] by the representative of those that had the interest of the kingdom. So men fought in this because they were immediately concerned and engaged in it; other men who had no other interest in the kingdom but this, that they should have the benefit of those laws made by the representative, yet that they should have the benefit of this representative. They thought it was better to be concluded by the common consent of those that were fixed men, and settled men, that had the interest of this kingdom, and from that way I shall know a law and have a certainty. And every man that was born in it, that has a freedom, is a denizen; he was capable of trading to get money, and to get estates by; and therefore this man, I think, had a great deal of reason to build up such a foundation of interest to himself; that is, that the will of one man should not be a law, but that the law of this kingdom should be by a choice of persons to represent, and that choice to be made by the generality of the kingdom. Here was a right that induced men to fight, and those men that had not this interest, and though this be not the utmost interest that other men have, yet they had some interest.

Now why we should go to plead whatsoever we can challenge by the right of nature against whatsoever any man can challenge by constitution; I do not see where that man will stop, as to point of property, that he shall not use that right he has by the law of nature against that constitution. I desire any man to show me where there is a difference. I have been answered: "Now we see liberty cannot stand without property." Liberty may be had and property not be destroyed; first, the liberty of all those that have the permanent interest in the kingdom, that is provided for. And [i.e. but] in a general sense liberty cannot be provided for if property be preserved. For, if property be preserved, that I am not to meddle with such a man's estate, his meat, his drink, his apparel, or other goods, then the right of nature destroys liberty. By the right of nature I am to have sustenance rather than perish; yet property destroys it for a man to have by the light of nature, suppose there be no human constitution.

Peters: I will mind you of one thing, that "upon the will of one man abusing us," and so forth. So that I profess to you, for my part I hope it is not denied by any man, that any wise, discreet man that has preserved England or the government of it [should have the vote]. I do say still under favour there is a way to cure all this debate. I think they will desire no more liberty if there were time to dispute it. I think he will be satisfied and all will be satisfied, and if the safety of the army be in danger, for my part I am clear it should be amended, the point of election should be mended.

---

[1] presses the impressment of men for compulsory military service.

[2] shrubs inferior or insignificant persons (OED shrub sb^{1} 3).

Cromwell: I confess I was most dissatisfied with that I heard Mr. Sexby speak of any man here, because it did savour so much of will. But I desire that all of us may decline that, and if we meet here really to agree to that which is for the safety of the kingdom, let us not spend so much time in such debates as these are, but let us apply ourselves to such things as are conclusive, and that shall be this: everybody here would be willing that the representative might be mended, that is, it might be better than it is. Perhaps it may be offered in that paper too lamely, if the thing be insisted upon too limited; why perhaps there are a very considerable part of copyholders by inheritance that ought to have a voice; and there may be somewhat too reflects upon the generality of the people. I know our debates are endless if we think to bring it to an issue this way. If we may but resolve upon a committee. If I cannot be satisfied to go so far as these gentlemen that bring this paper, I say it again, I profess it, I shall freely and willingly withdraw myself, and I hope to do it in such a manner that the army shall see that I shall by my withdrawing satisfying [satisfy] the interest of the army, the public interest of the kingdom, and those ends these men aim at. And I think if you do bring this to a result it were well.

Rainsborough: If these men must be advanced, and other men set under foot, I am not satisfied; if their rules must be observed, and other men, that are in authority, do not know how this can stand together, I wonder how that should be thought wilfulness in one man that is reason in another; for I confess I have not heard anything that does satisfy me, and though I have not so much wisdom or notions in my head, but I have so many that I could tell an hundred to the ruin of my people. I am not at all against a committee's meeting; and as you say, and I think every Christian ought to do the same, for my part I shall be ready, if I see the way that I am going, and the thing that I would insist on, will destroy the kingdom, I shall withdraw it as soon as any. And therefore, till I see that, I shall use all the means, and I think it is no fault in any man to [refuse to] sell that which is his birthright.

Sexby: I desire to speak a few words. I am sorry that my zeal to what I apprehend is good should be so ill resented. I am not sorry to see that which I apprehend is truth, but I am sorry the Lord has darkened some so much as not to see it, and that is in short. Do you think it were a sad and miserable condition, that we have fought all this time for nothing? All here, both great and small, do think that we fought for something. I confess, many of us fought for those ends which, we since saw, were not that which caused us to go through difficulties and straits to venture all in the ship with you; it had been good in you to have advertised us of it, and I believe you would have fewer under your command to have commanded. But if this be the business, that an estate does make men capable, it is no matter which way they get it, they are capable, to choose those that shall represent them; but I think there are many that have not estates that in honesty have as much right in the freedom, their choice as free, as any that have great estates. Truly, sir, your putting off this question and coming to some other, I dare say, and I dare appeal to all of them, that they cannot settle upon any other until this be done; it was the ground that we took up arms, and it is the ground which we shall maintain. Concerning my making rents and divisions in this way, as to a particular, if I were but so, I could lie down and be trodden there. Truly I am sent by a regiment; if I should not speak, guilt shall lie upon me, and I think I were a covenant-breaker. And I do not know how we have [been] answered in our arguments, and I conceive we shall not accomplish them to the kingdom when we deny them to ourselves. For my part, I shall be loath to make a rent and division, but for my own part unless I see this put to a question, I despair of an issue.

Captain Clarke:[1] The first thing that I shall desire was, and is, this: that there might be a temperature and moderation of spirit within us; that we should speak with moderation, not with such reflection as was boulted one from another,[2] but so speak and so hear as that which may be the droppings of love from one another to another's hearts.

Another word I have to say is: the grand question of all is, whether or no it be the property of every individual person in the kingdom to have a vote in election? And the ground is the law of nature, which, for my part, I think to be that law which is the ground of all constitutions. Yet really properties are the foundation of constitutions; for if so be there were no property, that the law of nature does give a principle to have a property of what he has, or may have, which is not another man's: this property is the ground of meum and tuum [mine and thine]. Now there may be inconveniences on both hands, but not so great freedom. The greater freedom, as I conceive, that all may have whatsoever. And if it come to pass that there be a difference, and that the one does oppose the other, then nothing can decide it but the sword, which is the wrath of God.

Captain Audley:[3] I see you have a long dispute, that you do intend to dispute here till the tenth of March.[4] You have brought us into a fair pass, and the kingdom into a fair pass, for if your reasons are not satisfied, and we do not fetch all our waters from your wells, you threaten to withdraw yourselves. I could wish, according to our several protestations, we might sit down quietly, and there throw down ourselves where we see reason. I could wish we might all rise, and go to our duties, and see our work in hand. I see both at a stand, and if we dispute here both are lost.

Cromwell: Really, for my own part I must needs say, while we say we would not make reflections, we do make reflections; and if I had not come hither with a free heart, to do that that I was persuaded in my conscience is my duty, I should a thousand times rather have kept myself away; for I do think I had brought upon myself the greatest sin that I was guilty of, if I should have come to have stood before God in that former duty which is before you, and if that my saying [that] which I did say, and shall persevere to say, that I should not, I cannot against my conscience do anything. They that have stood so much for liberty of conscience, if they will not grant that liberty to every man but say it is a deserting I know no what. If that be denied me, I think there is not that equality that I professed to be amongst us. I said this, and I say no more, that make your businesses as well as you can, we might bring things to an understanding; it was to be brought to a fair composure. And when you have said: if you should put this paper to the question without any qualification, I doubt whether it would pass so freely; if we would have no difference, we ought to put it. And let me speak clearly and freely; I have heard other gentlemen do the like. I have not heard the Commissary-General [Ireton] answered, not in a part to my knowledge, not in a tittle; if therefore, when I see there is an extremity of difference between you, to the end it may be brought nearer to a general satisfaction; and if this be thought a deserting of that interest, if there can be anything more sharply said, I will not give it an ill word. Though we should be satisfied in our consciences in what we do, we are told we purpose to leave the army, or to leave our commands, as if we took upon us to do it in matter of will. I did hear some gentlemen speak more of will than anything that was spoken for this way, for more was spoken by way of will than of satisfaction; and if there be not a more equality in our minds, I can but grieve for it. I must do no more.

---

[1] John Clarke (fl. 1645–1660), army officer; he later sat as an MP in every Parliament from 1653 to the end of the Protectorate.

[2] boulted bolted; probably in the contemporary sense meaning to blurt, to speak hastily or ill-advisedly (OED bolt v^2 5).

[3] Lewis Audley, an officer agitator.

[4] probably referring simply to a date months away, rather than to a specific event in the future.

Ireton: I should not speak, but reflections do necessitate, do call upon us to vindicate ourselves, as if we who have led men into engagements and services, had divided [from them] because we did not concur with them. I will ask that gentleman [Rainsborough] whom I love in my heart that spoke, whether when they drew out to serve the Parliament in the beginning, whether when they engaged with the army at Newmarket,[1] whether then they thought of any more interest or right in the kingdom than this, whether they did think that they should have as great interest in parliament-men as freeholders had, or whether from the beginning we did not engage for the liberty of parliaments, and that we should be concluded by the laws that such did make. Unless somebody did make you believe before now that you should have an equal interest in the kingdom; unless somebody do make that to be believed, there is no reason to blame men for leading so far as they have done; and if any man was far enough from such an apprehension, that man has not been deceived.

And truly I shall say but this word more for myself in this business, because the whole objection seems to be pressed to me and maintained by me. I will not arrogate that I was the first man that put the army upon the thought either of successive parliaments or more equal parliaments. Yet there are some here that know who they were put us upon that foundation of liberty, of putting a period to this Parliament, that we might have successive parliaments, and that there might be a more equal distribution of elections. There are many here that know who were the first movers of that business in the army. I shall not arrogate that but I can argue this with a clear conscience: that no man has prosecuted that with more earnestness, and that will stand to that interest more than I do, of having parliaments successive and not perpetual, and the distributions of it; but, notwithstanding, my opinion stands good, that it ought to be a distribution amongst the fixed and settled people of this nation; it's more prudent and safe, and more upon this ground of right for it. Now it is the fundamental constitution of this kingdom; and that which you take away for matter of wilfulness, notwithstanding this universal conclusion, that "all inhabitants" as it stands. Though I must declare that I cannot yet be satisfied, yet for my part I shall acquiesce; I will not make a distraction in this army, though I have a property in being one of those that should be an elector; though I have an interest in the birthright, yet I will rather lose that birthright, and that interest, than I will make it my business, if I see but the generality of those whom I have reason to think honest men, and conscientious men, and godly men, to carry them another way. I will not oppose, though I be not satisfied to join with them. And I desire [to say:] I am agreed with you, if you insist upon a more equal distribution of elections; I will agree with you, not only to dispute for it, but to fight for it, and contend for it. Thus far I shall agree with you. On the other hand, those who differ their terms, I will not agree with you except you go further. Thus far I can go with you; I will go with you as far as I can. If you will appoint a committee to consider of some of that, so as you preserve the equitable part of that constitution, who are like to be freemen, and men not given up to the wills of others, keeping to the latitude which is the equity of constitutions, I will go with you as far as I can. I will sit down. I will not make any disturbance among you.

---

[1] a general rendezvous of the New Model Army, held in Newmarket June 4–5, 1647; the officers and soldiers agreed to a Solemn Engagement in which they vowed not to disband until various grievances had been redressed. It was the Solemn Engagement that formalized the system of choosing two "agitators" or representatives from each regiment.

Rainsborough: If I do not speak my soul and conscience, I do think that there is not an objection made, but that it has been answered; but the speeches are so long. I am sorry for some passion and some reflections, and I could wish where it is most taken the cause had not been given. It is a fundamental constitution of the kingdom; there I would fain know, whether the choice of burgesses in corporations should not be altered.

The end wherefore I speak is only this: you think we shall be worse than we are, if we come to a conclusion by a vote. If it be put to the question, we shall all know one another's mind; if it be determined, and the resolutions known, we shall take such a course as to put it in execution. This gentleman says, if he cannot go he will sit still. He thinks he has a full liberty; we think we have not. There is a great deal of difference between us two. If a man has all he does desire, but I think I have nothing at all of what I fought for, I do not think the argument holds that I must desist as well as he.

Petty: The rich would very unwillingly be concluded by the poor. And there is as much reason, and indeed no reason, that the rich should conclude the poor as the poor the rich; but there should be an equal share in both. I understood your engagement was that you would use all your endeavours for the liberties of the people, that they should be secured. If there is a constitution, that the people are not free, that should be annulled. That constitution which is now set up is a constitution of forty shillings a year, but this constitution does not make people free.

Cromwell: Here's the mistake: whether that's the better constitution in that paper, or that which is. But if you will go upon such a ground as that is, although a better constitution was offered for the removing of the worse, yet some gentlemen are resolved to stick to the worse. There might be a great deal of prejudice upon such an apprehension. I think you are by this time satisfied, that it is a clear mistake; for it is a dispute whether or not this be better, nay, whether it be not destructive to the kingdom.

Petty: I desire to speak one word to this business, because I do not know whether my occasions will suffer me to attend it any longer. The great reason that I have heard is the constitution of the kingdom, the utmost constitution of it; and if we destroy this constitution, there is no property. I suppose that if constitutions should tie up all men in this nature, it were very dangerous.

Ireton: First, the thing itself were dangerous, if it were settled to destroy property. But I say the principle that leads to this is destructive to property; for by the same reason that you will alter this constitution, merely that there's a greater constitution by nature, by the same reason, by the law of nature, there is a greater liberty to the use of other men's goods, which that property bars you of. And I would fain have any man show me why I should destroy that liberty which the freeholders and burghers in corporations have in choosing burgesses, that which if you take away, you leave no constitution; and this because there is a greater freedom due to me from some men by the law of nature. More than that, I should take another man's goods because the law of nature does allow me.

Rainsborough: I would grant something that the Commissary-General says. But whether this be a just property, the property says that forty shillings a year enables a man to elect; if it were stated to that, nothing would conduce so much whether some men do agree or no.

Captain Rolfe:[1] I conceive that, as we are met here, there are one or two things mainly to be prosecuted by us; that is especially unity, preservation of unity in the army, and so likewise to put ourselves into a capacity thereby to do good to the kingdom. And therefore I shall desire that there may be a tender consideration had of that which is so much urged, in that of an equal, as well as of a free representative. I shall desire that a medium, or some thoughts of a composure in relation to servants, or to foreigners, or such others such as shall be agreed upon. I say then, I conceive, excepting those, there may be a very equitable sense [p]resented to us from that offer in our own declarations wherein we do offer the common good of all, unless they have made any shipwreck or loss of it.

[Lieutenant] Chillenden:[2] In the beginning of this discourse there were overtures made of imminent danger. This way we have taken this afternoon is not the way to prevent it. I should humbly move that we should put a speedy end to this business, and that not only to this main question of the paper, but also according to the Lieutenant-General's motion, that a committee may be chosen seriously to consider the things in that paper, and compare them with divers things in our declarations and engagements. That so as we have all professed, to lay down ourselves before God, if we take this course of debating upon one question a whole afternoon, if the danger be so near as it is supposed, it were the ready way to bring us into it. That things may be put into a speedy dispatch.

Clarke: I presume that the great stick here is this: that if every one shall have his property, it does bereave the kingdom of its principal fundamental constitution, that it [now] has. I presume that all people and all nations whatsoever have a liberty and power to alter and change their constitutions, if they find them to be weak and infirm. Now if the people of England shall find this weakness in their constitution, they may change it if they please. Another thing is this: if the light of nature be only in this, it may destroy the property which every man can call his own. The reason is this, because this principle and light of nature does give all men their own: as for example the clothes upon my back because they are not another man's. If every man has this property of election to choose those whom you fear may beget inconveniencies, I do not conceive that anything may be so nicely and precisely done, but that it may admit of inconveniency. If it be in that wherein it is now, there may those inconveniences rise from them. For my part I know nothing but the want of love in it, and the sword must decide it. I shall desire before the question be stated, it may be moderated as for foreigners.

Sir Hardress Waller:[3] This was that I was saying: I confess I have not spoken yet, and I was willing to be silent, having heard so many speak, that I might learn to. But it is not easy for us to say when this dispute will have an end; but I think it is easy to say when the kingdom will have an end. But if we do not breathe out ourselves, we shall be kicked and spurned of all the world. I would fain know how far the question will decide it; for certainly we must not expect, while we have tabernacles here,[1] to be all of one mind. If it be to be decided by a question, and that all parties are satisfied in that, I think the sooner you hasten to it the better. If otherwise, we shall needlessly discover our dividing opinion, which as long as it may be avoided I desire it may. Therefore I desire to have a period.

---

[1] Edmund Rolfe (fl. 1643–1656), an officer agitator. In June 1648 he would be accused, but acquitted, of plotting to assassinate the King.

[2] Edmund Chillenden (fl. 1638–1678), an officer agitator; later a General Baptist minister and Fifth Monarchist; after the Restoration he opened a coffee house.

[3] Sir Hardress Waller (ca. 1604–ca. 1666), commander of a New Model Army regiment; subsequently one of the regicides and active in Cromwell's Irish campaigns.

Audley: I chanced to speak a word or two. Truly there was more offence taken at it. For my part I spoke against every man living, not only against yourself and the Commissary, but every man that would dispute till we have our throats cut. I profess, if so be there were none but you and the Commissary-General alone to maintain that argument, I would die in any place in England, in asserting that it is the right of every free-born man to elect, according to the rule, quod omnibus spectat, ab omnibus tractari debet, that which concerns all ought to be debated by all. He knew no reason why that law should oblige when he himself had no finger in appointing the lawgiver, and therefore I desire I may not lie in any prejudice before your persons.

Captain Bishop:[2] You have met here this day to see if God would show you any way wherein you might jointly preserve the kingdom from its destruction, which you all apprehend to be at the door. God is pleased not to come in to you. There is a gentleman, Mr Saltmarsh,[3] did desire what he has wrote may be read to the General Council. If God do manifest anything by him, I think it ought to be heard.

Ireton: That you will alter that constitution from a better to a worse, from a just to a thing that is less just is my apprehension; and I will not repeat the reasons of that, but refer to what I have declared before. To me, if there were nothing but this, that there is a constitution, and that constitution which is the very last constitution, which if you take away you leave nothing of constitution, and consequently nothing of right or property. I would not go to alter that, though a man could propound that which in some respects might be better, unless it could be demonstrated to me that this were unlawful, or that this were destructive. Truly, therefore, I say for my part, to go on a sudden to make such a limitation as that in general, if you do extend the latitude that any man shall have a voice in election who has not that interest in this kingdom that is permanent and fixed, who has not that interest upon which he may have his freedom in this kingdom without dependence, you will put it into the hands of men to choose, of men to preserve their liberty who will give it away.

I have a thing put into my heart which I cannot but speak. I profess I am afraid, that if we from such apprehensions as these are, of an imaginable right of nature, opposite to constitution, if we will contend and hazard the breaking of peace upon this enlargement of that business, I am confident our discontent and dissatisfaction, in that if ever they do well they do in this, if there be anything at all that is a foundation of liberty, it is this: that those who shall choose the lawmakers shall be men freed from dependence upon others. I think if we, from imaginations and conceits, will go about to hazard the peace of the kingdom, to alter the constitution in such a point, I am afraid we shall find the hand of God will follow it; we shall see that that liberty, which we so much talk of and contended for, shall be nothing at all by this our contending for it, by putting it into the hands of those men that will give it away when they have it.

---

[1] while we have tabernacles seems to mean to have debates like those held in religious meetings, though this is not a usage recorded in the OED for the period. Possibly also a figurative use of the recorded sense of occupying a temporary building, of living somewhere for a limited time (OED tabernacle sb 1); Waller is concerned about the usefulness of occupying time in theoretical debate when the military and political situation was still in flux.

[2] possibly George Bishop (d. 1668), a captain in the Parliamentary army, later a Quaker.

[3] John Saltmarsh (ca. 1612–1647), army chaplain; he had sent the Council of War a letter of reproof for breaking their promises, and warning them to heed the opinion of all speakers in these discussions, "from the highest to the meanest."

Cromwell: If we should go about to alter these things, I do not think that we are bound to fight for every particular proposition. Servants, while servants, are not included. Then you agree that he that receives alms is to be excluded.

Lieutenant-Colonel Reade:[1] I suppose it's concluded by all, that the choosing of representatives is a privilege; now I see no reason why any man that is a native ought to be excluded that privilege, unless from voluntary servitude.

Petty: I conceive the reason why we would exclude apprentices, or servants, or those that take alms, it is because they depend upon the will of other men and should be afraid to displease. For servants and apprentices, they are included in their masters, and so for those that receive alms from door to door; but if there be any general way taken for those that are not bound, it would do well.

[Mr.] Everard:[2] I being sent from the agents of five regiments with an answer unto a writing, the committee was very desirous to inquire into the depth of our intentions. Those things that they had there manifested in the paper, I declared it was the Lieutenant-General's desire for an understanding with us, and what I did understand as a particular person, I did declare, and were presuming those things I did declare did tend to unity. And if so, you will let it appear by coming unto us. We have gone thus far: we have had two or three meetings to declare and hold forth what it is we stand upon, the principles of unity and freedom. We have declared in what we conceive these principles do lie: I shall not name them all because they are known unto you. Now in the progress of these disputes and debates we find that the time spends, and no question but our adversaries are harder at work than we are. I heard that there were meetings (but I had no such testimony as I could take hold of), that there are meetings daily and contrivances against us. Now for our parts I hope you will not say all is yours, but we have nakedly and freely unbosomed ourselves unto you. Though these things have startled many at the first view, yet we find there is good hopes; we have fixed our resolutions, and we are determined, and we want nothing but that only God will direct us to what is just and right. But I understand that all these debates, if we shall agree upon any one thing: this is our freedom; this is our liberty; this liberty and freedom we are debarred of, and we are bereaved of all those comforts. In case we should find half a hundred of these, yet the main business is how we should find them, and how we should come by them. Is there any liberty that we find ourselves deprived of? If we have grievances let us see who are the hindrances, and when we have pitched upon that way. I conceive I speak humbly in this one thing as a particular person, that I conceive myself, that these delays, these disputes, will prove little encouragement. As it was told me by [one of] these gentlemen, that he had great jealousies that we would not come to the trial of our spirits and that perhaps there might happen another design in hand. I said to his Honour again, if they would not come to the light, I would judge they had the works of darkness in hand. Now as they told me again on the other hand, when it was questioned by Colonel Hewson, they told me: "These gentlemen, not naming any particular persons, they will hold you in hand, and keep you in debate and dispute till you and we come all to ruin." Now I stood as a moderator between these things. When I heard the Lieutenant-General speak I was marvellously taken up with the plainness of the carriage. I said, I will bring them to you. You shall see if their hearts be so; for my part I see nothing but plainness and uprightness of heart made manifest unto you. I will not judge, nor draw any long discourses upon our disputes this day. We may differ in one thing, that you conceive this debating and disputation will do the work; we must put ourselves into the former privileges which we want.

---

[1] Thomas Reade, Lieutenant-Colonel in Colonel William Herbert's regiment.

[2] Robert Everard (fl. 1647–1664), soldier in Cromwell's regiment, a signatory of The Case of the Army (1647) and the first Agreement of the People.

Waller: I think this gentleman has dealt very ingenuously and plainly with us. I pray God we may do so too, and for one I will do it. I think our disputings will not do the thing. I think if we do make it our resolution that we do hold it forth to all powers, Parliament or King, or whoever they are, to let them know that these are our rights, and if we have them not we must get them the best way we can.

Cromwell: I think you say very well; and my friend at my back, he tells me that [there] are great fears abroad; and they talk of some things such as are not only specious to take a great many people with, but real and substantial, and such as are comprehensive of that that has the good of the kingdom in it. And truly if there be never so much desire of carrying on these things, never so much desire of conjunction, yet if there be not liberty of speech to come to a right understanding of things, I think it shall be all one as if there were no desire at all to meet. And I may say it with truth, that I verily believe there is as much reality and heartiness amongst us, to come to a right understanding, and to accord with that that has the settlement of the kingdom in it, though when it comes to particulars we may differ in the way. Yet I know nothing but that every honest man will go as far as his conscience will let him; and he that will go farther, I think he will fall back. And I think, when that principle is written in the hearts of us, and when there is not hypocrisy in our dealings, we must all of us resolve upon this, that 'tis God that persuades the heart. If there be a doubt of sincerity, it's the devil that created that effect; and 'tis God that gives uprightness. And I hope with such an heart that we have all met withal; if we have not, God find him out that came without it; for my part I do it.

Ireton: When you have done this according to the number of inhabitants, do you think it is not very variable? I would have us fall to something that is practicable, with as little pains and dissatisfaction as may be. I remember that in the proposals that went out in the name of the army, it is propounded as a rule to be distributed according to the rates that the counties bear in the kingdom. And remember then you have a rule, and though this be not a rule of exactness, for the number will change every day; yet there was something of equality in it, and it was a certain rule, where all are agreed; and therefore we should come to some settling. Now I do not understand wherein the advantage does lie from a sudden danger upon a thing that will continue so long, and will continue so uncertain as this is.

Waller: 'Tis thought there's imminent danger; I hope to God we shall be so ready to agree for the future that we shall all agree for the present to rise as one man if the danger be such, for it is an impossibility to have a remedy in this. The paper says that this Parliament is to continue a year, but will the great burden of the people be ever satisfied with papers [while] you eat and feed upon them? I shall be glad that there be not any present danger; if not that you will think of some way to ease the burden, that we may take a course, and [deal with this] when we have satisfied the people that we do really intend the good of the kingdom. Otherwise, if the four Evangelists were here, and lay free quarter upon them,[1] they will not believe you.

Colonel Rainsborough: Moved, that the army might be called to a rendezvous, and things settled....

—1647

---

[1] free-quarter the obligation to provide free room and board for soldiers; the implication is that even the most fair-minded people will cease eventually to support the army if the army cannot demonstrate its good intentions.

The Trial of King Charles I

1649

By September 1648, any real chance of military victory for the King had ended. In the spring of that year, Parliamentary armies had quelled scattered Royalist uprisings (events usually known as the Second Civil War); and in August at Preston Oliver Cromwell defeated a Scottish army that had been promised the temporary establishment of Presbyterianism in return for the restoration of Royal prerogatives. In September an alliance of Parliamentary moderates sent commissioners to Newport on the Isle of Wight to discuss a peace settlement with the King. But some members of Parliament envisioned a settlement in which the King no longer played a role. With backing from the army, a radical minority in Parliament purged the House of Commons of its moderate majority in early December, and in January 1649 this "Rump" Parliament put the King on trial. The central charge was that Charles had "traitorously and maliciously" levied war against Parliament and the people they represented.

The trial began on January 20 and lasted eight days. Throughout the proceedings, Charles refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the court that had been created for the occasion. The first of the two texts below is the text he wrote to justify his refusal; he was not allowed to read this statement at the trial, but it was secretly printed shortly after the King was executed on January 30. For the political philosophy that underlies his argument, particularly the belief that a king cannot be subject to laws for which he himself provides the authority, see the 1610 speech to Parliament by King James VI/I. For another refusal to recognize the authority of a judicial body headed by John Bradshaw (though one motivated by a very different political philosophy), see Richard Overton's narrative, "The Proceedings of the Council of State." The second text here is the court's sentence. Fifty-nine judges (of the one hundred and thirty originally appointed) signed the death warrant; of these, twenty-nine were tried and convicted of treason in 1660, and thirteen were executed. In addition, the bodies of Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, and Bradshaw (the president of the court) were exhumed for ceremonial hanging and quartering.

* * *

The Trial of King Charles I

The King's Reasons for Declining the Jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice

Having already made my protestations, not only against the illegality of this pretended Court, but also, that no earthly power can justly call me (who am your King) in question as a delinquent, I would not any more open my mouth upon this occasion, more than to refer myself to what I have spoken, were I in this case alone concerned: but the duty I owe to God in the preservation of the true liberty of my people will not suffer me at this time to be silent: for, how can any free-born subject of England call life or anything he possesseth his own, if power without right daily make new, and abrogate the old fundamental laws of the land which I now take to be the present case? Wherefore when I came hither, I expected that you would have endeavoured to have satisfied me concerning these grounds which hinder me to answer to your pretended impeachment. But since I see that nothing I can say will move you to it (though negatives are not so naturally proved as affirmatives) yet I will show you the reason why I am confident you cannot judge me, nor indeed the meanest man in England: for I will not (like you) without showing a reason, seek to impose a belief upon my subjects.

There is no proceeding just against any man, but what is warranted, either by God's laws or the municipal laws of the country where he lives. Now I am most confident this day's proceeding cannot be warranted by God's laws; for, on the contrary, the authority of obedience unto Kings is clearly warranted, and strictly commanded in both the Old and New Testament, which, if denied, I am ready instantly to prove.

And for the question now in hand, there it is said, that "where the word of a King is, there is power; and who may say unto him, what dost thou?" Eccles. 8:4. Then for the law of this land, I am no less confident, that no learned lawyer will affirm that an impeachment can lie against the King, they all going in his name:[1] and one of their maxims is, that the King can do no wrong. Besides, the law upon which you ground your proceedings, must either be old or new: if old, show it; if new, tell what authority, warranted by the fundamental laws of the land, hath made it, and when. But how the House of Commons can erect a Court of Judicature, which was never one itself (as is well known to all lawyers) I leave to God and the world to judge. And it were full as strange, that they should pretend to make laws without King or Lords' House, to any that have heard speak of the laws of England.

And admitting, but not granting, that the people of England's commission could grant your pretended power, I see nothing you can show for that; for certainly you never asked the question of the tenth man in the kingdom, and in this way you manifestly wrong even the poorest ploughman, if you demand not his free consent; nor can you pretend any colour for this your pretended commission, without the consent at least of the major part of every man in England of whatsoever quality or condition, which I am sure you never went about to seek, so far are you from having it. Thus you see that I speak not for my own right alone, as I am your King, but also for the true liberty of all my subjects, which consists not in the power of government, but in living under such laws, such a government, as may give themselves the best assurance of their lives, and property of their goods; nor in this must or do I forget the privileges of both Houses of Parliament, which this day's proceedings do not only violate, but likewise occasion the greatest breach of their public faith that (I believe) ever was heard of, with which I am far from charging the two Houses; for all the pretended crimes laid against me bear date long before this Treaty at Newport, in which I having concluded as much as in me lay,[2] and hopefully expecting the Houses' agreement thereunto, I was suddenly surprised and hurried from thence as a prisoner;[3] upon which account I am against my will brought hither, where since I am come, I cannot but to my power defend the ancient laws and liberties of this kingdom, together with my own just right. Then for anything I can see, the higher House is totally excluded;[4] and for the House of Commons, it is too well known that the major part of them are detained or deterred from sitting;[5] so as if I had no other, this were sufficient for me to protest against the lawfulness of your pretended Court. Besides all this, the peace of the kingdom is not the least in my thoughts; and what hope of settlement is there, so long as power reigns without rule or law, changing the whole frame of that government under which this kingdom hath flourished for many hundred years? (nor will I say what will fall out in case this lawless, unjust proceeding against me do go on) and believe it, the Commons of England will not thank you for this change; for they will remember how happy they have been of late years under the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, the King my father, and myself, until the beginning of these unhappy troubles, and will have cause to doubt, that they shall never be so happy under any new: and by this time it will be too sensibly evident, that the arms I took up were only to defend the fundamental laws of this kingdom against those who have supposed my power hath totally changed the ancient government.

---

[1] Since the monarch is the source of legal authority, lawyers in effect act in his name.

[2] Newport, on the Isle of Wight, was the site of negotiations (Sept.-Oct. 1648) between Charles and an alliance of moderate Parliamentarians. The King made concessions on religion and the militia, but admitted privately that he did so "merely in order to my escape."

[3] The army removed Charles from the Isle of Wight to the mainland on December 2.

[4] the higher House the House of Lords.

[5] On December 6, the army either turned away or arrested all members of Parliament—a majority of the House of Commons—willing to continue negotiations with the King. In effect a military coup, "Pride's Purge" (named for the colonel who guarded the door) left only a radicalized "Rump" Parliament willing to put the King on trial.

Thus, having showed you briefly the reasons why I cannot submit to your pretended authority, without violating the trust which I have from God for the welfare and liberty of my people, I expect from you either clear reasons to convince my judgment, showing me that I am in an error (and then truly I will answer) or that you will withdraw your proceedings.

This I intended to speak in Westminster Hall, on Monday, January 22, but against reason was hindered to show my reasons.

THE SENTENCE OF THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE UPON THE KING

Whereas the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, have by their late Act intituled an Act of the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, for erecting an High Court of Justice for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, King of England, authorised and constituted us an High Court of Justice for the trying and judging of the said Charles Stuart for the crimes and treasons in the said Act mentioned; by virtue whereof the same Charles Stuart hath been three several times convented before this High Court,[1] where the first day, being Saturday, the 20th of January instant, in pursuance of the said Act, a charge of high treason and other high crimes was, in the behalf of the people of England, exhibited against him, and read openly unto him, wherein he was charged, that he, the said Charles Stuart, being admitted King of England, and therein trusted with a limited power to govern by, and according to the law of the land, and not otherwise; and by his trust, oath, and office, being obliged to use the power committed to him for the good and benefit of the people, and for the preservation of their rights and liberties; yet, nevertheless, out of a wicked design to erect and uphold in himself an unlimited and tyrannical power to rule according to his will, and to overthrow the rights and liberties of the people, and to take away and make void the foundations thereof, and of all redress and remedy of misgovernment, which by the fundamental constitutions of this kingdom were reserved on the people's behalf in the right and power of frequent and successive Parliaments, or national meetings in Council; he, the said Charles Stuart, for accomplishment of such his designs, and for the protecting of himself and his adherents in his and their wicked practices, to the same end hath traitorously and maliciously levied war against the present Parliament, and people therein represented, as with the circumstances of time and place is in the said charge more particularly set forth; and that he hath thereby caused and procured many thousands of the free people of this nation to be slain; and by divisions, parties, and insurrections within this land, by invasions from foreign parts, endeavoured and procured by him,[1] and by many other evil ways and means, he, the said Charles Stuart, hath not only maintained and carried on the said war both by sea and land, but also hath renewed, or caused to be renewed, the said war against the Parliament and good people of this nation in this present year 1648;[2] in several counties and places in this kingdom in the charge specified; and that he hath for that purpose given his commission to his son the Prince, and others, whereby, besides multitudes of other persons, many such as were by the Parliament entrusted and employed for the safety of this nation, being by him or his agents corrupted to the betraying of their trust, and revolting from the Parliament, have had entertainment and commission for the continuing and renewing of the war and hostility against the said Parliament and people: and that by the said cruel and unnatural war so levied, continued and renewed, much innocent blood of the free people of this nation hath been spilt, many families undone, the public treasure wasted, trade obstructed and miserably decayed, vast expense and damage to the nation incurred, and many parts of the land spoiled, some of them even to desolation; and that he still continues his commission to his said son, and other rebels and revolters, both English and foreigners, and to the Earl of Ormond,[3] and to the Irish rebels and revolters associated with him, from whom further invasions of this land are threatened by his procurement and on his behalf; and that all the said wicked designs, wars, and evil practices of him, the said Charles Stuart, were still carried on for the advancement and upholding of the personal interest of will, power, and pretended prerogative to himself and his family, against the public interest, common right, liberty, justice, and peace of the people of this nation; and that he thereby hath been and is the occasioner, author, and continuer of the said unnatural, cruel, and bloody wars, and therein guilty of all the treasons, murders, rapines, burnings, spoils, desolations, damage, and mischief to this nation, acted and committed in the said wars, or occasioned thereby; whereupon the proceedings and judgment of this Court were prayed against him, as a tyrant, traitor, and murderer, and public enemy to the Commonwealth, as by the said charge more fully appeareth. To which charge, being read unto him as aforesaid, he, the said Charles Stuart, was required to give his answer; but he refused so to do, and upon Monday, the 22nd day of January instant, being again brought before this Court, and there required to answer directly to the said charge, he still refused so to do;[4] whereupon his default and contumacy was entered;[5] and the next day, being the third time brought before the Court, judgment was then prayed against him on the behalf of the people of England for his contumacy, and for the matters contained against him in the said charge, as taking the same for confessed, in regard of his refusing to answer thereto: yet notwithstanding this Court (not willing to take advantage of his contempt) did once more require him to answer to the said charge; but he again refused so to do; upon which his several defaults, this Court might justly have proceeded to judgment against him, both for his contumacy and the matters of the charge, taking the same for confessed as aforesaid.

---

[1] convented summoned (OED convent v 3b).

Yet nevertheless this Court, for its own clearer information and further satisfaction, have thought fit to examine witnesses upon oath, and take notice of other evidences, touching the matters ordained in the said charge, which accordingly they have done.

---

[1] invasions from foreign parts referring to Irish Catholic forces, from whom Charles sought military support throughout the civil wars (see the reference to the Earl of Ormond below).

[2] Royalist risings in southeast England and Wales in the spring of 1648 were quashed by Fairfax and Cromwell in what is usually known as the Second Civil War.

[3] James Butler, twelfth Earl and subsequently first Duke of Ormond (1610–1688), the King's commander in Ireland.

[4] This was the day the King sought to read his reasons for refusing their jurisdiction, but was not allowed to do so.

[5] contumacy here, wilful disobedience of a court (OED contumacy 3).

Now, therefore, upon serious and mature deliberation of the premises, and consideration had of the notoriety of the matters of fact charged upon him as aforesaid, this Court is in judgment and conscience satisfied that he, the said Charles Stuart, is guilty of levying war against the said Parliament and people, and maintaining and continuing the same; for which in the said charge he stands accused, and by the general course of his government, counsels, and practices, before and since this Parliament began (which have been and are notorious and public, and the effects whereof remain abundantly upon record) this Court is fully satisfied in their judgments and consciences, that he has been and is guilty of the wicked design and endeavours in the said charge set forth; and that the said war hath been levied, maintained, and continued by him as aforesaid, in prosecution, and for accomplishment of the said designs; and that he hath been and is the occasioner, author, and continuer of the said unnatural, cruel, and bloody wars, and therein guilty of high treason, and of the murders, rapines, burnings, spoils, desolations, damage, and mischief to this nation acted and committed in the said war, and occasioned thereby. For all which treasons and crimes this Court doth adjudge that he, the said Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy to the good people of this nation, shall be put to death by the severing of his head from his body.

—1649

A True Relation

1672

While English merchants had occasionally traded in slaves since the sixteenth century, a 1663 charter for the "Company of Royal Adventurers of England Trading in Africa" is the earliest document to list slaves as an officially recognized branch of English commerce. The slave trade grew in conjunction with the establishment in mid-century of sugar plantations in the West Indies; it is estimated that by the end of the century Dutch and English ships were carrying about 5000 slaves per year from the West African coast to labour in the plantations. After September 1672, the English trade was controlled by the Royal African Company. The following narrative was published in the same year the new company was given its charter, and its appearance reflects the growing importance of and interest in the African trade.

A True Relation purports to tell the story of John Watts (as told to his uncle, Richard Watts), held captive in the city of Old Calabar, a major trading port in what is now Nigeria. Old Calabar was founded by the Efik, a branch of the Ibibio-speaking peoples who still comprise one of the largest population groups in southeastern Nigeria. Efik traders played an important role in the slave trade through to the nineteenth century. Watt's geographical and much of his cultural detail accords with other (scattered) sources for the period: there seems no reason to doubt that the writer served on one of the English ships that did business in the port. But other details in his narrative, like the language Watts cites as native and the story of cannibalism (unattested by any other source or tradition for the area), have led some historians to deduce that his captivity narrative is likely fictitious, either entirely or at least in important details.[1] Whatever its status as an historical document, A True Relation should also be read as drawing on the conventions not only of the captivity narrative but also of travel writing and romance. For another captivity narrative, see the selection from Mary Rowlandson; for other accounts of native populations, see the selections from Edward Winslow and Pierre-Esprit Radisson.

* * *

A True Relation, of the Inhumane and Unparallel'd Actions and Barbarous Murders of Negroes or Moors: Committed on three English-men in Old Calabar in Guinny[2]

Among the variety of cruelties and murders, which history and experience daily inform us of, this, which I now intend to relate, is none of the least. And the story you shall have verbatim, from one of the sufferers' own mouth; who arrived lately in the Downs,[3] and is now in His Majesty's fleet.

In June 1668, the Peach-tree of London, a small vessel of the burthen of about sixty tons, Edward Dixon master, came into the Downs bound for Guinny, intending there to take in Negroes, and to transport them to the Barbados, and from thence to come for London,[1] where John Watts, the son of John Watts, of Elham, in the County of Kent, Chirurgion, shipped himself with the consent of Richard Watts, public notary of Deal;[2] little dreading that he, being not above eighteen years old, should meet with such a calamitous accident. The ship had not been long in the Downs, but a fair gale presenting, they suddenly hoisted sail, God's providence seeming to fill their sails with prosperous success; the first place they touched at was the Gold Coast,[3] where they stayed not long, but sailed to old Calabar in the Bith of Guinny.[4] They entered a river called the Cross River into Parrot Island.[5] After they had taken in their Negroes, and ready to sail, their anchor being a peek,[6] the Master calls up the boatswain and three men more, whereof the relator was one, and commands them to look out the copper bars that were left, and carry them on shore to try if they could sell them:[7] the boatswain with his small company desired that they might have arms with them, not believing the report of some, that informed them they were a harmless, and innocent people: they took with them three muskets and a pistol, and so rowed towards the shore, but not far from it unhappily our match fell into the water,[8] and the ship being fallen down from that narrow part of the river, nearer the sea, quite out of our sight, we were consulting what would be safest for us to do: we were not willing to precipitate our own ruin, and we were also ashamed to return to our ship before we had dispatched what we were commanded to: at length the boatswain commanded the relator John Watts on shore, to the first house to light our match, which we recovered out of the water, after it was extinct; which he readily obeyed: but before he was twenty rods from the water side,[9] he was seized on by two blacks (or rather tawny Moors),[10] and by them haled above half a mile up into the country, and thrown with great violence upon his belly, and so compelled to lie till they stripped him; and more company coming to them, they were so eager for his poor canvas apparel, that some they tore off, others they cut off, and with that several pieces of his flesh, to his intolerable pain: with these rags they made little children aprons to cover their privities: linen and woolen being very scarce there.

---

[1] David Northrup, Trade Without Rulers: Pre-Colonial Economic Development in South-Eastern Nigeria (Oxford: Clarendon, 1978), p. 38; Monday Efiong Noah, Old Calabar: The City-States and the Europeans (Uyo, Nigeria: Scholars' Press, 1980), pp. 38–39.

[2] Guinny Guinea, the general name applied by Europeans to much of the Western coast of equatorial Africa. The city of Calabar, known until this century as Old Calabar, is a seaport in what is now southeastern Nigeria.

[3] the Downs a famous roadstead, or sheltered area of water near a shore where ships may rest at anchor; in the English Channel off the town of Deal, in Kent.

The boatswain seeing this John Watts was thus carried away, was resolved with his other two companions to have him again, or else to venture all their lives for him. They arm themselves; but whilst they were consulting what to do, whether to venture on shore, or not, of a sudden they were beset with about a dozen men in several canoes, but they valiantly maintained their boat about the space of three hours, for after two of their three muskets were discharged, they defended themselves with their oars, and boat hooks. The boatswain received a mortal wound in his groin, and fell down in the boat; the other two adventured in the river, endeavouring by swimming to escape the merciless hands of cruel infidels; but the Negroes with their swift canoes soon overtook them, and brought them on shore to the place where the relator was. The Negroes took the boatswain out of the ship's boat; and instead of endeavouring at all to preserve life which remained in him, immediately they robbed him of it; one of them with a keen weapon cutting off his head before his companions' faces; and then they prepare for their rare banquet, while he was yet reeking in his blood: they in a barbarous manner cut off pieces of flesh from off his buttocks and his thighs and his arms and shoulders, and broiled them on the coals, and with a great deal of impatience eagerly eat it before their faces to our great astonishment.[1] About fourteen days after, one of the company fell sick, and instead of being physicians to cure him, they were his butchers to murther him. They served him as they did the boatswain, cut off his head, and broiled and eat up his flesh and rejoiced exceedingly at this rich banquet. About ten days after the third fell sick, whom they served in the same manner.

---

[1] the infamous "triangle trade" route: the ships transported slaves from West Africa to work on the plantations of the West Indies, then carried sugar and other commodities back to London.

[2] Richard Watts appears to be the boy's guardian; he indicates at the end of the narrative that he is the one who has prepared the pamphlet for the press.

[3] Gold Coast present-day Ghana.

[4] Bith of Guinny now the Bight of Biafra, in the Gulf of Guinea.

[5] Cross River…Parrot Island The geography is accurate.

[6] a peek usually "a peak"; still anchored, but with the anchor cable wound in sufficiently so that it forms a straight line with the forestay.

[7] Finger-sized copper bars were the standard currency in that area at the time.

[8] match for lighting the muskets.

[9] twenty rods 110 yards, or about 100 metres.

[10] blacks…tawny Moors The two terms were not clearly distinguished in the period (a confusion evident in debates about the race of Shakespeare's Othello). But while Moors did control much of the slave trade in the interior, the local population in Old Calabar were Efik, the Ibibio-speaking people who still inhabit southeastern Nigeria.

This was no small cause of sorrow to the relator: the thoughts of their inhumane and barbarous actions sometimes surrounded him with fears and sorrows, hourly expecting to taste of the said cruelty. Death did not seem so terrible to him as the violent manner of it; being left now alone in a strange country, destitute of friends or acquaintance, or anything that might keep up his spirits: die he would fain, but not by the hand of infidels and barbarous monsters. But the great God that is most compassionate in the greatest extremities had pity on him, and notwithstanding the alteration of the climate and the want of clothes, and the strangeness of his food which was only herbs, he continued in good health, and had time enough to lament this direful providence.

The natives who were daily expecting another banquet, met with a disappointment: either their customs or the over-ruling power of God would not suffer them to destroy him; he continuing still in health. Therefore they resolve to sell him: his Arauna or Master was pretty free to discourse him, which the relator was capable of, being about three years before in the West Indies, where he had learned the Tata language, which is easily attained being comprehended in a very few words, and all the Negroes speak of it.[2] He began to discourse his master to know the reason of their cruelty, who told him that he should rest himself contented, who if he were not sick, should not have his head cut off. In the boat which in the beginning they took with them, was a musket saved of the three which was not discharged; which his master some time after he had been with him, brought to him to know the use of it: he endeavoured as much as he could to make him apprehend the use of it, but still they professed their ignorance: but they commanded and threatened him to show the use of it. The fear of his master's displeasure and their inhumanity caused him to shoot it off; but the Negroes which expected some delightful thing were frustrated, and at the sudden noise and flash of fire (which they very much dread) ran from him, and were greatly affrighted; but quickly after hearing no more of that noise they came up to him again, and commanded him to do the like: he told them he had not powder which was the cause of the noise; but this would not satisfy these barbarians. He not being able to answer their expectation, they concluded he was not willing, they proceed to threaten him, and were about to murder him, had not his master rescued him. Upon discourse after with this Arauna or Master he began to understand the reason of their barbarous dealing with him and his friends, he telling him that naturally the people were civil and simply honest, but if provoked, full of revenge; and that this cruelty was occasioned by some unhandsome action of carrying a native away without their leave about a year before; they resolving if any came ashore they should never go off alive.

---

[1] While the practice of human sacrifice is well attested on this part of the African coast up to the nineteenth century, there is no other record or tradition of cannibalism; Watt's story here seems unlikely; Their... our an example of the use of both third and first person narration within the same sentence.

[2] Tata not identified. While most of the languages spoken in Western Africa belong to the Niger-Congo language family, this family comprises several sub-families which themselves contain numerous highly distinct languages. Watts seems to be referring to a kind of widely understood patois, though the ethnographic appendix (perhaps added by an editor) states that Tata is the language of Old Calabar. However, none of the words Watts provides can be associated with any language spoken in the Old Calabar region.

He had not been above seven weeks in the country, but his master presented him to his King,[1] whose name was E-fn-me King of the Buckamores, who immediately gave him to his daughter, whose name was Om-jah, and when the King went abroad he attended him also as his page, throughout the whole circuit of his dominions, which was not above twelve miles, yet boasting extremely of his power and strength, but glorying exceedingly that he had a white to attend him, whom he employed to carry his bow and arrows at several places remote from the seaside; the people would run away from him for fear, others would fall down and seem to worship him, and use those actions as they do to their God. Their progress was never so long but they could return home at night, but never without a handsome load of a cup of the creature. During all the time of the relator's servitude there, he never knew him [the King] go abroad and come home sober. They drink of the best palm wine, and another sort of strong liquor, called Penrore. The relator quickly knew how to humour this profound Prince, and if any of the natives abused him, upon his complaint he had redress, as once by striving with a negro his arm was broke, which by providence more than skill was set again.

After some months, the King of Ca-la-nanch whose name was E-fn-man-cha, hearing of this beautiful white, courted his neighbour Prince, that he would sell him to him; at length they struck a bargain, and the relator was sold for a cow and a goat; this King was a very sober and moderate person, free from treacheries and mischiefs, that the other was subject unto; and he would often discourse the relator, and ask him of his King and country, and if his kingdoms and dominions were as big as his, which were not above twenty-five miles in length and fifteen in breadth. He told him as much as his understanding and years made him capable of, keeping still in the bounds of modesty, and yet relating as much as possible to the honour and dignity of his sovereign; first informing him of the greatness of one of his kingdoms, the several shires and counties it contained, with number of its cities and towns and castles, and the strength of each, the infinite inhabitants, and valour of his subjects. One of these kingdoms was enough to amaze sufficiently this petty governor, that he need not to mention any more of his Majesty's glory and dignity. It put him into such a profound consternation, that he resolved to find out some way to tender his respects to this mighty prince, and no way could he find so convenient, as to tell the relator, that if he could find but a passage, he would let him go to England, to tell his Majesty of the great favour and respect he had for him. This did not a little rejoice our English man. Withal the King told him, that he would send him a present, which should be two cabareets or goats, which they do value at a very high rate; the King having not above 16 or 18. He tells the King, that the King of England had many thousands of his subjects, that were under the degree of gentlemen, which had a thousand of sheep apiece; the flesh of which, they valued at a very much higher rate than goats.

---

[1] his King As the narrative later describes, this and the other local kingdoms were small-scale: unlike the Ashanti, Fon and Yoruba west of the Niger river, most of the peoples of southeastern Nigeria, such as the Igbo and Ibibio, did not create large-scale kingdoms or federations.

Though our English man lived very handsomely with this E-fn-man-cha King of the Ca-la-nanch, yet his desires and his hopes were still for his native country: at length he obtained a promise from his King, that the first English ship that came into the road,[1] should have liberty to release or purchase him; this very much rejoiced his heart: now he thought every day a year, till he could hear of, or see some English ship arrived. Many times when he was alone, his heart would be oppressed with sighs and sobbings, when he thought of his relations, and the comfortable society that they had together; that it should be his unhappy fate to be captivated amongst barbarous infidels. Oftentimes did he walk down to the seaside, sometimes with hopes, sometimes with fear, earnestly expecting the winds of God's providence to blow in some English ship thither: his often recourse to the seaside was discerned by one Ja-ga a wizard, and the chiefest in three or four kingdoms thereabouts; they are persons that the natives give very much credit to, and on any difficult occasion run to them for satisfaction. That famous Delphean Oracle was never had in greater adoration,[2] than the prophetical speeches of these Moorish wizards. Though they have infinite numbers of them in every place, yet this Ja-ga had the most renown amongst them; and one day he comes to him, and very kindly asked him, why he so very often frequented that place; he told him, to see if he could discover any English vessel to come in there; but he being not unacquainted with his great fame, asked him when he did believe there would one come in, not that he was willing to give credit to any of their divinations, but supposing that he thereby should please him and answer his expectation. Ja-ga immediately told him that the fifteenth day after an English ship should come into the road. Then he asked him whether that ship should carry him away. To this he answered doubtfully, but told him that he should be offered to the master of the ship, and if they could not agree, but that he should come to shore again, he should not be sold, and that in a very short time after he should die for grief.

These fifteen days seemed very long and tedious; many a look did he cast on the sea with an aching heart: the fourteenth day he went to the highest hill thereabout, but to no purpose, for he could discover no ship: next morning he went again two or three times, but saw none: about two or three hours after came running into E-fn-man-cha, some of the Moors, and told him there was a canoe coming, so they called our ships, at which our English man heartily rejoiced, hoping then to be released forthwith, yet durst not show his joy for fear of punishment or of death; for though he lived better now than with his first master, yet his service was far worse than the slaves in Turkey, and their diet worse than dog's meat; therefore had he cause enough of inward joy; the ship came immediately in, and he hies away presently to Ja-ga, to know if it were an English ship, who resolved him that it was; it happened to be the St. Maloes, merchant, Captain Royden commander, who hastened to dispatch his business, took in his Negroes, and was ready to sail, and our English man heard never a word what should become of him, the King never offering to sell him; this put him on a resolution to endeavour to make an escape, and to that end had prepared a piece of timber which he had drawn near the water side, on which he intended to paddle to the ship, which then lay about a league from the shore. Just by the seaside, as he was about to launch his little floating stick, he espied a great alligator, which will devour a man at a mouthful; so this made him alter his resolution, and resolve rather to live with inhumane infidels than to throw himself into so imminent a danger, which would have been little less than self-murther. But the next day, which I may call a day of jubilee, Almighty God opened the heart of the King to let the poor English man go: he sent him in a canoe, placed between a negro's legs, with some others to guide this small vessel, for fear he should leap over-board, and swim to the ship. At a distance from the ship he hailed her in the English tongue, which was no small cause of admiration to those on board to hear an English tongue out of their canoes: the Negroes gave him leave to stand up and show himself to the Captain, to whom he gave an account how four were left there, and only he preserved. It was a pretty while before they could strike a bargain, though the Captain was resolved not to leave him behind. Several times the Negroes paddled away with their canoe, resolving not to part with him; but what with his entreaties and promises he persuaded them to the ship again, and they delivered him on board for forty-five copper bars and iron bars, each copper bar being about the bigness of a youth's little finger, the iron bars a little bigger.

---

[1] road roadstead (see note above).

[2] Delphean Oracle the oracle in the temple of Apollo at Delphi in ancient Greece, the most famous in the classical world.

Now were his joys completed, he thought himself, as it were caught up into the third heavens;[1] he could hardly persuade himself but it was a dream or vision, and that he did not really see English faces or embrace English bodies. It was some time before he could throw himself at the Captain's feet, and acknowledge his infinite cause of joy in himself, and thankfulness to him for his deliverance from such a severe captivity; that he that lately was a slave to infidels, that worship they know not what, should now see the faces of Christians, and join with them in worshipping the true God; and to him first he offered up the sacrifice of hearty thanksgiving, that had sent his angel to redeem him from so cruel a bondage. When he came on board, his hair was very long, and his skin tawny (Mulatto like) having gone naked all the time he was there, and frequently anointing himself with palm oil, he looked like a tawny-Moor; but immediately the seamen aboard with Christian-like hearts apparelled him. The master commanded to hoist sail, and having a fair wind, they sailed to Barbados, where Captain Royden was to tarry some time; but the relator earnestly desiring to go to his native country, and his relations, got passage to the Downs, in the Catharine of London, Captain South commander, which through God's goodness in a few weeks arrived in the Downs, where the relator was put on shore, to his uncle, Mr. Richard Watts of Deal, his great joy and satisfaction, who took this relation from his own mouth.

Having showed you how he was captivated, and some part of his trials and troubles, and also his deliverance and freedom; we will now speak of the People, and of their Country, as it was taken from his own mouth, which is no more than others have spoken formerly, who have been in the same Country.[2]

The People: The People are very careless, idle, sluggish, given wholly to ease; going stark naked (only some of their chiefest having a little apron to cover their nakedness), not exercising themselves either in work or play; free from having any tillage whatsoever (a small part only for tobacco, for their own use, excepted), having no thought for tomorrow. Their stature and bigness not near so big as our English.

Language: Their language is called the Tata language; it is contained in very few words, only so much as barely discovers their intentions: and is in part understood of all Negroes.

---

[1] third heavens Paradise; see II Corinthians 12:2.

[2] While several earlier writers provide brief accounts of the Guinea coast, the most detailed seventeenth-century English source is later: John Barbot's A Description of the Coasts of North and South Guinea (1732), a record of his travels there between 1678 and 1682.

The Country: The Country seems to be very fertile, overgrown with wood: sugar canes naturally grow there. He has been in most parts of the West Indies, yet he says, he never saw bigger nor more juicy than is there: the people lie secure as they think, but indeed lie very open, & are a prey to a handful of men. There are many bears (which are very good meat) which they often eat of, when they take pains to catch them. They have also hogs, beefs, deer and buffaloes, divers sort of good eating fowls, as cocks and hens, parrots, parakeets, & roots and several sorts of herbs, also palm-wine, which they have by cutting a top of a tree, then issues forth the wine: sap of wood, when 'tis burning. There is also very good fish; there is plenty of many things, they only want laborious persons to catch provision (for all are wild) and to cut down the woods: John Watts being much in the West Indies, and understanding the way to make sugar, invited them to learn, having such excellent juicy canes. But idleness would not hearken to so reasonable a request.

Their Provisions: Their provisions is Ebung, a root like a turnip, and as good and hearty as a potato; yams, plantains, palm oil, water and palm wine for drink; their flesh is elephants, wild boars, sows and pigs, deer, monkeys, baboons, dogs, &c; their fish is sea-cows and bulls, alligators, albacores, the catfish &c.

Their Weapons: Bows, arrows, and swords, they make of a piece of iron they steal from the English, and beat out with stones, which they neatly engrave: also they have a lance, which is also tipped at end with a piece of iron, and cut and engraved with flints, as they do their swords: very few of them have either lance or sword, many of them have swords of iron-wood, so called there. Their bow is about four foot long: their arrows about two foot and a quarter: their lance is about five foot long. These are the weapons they fight with, and with them do much mischief.

Of their Houses: Their houses are bigger or lesser, according to the family and number of wives every man enjoys (for every one hath liberty to have as many wives as he pleases; the ordinary men have two, three, or four; but the rich men and the King have many wives), set on scratches or posts covered with the leaves of a Membo (alias a Palm-wine) tree: the going in is very low (not above three foot high) and within, it is not six foot high: in this room is their fire kept day and night, their lodgings joining to this room: every wife hath her several house or lodging for her self and children, but all make use of this common fire, which is only for dressing of victuals; they have no occasion for a fire of any other use.

Of their Habit: The King and some great men have clouts as big as a sheet of large paper to cover their nakedness: so likewise the King's wives and great men's wives have a pilch or clout; but for the common people, they go stark naked, and are no more ashamed than brute beasts.

Of their God: They have no particular place of worship, neither do they congregate themselves, nor are there ministers, or in the least a talk of their God (but of fear of being beat by him) but like beasts rise out of their little lodgings, eat, drink and take their pleasures, and at night sleep again. He hath oftentimes heard them say, their God (which is the Devil) oftentimes appears to them in the likeness of a man, about two foot and a half high, as black as they are, whom they call Ajah (which is very strange that the Devil should give himself such a name, which is compounded of A and Jah, which is one of the names of God, as in Exodus: Jah is my name,[1] so Ajah being joined together, is as much as if the Devil should call himself without God, or against God. But for that the learned will tell you at ease, that with much study cannot be resolved by my pen). When any of them are sick, they go to the picture of their Ajah, and speak to it, then suddenly after he appears, as at other times: for when he appears in a human shape, he hath many copper bars about his loins, legs, neck, and arms, as the chief of them go with; then all presently worship him: then presently they kill dogs, goats, or chickens (but most commonly dogs) according as he commands, cutting off their heads, throwing the blood on the sick person, burning the bodies, and burying the heads and legs for a sacrifice to Ajah. If he recover, he takes three or four chickens and other things, and hangs them up alive by the legs over where he was sick, until they are dead; and when they are dead, he hangs them without his house at the top of a high pole, who that night are eaten up by the buzzards, and other wild fowl. If the sick man recover not, and if he be rich, they take several of his slaves before his face and behead them, and throw their blood on their master. These poor creatures think it a great honour that they may lose their lives for the recovery of their master's health.

If they die: If ordinary people be sick and like to die, they cut off their heads, and keep them above ground five days. But if a rich man be sick, they cut not off his head, but let him die naturally. And when five days are expired, they bury him with his copper bars about his neck, waist, arms, and legs, as they usually go, burying with him every sort of that household stuff they have, as a stool, an earthen pot, a calabash, a gourd, etc. and with him some of his servants' heads, sometimes three or four, sometimes ten or twelve, and this is a credit for the master, and an honour to the servant.[2] Into the grave is killed and thrown in several goats, chickens, and other provisions, according to the number of the persons therein; for their Ajah persuades them they go into a far country, where there is all necessaries and all riches, and that this provision is to eat by the way for the gentleman and his men that are buried. But when once they come there, they shall have all whatever they desire.

Of their king: He knows not whether the King be hereditary or elective. This he observed in both Kingdoms, that every morning the young maidens of the town where the King lives, wait for the King's rising at his house or palace, which is larger and handsomer than any of theirs, because he has more wives; when he comes out they keep continual bowing with their heads and bodies to him for the space of eight or ten minutes, saying, Aa, eera, and clap their hands; which words, Aa is how do you, and eera is thanks for his health; he all the time saying Aa, or how do you. The whole people are as serviceable to their King, as we are to our Sovereign.

Slaves: The slaves they sell to the English are prisoners taken in war: the Kings war much against one another.[3] They have no holds, castles, nor prisons; but for keeping those they have taken, until the next ship comes in, with withes[4] they fasten them to a pole, that they cannot untie themselves, and get home. They are also persuaded that they go to help that King to fight against his enemy, and that they shall live idly, and eat good victuals, drink good liquor, and have clothes, and that the King will give them great rewards. But if half were performed that is promised, they would be more ready to go, than we to fetch them.

---

[1] one of the names of God See Exodus 6:3, Psalm 68:4.

[2] a custom still practised in the area until the mid nineteenth century, when the Efik abolished it.

[3] The slaves they sell to the English European traders rarely collected slaves themselves (it was not worth their time), and did not even travel inland beyond the coast until long after the overseas trade had ended. Internal wars, raids, and kidnaping by other natives were likely the most common sources of slaves, though there is considerable evidence for later periods that enslavement also served as a judicial punishment, as Watts claims later in this section. Watts might also be making a distinction between "the slaves they sell to the English" and those who remained as part of the domestic slave trade, which continued in the area through to the early twentieth century.

[4] withes strong, supple twigs, like willow (OED withe sb 1).

How Ajah uses them: He oftentimes heard them cry out in the night, making a very great screeching noise, and lamentable cry, three or four hours together; and that is when they do not please Ajah, or he takes an occasion against them, for he keeps them as slaves. Next day they bemoan themselves to themselves, for if they complain one to another, then he beats and pinches them worse than before. They told him oftentimes that Ajah appears to them in several shapes, and very oftentimes fears them, he comes so ugly; but most times he comes in their own shape, with copper bars, as aforesaid.

Their Birth: There is no more compassion, nor care taken on them, or for them that are big with child, than there is England for their sows, cows, sheep, &c. (no nor so much), and when delivered, they take as little care of their children; for as soon as they are born, their mother fetches water, and with her hand puts it in their nostrils till they are almost strangled, then they take them up by the heels, their head downwards, for the water to run away; then they lay them on the ground, where after they have cried their fill, they fall asleep: this is all they have the first four and twenty hours. If they be poor women, they tie their children at their backs, and go to work.

Their Marriages: If a man and a maid agree, and resolve to be betrothed (for 'tis certainly reported, widows there never marry) they go before several persons, one whereof is the King, or a great man, and cut each other's wrist with a flint stone, and suck each other's blood, and this is their marriage, and that knot there with them cannot be broken.

Of a Whore: If a woman be taken in whoredom, they carry her to an ants' nest (which there is bigger than a bushel, and hang in trees in a bunch like bees): under the ants they tie her fast with withes, then with a pole shake down the nest on her; where they keep her about half an hour, in which time she is almost stung to death: then they carry her to a fire, and heat her back, and also cut at least ten gashes in it, that she may be known: then for the next fault her husband sells her.[1]

A Scold: If a wife scold with any of her neighbours, or with her husband's other wives, and she be abusive, especially if she strikes, and he see it or have good evidence, he takes the scold, and cuts a cross in her shoulder about four inches long, and if she commit the like fault, he sells her. Thus they take occasion to sell their wives, children, and servants.

A Thief: Though they generally are thieves themselves when they come into our ships, yet they are severer against thieves in their own country by blows, and for the second fault sell them.

Wounds: If any be wounded, they knock the wound, and cut round about it, and that is all the remedy.

Rain: The rains come every full moon, which they call a year (for the moon is their governor for almost everything), but once in three or four moons it happens that so much water comes from the hills that it comes close to their towns, and oftentimes does mischief.

---

[1] Evidence from later periods indicates that slavery did function as a form of judicial punishment.

A Canoe: A canoe is their boat, which is the body of a tree, which they cut hollow, somewhat like unto one of our hog troughs.

Dressing of Victuals: They are very subject to their own humour, and will not be taught; he would have showed them how to dress their victuals, but they would not learn, saying, as for flesh, if it were little more than hot through, it were enough: so also they eat their herbs and fish: as for salt, he never saw any there.

—1672

The Gentlewoman's Companion

1673

The Gentlewoman's Companion, a domestic advice manual and an early example of conduct literature, was first published in 1673. Hannah Woolley was identified on the title page and in subsequent pages as its author. Little is known of Hannah Woolley's parentage or early life. In 1647, she was married to Benjamin Woolley, master of the free school at Newport, and resided in Essex. The couple had four sons. When the family moved to Hackney in 1655, she managed the domestic affairs of her husband's boarding school. Widowed by Woolley, Hannah married Francis Challinor of St. Margaret's, Westminster in 1666.

Woolley published a series of books of recipes and domestic advice manuals, among them The Lady's Directory (1661), The Cook's Guide (1664), The Queen-like Closet (1671), and The Lady's Delight (1672). However, in A Supplement To the Queen-like Closet, Woolley objects to a book which has been published under her name, a work which she claims contains a false biography. She likely refers to The Gentlewoman's Companion which sets forth an account of her supposed early life.

The Gentlewoman's Companion not only includes principles of domestic management and a series of recipes as do her earlier works, but contains substantial counsel on social deportment and conduct. In the Epistle Dedicatory, the book is promoted as "a universal companion and guide to the female sex, in all relations, companies, conditions, and state of life even from childhood down to old age; and from the lady at the Court to the cook-maid in the country." The Gentlewoman's Companion seeks to define for its readers the proper role of gentlewomen in English society. Regardless of its authorship, The Gentlewoman's Companion is an entertaining account of the education and occupations of middle-class women in Restoration England. The date of Woolley's death is unknown.

The Gentlewoman's Companion; Or, a Guide to the Female Sex:

The Introduction

The right education of the female sex, as it is in a manner everywhere neglected, so it ought to be generally lamented. Most in this depraved later age think a woman learned and wise enough if she can distinguish her husband's bed from another's. Certainly man's soul cannot boast of a more sublime original than ours; they had equally their efflux from the same eternal immensity, and therefore capable of the same improvement by good education.[1] Vain man is apt to think we were merely intended for the world's propagation, and to keep its human inhabitants sweet and clean; but, by their leaves, had we the same literature, he would find our brains as fruitful as our bodies. Hence I am induced to believe, we are debarred from the knowledge of human learning, lest our pregnant wits should rival the towering conceits of our insulting lords and masters.[1]

---

[1] they had equally...eternal immensity Their souls emanated from the same divine source (OED efflux sb 4 concr). Compare Henry More's "all our souls are free effluxes from his essence" (Psychozoia Pref.). Likely it is an allusion to Agrippa's De nobilitate et praecellentia foeminei sexus: "God the Creator of all things, in whom the plenitude of both sexes dwells, both made man like himself: male and female created he them...Therefore there is no preeminence of nobility (between man and women, by the essence of the soul)" (trans. Edward Fleetwood, 1652).

Pardon the severity of this expression, since I intend not thereby to infuse bitter rebellion into the sweet blood of females; for know, I would have all such as are entered into the honourable state of matrimony to be loyal and loving subjects to their lawful (though lording) husbands. I cannot but complain of, and must condemn the great negligence of parents in letting the fertile ground of their daughters lie fallow, yet send the barren noddles of their sons to the university where they stay for no other purpose than to fill their empty sconces with idle notions to make a noise in the country.[2]

. . . .

What Qualifications Best Become and are Most Suitable to a Gentlewoman

I have already endeavoured to prove, that though nature hath differed mankind into sexes, yet she never intended any great difference in the intellect. This will evidently appear not only from those many arguments learned Cornelius Agrippa hath laid down in a particular treatise for the vindication of the excellency of the female-sex, but likewise from the many learned and incomparable writings of famous women, ancient and modern, particularly Anna Comnena, who wrote the Eastern History in Greek, a large folio.[3] Nor can we without great ingratitude forget the memory of that most ingenious Dutch lady Anna Maria Schurman, who was so much admired by the greatest scholars in Europe for her unparalleled, natural and acquired parts, that there were very few (as the great Salmasius, etc.) who did not frequently correspond with her by letters.[4] Her Opuscula or smaller works are now extant, printed in Holland in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, in which there is a small tract, proving that a woman's capacity is no way inferior to man's in the reception of any sort of learning; and therefore exhorts all parents who are not much necessitated, not to let their children spin away their precious time, or pore on a sampler, till they have pricked out the date of their life;[5] but rather instruct them in the principles of those learned tongues, whereby they may at pleasure pick-lock the treasuries of knowledge contained in those languages, and adapt them for the conversation and discourse of most nations.

I need not go out of our native country to produce you examples of our own sex for your imitation and encouragement in treading the paths of learning. I shall forbear to speak of the incomparable worth and pregnant parts of some gentlewomen lately deceased, as Mrs. Philips the ingenious translatress of Pompey, etc. find what is extant of hers;[6] or her contemporaries will more at large express their matchless merit; nor shall I eulogize or praise the living, nominating any person, lest I be thought one partially addicted to flattery: Yet give me leave to say, I could instance not a few, who (to the glory of our sex, and the place of their nativity if occasion modestly required) would not blush to answer a capricious virtuoso in three of the most useful tongues spoken or understood, that is Latin, French, and Italian.

---

[1] pregnant fertile, inventive (OED pregnant a^2 II.3a,b).

[2] noddles heads as the seat of the mind, with a playful suggestion of dullness or emptiness (OED noddle sb^1 3); sconces a jocular term for the head, especially the crown of the head (OED sconce sb^2 arch).

[3] Cornelius Agrippa as cited above; Anna Comnena (1083–1153 C.E.), the daughter of Alexius I, Emperor of Constantinople, is considered the first female historian. Her work Alexias (ca. 1148) is a fifteen-volume history of her family, the Comneni.

[4] Anna Maria Schurman also referred to as Anna Maria van Schurman (1607–1678). She was a Dutch scholar of international reputation. Opuscula (1648) is the collection of her theological and philosophical works. Schurman defended the education of women in A Friendly Discourse Between Anna Maria Schurman and A. Rivetus Concerning the Capacity of Women for Scholarly Pursuits (1638), as she did in The Learned Maid; or, Whether a Maid may be a Scholar? (1641), translated into English by Clement Barksdale in 1659.

[5] sampler a piece of canvas embroidered by a girl as a specimen of her skill (OED sampler sb^1 3b).

[6] Mrs. Philips... Pompey Katherine Philips (1632–1664) translated Corneille's La Mort de Pompeé into English verse and adapted it for the stage in 1663. Her poems and translations were published in 1667.

I desire not to hyperbolize; it is probable they may not be so expert in the anatomizing an insect, or the discovery of some monstrous production, as these Academical Wits are; yet for ought I know, may find out many monstrosities in their brain, whilst they are subtly plumbing the depth of their self-admired understanding.

Now since it may hence appear, ladies, that you have no Pygmean souls, but as capable of gigantic growth as of your male opponents; apply yourself to your grammar by time, and let your endeavours be indefatigable, and not to be tired in apprehending the first principles of the Latin tongue. I shall forbear to give you rules for attaining the perfect knowledge thereof, but leave you to that method your tutor or skillful governess shall propound for your observation.

I need not tell you the vast advantages that will accrue hereby, your own experience will better inform you hereafter. However, I shall hint some, as first, your understanding the Latin tongue will enable you to write and speak true and good English; next it will accommodate you with an eloquent style in speaking, and afford you matter for any discourse: lastly, you will be freed from the fear of rencountering such who make it their business to ransack a new world of words to find out what are long and obscure;[1] not regarding how insignificant they carry a rattling sound with them. Thus these fops of rhetoric, spawns of non-intelligency, will venture the spraining of their tongues, and splay-footing of their own mouths, if they can but cramp a young gentlewoman's intellect.[2]

. . . .

Of the Government of the Eye

As prudence is the eye of the soul, so discretion is the apple of that eye but as for the natural eyes, they are the casements of the soul, the windows of reason: as they are the inlets of understanding, so they are the outlets or discoverers of many inward corruptions. A wanton eye is the truest evidence of a wandering and distracted mind. As by them you ought not to betray to others' view, your imperfections within; so be not betrayed by their means, by vain objects without: This made the princely prophet pray so earnestly, Lord turn away my eyes from vanity.[3] And hence appears our misery, that those eyes which should be the cisterns of sorrow, limbecks of contrition, should become the lodges of lust, and portals of our perdition.[4] That those which were given us for our assistants, should become our assassinates.

An unclean eye, is the messenger of an unclean heart; wherefore confine the one, and it will be a means to rectify the other. There are many objects a wandering eye finds out, whereon to vent the disposition of her corrupt heart.

The ambitious eye makes honour her object, wherewith she torments herself, both in aspiring to what she cannot enjoy; as likewise, in seeing another enjoy that whereto herself did aspire. The covetous makes wealth her object; which she obtains with toil, enjoys with fear, foregoes with grief; for being got, they load her; loved, they foil her; lost, they gall her. The envious makes her neighbour's flourishing condition her object; she cannot but look on it; looking, pine and repine at it; and by repining, with envy, murders her quiet and contentment. The loose or lascivious makes beauty her object; and with a leering look, or wanton glance, while she throweth out her lure to catch others, she becomes caught herself.

---

[1] rencountering encountering a person in a hostile fashion (OED rencounter v 1 trans).

[2] fops pretenders to wit, wisdom or accomplishments (OED fop sb 2); splay-footing slanting or sprawling (OED splay adv Aa,Bb; splay-foot 3).

[3] Lord turn…from vanity Psalm 119:37.

[4] limbecks apparatus formerly used in distilling (OED alembic).

Gentlewomen, I am not insensible, that you frequent places of eminency for resort, which cannot but offer to your view variety of pleasing objects. Nay, there where nothing but chaste thoughts, staid looks, and modest desires, should harbour, are too commonly loose thoughts, light looks, and licentious desires in especial honour. The means to prevent this malady, which like a spreading canker disperseth itself in all societies, is to abate your esteem for any earthly object. Do you admire the comeliness of any creature? Remove your eye from thence, and bestow it on the contemplation of the super-excellency of your Creator.

Put a check to the straggling disposition of your eyes, lest Dinah-like, by straying abroad you are in danger of ravishing.[1] Now to preserve purity of heart, you must observe a vigilancy over every sense; where, if the eye which is the light of the body be not well disposed, the rest of the senses cannot choose but be much darkened. Be assured, there is no one sense that more distempers the harmony of the mind, nor prospect of the soul, than this window of the body. It may be said to open ever to the raven, but seldom to the dove.[2] Roving affections, it easily conveys to the heart; but dove-like innocence, it rarely retains in the breast. The very frame of your eyes may sufficiently inform you how to govern and guide them. For it is observed by the most curious occultists, that whereas all irrational creatures have but four muscles to turn their eyes round about; man alone hath a fifth to draw his eyes up to heaven. Do not then depress your eyes, as if earth were the center of their happiness, but on heaven the haven of their bliss after earth. To conclude, so order and dispose your looks, that censure may not tax them with lightness, nor an amorous glance impeach you of wantonness. Send not forth a tempting eye to take another; nor entertain a tempting look darting from another. Take not; nor be taken. To become a prey to others, will enslave you, to make a prey of others will transport you. Look then upward, where the more you look, you shall like; the longer you live, you shall love. From the management of the eyes let us next proceed to speech.

OF SPEECH AND COMPLEMENT

The eye entertains itself not with more objects than the invention furnishes the tongue with subjects; and as without speech, no society can subsist; so by it we express what we are; as vessels discover themselves best by the sound. Let discretion make opportunity her anvil, whereon to fashion a seasonable discourse; otherwise, though you speak much, you discourse little.

It is true (ladies) your tongues are held your defensive armour, but you never detract more from your honour than when you give too much liberty to that slippery glib member. That ivory guard or garrison, which impales your tongue, doth caution and instruct you, to put a restraint on your speech. In much talk you must of necessity commit much error, as least it leaves some tincture of vain-glory, which proclaims the proud heart from whence it proceeded, or some taste of scurrility, which displays the wanton heart from whence it streamed.[1]

---

[1] Dinah-like When Dinah, the only named sister of the twelve sons of Jacob, "went out to see the daughters of the land" (Shalem), she was raped by Shechem, a Hivite, who then sought to marry her. To avenge the rape, her brothers Simeon and Levi killed Shechem and all the males residents of Shalem (Genesis 34:1–31).

[2] raven…dove The raven, believed mischievous and thievish, was popularly regarded as a bird of evil omen and mysterious character (OED). In biblical tradition, the dove symbolizes purity, peace and reconciliation. It is often identified with the Holy Spirit.

A well-disposed mind will not deliver anything till it hath rightly conceived; but its expressions are always prepared by a well-seasoned deliberation. Think not I would have you altogether silent (ladies) in company, for that is misbecoming error on the other side; but I would have you when you do speak, to do it knowingly and opportunely.

A saying of a philosopher will not be unworthy of your commemoration, who seeing a silent guest at a public feast, used the words, If thou beest wise, thou art a fool; if a fool, thou art wise in holding thy peace. For as propriety of speech affords no less profit than delight to the hearer, so it argues discretion in the speaker.

By the way, let me advise you never to tie yourself so strictly to elegancy, or ornament; as by outward trimming, the internal worth of right understanding should be altogether forgotten, and so your expressions savour of some absurd impertinency. This were to prefer the rind before the pith, and the sound of words before solid reason.[2]

That excellent precept of Ecclesiasticus, though it was spoken in general yet I know not to whom it is more particularly useful than to young women.[3] Thou that art young, speak, if need be, and yet scarcely when thou art twice asked. Comprehend much in few words; in many, be as one that is ignorant; be as one that understandeth, and yet hold thy tongue.

Volubility of tongue in these, argues either rudeness of breeding, or boldness of expression. Gentlewomen, it will best become ye, whose generous education hath estranged ye from the first, and whose modest disposition hath weaned ye from the last, in public society to observe, rather than discourse; especially among elderly matrons to whom you owe a civil reverence, and therefore ought to tip your tongue with silence.

Silence in a woman is a moving-rhetoric, winning most, when in words it wooeth least. If opportunity give your sex argument of discourse, let it neither taste of affectation, for that were servile;[4] nor touch upon any wanton relation, for that were uncivil; nor anything above the sphere of your proper concern, for that were unequal. This will make your discourse generally acceptable, and free you from prejudicate censure.[5]

OF WANTON SONGS, AND IDLE BALLADS

Let your prudence renounce a little pleasure for a great deal of danger. To take delight in an idle vain song without staining yourself with the obscenity of it, is a thing in my mind almost impossible; for wickedness enters insensibly by the ear into the soul, and what care soever we take to guard and defend ourselves, yet still it is a difficult task not to be tainted with the pleasing and alluring poison thereof.

Physicians endeavour to persuade the wiser sort of men, as well as ignorant and credulous women, that a mother fixing steadfastly her eye on a picture, she will secretly convey the complexion, or some other mark on the infant; from hence we may be induced to believe, that the lascivious and wanton expressions contained in some songs and ballads may have the same effect in our imagination, and do most frequently leave behind them some foul impressions in our spirits.

---

[1] tincture trace; fig. a stain or blemish (OED tincture sb 5b,3b); scurrility coarseness or indecency of language, esp. in invective and jesting.

[2] pith the central or inward part; hence, the essential part (OED pith sb 4).

[3] That excellent precept…to young women "The stroke of the whip maketh marks in the flesh; but the stroke of the tongue breaketh the bones. Many have fallen by the edge of the sword: But not so many as have fallen by the tongue" (Ecclesiasticus 28:17–18).

[4] affectation artificiality; hollow or false display (OED affectation 4,5).

[5] prejudicate censure being judged or condemned in advance.

The reading [of] these wanton things do heat by little and little; it insensibly takes away the horror and repugnancy you ought to have to evil; by this means you acquaint yourself so thoroughly with the image of vice, that afterwards you fear it not though you meet with vice itself.

Licentiousness is not bred in a moment, at one and the same instant; so the contagion of loose songs seizeth by degrees on the heart; they may be said to work on the minds of youth as seed in the ground, it first appears only above the surface of the earth, but every day afterwards adds to its growth till it be fit for the sickle.

Nay more, these songs of wantonness will breed in you a more fitting boldness, which will put you on the confidence of practicing what you read or sing. Assure yourself, if you admit of a familiarity with these things, your innocency will be in daily danger.

You may easily believe this to be truth, if you consider the multiplicity of vanity and trumpery which stuff these ballads; how an amorous or rather foolishly-fond virgin forsook kindred and country, to run after a stranger and her lover. In another you find how craftily two lovers had plotted their private meetings to prosecute their unlawful enjoyments; and the letters that pass between for the continuation of their affection; which straight-ways makes the reader up to the ears in love. In the one is expressed the constancy of two fools one to the other; in the other, what trouble, what hazard, and what not, they run into, to ruin themselves, distract their parents, and leave a stain on their own reputations, never to be washed out.

These are the things which contain cunning lessons to learn the younger sort to sin more wittily;[1] and therefore no judicious person can comprehend with what reason these dangerous songs and sonnets be justified.

. . . .

What Recreations and Pleasures are Most Fitting and Proper for Young Gentlewomen

Recreations which are most proper and suitable to ladies, may be ranked under four principle heads, music, dancing, limning and reading.[2] Of dancing I have already lightly treated on in the directions for your deportment at balls; however, this I will say further on it, that though the Romans had no very great esteem for it, as it may appear by Sallust's speaking of Sempronia, she danced better than became a virtuous lady;[3] yet the mode and humour of these times look upon it not only as a generous and becoming property, but look upon gentility ill-bred if not thoroughly acquainted therewith;[4] and to speak the truth it is the best and readiest way to put the body into graceful posture; behaviour must of necessity halt without it; and how will you blush when you come into a mixed society, where each person strives to show her utmost art and skill in dancing, and you for the want thereof must stand still and appear like one whose body was well framed but wanted motion, or a soul to actuate it.[5]

In the next place, music is without doubt an excellent quality; the ancient philosophers were of the opinion, that souls were made of harmony and that that man or woman could not be virtuously inclined who loved not music;[1] wherefore without it a lady or gentlewoman can hardly be said to be absolutely accomplished.

---

[1] learn teach (OED learn v II.4).

[2] limning painting, especially in water-colour or tempera (OED limning vbl sb 2).

[3] Salust's speaking of Sempronia Gaius Sallustius Crispus (ca. 86–35 B.C.E.) writes that though Sempronia was favoured with fortune, beauty and "a high degree of wit and charm," she was "able to play the lyre and dance more skillfully than an honest women need" and readily engaged in fraud, murder and sexual abandonment (Bellum Catilinae xxiiii–xxv).

[4] property attribute (OED property sb 5).

[5] want lack (OED want sb^2 2); actuate perform (OED actuate v 1).

Limning is an excellent qualification for a gentlewoman to exercise and please her fancy therein. There are many foreign ladies that are excellent artists herein; neither are there wanting examples enough in his majesty's three kingdoms of such gentlewomen, whose indefatigable industry in this laudable and ingenious art, may run parallel with such as make it their profession.

Some may add stage-plays as a proper recreation for gentlewomen; as to that (provided they have the consent of parents or governess) I shall leave them to make use of their own liberty, as they shall think convenient.

I am not ignorant that stage-plays have been much envied at,[2] and not without just cause, yet most certain it is, that by a wise use, and a right application of manythings we hear and see contained therein, we may meet with many excellent precepts for instruction, and sundry great examples for caution, and such notable passages, which being well applied (as what may not be perverted) will confer no small profit to the cautious and judicious hearers.[3] Edward the Sixth the reformer of the English Church, did so much approve of plays, that he appointed a courtier eminent for wit and fancy to be the chief officer in supervising, ordering and disposing what should be acted or represented before his majesty, which office at this time retains the name of Master of the Revels. Queen Elizabeth, that incomparable virtuous princess was pleased to term plays the harmless spenders of time, and largely contributed to the maintenance of the authors and actors of them.

But if the moderate recourse of gentlewomen to plays may be excused, certainly the daily and constant frequenting [of] them, is as much to be condemned.

There are an hundred divertisements harmless enough, which a young lady may find out, suitable to her inclination;[4] but give me leave to find out one for her which hath the attendance of profit as well as pleasure and that is reading.

Mistake me not; I mean the reading of books whose subjects are noble and honourable. There are some in these later days so stoical, that they will not allow any books to womankind, but such as may teach them to read, and the Bible. The most severe of them do willingly permit young gentlewomen to converse with wise and learned men; I know not then by what strange nicety they would keep them from reading their works. There are a sort of religious men in foreign parts, who do not debar the people from knowing there is a Bible; yet they prohibit them from looking into it.

I would fain ask these sour stoics what can be desired for the ornament of the mind, which is not largely contained and expressed in books? where virtue is to be seen in all her lovely and glorious dresses, and truth discovered in what manner soever it is desired. We may behold it in all its force, in the philosophers, with all its purity in faithful historians; with all its beauty and ornaments in golden-tongued orators, and ingenious poets.

In this pleasing variety (whatsoever your humour be) you may find matter for delectation and information.[5] Reading is of most exquisite and requisite use if for nothing but this, that these dumb teachers instruct impartially. Beauty, as well as royalty, is constantly attended with more flatterers than true informers. To discover and acknowledge their faults, it is necessary that they sometimes learn of the dead what the living either dare not or are loth to tell them. Books are the true discoverers of the mind's imperfections, as a glass the faults of their face, herein shall they find judges that cannot be corrupted with love or hate. The fair and the foul are both alike treated, having to do with such who have no other eyes but to put a difference between virtue and vice. In persuading you to read, I do not advise you should read all books; advise with persons of understanding in your choice of books, and fancy not their quantity but quality. For why should ye seek that in many which you may find in one? The sun, whilst in our hemisphere needs no other light but its own to illuminate the world. One book may serve for a library. The reading of few books, is not to be less knowing, but to be the less troubled.

---

[1] souls were made of harmony In Plato's Timaeus, the Demiurge brought the conflicting elements of Chaos into a harmony, proportion and unity modeled on his Idea of perfection. Into this body, circular in form and motion, he placed an invisible Soul, also circular in motion and numerically proportioned, which partook of reason and harmony.

[2] envied at disapproved of (OED envy v 2).

[3] I am not ignorant...judicious hearers In Renaissance anti-theatrical literature, stage-plays are considered socially disruptive and spiritually damning.

[4] divertisements diversions (OED divertisement arch 2).

[5] delectation delight (OED delectation).

—1675

Court Satire

Written by and for the members of London's fashionable society, Restoration court satires (contemporaries also used the terms "libels" and "lampoons") targeted the celebrities of the day—court personalities, political, literary, and theatrical figures. Like much coterie poetry of the seventeenth century, these poems customarily circulated in manuscript, passed around first on single sheets of paper and then subsequently copied into manuscript compilations. Most of these satires (hundreds survive of the thousands that were likely written) were not printed at the time. Most also were circulated without an author's name: in addition to the possibility that some courtier might decide to defend his honour by sword or hired thug, a poet could be sued for libel or charged under acts and proclamations that prohibited the circulation of manuscript political poems. While many Restoration satires do have authors' names attached to them in manuscript or print compilations, these attributions are frequently suspect.

The final five or six years of the reign of Charles II were the heyday for personal, as opposed to political, satire. The following anonymous satire on the ladies of the court appeared in the spring of 1682.

* * *

Satire

This way of writing I observed by some
Is introduced by an exordium, [1]
But I will leave to make all that ado,
And in plain English tell you who fucks who.

Grafton sets up for ogling and smart answers,
And lies with all her witty set of dancers; [2]
Her crop-eared lord, who is so brisk and airy,
Is managed by the Countess of Orrery. [3]

Lumley has Fox with nose as red as cherry,
And when they are alone, they are so merry! [4]
His younger brother, who's so famed for nonsense,
Has fucked, or will fuck, Williams, on my conscience. [5]

Poor Nelly all this while has ne'er a runion,
But folks complain that her breath stinks of onion.
Though she exposed her poor defunct Sir Carr,
She'd now be glad o'th' brother of Dunbar. [6]

Grey's wife has been so long kept out of town,
I fear she'll lose her so well gained renown;
'Tis a long time since she has had her arse filled,
Her husband is so frighted with this Sarsfield. [7]

Arundel, who is in lechery so knowing,
Finding that the earl's other eye was going,

---

[1] exordium introductory part, preamble (OED); satires ("this way of writing") were often prefaced with high-minded announcements of the poet's reformatory intentions.

[2] Grafton Isabella Bennet, Duchess of Grafton; married when still a child (she was still only fifteen the year this poem was written) to Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Grafton, the illegitimate son of Charles II and Barbara Villiers.

[3] Orrery Mary Boyle, Countess of Orrery, wife of Richard Boyle, statesman, soldier, and dramatist.

[4] Lumley Richard Lumley, at the time Baron Lumley and later first Earl of Scarborough; Fox Elizabeth Fox, wife of Charles Fox, Paymaster General of the army.

[5] younger brother Henry Lumley, wit and soldier; Williams Susannah, Lady Williams, widow of Sir John Williams.

[6] Nelly Nell Gwyn (1650–1687), actress and mistress of Charles II; she had dismissed the attentions of Sir Carr Scrope in 1678. William Constable, younger brother of Robert, Viscount Dunbar, was a notorious womaniser—the poet is implying desperation on Gwyn's part; runion penis.

[7] Grey's wife Mary Berkeley, wife of Ford Grey, Baron Grey of Werke, Whig politician; Captain Patrick Sarsfield challenged Grey to a duel for making an anti-Irish joke; Grey reported the challenge and Sarsfield was taken into custody—but escaped.

Took Hewitt in, who near her cunt did lurk,
On the occasion to fuck journey work,
Being told by Mrs. Jennings there's no doubt
That purblind eyes can never be swived out.[1]

Harriet will do the thing whate'er it cost her,
But first intends to get the sneaking Foster.[2]
Kate Villiers, as they say, has got the notion
To marry ere she puts her breech in motion.[3]

Vernon, to say the truth, 's a bouncing wench,[4]
She swears and fucks and all the while's so French!
What pity 'tis Wentworth should want a hero.
Oh, Mulgrave, 'twas not done like cavalero
To tantalize her with your lobcock tarse,
Then leave her, and but only clap her arse.[5]

Monmouth since Felton's dead is yet in doubt
On whom he shall bestow his single bout.[6]
Jack Gibbons says that Lansdown is the fittest,[7]
But Armstrong swears that Lawson is the prettiest,
Who, under the pretense to cure her cough,
Is roaring drunk each night with usquebaugh.[8]

To speak of Scarsdale is but loss of paper;
She's called a stinking whore in every satire;[9]
And all the writers have as far as able
Described the lewdness of Hyde's basset table.[10]

Dy tells her Aubrey, believe't who can,[11]
That woman may conceive without a man;
But when alone she gives her lust no check,
And Sidney 'tis must get the Lord Bulbeck.

Ogle's returned and will consider further
Who next she'll show her arse to for a murder.[12]
I'll say no more, but only this one thing:
All living creatures fuck, except the King.
—1682

---

[1] Arundel Mary Mordaunt, Countess of Arundel; her one-eyed lover was Charles Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury; his replacement was Sir George ("Beau") Hewitt; Mrs. Jennings Frances Jennings, organizer and abetter of court amours.

[2] Harriet Lady Henrietta Berkeley, Lord Grey's sister-in-law and mistress. She ran away from home in August 1682, reportedly to marry a man named Forrester.

[3] ere she puts her breech in motion before she gave birth. Katherine Villiers was a maid of honour to the Queen.

[4] Vernon Mary Kirke, wife of Sir Thomas Vernon. In the mid-1670s, she appears to have been mistress simultaneously to the Duke of York, the Duke of Monmouth, and the Earl of Mulgrave, and had fled to a nunnery in France after a duel was fought over her. She married Vernon, a man twice her age, in Paris in 1677.

[5] Wentworth Lady Henrietta Wentworth, maid of honour to the Duchess of York; Mulgrave John Sheffield, third Earl of Mulgrave, later first Duke of Buckingham and Normandy, soldier, politician, and writer, patron of Dryden and friend of Pope; lobcock tarse a large penis.

[6] Monmouth James Scott, Duke of Monmouth and Buccleuch, illegitimate son of Charles II, executed in 1685 for claiming succession to the throne; Lady Betty Felton died in 1681.

[7] Gibbons John Gibbons, a gentleman in the service of the Duke of Monmouth; Lansdowne Martha Osborne, wife of Charles Granville, Lord Lansdowne.

[8] Armstrong Sir Thomas Armstrong, friend of the Duke of Monmouth; Lawson probably Elizabeth Lawson, daughter of Sir John Lawson and rumoured to be an aspirant for the post of royal mistress; usquebaugh Irish whiskey.

[9] Scarsdale Mary Lewis, wife of Robert Leke, Earl of Scarsdale; another manuscript satire from about 1682 features the "famous Scarsdale."

[10] Hyde Henrietta Boyle, wife of Lawrence Hyde, son of Clarendon and later made first Earl of Rochester; basset a complicated card game, often played for very high stakes.

[11] Dy Diana Kirke, wife of Aubrey de Vere, Earl of Oxford; Sidney Henry Sidney, son of Robert Sidney, Earl of Leicester. Bulbeck was a barony in the Vere family: the implication is that the Earl's wife has given Sidney the responsibility for begetting an Oxford heir.

[12] Ogle Lady Elizabeth Percy (1667–1722), sole heiress to the last Earl of Northumberland, widow (at the age of thirteen) of Henry Cavendish, Earl of Ogle; she married Thomas Thynne in 1681 but fled to Holland before the marriage was consummated. Thynne was murdered by agents employed by a rival suitor in February 1682, and rumours of her complicity persisted for years.

The Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford

July 21, 1683

The Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford, Passed in Their Convocation, July 21, 1683, against Certain Pernicious Books and Damnable Doctrines, Destructive to the Sacred Persons of Princes, Their State and Government, and of All Humane Society [1]

Although the barbarous assassination lately enterprised against the person of his sacred majesty and his royal brother engage all our thoughts to reflect with utmost detestation and abhorrence of that execrable villainy, hateful to God and man, and pay our due acknowledgements to the divine providence which, by extraordinary methods, brought it to pass that the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord,[2] is not taken in the pit which was prepared for him, and that under his shadow we continue to live and enjoy the blessings of his government; yet, notwithstanding, we find it to be a necessary duty at this time to search into and lay open those impious doctrines which, having of late been studiously disseminated, gave rise and growth to these nefarious attempts, and pass upon them our solemn public censure and decree of condemnation.

Therefore, to the honour of the holy and undivided Trinity, the preservation of catholic truth in the church, and that the king's majesty may be secured from the attempts of open and bloody enemies and machinations of treacherous heretics and schismatics, we, the vice-chancellor, doctors, proctors and masters regent and not regent,[3] met in convocation in the accustomed manner, time and place, on Saturday, the 21 of July, in the year 1683, concerning certain propositions contained in divers books and writings, published in English and also in the Latin tongue, repugnant to the Holy Scriptures, decrees of councils, writings of the fathers, the faith and profession of the primitive church, and also destructive of the kingly government, the safety of His Majesty's person, the public peace, the laws of nature and bonds of human society, by our unanimous assent and consent have decreed and determined in manner and form following:

THE FIRST PROPOSITION
All civil authority is derived originally from the people.

THE SECOND
There is a mutual compact, tacit or express, between a prince and his subjects, and that if he perform not his duty, they are discharged from theirs.

---

[1] With this work compare Sir Roger L'Estrange, Considerations and Proposals in Order to the Regulation of the Press, 1663. The present work might be held to illustrate the truth of the description of Oxford as the home of lost causes; it also shows that fears occasioned by memories of the Civil War took a long time to die, not unnaturally in view of political history between 1660 and 1688. The citations in the document are not explained; they are not necessary to its understanding, and most are easily tracked down by anyone who has learned to do library research. A highly readable account of the relevant background history is the chapter "The Reigns of Terror, 1678–85" in G.M. Trevelyan, England under the Stuarts (London: Methuen, 1904 and many reprints).

[2] the breath of our nostrils See the headnote to Lancelot Andrewes.

[3] masters regent and not regent The masters regent are those with the status of M.A., holding university appointments, who normally have a voice in decision making; masters not regent are M.A.s who are privileged to vote on certain special occasions.

THE THIRD

That if lawful governors become tyrants, or govern otherwise than by the laws of God and man they ought to do, they forfeit the right they had unto their government.

Lex Rex; Buchanan, de Iure Regni; Vindiciae contra Tyrannos; Bellarmine, de Conciliis, de Pontifice; Milton; Goodwin; Baxter, H.C. [Holy Commonwealth].

*

THE FOURTH

The sovereignty of England is in the three estates, viz. king, lords and commons. The king has but a coordinate power, and may be overruled by the other two.

Lex Rex; Hunton, Of a Limited and Mixed Monarchy; Baxter, H.C.; Polit. Catechis.

*

THE FIFTH [1]

Birthright and proximity of blood give no title to rule or government, and it is lawful to preclude the next heir from his right of succession to the crown.

Lex Rex; Hunt's Postscript; Doleman's History of the Succession; Julian the Apostate; Mene Tekel.

*

THE SIXTH

It is lawful for subjects, without the consent and against the command of the supreme magistrate, to enter into leagues, covenants and associations for defence of themselves and their religion.

Solemn League and Covenant; Late Association.

*

THE SEVENTH

Self-preservation is the fundamental law of nature, and supersedes the obligation of all others whenever they stand in competition with it.

Hobbes, de Cive, Leviathan.

*

THE EIGHTH [2]

The doctrine of the Gospel concerning patient suffering of injuries is not inconsistent with violent resisting of the higher powers in case of persecution for religion.

Lex Rex; Julian Apostate; Apolog. R*elat.*

*

THE NINTH

There lies no obligations upon Christians to passive obedience when the prince commands anything against the laws of our country; and the primitive Christians chose rather to die than to resist because Christianity was not yet settled by the laws of the empire.

Julian Apostate.

*

THE TENTH

Possession and strength give a right to govern, and success in a cause or enterprise proclaims it to be lawful and just; to pursue it is to comply with the will of God, because it is to follow the conduct of his providence.

Hobbes; Owen's sermon before the regicides, Jan. 331, 1648[/9]; Baxter; Jenkins' Petition, Oct. 1651.

*

THE ELEVENTH

In the state of nature there is no difference between good and evil, right and wrong; the state of nature is a state of war in which every man has a right to all things.

THE TWELFTH

The foundation of civil authority is this natural right, which is not given but left [i.e. lent] to the supreme magistrate upon men's entering into societies; and not only a foreign invader but a domestic rebel puts himself again into a state of nature to be proceeded against, not as a subject, but an enemy, and consequently acquires by his rebellion the same right over the life of his prince as the prince for the most heinous crimes has over the life of his own subjects.

---

[1] This is clearly aimed at those who wished to exclude Charles I's brother James from the throne on account of his Roman Catholicism.

[2] This takes aim at a doctrine which foreshadows the "liberation theology" of the twentieth century.

THE THIRTEENTH
Every man, after his entering into a society, retains a right of defending himself against force, and cannot transfer that right to the commonwealth when he consents to that union whereby a commonwealth is made; and in case a great many men together have already resisted the commonwealth, for which every one of them expects death, they have liberty then to join together to assist and defend one another. Their bearing of arms subsequent to the first breach of their duty, though it be to maintain what they have done, is no new unjust act, and if it be only to defend their persons is not unjust at all.

THE FOURTEENTH
An oath superadds no obligation to [a] pact, and a pact obliges no farther than it is credited; and consequently if a prince gives any indication that he does not believe the promises of fealty and allegiance made by any of his subjects, they are thereby freed from their subjection; and, notwithstanding their pacts and oaths, may lawfully rebel against and destroy their sovereign.
Hobbes, de Cive, Leviathan.

*

THE FIFTEENTH
If a people that by oath and duty are obliged to a sovereign shall sinfully dispossess [him], and contrary to their covenants choose and covenant with another, they may be obliged by their later covenant, notwithstanding their former.
Baxter, H.C.

*

THE SIXTEENTH
All oaths are unlawful and contrary to the word of God.
Quakers.

*

THE SEVENTEENTH
An oath obliges not in the sense of the imposer, but the takers.
Sheriff's case.

*

THE EIGHTEENTH
Dominion is founded in grace.

THE NINETEENTH
The powers of this world are usurpations upon the prerogative of Jesus Christ; and it is the duty of God's people to destroy them in order to the setting Christ upon his throne.
Fifth-Monarchy Men.

*

THE TWENTIETH
The presbyterian government is the sceptre of Christ's kingdom, to which kings as well as others are bound to submit; and the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs, asserted by the church of England, is injurious to Christ, the sole king and head of his church.
Altare Damascenum; Apolog. R*elat.; Hist. Indulg.;* Cartwright; Travers.

*

THE TWENTY-FIRST
It is not lawful for superiors to impose anything in the worship of God that is not antecedently necessary.

THE TWENTY-SECOND
The duty of not offending a weak brother is inconsistent with all human authority of making laws concerning indifferent things.
Protestant Reconciler.

*

THE TWENTY-THIRD
Wicked kings and tyrants ought to be put to death; and if the judges and inferior magistrates will not do their office, the power of the sword devolves to the people. If the major part of the people refuse to exercise this power, then the ministers may excommunicate such a king; after which it is lawful for any of the subjects to kill him, as the people did Athaliah and Jehu Jezebel.

Buchanan; Knox; Goodman; Gilby; Jesuits.

*

THE TWENTY-FOURTH
After the sealing of the scripture-canon, the people of God in all ages are to expect new revelations for the rule of their actions (a); and it is lawful for a private man, having an inward motion from God, to kill a tyrant (b).[1]
(a) Quakers and other enthusiasts; (b) Goodman.

*

THE TWENTY-FIFTH
The example of Phineas is to us instead of a command, for what God has commanded or approved in one age must needs oblige in all.[2]
Goodman; Knox; Napthali.

*

THE TWENTY-SIXTH
King Charles the first was lawfully put to death, and his murderers were the blessed instruments of God's glory in their generation.
Milton; Goodwin; Owen.

*

THE TWENTY-SEVENTH
King Charles the first made war upon his parliament; and in such a case the king may not only be resisted, but ceases to be a king.
Baxter.

*

We decree, judge and declare all and every of these propositions to be false, seditious and impious; and most of them to be also heretical and blasphemous, infamous to Christian religion, and destruction of all government in church and state.

We further decree that the books which contain the aforesaid propositions and impious doctrines are fitted to deprave good manners, corrupt the minds of unwary men, stir up seditions and tumults, overthrow states and kingdoms, and lead to rebellion, murder of princes, and atheism itself. And therefore we interdict all members of the university from the reading [of] the said books, under the penalties in the statutes expressed. We also order the before-recited books to be publicly burnt by the hand of our marshal in the court of our schools.

Likewise we order that, in perpetual memory hereof, these our decrees shall be entered into the registry of our convocation; and that copies of them being communicated to the several colleges and halls within this university, they be there publicly affixed in the libraries, refectories, or other fit places, where they may be seen and read of all.

Lastly, we command and strictly enjoin all and singular readers, tutors, catechists, and others to whom the care and trust of institution of youth is committed that they diligently instruct and ground their scholars in that most necessary doctrine which, in a manner, is the badge and character of the church of England, of submitting to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake,[3] whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well; teaching that this submission and obedience is to be clear, absolute, and without exception of any state or order of men. Also that all supplications, prayers, intercessions and giving of thanks be made for all men, for the king, and all that are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty, for this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour. And in especial manner that they press and oblige them humbly to offer their most ardent and daily prayers at the throne of grace for the preservation of our sovereign lord King Charles from the attempts of open violence and secret machinations of perfidious traitors, that he, the Defender of the Faith, being safe under the defence of the Most High, may continue his reign on earth till he exchange it for that of a late and happy immortality.

---

[1] This is relevant to our understanding of Samson Agonistes.

[2] For Phineas, see Numbers 25; and Norman T. Burns, "'Then stood up Phinehas': Milton's Antinomianism, and Samson's," in Milton Studies 33: The Miltonic Samson, 1996.

[3] This is based on Romans 13:1: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God." This is a favourite text in the Elizabethan Homilies, designed to obtain civil obedience.

—1683

Index of First Lines

A broken ALTAR, Lord thy servant rears 363
A married state affords but little ease 1016
A sessions was held the other day 602
A Sudden sad mischance 1229
A sweet disorder in the dress 311
A ward, and still in bonds, one day 875
Accept, thou shrine of my dead saint! 354
Adieu dear object of my love's excess 1014
After thinking this fortnight of Whig and of Tory 1095
Ah Ben! 319
All human things are subject to decay 987
All Kings, and all their favorites 105
All sorts of men through various labours press 807
Am I mad, o noble Festus 224
Am I thus conquered? Have I lost the powers 232
Ancient person, for whom I 1164
And be in his brave court a glorious light 235
And burn, yet burning you will love the smart 235
And call ye this to utter what is just 20
And do they so? have they a sense 879
And now all nature seemed in love 75
And why an honoured ragged shirt, that shows 769
And why so coffin'd in this vile disguise 664
And why this vault and tomb? Alike we must 1011
As by the streams of Babylon 72
As I was walking forth one day 1227
As I was walking in the Mall of late 1181
As some brave admiral, in former war 1159
As the sweet sweat of roses in a still 115
As to th'Eternal often in anguishes 23
As virtuous men pass mildly away 112
As when the glorious magazine of light 1009
Ask me no more where Jove bestows 387
At court I met it, in clothes brave enough 147
At the round earth's imagined corners, blow 123
Avenge O Lord thy slaughtered saints, whose bones 522
Batter my heart, three person'd God; for you 124
Be from the Court of Love, and Reason torn 237
Be given to him who triumphs in his right 237
Because you have thrown off your prelate lord 523
Begin with Jove; then is the work half done 317
Behold these woods, and mark, my sweet 460
Ben do not leave the stage 459
Betwixt two ridges of plowed-land, lay Wat 887
Bid me to live, and I will live 315
Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears 108
Blest age! when ev'ry purling stream 1099
Brave infant of Saguntum, clear 157
Bright books! the perspectives to our weak sights 885
Bright Queen of Heaven! God's Virgin Spouse 883
Busy old fool, unruly Sun 106
But that which most I wonder at, which most 1088
But where they may return with honour's grace 236
By a bold people's stubborn arms oppressed 781
By all love's soft, yet mighty powers 1160
Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe 147
Can we not force from widowed poetry 385
Cherry-ripe, ripe, ripe, I cry 310
Christ is our Rock, who in a rock is lain 702
Chronos, Chronos, mend thy pace 1005
Clora, come view my soul, and tell 832
Cloyed with the torments of a tedious night 231
Come darkest night, becoming sorrow best 232
Come, leave the loathèd stage 160
Come, Madam, come, all rest my powers defy 117
Come, my Ardelia, to this bower 1011
Come, my Celia, let us prove 152
Come, my Lucasia, since we see 1010
Come sons of Summer, by whose toil 314
Come, spur away 457
Come thou, who art the Wine, and wit 318
Dear famish not what you yourself gave food 231
Dear friends, if you'll be ruled by me 1180
Death, who'ld not change prerogatives with thee 456
Death be not proud, though some have called thee 123
Dim, as the borrow'd beams of moon and stars 998
Do'st see how unregarded now 600
Dull and unthinking! had'st thou none but me 1184
Dull to my self, and almost dead to these 320
Each blessed lady that in virtue spends 76
Eternal God! maker of all 884
Excellent Brutus, of all human race 777

Except my heart which you bestowed before 238
Fair daffodils, we weep to see 317
Fair lovely maid, or if that title be 1110
Fair stood the wind for France 64
Fairfax, whose name in arms through Europe rings 524
False hope which feeds but to destroy, and spill 233
Farewell (sweet Cooke-ham) where I first obtained 93
Farewell dear babe, my heart's too much content 649
Farewell, rewards & Fairies 223
Farewell, thou child of my right hand, and joy 147
Farewell, too little and too lately known 1002
Farewell ye unsubstantial joys 1187
Father of lights! what sunny seed 882
Fight on brave soldiers for the cause 796
Follow your Saint, follow with accents sweet 71
For Godsake hold your tongue, and let me love 106
Forbear thou great good husband, little Ant 768
Fortune's darling, king's content 1234
Free from all fogs but shining fair, and clear 238
From the dull confines of the drooping West 320
From the hag and hungry goblin 1221
Gather ye Rose-buds while ye may 314
Get up, get up for shame, the blooming morn 311
Go, lovely rose! 498
Go, solitary wood, and henceforth be 460
God bless our good and gracious King 1166
Good and great God, can I not think of thee 152
Good princes must be pray'd for: for the bad 311
Good things, that come of course, far less do please 316
Graze on, my sheep; and let your souls defy 347
Had we but world enough, and time 834
Hail, old patrician trees, so great and good 784
Hail, Sister Springs 657
Happy insect, what can be 773
Happy is he, that from all business clear 159
Happy the man which, far from city care 455
Happy those early days! when I 877
Having been tenant long to a rich Lord 363
Hark how the Mower Damon sung 858
Hasten, great prince, unto thy British Isles 1009
Have I not blest Thee? Then go forth; nor fear 318
Have I renounc't my faith, or basely sold 222
Having interr'd her infant-birth 227
He first deceased; she for a little tried 75
He may our prophet, and our tutor prove 236
He that loves a rosy cheek 381
He that shuns love doth love himself the less 236
Hence loathèd Melancholy 510
Hence vain deluding joys 513
Here down my wearied limbs I'll lay 316
Here lies, to each her parents' ruth 147
Here lies Wise and Valiant Dust 671
Here, take again thy sack-cloth! and thank heaven 873
Here take no care, take here no care, my Muse 1190
His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might 235
Ho, brother Teague, dost hear de decree 1174
Holiness on the head 378
Holland, that scarce deserves the name of land 860
How blest be they then, who his favours prove 236
How fresh, O Lord, how sweet and clean 377
How happy is he born and taught 74
How like an Angel came I down! 1086
How sacred and how innocent 1012
How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth 520
How vainly men themselves amaze 855
How? Providence? and yet a Scottish crew? 667
I am a little world made cunningly 122
I am not eagle ey'd to face the Sun 701
I bless thee, Lord, because I grow 375
I can love both fair and brown 104
I can't, Celinda, say I love 1212
I did but prompt the age to quit their clogs 521
I did not live until this time 1012
I have lost, and lately, these 310
I know the ways of Learning; both the head 369
I know to whom I write. Here, I am sure 153
I language want, to dress my fancies in 890
I led my Silvia to a grove 1098
I made a posy, while the day ran by 371
I read of a Confessor, and a King 701
I sing of Brooks, of Blossoms, Birds, and Bowers 309
I struck the board, and cried, No more 376
I tell thee Dick, where I have been 597
I think not on the state, nor am concerned 1008
I travelled on, seeing the hill, where lay 375
I walked the other day (to spend my hour) 879
I was foretold, your rebel sex 380

I will enjoy thee now my Celia, come 382
I wonder by my troth, what thou, and I 103
I've touched each string, each muse I have invoked 1211
If all you boast of your great art be true 146
If ever Love had force in human breast? 234
If ever two were one, then surely we 648
If, friends, you would but now this place
accost 1176
If Love loves truth, then women do not love 72
If, my religion safe, I durst embrace 148
If poisonous minerals, and if that tree 123
In the hour of my distress 322
In pious times, ere priest-craft did begin 971
In sober mornings, do not thou rehearse 310
In secret place where once I stood 646
In his own age, Democritus could find 1004
In silent night when rest I took 649
In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn? 234
In what torn ship soever I embark 126
Incautious youth, why do'st thou so misplace 1179
Is to leave all, and take the thread of Love 235
It was a beauty that I saw 163
Joy of my life! while left me here 877
King of Glory, King of Peace 379
Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids 120
Ladies that guild the glittering Noon 671
Let him that will be free and keep his heart from care 71
Let Kings command, and do the best they may 318
Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this 125
Let me pour forth 109
Let the male poets their male Phoebus choose 1017
Like the vain curlings of the wat'ry maze 864
Like to the falling of a star 357
Like to the Indians, scorched with the sun 232
Long in thy shackles, liberty 766
Long time had Israel been disus'd from rest 1195
Lord, how can man preach thy eternal word? 367
Lord, Thou hast given me a cell 321
Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store 364
Love, a child, is ever crying 234
Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back 379
Love in fantastic triumph sat 1102
Love, leave to urge, thou know'st thou hast the hand 231
Love, Reason, Hate, did once bespeak 600
Love, thou art absolute sole lord 660
Luxurious man, to bring his vice in use 858
Man's life's a tragedy: his mother's womb 75
Mark but this flea, and mark in this 103
Me thought I passed through th' Idalian groves 78
Men that are safe and sure in all they do 155
Mourn, mourn, ye Muses, all your loss deplore 1108
Much wine had passed, with grave discourse 1161
My body being dead, my limbs unknown 1089
My contemplation dazzles in the End 1092
My God, I heard this day 370
My love is of a birth as rare 833
My mind to me a Kingdom is 1222
My mind was once the true survey 860
My muse, now happy, lay thy self to rest 238
Naked she lay, clasped in my longing arms 1160
Nature's lay idiot, I taught thee to love 115
New England. 640
Next heaven my vows to thee (O sacred Muse!) 1189
No: I'm unmoved: nor can thy charming muse 1212
No spring, nor summer beauty hath such grace 116
No worldling, no, tis not thy gold 388
Not that thy fair hand 1192
N*ow* is the time for mirth 313
Now that the winter's gone, the earth hath lost 388
Now you have freely given me leave to love 387
O God, why hast thou thus 21
O joys! Infinite sweetness! with what flowers 878
O Sacred Providence, who from end to end 372
O, who shall from this dungeon raise 857
Obliged by frequent visits of this man 829
Observe the weary birds ere night be done 1015
Of British beasts the Buck is king 1233
Of the first paradise there's nothing found 500
Of thee (kind boy) I ask no red and white 601
Oh Book! infinite sweetness! let my heart 366
Oh! for some honest lover's ghost 601
Oh, let me not serve so, as those men serve 114
Oh that I knew how all thy lights combine 366
Oh thou that swing'st upon the waving hair 765
Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one 125

One day the amorous Lysander 1104
Or come again 319
Our fleet divides, and straight the Dutch appear 967
Out upon it, I have loved 599
Poet and Saint! to thee alone are given 774
Philosophy the great and only heir 778
Phoebus make haste, the day's too long, be gone 648
Pray thee take care, that tak'st my book in hand 146
Prayer the Church's banquet, Angels' age 365
Prue, my dearest Maid, is sick 316
Quoth the Duchess of Cleveland to counselor Knight 1155
Reading my verses, I liked them so well 887
Sad was the morn', the sadder week began 1108
Sam. A little onward lend thy guiding hand 526
See how the archèd earth does here 840
See how the orient dew 856
See the chariot at hand here of Love 153
See! what a clouded Majesty! and eyes 767
See with what simplicity 837
Seest thou yonder craggy rock 1187
Shame is a bad attendant to a State 318
Should we go now a wandering, we should meet 872
Show me dear Christ, thy spouse, so bright and clear 125
Since I am coming to that holy room 127
Since it must be so 796
Since, O ye powers, ye have bestowed on me 1177
Since she whom I lov'd hath paid her last debt 124
Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part 66
Sith Cynthia is ascended to that rest 84
So angels love and all the rest is dross 1209
Some that have deeper digged love's mine than I 104
Some man unworthy to be possessor 107
Spew out thy filth, thy flesh abjure 1090
Spit in my face ye Jews, and pierce my side 123
Still to be neat, still to be dressed 162
Sure we have poets, that did never dream 748
Sweet, be not proud of those two eyes 311
Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright 369
Sweet, exclude me not, nor be divided 71
Sweet-Heart I come unto thee 1231
Take heed mine eyes, how you your looks do cast 233
Teach me, my God and King 378
Tell me not (sweet) I am unkind 765
That childish thoughts such joys inspire 1084
That shipwrecked vessel which th' Apostle bore 499
That thou hast kept thy love, increased thy will 149
That which her slender waist confined 498
The fleet Astronomer can bore 368
The forward youth that would appear 835
The glories of our blood and state 396
The highest things are easiest to be shown 1090
The many-headed Hydra, or the people 702
The merry world did on a day 371
The stately palace in which the Queen dwells 890
The wanton troopers riding by 838
Their name is Legion, grinning from afar 1210
There is a garden in her face 72
There is a thing which in the light 605
They are all gone into the world of light! 881
This book by any yet unread 650
This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint 122
This is the month, and this the happy morn 504
This little grave embraces 1234
This lovely sweet, and beauteous Fairy Queen 889
This morning, timely rapt with holy fire 148
This was a private crime; but you shall hear 1002
This way of writing I observed by some 1284
Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show 150
Thou hast begun well, Roe, which stand well too 149
Thou ill-formed offspring of my feeble brain 648
Though all thy gestures and discourses be 773
Though Clock 320
Through fear of sharp and bitter pain 1226
Though frost, and snow, locked from mine eyes 381
Through that pure Virgin-shrine 883
'Tis not that I am weary grown 1156
Tis the year's midnight, and it is the day's 112
Tis true (dear Ben:) thy just chastizing hand 385
To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name 161
To have lived eminent, in a degree 356
To sing of wars, of captains, and of kings 639
To the Hall, to the hall 795
Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house and I 149
'Twas nobly thought, and worthy-still 1210
Twice forty months of wedlock I did stay 1015
Twice or thrice had I loved thee 108

Twixt Kings and Subjects there's this mighty odds 310
Tyrant, why swell'st thou thus 19
Underneath this sable hearse 272
Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound 237
Upon the slippery tops of human state 787
Urge me no more to sing. I am not able 798
Vast bodies of philosophy 775
We are Diana's virgin-train 1188
Well may my Book come forth like Public Day 309
Well might the ancients deem a grove to be 1178
Well then; I now do plainly see 771
Well worth Predecessors, and Fathers by name 1223
Were I (who to my cost already am 1156
What can I do in poetry 317
What if this present were the world's last night? 124
What none, that dare in hand to take a pen 1167
What wouldst thou have? a King, a Lord, a Knight 701
When age hath made me what I am not now 457
When as in silks my Julia goes 321
When by thy scorn, O murdress, I am dead 103
When civil Fury first grew high 692
When ere the old Exchange of profit rings 346
When everyone to pleasing pastime hies 233
When first my lines of heav'nly joys made mention 371
When first thou didst entice to thee my heart 364
When for the thorns with which I long, too long 832
When God at first made man, 376
When I a Verse shall make 319
When I beheld the poet blind, yet bold 870
When I consider how my light is spent 522
When I survey the bright 463
When Love with unconfined wings 768
When my devotions could not pierce 367
When my grave is broke up again 113
When night's black mantle could most darkness prove 230
When splendent Sol, which riseth in the East 400
When we for age could neither read nor write 502
When with the Virgin morning thou do'st rise 317
Whene'er the old exchange of profit rings 343
Where dost thou careless lie 156
Where, like a pillow on a bed 109
Where the remote Bermudas ride 863
While that my soul repairs to her devotion 366
Whilst happy I triumphant stood 1102
Whilst yet to prove 111
Who ere she be 654
Who knows, but beasts, as they do lie 887
Who says that fictions only and false hair 366
Whoever loves, if he do not propose 118
Why are we by all creatures waited on? 124
Why dost thou shade thy lovely face? O why 344
Why I tie about thy wrist 317
Why so pale and wan fond lover? 597
Why trouble you religion's sacred stream 702
Wilt thou forgive that sin where I begun 127
Within this sober frame expect 841
Woe, woe to them, who (by a ball of strife) 311
Would ye have fresh Cheese and Cream? 318
Ye have been fresh and green 316
Ye living lamps, by whose dear light 860
Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more 516
You brave heroic minds 63
You ladies all of merry England 1164
You meaner beauties of the night 74
You noble Diggers all, stand up now, stand up now 637
You, that will a wonder know 389
Young Coridon and Phillis 1096

Index of Authors and Titles

A Ballad. Upon a Wedding 597
A Barley-break 600
A Candle 605
A Character of King Charles II 1036
A Child 443
A Country Life 1012
A Declaration from the Poor Oppressed People of England 632
A Deposition from Love 380
A Dialogue between Old England and New 640
A Dialogue between the Soul and Body 857
A Discourse of Beasts 887
A Fair and Happy Milkmaid 219
A Farewell to Worldly Joys 1187
A Fiery Flying Roll and A Second Fiery Flying Roll (excerpts) 790
A Funeral Sermon 673
A Good Woman 218
A Hymn to Christ, at the Author's last going into Germany 126
A Hymn to God the Father 127
A Hymn to God my God, in my sickness 127
A Hymn to the Name and Honour of the Admirable Saint Teresa 660
A Looking-Glass for Men and Maids 1228
A Married State 1016
A Muzzle for Melastomus 397
A Nocturnal Upon S. Lucy's Day Being the Shortest Day 112
A Pastoral Courtship 460
A Pindaric on the Death of our Late Sovereign 1108
A Pindaric, to the Athenian Society 1211
A Poetical Question concerning the Jacobites 1210
A Prisoner 220
A Proclamation and Declaration to Inform Our Loving Subjects 420
A Quiet Woman 16
A Rabble 699
A Ramble in St. James's Park 1161
A Rapture 382
A Remarkable Letter of Mary Howgill to Oliver Cromwell 901
A Retired Friendship, To Ardelia 1011
A Rhapsody 872
A Romance-Writer 698
A Satire Against Reason and Mankind 1156
A Satire on the Rebellion 798
A Sermon Preached Before The King's Majesty at Whitehall 5
A Song 387
A Song for St Cecilia's Day, 1687 1000
A Song of a Young Lady to her Ancient Lover 1164
A Speech to the Lords and Commons of the Parliament 67
A Surgeon 444
A Sweet and Pleasant Sonnet 1222
A Thanksgiving to God, for his House 321
A True Relation 1266
A Valediction of Weeping 109
A Valediction: forbidding Mourning 112
A Virgin Life 1177
A Vision of Beauty 163
A Wanton Woman 16
A Waterman 219
Aaron 378
Absalom and Achitophel 969
Advice to Charles II 358
Affliction (I) 364
Air and Angels 108
All Sorts of Men 807
An Answer to Master Ben. Jonson's Ode 459
An Atheist or Most Bad Man 15
An Elegy upon the Lady Venetia Digby 456
An Elegy Upon the Death of the Dean of Pauls, Dr. John Donne 385
An Epistle Answering to One that Asked to be Sealed of the Tribe 155
An Epistle to Master John Selden 153
An Essay to Revive the Ancient Education of Gentlewomen 425
An Essay Concerning Human Understanding Chapter XIX 1029
An Exequy to his Matchless never to be Forgotten Friend 354
An Horatian Ode Upon Cromwell's Return From Ireland 835

An Imitation of Horace Book I, Satyr IX 1181
An Injured Prince Vindicated 1167
An Invitation to my Friends at Cambridge 1176
An Ode for him. 319
An Ode to Master Anthony Stafford 457
An Ode. To Himself 156
An Ode upon a Question moved 227
An Unworthy Lawyer 16
And do they so? 879
ANDREWES, LANCELOT 5
Annus Mirabilis 967
Another 648
Aphorism Concerning The Interpretation of Nature and the Kingdom 47
Areopagitica 561
As by the streams of Babylon 72
Athenae Oxoniensis 1025
AUBREY, JOHN 923
BACON, FRANCIS 24
Ballads 1221
BARKER, JANE 1176
BEHN, APHRA 1098
Bermudas 863
BRADFORD, WILLIAM 290
BRADSTREET, ANNE 639
BRETON, NICHOLAS 15
Brief Lives 923
BROME, ALEXANDER 795
BROWNE, WILLIAM 272
BROWNE, SIR THOMAS 465
Brutus 777
BUNYAN, JOHN 953
BURNET, BISHOP 1149
BURTON, ROBERT 188
BUTLER, SAMUEL 692
CAMPION, THOMAS 70
CAREW, THOMAS 380
Casualties 316
CAVENDISH, WILLIAM, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE 358
CAVENDISH, MARGARET, DUCHESS OF NEWCASTLE 886
CCXI Sociable Letters 894
CHAMBERLAIN, JOHN 1
Charles I to Prince Rupert 1218
Cherry-Ripe 310
Church-monuments 366
CLARENDON, EDWARD HYDE, EARL OF 609
CLARKSON, LAWRENCE 713
Clerimont's Song 162
CLEVELAND, JOHN 664
CLIFFORD, ANNE 297
CLINTON, ELIZABETH, COUNTESS OF LINCOLN 183
Cloris' Charms Dissolved by Eudora 1192
Cock-Crowing 882
Confined Love 107
Considerations and Proposals 755
Cooper's Hill 748
COPPE, ABIEZER 790
CORBETT, RICHARD 222
Corinna's Going a Maying 311
Court Satire 1284
COWLEY, ABRAHAM 770
CRASHAW, RICHARD 654
Damon the Mower 858
DAVIES, LADY ELEANOR 273
De Morte 75
DEKKER, THOMAS 220
Delight in Disorder 311
DENHAM, SIR JOHN 748
Denial 367
Devotions: Upon Emergent Occasions 128
Diary of Cotton Mather 1199
Directions for Obedience to Government 286
Disdain Returned. 381
Ditties Lamentation for the Cruelty of this Age 1223
DONNE, JOHN 102
DRAYTON, MICHAEL 63
DRYDEN, JOHN
Duty to Tyrants 311
EARLE, JOHN 443
Easter Wings 364
Ecclesiastical Policy the Best Policy 1056
Eclogue VIII 347
EDWARD, LORD HERBERT OF CHERBURY 227
EDWARDS, THOMAS 407
Elegy VI 114
Elegy VII 115
Elegy VIII The Comparison 115
Elegy IX The Autumnal 116
Elegy XIX To His Mistress Going to Bed 117

Elegy [XVIII] Love's Progress 118
Emblem III (from Book III) 343
Emblem VII (from Book III) 344
Epigram III (from Book IV) 345
Epitaph 1234
Epitaph on the Duke of Buckingham 1234
Epitaph on the Earl of Strafford 671
Essays 25
EVANS, KATHERINE AND SARAH CHEEVERS 915
EVELYN, JOHN 800
Evensong 317
Extracts from the Preface to the Poems of 1656 772
Farewell to Love 111
FELL, MARGARET 704
FELLTHAM, OWEN 446
FILMER, SIR ROBERT 279
Flecknoe, an English Priest at Rome 829
Follow your Saint, follow with accents sweet 71
Fresh Cheese and Cream 318
Friendship's Mystery, To My Dearest Lucasia 1010
Gangraena (excerpts) 407
Go, Lovely Rose! 498
Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward 125
Good News from New England 390
Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (excerpt) 953
HABINGTON, WILLIAM 463
HALKETT, LADY ANNE 905
Her Triumph 153
Her Descending Down 890
HERBERT, GEORGE 363
HERRICK, ROBERT 309
His Prayer to Ben. Jonson 319
His Winding-Sheet 318
His Grange, or Private Wealth 320
His Litany, to the Holy Spirit 322
His Return to London 320
History of My Own Time 1149
History of Plymouth Plantation (excerpts) 290
HOBBES, THOMAS 239
HOBY, LADY MARGARET 97
Holy Sonnets 122
Holy Sonnets from the Westmoreland ms 124
HOWGILL, MARY 901
Hudibras 692
HUTCHINSON, LUCY 807
Hydriotaphia (excerpts) 489
I Language want 890
I walked the other day 879
If Love loves truth, then women do not love 72
Il Penseroso 513
Impromptu on Charles II 1166
In Memory of my Dear Grand-Child Elizabeth Bradstreet 649
In Praise of his Mistress 389
Information from the Scottish Nation 1235
Innocence 1088
Inviting a Friend to Supper 149
JAMES, ELINOR 1167
JAMES VI/I 67
John Evelyn to Sir Christopher Wren 1219
JOHNSON, ELIZABETH 1207
JONSON, BEN 146
Jordan (I) 366
Jordan (II) 371
Joy of my life! while left me here 877
Juvenal's Sixth Satire 1002
Juvenal's Tenth Satire 1004
KILLIGREW, ANNE 1187
KING CHARLES I 420
KING CHARLES II 965
KING, HENRY 354
L'Allegro 510
L'Envoy 379
L'ESTRANGE, SIR ROGER 755
LANEY, BENJAMIN 324
LANYER, AEMELIA 76
LAUD, WILLIAM 164
Let him that will be free and keep his heart from care 71
Letters 1
Letters 1217
Leviathan (excerpts) 239
Life 371
Lilli Burlero 1174
LOCKE, JOHN 1029
Love (III) 379
Love Letters by Mrs A. Behn 1111
Love's Alchemy 104
LOVELACE, RICHARD 764

Lycidas 516
Mac Flecknoe 987
MAKIN, BATHSUA 424
Man 370
MARVELL, ANDREW 829
MATHER, COTTON 1199
Matins, or Morning Prayer 317
Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson
(excerpts) 818
MILTON, JOHN 503
Mrs. James's Vindication of the Church of England 1168
My Opinion 1095
Nature's Pictures Drawn by Fancy's Pencil
to the Life 891
Nell Gwyn to (?) Laurence Hyde 1218
No ring, no Wedding 1231
Nox nocti indicat Scientiam 463
Of Love 28
Of Masques and Triumphs 44
Of My Self 787
Of Obscurity 785
Of Solitude 781
Of the Last Verses in the Book 502
Of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, and Toleration 589
Of Truth 25
Oldham, John 1181
Oliver Cromwell to Colonel Valentine Walton 1217
On a Bank as I Sat a-Fishing 75
On a Drop of Dew 856
On a Girdle 498
On a Juniper-Tree, Cut Down to Make Busks 1102
On a Picture Painted by Herself 1188
On himself 316
On his Mistress, the Queen of Bohemia 74
On Lucy, Countess of Bedford 148
On Mr. Milton's "Paradise Lose" 870
On My First Daughter 147
On My First Son 147
On Something that Walks Somewhere 147
On St. James's Park, As Lately Improved by
His Majesty 500
On the 3 of September, 1651 1009
On the Countess Dowager of Pembroke 272
On the Death of a Nightingale 460
On the Death of Mr. Crashaw 774
On the Death of the late Earl of Rochester 1106
On the Morning of Christ's Nativity 504
On The New Inn Ode. To Himself 160
On the New Forcers of Conscience under the Long Parliament 523
On the Numerous Access of the English to wait upon the King 1009
Orations of Diverse Sorts 893
Orinda Upon Little Hector Philips 1015
Orinda to Lucasia 1015
Orinda to Lucasia parting October 1661 at London 1014
OSBORNE, DOROTHY 937
Overburian Character 218
OVERTON, RICHARD 733
Pamphilia to Amphilanthus 230
Paradise 375
Patriarcha 279
Paul's Walk 445
PEPYS, SAMUEL 1047
PHILIPS, KATHERINE 1008
PHILO-PHILIPPA 1017
Philosophical Letters: or, Modest Reflections 899
Platonic Love 1209
Prayer (I) 365
Preface to the Reader 1207
Providence 372
Psalm 58 Si Vere Utique 20
Psalm 74 Ut Quid, Deus 21
Psalm 120 Ad Dominum 23
QUARLES, FRANCIS 343
QUEEN HENRIETTA MARIA 606
RADISSON, PIERRE-ESPRIT 1130
RANDOLPH, THOMAS 455
Redemption 363
Regeneration 875
Religio Medici (excerpts) 465
Religio Laici or A Layman's Faith 992
Resolves 446
ROWE, ELIZABETH SINGER ["PHILOMELA"] 1209
ROWLANDSON, MARY 1068
SACKVILLE, CHARLES EARL OF DORSET 1095
Saint Mary Magdalene or The Weeper 657

Salve Deus Rex Judæorum 84
Samson Agonistes 524
Satire 1284
Satire III 120
SAVILE, GEORGE, MARQUIS OF HALIFAX 1036
SEDLEY, SIR CHARLES 1096
Shame, no Statist 318
SHIRLEY, JAMES 396
Sic Vita 357
SIDNEY HERBERT, MARY 18
Signior Dildo 1164
Some Verses upon the Burning of Our House, July 10th, 1666 649
Song 597, 1155, 1160
Song "I Led my Silvia to a Grove" 1098
Song "Love Armed" 1102
Song To Celia 152
Sonnet I 600
Sonnet II 601
Sonnet III 601
Sonnet 7 520
Sonnet 12 On the detraction which followed upon my writing 521
Sonnet 15 On the Lord General Fairfax at the Siege of Colchester 524
Sonnet 18 On the Late Massacre in Piedmont 522
Sonnet 19 522
Sonnet 61 66
Sors Virgiliana 781
SOUTH, ROBERT 1056
SPEGHT, RACHEL 397
SPRAT, THOMAS 1080
SUCKLING, JOHN 596
Sweet, exclude me not, nor be divided 71
TAYLOR, JEREMY 673
The Altar 363
The Anabaptist 701
The Anatomy of Melancholy (excerpts) 188
The Anniversary 105
The Ant 768
The Anticipation 1092
The Apparition 103
The Argument of his Book 309
The Athenians' Answer 1210
The Author to Her Book 648
The Author's Dream to the Lady Mary 78
The Bad Season makes the Poet Sad 320
The Bloody Project 434
The Book 884
The Bracelet to Julia 317
The Canonization 106
The Character of a Happy Life 74
The Character of Holland 860
The Collar 376
The Common People 702
The Complaint of a Lover 1187
The Constant Lover 599
The Coronet 832
The Countess of Lincoln's Nursery (excerpts) 183
The Declaration of Breda 965
The Definition of Love 833
The Demonstration 1090
The Departure of the Good Daemon 317
The Description of Cooke-ham 93
The Diary of John Evelyn 800
The Diary of Lady Margaret Hoby 1599–1605 97
The Diary of Samuel Pepys Volume VII, 1666 1047
The Diary of... William Laud 164
The Difference Betwixt Kings and Subjects 310
The Diggers' Song 637
The Disabled Debauchee 1159
The Disappointment 1104
The Discontent 1190
The Distracted Puritan 224
The Dream 400
The Dumb Virgin: Or, The Force of Imagination 1116
The Ecstasy 109
The Elixir 378
The Fairies Farewell 223
The First Anniversary of the Government under His Highness 864
The Flea 103
The Flesh and the Spirit 646
The Flower 377
The Foreigners 1195
The Gallery 832
The Garden 855
The General Eclipse 671
The Gentlewoman's Companion (excerpts) 1276

The glories of our blood and state 396
The Golden Age. A Paraphrase on a Translation out of French 1099
The Good-Morrow 103
The Grasshopper 765, 773
The H. Scriptures I 366
The H. Scriptures II 366
The History of The Royal Society of London (excerpts) 1080
The Hock-cart, or Harvest home 314
The Holy Sepulchre 702
The Hunting of a Hare 887
The Imperfect Enjoyment 1160
The Indifferent 104
The Innocent Ill 773
The Instruction 1090
The Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford 1286
The King's Disguise 664
The King's Last Farewell to the World 1226
The Knole Diary (1603–1619) 298
The Knot 883
The Lady Eleanor Her Appeal 273
The Letters of Dorothy Osborne to Sir William Temple, 1652–54 937
The Levellers Rant 795
The Life and Times of Anthony à Wood (extracts) 1021
The Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon 609
The Life of Mrs. Lucy Hutchinson Written by Herself, A Fragment 808
The Lost Sheep Found 713
The Memoirs of Anne, Lady Halkett 905
The Morning-Watch 878
The Mower against Gardens 858
The Mower to the Glowworms 860
The Mower's Song 860
The New Illiterate Lay-Teachers 702
The New-Courtier 796
The Night 883
The Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn 838
The Pastime of the Queen of the Fairies 889
The Pearl. Matth. 13:45 369
The Philosophical and Physical Opinions 890
The Picture of Little T.C. in a Prospect of Flowers 837
The Pilgrim's Progress (excerpt) 959
The Pilgrimage 375
The Poetress's Hasty Resolution 887
The Power in the People 318
The Praises of a Country Life 159
The Preparative 1089
The Proceedings of the Council of State Against Richard Overton 734
The Prologue 639
The Prospect of a Landskip, Beginning with a Grove 1178
The Psalms of David Psalm 52 Quid Gloriaris? 19
The Pulley 376
The Putney Debates 1238
The Queen's Letter 606
The Queen's Letter Sent to the King's most excellent Majesty 607
The Quip 371
The Reason of Church Government (1641) 555
The Rebel Scot 667
The Relic 113
The Reply to Mr.—— 1212
The Retreat 877
The Royall health to the Rising Sun 1227
The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying 687
The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living 685
The Saints Encouragement 796
The Second Epode of Horace Translated 455
The second of my Prebend Sermons upon my five Psalms 132
The Second Rapture 388
The Secular Masque 1005
The Sovereignty and Goodness of God 1068
The Spring 388
The Study of Quiet, in Two Sermons 324
The Sun Rising 106
The Third Century 1083
The Trial of King Charles I 1261
The Windows 367
The Wish 771
The Wits 602
There is a garden in her face 72
They are all gone into the world of light! 881

This is a Short Relation of Some of the Cruel Sufferings 915
To a Lady that Desired I would Love her 387
To a Lady with Child that Asked an Old Shirt 769
To Alchemists 146
To All Virtuous Ladies in General 76
To Althea, From Prison 768
To Anthea, who may Command him Anything 315
To Ben Jonson 385
To Celinda 1212
To Daffodils 317
To Dianeme 311
To Heaven 152
To his Book 318
To his Books 885
To his Coy Mistress 834
To Live Merrily, and to Trust to Good Verses. 313
To Lucasta. From Prison 766
To Lucasta, Going to the Wars 765
To Meadows 316
To Mr. Hobbes 775
To my Worthy Friend Mr. Peter Lilly 767
To My Dear and Loving Husband 648
To My Dear Children 650
To My Excellent Lucasia, On Our Friendship 1012
To My Friends Against Poetry 1180
To My Young Lover 1179
To Penshurst 150
To Saxham 381
To Sir Henry Savile 148
To Sir Thomas Roe 149
To the Cambro-Britans, and their Harp 64
To the Excellent Orinda 1017
To the fair Clarinda 1110
To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of That Noble Pair 157
To the King and Queen, Upon Their Unhappy Distances 311
To the Memory of My Beloved, The Author, Mr William Shakespeare 161
To the Memory of Mr. Oldham 1002
To the Most Illustrious, and Most Hopeful Prince 309
To the Reader 146, 443, 596, 701
To the Royal Society 778
To the Same 149
To the Virginian Voyage 63
To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time 314
To the Virtuous Reader 83
To William Camden 147
Tom o' Bedlam 1221
TRAHERNE, THOMAS 1083
Travel Journal (Canadian Travels) (excerpts) 1130
TUTCHIN, JOHN 1195
Twicknam Garden 108
Upon a Bookseller 1184
Upon a Cloak Lent Him by Mr. J. Ridsley 873
Upon an Unhandsome Gentlewoman 222
Upon Appleton House 841
Upon his Picture 457
Upon His Leaving His Mistress 1156
Upon His Majesty's Repairing of Paul's 499
Upon Prudence Baldwin her Sickness 316
Upon the Death of my ever Desired Friend Dr Donne 356
Upon the death of Sir Albert Morton's Wife 75
Upon the Double Murder of K. Charles I 1008
Upon the Duke of Buckingham 1233
Upon the Hill and Grove at Bilbrough 840
Upon the Loss of His Mistresses 310
Upon the Mournful Death of our Late Soveraign Lord Charles the First, King of England, &c. 701
Upon the Saying that my Verses were Made by Another 1189
Upon Julia's Clothes 321
Vanity (I) 368
VAUGHAN, HENRY 872
Virtue 369
WALLER, EDMUND 498
WALWYN, WILLIAM 434
WATKYNS, ROWLAND 700
WEBSTER, JOHN 219
WHARTON, THOMAS 1174
When he would have his Verses Read 310
WILMOT, JOHN, EARL OF ROCHESTER 1155
WINSLOW, EDWARD 390
WINSTANLEY, GERRARD 632
Wishes. To his (supposed) Mistress 654

Wiston Vault 1011
Women's Speaking Justified, Proved, and Allowed 705
Wonder 1086
WOOD, ANTHONY À 1021
WOOLLEY, HANNAH 1276
WOTTON, HENRY 74
WROTH, LADY MARY 230
Young Coridon and Phillis 1096

The publication of The Broadview Anthology of Seventeenth-Century Verse and Prose is a literary event; this comprehensive volume is the first anthology of the period to reflect the breadth of seventeenth-century studies in recent decades. Over one hundred writers are included, from John Chamberlain at the beginning of the century to Elizabeth Singer Rowe at its end. There are generous selections from the work of all major writers, and a representation of the work of virtually every writer of significance. The work of women writers figures prominently, with extensive selections not only from canonical writers such as Behn and Bradstreet, but also from other writers (such as Katherine Philips and Margaret Cavendish) who have been receiving considerable scholarly attention in recent years.

The anthology is broadly inclusive, with writing from America as well as from the British Isles. Memoirs, letters, political texts, travel writing, prophetic literature, street ballads, and pamphlet literature are all here, as is a full representation of the literary poetry and prose of the period, including the poetry of Jonson; the prose of Bacon; the metaphysical poetry of Donne, Herbert, Marvell, and others; the lyric verse of Herrick; and substantial selections from the poetry and prose of Milton and Dryden. (While Samson Agonistes is included in its entirety, Milton's epic poems have been excluded, in order to allow space for other works not so readily accessible elsewhere.)

The editors have included complete works wherever possible. A headnote by the editors introduces each author, and each selection has been newly annotated.

Alan Rudrum, a Professor Emeritus of English Literature at Simon Fraser University and the anthology's senior editor, has published extensively on seventeenth-century British literature; Joseph Black, an Assistant Professor in the English Department at the University of Tennessee, has published articles on sixteenth- and seventeenth-century British literature and book history; Holly Faith Nelson, who recently obtained her doctorate from Simon Fraser University, is a Lecturer at Trinity Western University.

Cover: Abraham Hondius, "The Frozen Thames Looking Eastwards towards Old London Bridge," 1677 (Museum of London).
Cover design: George Kirkpatrick

ISBN 1-55111-053-9
9 781551 110530

$69.95

P7-EKX-575